43922

PUBLIC
LIBR

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2013

http://archive.org/details/nation123julnewy

The Nation

A WEEKLY JOURNAL DEVOTED TO

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE
DRAMA, MUSIC, ART
INDUSTRY

FOUNDED 1865

43022

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

VOLUME CXXIII

JULY 7, 1926, TO DECEMBER 29, 1926

THE NATION, Inc.
20 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK

43922

INDEX TO VOLUME CXXIII

JULY 7, 1926, TO DECEMBER 29, 1926

(Nos. 3183-3208)

The following letters are used to indicate the type of article:

A Art
C Correspondence
D Drama
Dt Driftway
E Editorial Article
EP Editorial Paragraph
I International Relations, Documents
IP International Relations, Foreign Press
IS International Relations, Signed Articles
M Music
P Poetry
S Signed Article

Book reviews and reviewers are indexed separately in the Book Review Section.

A

Abbott, Mather A.
The new generation; S..... 587
Abyssinia
Appeals to the league; IP..... 230
Appeals to the league. J. M. Kenworthy; IS..... 280
Great Britain and Italy compromise difficulties; EP..... 258
A cavalcade into the mountains in Russia; Dt. 346
Accidents
Forty-three miners trapped underground; EP..... 335
Adams, Samuel Hopkins; E..... 628
Adolescence
Twenty years of adolescence. M. Bachrach; S..... 428
A., D. P.
Oregon—Staunchly conservative; C..... 128
Advertising
Sweet land of buncombe; E..... 338
Advertising association
Need of a bureau of standards; EP..... 466
Praise from President Coolidge, but advertising methods misleading; EP..... 466
Aeronautics
Airplanes and safety; E..... 500
An air law for America. M. W. Royse; S. 659
Effect of flying on evolution of languages; Dt..... 666
Hopeful and profitable development; EP.. 186
Our airfleet a century ago. L. N.; C.... 59
Postmaster General New urges private enterprise; EP..... 186
The shrinking globe; IP..... 111
Aiken, S. C., lynching; EP..... 388
Ainsworth, Clara
Profits—Service?; C..... 129
Algeria
France in Algeria and Tunisia. E. Knowlton; IS..... 303
Alien property. See Enemy property
Allegash voters' political indifference; Dt..... 13
Allen, Harbor
"I believe in free speech, but——"; S.... 240
Allen, Robert S.
Progressive Wisconsin wins and loses; S.. 502
Alsberg, Henry G.
Petlura; C..... 128
Amalgamated clothing workers
Achievements through organization; EP... 115
Undertake construction of apartment buildings. J. Rorty; S..... 323
American federation of labor
Learns who its enemies are; EP..... 387
William Green's convention. B. Stolberg; S..... 449
American legion
Divided opinion with regard to reunion in Paris; EP..... 285
Education à la legion. U. Sinclair; C.... 348
American library association
Raises question how important knowledge may be diffused among people; EP..... 389
American Methodist missionaries
Demand admission of Asiatics to American citizenship; EP..... 141
Amerindian verse
The road to the spring. M. Austin; S.... 360
Anabtawy, Nazmie H.
The French activities in Syria; IS..... 136
An American tragedy. P. Kearney (adapter); D..... 460
Anddle, J. K.
Letter to Roger Baldwin on oath of allegiance; E..... 551
Andersen, Hans Christian
Two unpublished tales—Quack; The copy clerk..... 57
Anderson, Paul Y.
Exposes fraud in dissemination of news; E..... 629
Andrews, Lincoln Clark
Successful prohibition mission to England; EP..... 159
Anonymous
Mother's daughter..... 633
The making of a militant..... 553
The peacock's tail..... 664
Why I earn my own living..... 579
Anti-picketing injunction
Defied by multitudes of men and women; EP..... 439
Antiquity
Refrigerated mammoths; E..... 628
Archaeology
Prospecting for buried worlds. I. Treat; S..... 528
Arizona
Arizona's river. G. W. P. Hunt; C..... 128
Delayed election news. F. C. Lockwood; C 507
Arkansas
Courtin' night in Arkansas. H. Wight; C. 453
"Dry" [J. E. Martineau]. P. C. Snodgrass; C..... 247
Armaments
Evading the Washington treaty. S. Bent; S..... 55
Failure of proposal to extend limitation of naval construction; EP..... 113
Fairness to Russia must precede reduction of European armies; EP..... 113
Armistice day
President's address at Kansas City; EP... 519
The new generation. M. A. Abbott; S.... 587
Army and Navy Journal; EP..... 677
Art
Brancusi. W. Pach; S..... 566
Modern art: Genesis or Exodus? L. Lozowick; S..... 672
Roy Van Auken Sheldon. P. Loving; S.. 227
The background of art. G. Howe; C.... 667
The plastic artist in America. R. M. Pearson; S..... 364
Words of cheer for worms. C. J. Ducasse; S..... 228
Asquith, Herbert Henry
Mr. Asquith retires; E..... 443
Asquith, Margot
On usefulness of intimate memoirs; E.... 628
"As swinish as the owners." J. L.; C..... 403
Astronomy
The size of the sky; E..... 163
Athletics
Severance of relations between Harvard and Princeton; EP..... 520
Austin, Mary
Mary Austin on alcohol. W. G. Clugston, H. M. Rosenthal, E. H. Whelan, S. D. B. Hyllebourne; C..... 83
Not to you only, O Pythian; P..... 601
The road to the spring; S..... 360
Automobile-liability insurance
Massachusetts leads way; E..... 392

B

Bacon, Roger
Friar Bacon; E..... 656
Bachrach, Marion
Twenty years of adolescence; S..... 428
Baker, Mary Francis
—Advt.; C..... 175
Baker, Newton
Speaks bluntly about inter-allied debts; EP 233
Baldwin, Roger N., and others
In Horthy's Hungary; C..... 297
Balance sheet
More assets and liabilities. M. A. Patterson; C..... 560
Balance sheet of a crank; Dt..... 480
"Balfour principle," the; S..... 77
Balkans
Mussolini's treaty with Albania rouses Jugoslavia; EP..... 653
Baltzell, Robert C.; EP..... 160
Bankers
The great free-trade manifesto; E..... 442
Barnhill, John Basil
The ayes have it; C..... 128
Barrett, Clara
Makes heroic effort to cross Channel; EP. 139
Barry, Tom
The immortal thief. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 409
Bathing
Bathing suit hailed as costume of the future; EP..... 49
Bäumer, Gertrud
Writes on censorship bill before Reichstag; E..... 682
Baumes, Caleb H.
Crime and punishment; E..... 313
Baumes law
Judge Taylor tests its mandatory character; EP..... 496
Revolt among the judges; EP..... 574
Bausman, Frederick
Indorses President Coolidge on war debts; C..... 508
B., D. G.
More work for Cal; C..... 640
Beals, Carleton
Baron Banana in Puerto Barrios; S..... 241
Calles is gaining in Mexico; S..... 320
The Mexican church goes on strike; S.... 145
The Nicaraguan farce; S..... 631
Bean, Louis H.
The agricultural recovery; S..... 219
Beard, Charles A.
The great American tradition; S..... 7
Beffel, John Nicholas
The lost art of profanity; S..... 270
Bell, Bernard Iddings
The worm turns; C..... 247
Bell, Gertrude. Obituary; EP..... 69
Benavente y Martínez, Jacinto
Saturday night. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 488
Bent, Silas
Evading the Washington treaty; S..... 55
The Hall-Mills case in the newspapers; S.. 580
Berlack, Harris
What about Florida?; C..... 453
Beyond the horizon. E. O'Neill; D..... 647
Billings, Jr., John
Oil and the wheels of justice; S..... 75
Biography
James Ralph, jack of all literary trades. R. F. Dibble; S..... 361
Who's what?; E..... 238
Black boy. J. Tully and F. Dazey; D..... 435
Blake, William Difference between bad and good artist; E 141
Blanshard, Paul
Manhunting on the subway; S..... 74
Blount, Michael
A California liberal; S..... 12
Board of superintendents of New York city
Are teachers muzzled?; E..... 523
Bogan, Louise
Dark river; P..... 359
Second song; P..... 246
Bolivar, Simon
The Bolivar centennial. E. E. Curtis; IS.. 182
Books
Officially pure. J. T. Moutoux; C..... 106
Borah, William E.
Demands abolition of poison gas; EP..... 678
Denounces policy of force against China; EP..... 547
Boston Journalist
Silent Cal's silent partner; S..... 424
Boston university
Abolishes compulsory military training; EP 520
Botany consolidated mills; EP..... 679
Bothwell, Austin
Real Indians in the real north; C..... 37
Boulder dam and All-American canal
Bill to make project a public development; EP..... 2
Bourdet, Edouard
The captive. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D 409
Boxing
Outcome of Dempsey-Tunney fight; EP.... 311
The fake of the century; E..... 313
Boyd, Susie; EP..... 95
Boyd, Thomas; S..... 345
Brailsford, Henry N.; EP..... 466
Brailsford, Henry N.
An editor's farewell; IP..... 518
Brandeis, Louis
Passes seventieth birthday; EP..... 520
Brandes, Georg; E..... 261
Breckinridge, Desha; EP..... 651
Brenner, Anita
Idols behind altars; S..... 396
Bressler, Harry S.
Cartoons..... 393, 582
Briggs, George A.
Beyond Ford's utopia; C..... 175
Brite, Mary D.
Free speech (?) in Cincinnati; S..... 344
British commonwealth of nations
Britannia still rules; E..... 577
Report of inter-imperial relations committee of imperial conference; I.....590, 648
Broadway. P. Dunning and G. Abbot; D.... 330
Brodsky, B.; S..... 323
Bronson, Jean Jacques; E..... 72
Broun, Heywood
Sermon on censorship; EP..... 23
Brown, R.
De Valera's position; C..... 222
Buck, Pearl S.
The emotional nature of the Chinese; S.. 269
Buckner, Emory R.
Outlines case against Daugherty and Miller; EP..... 257
Buckner, Emory R.; EP..... 496
Bulgaria
They starve in Bulgaria. A. Rochester; C. 59
Tsanko Bakaloff Tserkovsky. T. Geshkoff; C..... 196
Bunnell, Milie
Warning with regard to newspapers; EP.. 627

Bureaucracy
Stupid treatment of immigrants; EP..... 496
Bureau of naturalization
The oath of allegiance; E..... 551
Bureau of standards; EP..... 466
Burns, Anthony
Remember Anthony Burns. F. Landon; C. 481
Busick, Charles O.
Defeated in election; EP..... 234
Butler, C. R.
Treason!; C..... 667
Butler, William M.
Silent Cal's silent partner. Boston Journalist; S..... 424
Byington, Steven T.
Disguised as itself?; C..... 453
Is grammar bunk; C..... 59

C

California
A California liberal. M. Blount; S..... 12
California's new governor. G. P. West; S. 502
Conflict between white and yellow ends in triumph of latter; EP..... 416
Mixed interpretations of election result; EP 234
Calkins, Clinch
What will she do with seven fat years?; P 668
Canada
Alberta run by farmers; EP..... 114
Byng or King": issue in election. R. De Brisay; S..... 213
Ontario goes wet; EP..... 626
Political pendulum swings toward liberals; EP..... 284
West lines up against Quebec; EP..... 21
Cannon, Joseph; E..... 550
Joseph Cannon. Obituary; E..... 521
Caponsacchi. A. Goodrich and R. A. Palmer; D..... 514
Captive. E. Bourdet; D..... 409
Carter, John
Putting America in a hole—the lesson of the debts; S..... 77
Castles in the air. R. W. Peck; D..... 279
Cathode tube; EP..... 441
Catullus, Caius Valerius
Catullus again. M. A. Gaffney; C..... 151
Bill Hard translates Catullus. W. Hard; C 14
Censorship
The cruelty of censorship; E..... 25
The unwilling censor; E..... 117
Central America
Baron Banana in Puerto Barrios. C. Beals; S..... 241
Central Park
Sun-burned slopes evoke other scenes and memories; Dt..... 272
Chandler, J. A. C.
Interprets Declaration of independence to Ku klux klan; EP..... 388
Channel swimming
Championship of Georges Michel; EP.... 259
Gade, Mille [Mrs. Clemington Corson]; EP 206
Vierkoetter, Ernst; EP..... 206
Chao Hsin-chu; E..... 312
Chao-Ying Shill
Americanized China; C..... 430
Chaplin, Charlie
"That film"; IP..... 306
Chase, Stuart
Gasless America; S..... 586
My great-great-grandfather and I; S..... 190
Henry Ford's utopia; S..... 53
Chekhov, Anton
The three sisters. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 488
Chemical foundation case
Investors, beware!; E..... 419
Cheney, O. H.
Discusses competition in Nation's Business; E..... 70
Chenkin, Rose Yuni
Florida?; C..... 325
Chen Yu-jen
No money for Peking; IS..... 256
Chi-Chen Wang
Indispensability dispensed; C..... 482
Chicherin, George
The USSR and the Chinese Eastern railway; IS..... 491
China
Americanized China. Chao-Ying Shill; C.. 430
America's job in China. L. S. Gannett; S. 211
An army that liberates. F. Hsingchi Liu; C..... 430
Bad manners at Geneva [Chao Hsin-chu's protest]; E..... 312
Bolshevism in China. L. S. Gannett; S.. 171
Chiang Kai-shek threatens Shanghai; EP.. 416
China: the world's proletariat. L. S. Gannett; S..... 122
Continuing success of Canton soldiers; EP 234
Danger of dilution of Canton spirit; EP.. 416
Dunning China; E..... 236
England waging private wars in China; EP 258
Foreign rule in Shanghai. J. H. Dolsen; IS..... 542
I never liked missionaries . . . L. S. Gannett; S..... 79
Is China being Americanized? L. S. Gannett; S..... 31
Kwangtung most hopeful spot; EP..... 48
No glamor in maneuvers of British warships; EP..... 258
No money for Peking! Chen Yu-jen; IS. 256
Nonsense [attitude of Powers]; E..... 575
Sun Yat-sen's "San Min Chu I"; S..... 635
Talks in her sleep; E..... 522
The edge of China. L. S. Gannett; S.... 526
The emotional nature of the Chinese. P. S. Buck; S..... 269
The nationalists take Wuchang. A. Rochester; S..... 635
The propaganda war in China. L. M. Karakhan; IS..... 138
The USSR and the Chinese Eastern railway. G. Chicherin; IS..... 491
The voice of Wanhsien. H. S. Hsung and four others; C..... 559
Tide of nationalism continues to swell; EP 185
Threat of strike assembles flotilla at Hankow; EP..... 626
Truce in civil war; EP..... 465
Use of force denounced by Senator Borah; EP..... 547
What every coolie knows; E..... 391
When patience is iconoclasm. L. M. Crosgrave; C..... 454
Wu Pei-fu and Chang Tso-lin join hands; EP..... 48
Christmas charity
The annual Christmas side-shows. E. Lyons; S..... 684
Christian churches of Detroit
Cower when non-union employers crack their whips; EP..... 387
Christmas puddin'; E..... 654
Church, C. C.
Communism in marriage; S..... 124
Civic conduct
A Hard dilemma. W. Hard; C..... 128
Civic repertory theater (Eva Le Gallienne); D 488
Clapper, Raymond
Doheny and Fall face justice; S..... 525
Doheny—a portrait in oil; S..... 658
Clemenceau, Georges
Writes letter to Coolidge; EP..... 139
Cline, Charles
After prison, thanks; C..... 347
Clinton, De Witt
Career contrasted with Governor Smith's; EP..... 4
Clugston, W. G.
Mary Austin on alcohol; C..... 83
Cobham, Sir Alan; Dt..... 666
Colby, Elbridge
Justice in Georgia; S..... 32
College or country club?; E..... 288
College journalism
Commendable work of Vassar Journal of Undergraduate Studies; EP..... 69
Collins, Chapin
A political crisis in education; S..... 445
Colorado
Ku klux klan routed in election; EP..... 284
Communism . . . a religion? L. Fischer; S.. 686
Competition—1926 model; E..... 70
Concord, Massachusetts
The old Concord tradition. C. L. de Normandie; C..... 129
Condylis, Georges; EP..... 185
Conference of Dominion premiers in London
Empire not collapsing, but geography and economics outweigh historical sentiment; EP..... 439
Conference of League of nations societies
Lazarus. M. Kelsey; C..... 348
Congress of the United States
Unjust apportionment of congressional seats; EP..... 1
Conklin, Robert J.
On the purity of readers; C..... 175
Contempt of court
Lese majeste [case of George R. Dale]; E. 142
Convict leasing
Barbarism to convicts. B. M. McConnell; S..... 479
County-jail system. J. K. Jaffray; C.... 530
Cooking
Bad cooking threatens scheme to colonize Porto Rican laborers in Arizona; EP.. 440
Coolidge, Calvin
A canny child, young Calvin built; EP... 309
A third term for Coolidge?; S..... 685
Calvin Coolidge, socialist; E..... 655
Changes from position to position; EP.... 677
Coolidge for mayor! L. H. J.; C..... 530
Discredits railroad labor act by questionable appointments to board of mediation; EP 68
Excerpt from speech at Cambridge, July 3, 1925; S..... 421
More work for Cal. D. G. B.; C..... 640
Mr. Coolidge, the election, and the future; E..... 498
Reappoints Henry H. Glassie to tariff commission; E..... 261
Reception of Queen Marie causes first alarm in several years; EP..... 389
Spokesman, what of the night?; E..... 286
Surrenders to senators from North Dakota; EP..... 625
Utterances on tax reduction "put gang in bad"; EP..... 547
Utters weasel-worded sentiments on armistice day; EP..... 519
Vacation worries; EP..... 67
Coolidge, William David
Cathode tube controlling billions of electrons; EP..... 441
Cooper, Hugh L.
Touches a dream [hydroelectric development on Dnieper river]; E..... 311
Corday, Michel; E..... 72 Corruption
Use of money in elections; E..... 143
Cotton
Cotton goes West. M. Stern; S..... 29
California Cotton Journal's prophecy regarding cotton..... 30
Problem of how to deal with ruinous effects of overproduction; EP..... 416
Cotton growers' association of Arizona
Encounters difficulties in colonizing Porto Rican laborers; EP..... 440
Cotton industry
Organization the great need; EP..... 115
Conditions in southern mills; EP..... 115
Countess Maritza. E. Kalman; D..... 330
Couturiers' association vs. International ladies' garment workers union; S..... 689
Coward, Noel
This was a man. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 647
Craton, Ann Washington
Bertha, the sewing-machine girl; S..... 689
Crawford, Nelson Antrim
The New England farm comes back; S... 169
Crime
Crime and punishment; E..... 313
Epicures in crime; E..... 681
The problem of crime remains; E..... 98
Study and treatment of individual delinquent; E..... 98
Crosgrave, Lloyd M.
When patience is iconoclasm; C..... 454
Crossley, Stella
Real estate vs. human lives in Florida; S. 341
Florida cashes in her chips; S..... 11
Crowther, Rodney
Look-a-way, Dixieland!; C..... 691
Cuba
American intermeddling in island's affairs; EP..... 22
Cummins, Albert B. Obituary; EP..... 113
Cummings, Edward. Obituary; EP..... 627
Curti, M.
The peace department, 1821; C..... 247
Curtis, Edward E.
The Bolivar centennial; IS..... 182
Czecho-Slovakia
Germans admitted to cabinet; EP..... 415

D

D'Abernon, Viscount Edgar Vincent
Lays foundations of Locarno pacts; EP.. 336
Daisy Mayme. G. Kelly; D..... 488
Dale, George R.
Editor of Muncie, Indiana, Post-Democrat persecuted by klansmen; EP..... 68
Lese majeste; E..... 142
Damned souls society; EP..... 23
Damon, S. Foster
Commentary on John x, 34; P..... 693
Epitaphs; P..... 274
Damrosch, Walter
Walter Damrosch retires; E..... 681
Danchakoff, Vera
Communism comes to the village; S..... 474
Darrow, Clarence; EP..... 678
Das, Mary K.
A woman without a country; S..... 105
Daugherty, Harry M.
Daugherty at the bar. E. Mels; S..... 423
Emory R. Buckner will retry Daugherty and Miller; EP..... 496
Failure of jury to convict; EP..... 415
Government's case against him; EP..... 257
Davidson, Donald
Martha and shadow; P..... 148
Davis, Julia Johnson
Bones; P..... 197
Davis, Owen
Sandalwood. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D. 384
Dawes plan
S. Parker Gilbert's report for second year; EP..... 626
Death-rate figures
So-so figures. T. A. Larremore; C..... 297
De Brisay, Richard
"Byng or King": issue in election; S.... 213
Debs, Eugene Victor
Eugene Victor Debs; E..... 443
Decadence
Decadent French—where are they?; EP... 283
Deep river. L. Stallings and W. F. Harling; D..... 409
Delacroix, Léon; EP..... 336
Dell, Robert
The French family commits murder; S.... 665
Democratic experiment; EP..... 1
Dempsey, Jack; EP..... 311
Dempsey-Tunney prize-fight
Higher education in California. F. L. Martin; C..... 402
War, inc. G. Williamson; C..... 403
Denmark
Denmark and the free-trade conference. C. C. Platt; IS..... 202
Denmark (Lake) navy arsenal explosions
Callousness of Dover Rotary Club; EP..... 67
The king may do no wrong; E..... 71
de Normandie, Charles L.
The old Concord tradition; C..... 129
Desert song; D..... 697
Deutsch, Babette
Animula vagula; P..... 359
De Valera, Eamonn
De Valera's position. R. Brown; C..... 222
De Valera, Eamonn; S..... 120
Diaz, Adolfo
Recognized as president, does bidding of masters; EP..... 548

Dibble, Roy Floyd
James Ralph, jack of all literary trades; S. 361
Disarmament
Is Germany disarmed? L. Fischer; S.... 394
Secretary Kellogg's Plattsburg speech; EP. 185
Ditto, J. R.
The Garvey gospel; C..... 273
Djerzinsky, Felix. Obituary; EP..... 96
Doheny, E. L.
E. L. Doheny, LL.D. T. Ruadh; C..... 38
Doheny-Fall case
Doheny and Fall face justice. R. Clapper; S..... 525
Doheny—a portrait in oil. R. Clapper; S. 658
Government by crooks?; E..... 680
Suppression of Gleaves documents; EP.... 677
Navy department guilty; EP..... 651
Dole, Nathan Haskell
The agonies of orthodoxy; C..... 325
Dolsen, James H.
Foreign rule in Shanghai; IS..... 542
Drama
Next winter in the theater; E..... 98
Should actors be themselves? P. B. Wadsworth; C..... 453
"Singing jailbirds." U. Sinclair, E. Wilkinson; C..... 247
Taking life seriously; E..... 313
Ducasse, C. J.
Words of cheer for worms; S..... 228
Duke, James B.; C..... 691
Dunn, Robert W.
The red raids; S..... 267
Dunning, P., and G. Abbot
Broadway. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D.. 330

E

Eastman, Max
Dagger; P..... 483
Max Eastman and Mr. Ochs's money; C.. 640
Reveals Lenin's "testament"; EP..... 415
Eastward progress of western civilization; EP 23
Ederle, Gertrude
Wins her roadster; EP..... 139
Eddy, Sherwood
Russia, the land of contradictions; IS. 349, 410
Edison, Thomas A.
Starts first rumble in possible radio collapse; EP..... 337
Edloff, E. E.
How to have honest elections; C..... 222
Education
A political crisis in education. C. Collins; S..... 445
Attempt in Louisiana to curtail freedom of education; EP..... 48
Censoring textbooks in Texas; EP..... 95
College or country club?; E..... 288
Dismissal of J. E. Kirkpatrick by trustees of Olivet college; EP..... 3 Independence brings trouble for President Hall of Oregon State university; EP.... 96
Religion in the medical schools. S. Michels; C..... 247
Remarks on, by Harry Emerson Fosdick; EP..... 549
Should colleges be treadmills?; E..... 163
Test for admission to Loyola college of medicine; EP..... 113
The case against education [Hankin]; E.. 26
The worm turns. R. I. Bell; C..... 247
What is a college president?; EP..... 3
Edward Albert, prince of Wales
Sends £10 to Somersetshire coalfields distress committee; EP..... 235
Edwards, H.
For Mr. Mellon to answer; C..... 402
Edwards, Major General Clarence R.
Faith in the youth of America; EP..... 259
Ehrman, Chester S.
Mary, guaranteed genuine; C..... 175
Elections—Great Britain
Labor triumphs in municipal elections; EP. 496
Elections—United States
Delayed news from Arizona. F. C. Lockwood; C..... 507
Forecast of impending elections; E..... 418
How to have honest elections. E. E. Edloff; C..... 222
Interpretation of primary elections; E.... 260
Subterfuges in addition to expenditure of money in Pennsylvania; EP..... 652
The outcome in three states; S..... 502
Eliot, Charles W. Obituary; EP..... 186
Eliot, Charles W.; C..... 454
Eliot, Charles W.
Eliot: iconoclast and builder. G. Frank; S. 293
Eliot, T. S., editor of New Criterion; EP..... 259
Emden, German cruiser; E..... 469
"Encyclopaedia Britannica"
Peace in the Encyclopaedia; E..... 420
Return to great traditions of the work; E 420
Enemy property
Activities of Senator Moses; EP..... 625
Compromise bill passed in House; EP.... 678
Investors, beware!; E..... 419
English, George W.
Resigns on eve of impeachment proceedings; EP..... 495
Enticing day-dreams as to where one would live; Dt..... 402
Escape from modern life—is there any?; Dt. 452
Escoffier, Auguste
Reflections on American cooking; Dt.... 529
Esperanto as an aid in travel abroad; Dt.... 74
Europe
America's crop of hate. O. G. Villard; S. 126
Economic reorganization; EP..... 140
France and Germany, friends. I. Treat; S. 688
Evans, (Miss) Ernestine
How old is Will?; C..... 530
Evans, Ernestine
Potemkin; D..... 252
Evolution
Religion and evolution. B. Shadwell; C.. 222
Ewer, W. N.
Why was the British strike called off?; S. 9

F

Fall-Doheny case. See Doheny-Fall case
Falstaff, Jake
The Cock; P..... 35
Noah; P..... 473
Famous Names, Inc.
Sweet land of buncombe; E..... 338
Fanny. W. Mack and D. Belasco; D..... 385
Farmers—Canada
Alberta in control of farmers; EP..... 114
Farmers—United States
Are farm-land speculators entitled to pity? B. C. Marsh; S..... 400
Are farm speculators entitled to pity? E. Henderson; C..... 481
Bilked again by Congress; EP..... 1
Haugen bill sent to ashheap; EP..... 1
Price-fixing for the farmer. H. Shipstead; S..... 101
The agricultural recovery. L. H. Bean; S. 219
The New England farm comes back. N. A. Crawford; S..... 169
The tariff and the farmer. G. W. Norris; S..... 192
Why New England prospers. G. F. Weeks; C..... 297
Farrington, Frank; E..... 237
Fascism
A nation gone mad; E..... 499
In defense of fascism. V. Zorin; C..... 588
Federal oil conservation board
Waste in exploitation of oil wells; E.... 390
Feinstein, Martin
A Venezuelan speaks; C..... 273
Mr. Bruce spills; C..... 589
Fellowship of youth for peace
Encounters hostility in Concord, Massachusetts; EP..... 49
Herald reporter comments on Fred Marvin's speech; EP..... 49
Ferguson, Governor Miriam
Pardons six Mexican revolutionists; EP... 205
Ferril, Thomas Hornsby
Bride; P..... 76
Finance—France
Caillaux's measures to save franc; EP.... 2
Falling franc continues to worry politicians; EP..... 48
How to stop the tumbling franc; EP..... 67
Finance—Great Britain
Interesting items in the financing of a great iron and coal company; EP.... 389
Finck, Henry T.
Critics and criticized; E..... 444
Obituary; EP..... 337
Fischer, Louis
Communism . . . a religion?; S..... 686
How America fools herself; S..... 166
Is Germany disarmed?; S..... 394
Nine years of bolshevism; S..... 471
Flags
What is a flag?; EP..... 259
Florida
—Advt. M. F. Baker; C..... 175
Conscription of unemployed after hurricane; EP..... 310
Curious paradoxes in regard to Negroes; EP..... 186
Florida again. Mrs. O. R. Lovejoy; C.... 482
Florida cashes in her chips. S. Crossley; S..... 11
Hurricane makes all men kin; EP..... 283
Real estate vs. human lives. S. Crossley; S 341
What about Florida? H. Berlack; C..... 453
Forgotten letters; Dt..... 429
Ford, Henry
Beyond Ford's utopia. G. A. Briggs; C.. 175
Forward (Glasgow); EP..... 389
Fosdick, Frank Sheldon; EP..... 548
Fosdick, Harry Emerson
Concerning end of true education; EP.... 549
Denounces war department in armistice speech; EP..... 520
Fourteen points
That armistice pledge. M. Hentschke; C. 273
Fourth commonwealth conference, in session at the State University of Iowa..... 7
Fox, Dorothy
Escaping Seventh street; C..... 36
France
Army to be cut and term of compulsory training reduced; EP..... 519
Chamber of deputies declares sale of "pacifiers" for babies illegal; EP..... 115
Clemenceau's letter to Coolidge; EP..... 139
Economic understanding with Germany; EP..... 284
France and her politicians. O. G. Villard; S..... 395
Galaxy of ex-premiers in cabinet; EP.... 96
New books in France. R. Lalou; S..... 533
Peace tendencies in France. A. Lowry; IS 19
Poincaré's efforts to restore finances of his country; EP..... 139
Tentative economic agreement with Germany becomes clearer; EP..... 309
The French activities in Syria. N. H. Anabtawy; IS..... 136
The French family commits murder. R. Dell; S..... 665
Refuses to be stampeded by Mussolini's threats; EP..... 284
France, Anatole
When Boswells fall out; E..... 72
Francis, Rothschild
Further prosecution at hands of Virgin Islands authorities; EP..... 574
Frank, Glenn
Eliot: iconoclast and builder; S..... 293
Fraser, Lindley M.
Poor old Britain; C..... 691
Frazier, E. Franklin
Garvey: a mass leader; S..... 147
Free competition vs. organized industry
Dear old private initiative; E..... 390
Free press
A battle of editors. F. Paul; S..... 345
Lese majeste [limitation of freedom through contempt cases]; E..... 142
Free speech
Free speech (?) in Cincinnati. M. D. Brite; S..... 344
"I believe in free speech, but——." H. Allen; S..... 240
Upheld by board of regents of university of Utah; EP..... 651
Free trade
A plea for free trade; I..... 461
Denmark and the free-trade conference. C. C. Platt; IS..... 202
Free traders convene. C. C. Platt; C..... 14
The great free-trade manifesto; E..... 442
Friedum, S. F.
Another modern woman; C..... 667
Frothingham, Paul Revere. Obituary; EP..... 627

G

Gade, Mille; EP..... 206
Gaffney, Margaret A.
Catullus again; C..... 151
Gandhi, Mohandas Karamchand
If Gandhi were emperor; E..... 209
Gannett, Lewis S.
America's job in China; S..... 211
Bolshevism in China; S..... 171
China: the world's proletariat; S..... 122
I never liked missionaries . . . ; S..... 79
Is China being Americanized?; S..... 31
Mongolia—a nomad republic; S..... 55
The edge of China; S..... 26
Toward the Arctic ocean; S..... 584
Garrison, Frank W.
Laissez-faire; C..... 84
Garvey, Marcus
A mass leader. E. F. Frazier; S..... 147
The Garvey gospel. J. R. Ditto; C..... 273
Gassner, John Waldhorn
For a thief lynched; P..... 107
Gathering of international financiers to consider French finance; EP..... 67
Gay Paree; D..... 567
Gedye, G. E. R.
The real Hungary; IS..... 674
General motors and General Andrews; EP.... 159
General motors corporation
Distribution of fabulous profits; EP..... 159
Gentlemen prefer blondes. A. Loos and J. Emerson; D..... 409
Georgia
Justice in Georgia. E. Colby; S..... 32
Germany
Economic understanding with France; EP. 284
Enters the League of nations; E..... 236
France and Germany, friends. I. Treat; S. 688
Germany revisited. O. G. Villard; S..... 447
Give Germany her colonies. P. Snowden; S..... 56
"Interallied control" ceases January 31, 1927; EP..... 653
Is Germany disarmed? L. Fischer; S.... 394
Minority cabinet forced out; EP..... 678
New understanding with France agreeable to Germany; EP..... 309
Railway bonds, key to Franco-German reconciliation; EP..... 336
Saving Germany for chewing gum. L. Wender; C..... 106
Tentative economic agreement with France becomes clearer; EP..... 309
Under second year of Dawes plan; EP... 626
Geshkoff, Theodore
Tsanko Bakaloff Tserkovsky; C..... 196
Gilbert, A. B.
Who killed the Nonpartisan league; C.... 151
Gilbert, S. Parker
Report of second year of Dawes plan; EP 626
GilFillan, S. C.
Why profanity declines; C..... 481
Gipsies
Bury King at Trenton, N. J.; EP..... 285
Glassie, Henry H.; E..... 261
Glass, Montague, and J. E. Goodman
Potash and Perlmutter. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 279
Gleaves documents; EP..... 677
Gleason, Arthur
Glimpses of Arthur Gleason. H. H. Gleason; S.....102, 149, 194
Land of the free; S..... 243
Gleason, Helen Hayes
Glimpses of Arthur Gleason; S..102, 149, 194
"Global" tonnage; EP..... 48

Glyn, Elinor
Elinor Glyn's symposium on love; E..... 5
God loves us. J. P. McEvoy; D..... 459
Gold, Michael
At a workers' vacation camp; S..... 294
Where the battle is fought; C..... 37
"Gold Rush"
"That film"; IP..... 306
Good fellow; D..... 409
Goodrich, Arthur, and Rose A. Palmer
Caponsacchi. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D. 514
Gordon, Irving
"Professor Sam, militarist"; C..... 272
Gordon, John Wesley [Left Wing Gordon]; E. 117
Gottschalk, Laura Riding
For all our sakes; P..... 130
For one who will believe; P..... 130
Gould, Arthur R.; EP..... 573
Government responsibility
The king may do no wrong; E..... 71
Gozzi, Carlo
The princess Turandot. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 567
Grand street follies. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 63
Grammar
Is grammar bunk? S. T. Byington; C.... 59
Graves, Robert
Pure death; P..... 509
Robert Graves. E. Muir; S..... 217
Great Britain
Britannia still rules; E..... 577
Comes to understanding with Italy in regard to Abyssinia; EP..... 258
J. M. Kenworthy withdraws from liberals and joins Labor party; EP..... 466
Private wars in China; EP..... 258
Great Britain—Colonies and dominions
What is the British empire? J. B. Hertzog; IS..... 44
Great Britain—Politics and government
Britain's midsummer mood. J. R. MacDonald; S..... 168
Labor makes sweeping gains in municipal elections; EP..... 496
Greece
Condylis replaces Pangalos, EP..... 185
Guam
Women in Guam. M. S. Lea; S..... 33
Guitry, Sacha
Mozart. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D.... 647
Guthrie, William D.
Argument against Mexico's anti-clerical legislation; EP..... 626
Guy, Justice Charles L.
Makes own law in form of an injunction; EP..... 439

H

Haggin, B. H.
Music and common sense—I; M..... 621
Music and the external world; M..... 382
The emotional trend in performance; M.. 180
Haiti
Significance of Louis Borno's visit; EP.. 22
Where American marines hold power. P. Thoby; C..... 129
Haldeman-Julius, E.
Adds Haldeman-Julius Quarterly to long list of publications; EP..... 337
Hall, Amanda Benjamin
Live epitaphs; P..... 176
Hall, Covington
Remarkabler yet; C..... 247
Hall-Stevens case
Acquittal of accused raises question of indemnification; EP..... 653
Hammerling, Louis N.; S..... 427
Hanbury Hankin says; E..... 26
Hand, Justice Learned
Tribute to Louis Brandeis; EP..... 520
Hard, William
A Hard dilemma; C..... 128
Bill Hard translates Catullus; C..... 14
Hardy, Thomas
A piece of literary intelligence not a scoop; EP..... 337
Hargrett, Lester
Henry Timrod; C..... 454
Harris, Frank
Divine wrath; C..... 347
Harris, Julian; S..... 345
Harris, Julian; EP..... 651
Harris, Louis I.
Condemns habit of shaking hands; E.... 521
Hartley, Governor Roland H.; S..... 445
Hastings, P.
Scotch mist. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D. 330
Hauptmann, Gerhart
Declines membership in German academy of poetry; IS..... 64
Hays, Will H.
How old is Will? (Miss) E. Evans; C... 530
Heckscher, August
Head as well as heart behind project for abolishing slums; EP..... 467
Solving the slums; C..... 482
Submits plan to eliminate city's slums; E. 419
Hell. C. E. Stowe; C..... 691
Henderson, Edward
Are farm speculators entitled to pity?; C. 481
Henry Ford's utopia. S. Chase; S..... 53
Hentschke, Max
That armistice pledge; C..... 273
Hepler, Hartley H.
He likes us; C..... 430
Herrmann, John, author of "What Happens"; E..... 117
Hersey, Mark L.
Wants military training for girls as well as boys; EP..... 416
Herzfeld, Max
The story of philosophers; C..... 347
Hertzog, J. B.
What is the British empire?; IS..... 44
Hindus
A woman without a country. M. K. Das; S 105
Justice to Hindus. J. T. Sunderland; C. 296
History
The American past [as seen by latest historians]; E..... 340
Hobhouse, Emily. Obituary; EP..... 235
Honorary degrees
Degrees of honor; E..... 4
Hoover, Herbert Clark
Rejoices over prosperity reached by country; EP..... 573
Horse show
Ghosts at the horse show; E..... 578
Houdini, Harry [Eric Weiss]. Obituary; EP.. 467
Hourwich, Rebecca
Three black women; S..... 505
Housing
The workers build their own. J. Rorty; S 322
Howard, Sydney
Ned McCobb's daughter. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 697
Howe, Gurdon
The background of art; C..... 667
Howland, Miss Emily
Honored on her hundredth birthday; EP.. 548
Hsingchi Liu, Frank
An army that liberates; C..... 430
Hsung, H. S., and four others
The voice of Wanhsien; C..... 559
Hubbard, Wynant Davis
My black brother Mafeking; S..... 315
Huebsch, B. W.
The northern literary world; S..... 532
Hughes, Langston
American art or Negro art; C..... 151
Humphries, Rolfe
Text for a bitter vision; P..... 359
Hungary
In Horthy's Hungary. R. N. Baldwin and others; C..... 297
The real Hungary. G. E. R. Gedye; IS.. 674
Trial of Matthias Rakosi and fifty-four other political prisoners; EP..... 140
Hunt, George W. P.
Arizona's river. G. W. P. Hunt; C..... 128
Hunter, Fred M.; EP..... 416
Hygiene
Don't kiss! Don't shake! Don't breathe. J. L. Morrison; C..... 640
Shake Hands!; E..... 521
Hyllebourne, Stephen D. B.
Mary Austin on alcohol; C..... 83

I

Ibsen, Henrik
The master-builder. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 513
Ice age
Refrigerated mammoths; E..... 628
If I was rich. W. A. McGuire; D..... 279
Illinois
Corrupt use of money in Republican senatorial primaries; EP..... 113
Money in political campaigns; EP..... 95
Remarkabler yet. C. Hall; C..... 247
The candidacy of Hugh S. Magill; EP... 387
Votes for corruption. C. C. Nash, Jr.; S. 503
Immortal thief. T. Barry; D..... 409
Imperial airways
Airplanes and safety; E..... 500
Imperialism
Who's who in America. R. F. Pettigrew; C 348
Independent, St. Petersburg, Florida; EP..... 627
India
If Gandhi were emperor; E..... 209
Indiana
Revolt against the Ku klux klan; EP.... 387
Indians—North American
Real Indians in the real north. A. Bothwell; C..... 37
Industrial corporations
Professor Ripley pokes the pig; E..... 208
Industrial council of cloak, suit, and skirt manufacturers; EP..... 439
Industry
Extension of factory system to tropics; E. 162
Inge, William Ralph
Draws gloomy picture of England; EP... 337
Injunctions
Relative values of injunction against breaking a labor contract and the anti-picketing injunction; EP..... 161
Insull, Samuel; EP..... 113
Internal revenue bureau
Figures indicating prosperity of the few; EP..... 233
Internal-revenue collections
For Mr. Mellon to answer. H. Edwards; C..... 402
International congress of philosophers
First since world war; EP..... 259
International ladies' garment workers
Imprisonment in Chicago for engaging in strike in 1924; EP..... 68
Terms of settlement with "inside manufacturers"; EP..... 548
Ireland
My adopted mother. H. W. Nevinson; S.. 120
Irving, Laurence
The humble. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D. 460
Italy
A nation gone mad; E..... 499
Compromises Abyssinian difficulties with Great Britain; EP..... 258
Mussolini out-Bonaparts Napoleon; EP.... 48
Reestablishment of nine-hour day in Italian industry; EP..... 21
Victor Emmanuel opposes decree reestablishing death penalty; EP..... 440

J

Jaffray, Julia K.
County-jail system; C..... 530
Japan
Alien land law; IP..... 544
Insurgency of university students; EP.... 115
Japan in Manchuria; IP..... 490
Methodist missionaries demand admission of Asiatics to American citizenship; EP. 141
Okada's order to colleges and schools; IS. 436
Return to feudalism. H. E. Wildes; IS.. 436
Rickshas supplanted by motor trucks; EP 235
Weirdly mixed of medieval and modern; EP 652
Jeffersonism in Denver: democracy receives a queen; Cartoon..... 583
Jefferson's disciples—1926 model. Harry S. Bressler; Cartoon..... 582
Jenks, Leland Hamilton; EP..... 22
Jennings, Leslie Nelson
Vanguard; P..... 326
Jersey justice
Severe blow dealt by conduct of Hall-Mills murder trial; EP.....141, 574
Wholesale arrests for violating a 1798 law; EP..... 653
Jesus Christ
Is Jesus a myth?; E..... 261
Jeweled tree. G. C. Pier; D..... 435
J., L. H.
Coolidge for mayor; C..... 530
Johnson, James Weldon; EP..... 388
Jones, Paul
Something eerie on the Erie; C..... 403
Jordan, Laurence
Retreat; P..... 152
Journalism. See Newspapers
Juarez and Maximilian. F. Werfel; D..... 435
Jurisprudence
Evolution in legal education; E..... 143
Just life. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 302

K

Kahan, Israel
Thank God for the Bronx!; C..... 324
Kalman, E.
Countess Maritza. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 330
Kane, Florence Bayard
Professor Sam, militarist; C..... 297
Karakhan, L. M.
The propaganda war in China; IS..... 138
Kearney, Patrick (adapter)
An American tragedy. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 459
Kellock, Harold
Soviet industry; IS..... 490
Kellogg, Frank Billings; EP..... 185
Kelly, George
Daisy Mayme. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 488
Kelsey, Mary
Lazarus; C..... 348
Kemmerer, Edwin Walter; EP..... 336
Kemp, Harry
The answer; P..... 322
Kent, Frank R.
A third term for Coolidge?; S..... 685
Kentucky
Lynchings of Negroes prevented, but unjust prosecutions continue; EP..... 310
Kenworthy, Joseph Montague
Abyssinia appeals to the league; IS..... 280
Kenworthy, Joseph Montague; EP..... 466
Kenyon, William S.; EP..... 336
Khayyam, Omar; C..... 560
King, Willard E.
Listen; C..... 59
Kizkage, Carl
Saintly St. Louis; C..... 530
Knickers
Right of small girls to appear in knickers in Indiana and Kentucky schools; EP.417, 440
Knights of Columbus
Inaugurates campaign of education on conditions in Mexico; EP..... 141
Knowlton, Elizabeth
France in Algeria and Tunisia; IS..... 303
Kollontai, Alexandra
Exclusion by Secretary Kellogg; EP..... 495
Kovac, Paul; S..... 450
Krassin, Leonid. Obituary; Dt..... 588
Krimsky, Joseph
The socialization of medicine; S..... 398
Krishnamurti, modern Hindu mystic; EP..... 206
Krutch, Joseph Wood
Alloy; D..... 384
A note on tragedy; D..... 646
Broadway; D..... 330
Four notes; D..... 63

Ibsen restated. D
Miss Rambeau enjoys herself. D
Nodding Homer. D
Something new in theaters. D
Spiders. D
Square of the Hypotenuse. D
The earnest way. D
The lion tamer. D
The mind of Wentel. D
The witch. D
Things in the saddle. D
Who reads American books? S
Ku Klux klan
Comment of Greensboro (N. C.) Daily News. EP
Control's Indiana state government. EP
Routed in Colorado election. EP
Kylsant, Owen Cosby Phillipps
World's greatest shipping emperor. IP

L

Labor. Great Britain
British labor in transition. S. Nearing; IS La Follette, Robert Marion
La Follette and wife. E
Memorial service in Washington. E
Laissez-faire. F. W. Garrison; C. 84
Lake Denmark. See Denmark (Lake)
Laon, Rene
New books in France. S
The importance of Paul Valéry; S.
La Motte, Ellen W.
Opium up to date. IS Land
Japan's alien land law. IP
Land of the free. A. Gleason; S
Landon, Fred
Remember Anthony Burns; C
Lane, Winthrop D.
Thomas Mott Osborne. S
Larremore, Thomas A.
Sesso figures. C
Lathrop, Mother Alphonsa. Obituary. EP
Lawrence school; S.
Lawrence, V.
Sour grapes. Criticism. J. W. Krutch. D
Lea, M. S.
Women in Guam. S
League of nations
Abyssinia appeals to the league. IP
Abyssinia appeals to the league. J. M. Kenworthy. IS American reservations to world court accepted with reservations. EP
An illuminating credit and debit balance. EP
Attitude toward weak and powerful nations. EP
Bad manners at Geneva [on part of Chinese delegate]; E.
Definition of "global" tonnage; EP.
Eminent men demand abolition of compulsory military service; EP
Faithless toward Soviets in their struggle with the French. EP
Farce of American reservations to entering world court. EP
Germany enters the league. E
Give Germany her colonies. P. Snowden. S
Man-eaters on vacation. D. G. Mukerji; C.
Unexpected desire to conciliate United States in Geneva; EP.
Lefkowitz, Abraham
Denial promotion. E
Le Gallienne, Eva (Civic repertory theater). D
Lehman, B. H.
Oliver Cromwell on prohibition; C.
Lenglen, Suzanne
Reflections on her decision to become a professional; Dt.
Lenin's testament
Revealed by Max Eastman. EP
Max Eastman and Mr. Ochs's money. M. Eastman. C
Lennon, Thomas J. See A California liberal
Lenox Hill players
Omitted. M. P. Marcus; C.
Leonard, Jonathan Norton
When the oil gives out; S.
Leonard, William Ellery
International debt, new style; C.
Letherman, Lawrence; EP.
Letter of a little girl worker, with comment. Dt.
Let well enough alone. C. E. Stowe; C.
Levebre, André; S.
Lewis, Alfred Baker
Another kind of animal; C.
Lewis, Judge Robert E.; EP.
Lewis, Sinclair
Mantrapped; C.
Lewisohn, Ludwig
An unknown poet. S
Liberty
The great American tradition. C. A. Beard; S.
Liberty's solution of French debt and Mexican problems; EP.
Light-metal-compound experiments; S.
Lion tamer. A. Savoir; D.
Literary criticism
Divine wrath. F. Harris; C.
Mr. Krutch and M. France. H. Mulvaney; C.
Literary expression
Vanguards. E
Lobbying
Equal and between. E
International [illegible]. W. E. Lucas; C
Losing by not losing [illegible]. E
Money in [illegible]. E
New books in France. R. Lalou; S
Rediscovering the [illegible]. A. [illegible]
Rights and [illegible]. E
The [illegible] of Paul Valéry. R. Laon; S
The [illegible] of [illegible]. E
The [illegible] [illegible]. E. W. Dawson; C
Wi[illegible] Association [illegible]. J. W. [illegible]; S
L., J.
An [illegible] to [illegible]. C
Lane, Alice
A [illegible]. C
Lockwood, Frank C.
Decayed news from Arizona; C
[illegible] R. [illegible]. C
Loeb, A. and J. [illegible]
Gentlemen prefer blondes. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D.
Los Angeles [illegible]
Hiss [illegible] and [illegible]. K. S. Robinson; C
Lovejoy
Bill [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. El
Love
Can [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. E
Lovejoy, Mrs. Owen R.
Florida again; C.
Lowell, Percival
Ex-Voto Ardent Studies. S
Lowmoor case
Story [illegible] Adams. E
Lowry, Alfred
Paper [illegible] in France. IS Lozowick, Louis
Drawings; S.
Mussolini's Gesture or Exodus. S
Ludlow, Clyde, Light [illegible]
The [illegible] arrives. E
Ludicrous lapses of translators; Dt.
Lufthansa
Airplanes and safety; E.
Lynching
Hideous fruit of lynching tree. EP
Old policy of doing nothing continues in South. EP
South Carolina's shame. E
Young record demands protection for federal law. EP
Lyons, Eugene
Class-prosecution—class-defense; C.
The annual Christmas [illegible]. S

M

MacDonald, J. Ramsay
Britain's midsummer mood. S
Mack, Willard and David Belasco
Fanny. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D.
MacShane, Mulligan
Mexico and the church. C
MacSwiney, Mary. S
Madeiros, Celestino F. EP
Mafeking
Mr. Black [illegible] Mafeking. W. D. Hubbard; S.
Magill, Hugh S.; EP
Maine
Election scandal centering around Arthur R. Gould. EP
Mammoths
Refrigerated mammoths; E.
Manchuria
Japan in Manchuria. IP
Man from Toronto. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D.
Manson, Philip
Whitewashing the shipping board. C.
"Mantrap"
Man trapped. S. Lewis. C
Manuscripts
Formula for dealing with manuscripts. Dt.
Marguerite Louise-Gustave-Marie
End of earth [illegible] predicated on series of experiments; EP.
Marcus, Mitchell Padraic
Omitted [Lenox Hill players]; C.
Marine cows and seagoing sheep and chickens; Dt.
Marriage
Communism in marriage. C. C. Church; S.
Marsh, Benjamin C.
Are farm-land speculators entitled to pity?; S.
Marsh, Daniel L.
Abolishes compulsory military training in Boston university; EP.
Martin, Anne
The women's peace congress at Dublin; IS.
Martin, Frank L.
Higher education in California; C.
Mary had a little lamb
Mary, guaranteed genuine. C. S. Ehrman. C
Masefield, John, and Wiers-Jenssen
The witch. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D.
Massachusetts
Department of [illegible] relief to "militiamen" workers. EP
[illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. H. A. [illegible]
Wealth Mass. [illegible]. E
Massie [illegible] [illegible]. D
Mayo, Comptroller General John Raymond. EP
McConnell, Burt M.
[illegible] in [illegible]. E
McEvoy, J. P.
Can [illegible] [illegible]. J. W. Krutch. D
McNab, Tansy
Alliance [illegible]. E
McPherson, Aimee Semple
Aimee Semple McPherson. D. W. Ryder; S
Medicine, Legal Cases
Challenges [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. E
Medley, Oscar
Comparative [illegible]. C Medicine
The [illegible] socialization of medicine. J. Krimsky; S.
Mellett, Donald R.
Editor of Canton, Ohio, Daily News, [illegible]. E
Mexico
Aviation [illegible] [illegible] debt problem. E
Mexia, Ynes
Dentistry at the bar; S.
Law and the Ocean; S
Meyer, Agnes E. Criticism. J. W. Krutch. D
Merton, Richard
Textiles in our ancient Dardanelles and Sicily. EP
Mexico
American elder on southern [illegible] government. EP
Crime [illegible] in Mexico. C. Beals. S
Catholic church wrongs own members. EP
Conflict between government and Roman Catholic church. E.
Dispatch announcing revolts in Chihuahua and Durango. EP
Lives behind altars. A. Brenner; S.
Knights of Columbus oppose Plutarco Calles; EP.
Mexico and the church. H. H. Recner, S. J., A. J. Petty, M. MacShane; C.
Mexico vs. the Roman church. E
Miracles accomplished by prayer; EP.
Putting Mexico in her place. E
Storm signals in Mexico. E
The Mexican church goes on strike. C. Beals; S.
W. D. Guthrie's argument against anti-clerical legislation; EP.
Michel, Georges; EP.
Michels, S.
Religion in the medical schools; C.
Michelson, Clarina
Passaic wants help!; C.
Mikado, "The." E
Militarism
Professor Sam, militarist; E.
Professor Sam, militarist. F. B. Kane; C.
"Professor Sam, militarist." I. Gordon; C.
Military training
Abolished in Boston university; EP.
Equivocal conduct of authorities of College of City of New York; EP.
General Hersey wants girls to drill as well as boys; EP.
Student protests at college of city of New York bear fruit; EP.
Miller, Thomas W.; EP.
Miller, Thomas W.; S.
Mims, Edwin
Utters reasonable sentiments about the South; EP.
Molnar, Ferenc
The play's the thing. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D.
Monet, Claude
Claude Monet, 1840-1926. Obituary; E.
Mongolia
A nomad republic. L. S. Gannett; S.
Mongolia's constitution. I
Toward the Arctic ocean. L. S. Gannett; S.
Moore, Virginia
Races. P
Moorehead, W. K.
Speak up!; C.
Morley, John
Remark on America entering world war; S.
Morrison, J. L.
Don't kiss! Don't shake! Don't breathe; C.
Moss, Arthur H., founder of Quill; Dt.
Moutoux, John T.
Officially pure; C.
Movie theater
Confessions of a movie reader. R. Sapin; S.
Mozart. S. Guitry; D.
Muir, Edwin
Robert Graves; S.
Mukerji, Dhan Ghopal
Man-eaters on vacation; C.
Mulle, Antoinette; S.

Mellon, Henry
The artist on stained glass; P ... 148
Mulvaney, H.
Mr. Krutch and M. Fyatse; C ... 347
Music
A few happy moments; H. Strater; S ... 691
Mrs. Coolidge; H. Strater; M ... 554
Music and common sense; J. B. H. Haggin; C ... 621
Music and the external world; B. H. Haggin; M ... 382
The emotional trend in performance; B. H. Haggin; M ... 189
Mussolini, Benito
Censorship an admission of weakness; EP ... 432
Encounters opposition of Victor Emmanuel; EP ... 448
[illegible] attempt at assassination of; EP ... [illegible]
What cost Mussolini? O. G. Villard; S ... 561

N

Nagel, Charles
Chosen chairman of Bureau men's home-making; EP ... 574
Naked; L. Pirandello; D ... 548
Nash, Jr., Chester C.
Illinois votes for corruption; S ... 386
National association of manufacturers
Demand certain downward of tax schedule; EP ... 447
National horse show association of America, Ltd.
Ghosts at the horse show; E ... 578
Nationalism vs. patriotism
Disguised as profit; S. I. Rabinowitz; C ... 440
National lawn tennis association
Admits white women to; EP ... 561
Naughty Riquette; H. E. Smith; D ... 464
Navy league
Urges an America strong enough to gain respect for its ideals; EP ... 416
Near East
Peoria and Parsee form an alliance; IP ... 581
Nearing, Scott
British labor in retirement; IS ... 341
Wins right to speak before assembly of Utah; EP ... 431
Ned McCobb's daughter; S. Howard; D ... 464
Negroes. See also Lynching Negroes
American art or Negro Art?; L. Hughes; C ... 621
Conference of N. A. A. C. P.; EP ... 1
Escaping Seventh street; D. Eby; C ... 440
Lower branches for watching prosecutions in Kentucky; EP ... 310
Plead against [illegible]; EP ... 1
Success of some leaders; H. L. Dawson; S ... 1
Negroes and whites; G. S. Schuyler; C ... 1
Negro workers organize; E ... 1
New technique in [illegible] New Jersey; EP ... 1
Northern race riots and southern comment; EP ... 1
Perpetual pessimist to Europe; EP ... 1
Persecution of South Dakota; EP ... 1
[illegible] similar; E ... 1
Where to [illegible] a parade; M. Gold; D ... 1
Negro spirituals
[illegible] of the spirituals; A. Nevinson; M ... 1
Nevinson, Henry W.
My adopted mother; S ... 120
Newcastle, William Bentinck
Duchess of; Rose Macaulay; C ... 1
News service
Home news committee of; C ... 1
Florida?; R. Y. Chenkin; C ... 1
Lynch & Richmond papers; W. O. Saxton; C ... 1
How many votes in; Woods; C ... 1
Duchess of; Wharton; C ... 1
Stage; Nathan; D ... 1
Their [illegible]; Colman; C ... 1
Their [illegible]; Nathan; D ... 1
New Hampshire
Negroes; EP ... 1
New Mexico
H. N. Bursum; [illegible]; EP ... 1
New Orleans
A battle of editors; P. Pica; E ... 1
Bureau connected to; EP ... 1
Our candidate; O. Schmidt; C ... 1
IP ... 1
Gallows; U. S. Congressional committee against; EP ... 1
Independence maintained; EP ... 1
Outspoken
Woodrow; EP ... 1
Senator Gerald; Women's press; EP ... 1
The fate of the country; M. ... 1
The greatest newspaper in the world; S. ... 1
The Hall Mills case in the newspapers; Bent; S ... 1
The immigrant press at [illegible]; A. Parry; S ... 1
[illegible] treatment by prominent papers of prohibitionist's milk analysis; EP ... 467
Valentino and yellow journalism; E ... 207
[illegible] attitude in Sacco-Vanzetti case; EP ... 1
New York as a tariff
And what about Europe?; B. Shadwell; C ... 1
New York bar association
Protests against misrepresenting situation [illegible] financial gas; EP ... 1
New York city
Gangsters [illegible] of tiny garden; EP ... 1
I. R. T. runs sixty-two accidents for [illegible] ages; EP ... 186
Issues of subway strikes; EP ... 1
Manhunting on the subway; P. Blanshard; S ... 1
New York Symphony society presents [illegible] cycle of Sibelius; EP ... 1
Recent outbreak in the Bronx; EP ... 1
Subway [illegible] in Bronx; EP ... 1
Striking workers encounter violence at hands of police; EP ... 1
The buncombe of bigness; E ... 1
New York (state)
For sale—48,000,000 horses; E ... 24
Governor Smith fights and compromises in water-power fight; EP ... 440, 625
Mud-slinging election campaign; EP ... 440
Water-power commission plans to [illegible] power projects of St. Lawrence river; EP ... 625
New Zealand
New Zealand's family dole; F. Wilson; IS ... 1
Niagara falls
Big project on the [illegible]; E ... 1
Dispute diplomacy experiment in dealings with Latin America; EP ... 141
President Diaz profits from association with United States state department; EP ... 1
Recognition refused President Chamorro; E ... 1
The Nicaraguan farce; C. Reed; S ... 1
Unjust [illegible] actions in recognizing Chamorro; EP ... 1
Nicholas, Rudolph; EP ... 1
Night in Paris; D ... 1
Niles, Abbe
Representing the journals; S ... 1
Nitrogen
Air [illegible] nitrogen; W. [illegible]; S ... 1
N., L.
Our [illegible] country; C ... 1
N., L. O.
South Dakota; C ... 1
Nobel prize
Literary [illegible] and; C ... 1
No Quarter; Criticism; J. W. Krutch; D ... 1
Noonan, A. M.
The eucharistic congress; C ... 1
Nordmeyer, H. W.; C ... 1
Norfolk, Virginia
Court of the; [illegible]; EP ... 1
Norris, George W.
[illegible] conference with; [illegible]; S ... 1
The third and the [illegible]; S ... 1
North Dakota, U. S. S.
[illegible]; EP ... 1
North Dakota
W. [illegible] the Nonpartisan; [illegible]; S ... 1
Gilbert; C ... 1
Norway
[illegible] on; EP ... 1
Nye, Gerald; EP ... 1
Nyssens, [illegible]; IT ... 1

O

[illegible]
boul; D ... 1
[illegible] Art; S ... 1
[illegible] Theatre; ... 1
[illegible] Nathan; D ... 1
Ohio
[illegible] Mrs. Nick Longworth; [illegible]; EP ... 1
[illegible] Ohio's [illegible] Senator; W. O. Saxton; C ... 1
[illegible] Ohio's [illegible] Senator; W. O. Saxton; C ... 1
Oil
[illegible] Ohio's [illegible] Senator; W. O. Saxton; C ... 1
Oklahoma
[illegible] Ohio's [illegible] Senator; W. O. Saxton; C ... 1
Old Testament
Copyreader; P ... 1
Oliver, Frederick Scott
[illegible] Ohio's [illegible] Senator; W. O. Saxton; C ... 1
Olympic games
[illegible] Ohio's [illegible] Senator; W. O. Saxton; C ... 1
Omaha, Nebraska
[illegible] Ohio's [illegible] Senator; W. O. Saxton; C ... 1
O'Neill, Eugene
[illegible] Ohio's [illegible] Senator; W. O. Saxton; C ... 1
Opera
[illegible] Ohio's [illegible] Senator; W. O. Saxton; C ... 1
Oregon
[illegible] Ohio's [illegible] Senator; W. O. Saxton; C ... 1
Orient
[illegible] Ohio's [illegible] Senator; W. O. Saxton; C ... 1
Orlando, Vittorio
[illegible] Ohio's [illegible] Senator; W. O. Saxton; C ... 1
Orpheus
[illegible] Ohio's [illegible] Senator; W. O. Saxton; C ... 1
Osborn, Henry Fairfield
[illegible] Ohio's [illegible] Senator; W. O. Saxton; C ... 1
Osborn, Thomas Mott
[illegible] Ohio's [illegible] Senator; W. O. Saxton; C ... 1
Osborne, William J.
[illegible] Ohio's [illegible] Senator; W. O. Saxton; C ... 1
Ostrovsky, Alexander
[illegible] Ohio's [illegible] Senator; W. O. Saxton; C ... 1
Otis, James
Opposes [illegible] in time of general [illegible] ... 1

P

Pack, Wayne
Professor; A ... 1
Pacifism. Nobel Committee; EP ... 1
Pacifism
America's first pacifist!; A. Locke; C ... 560
Page, Kirby
Professes [illegible] of peace experiment in the government; E ... 49
Palmerston, Viscountess H.; EP ... 1
Panic, Adler
The immigrant press at [illegible] times; S ... 120
Panama canal. See Straits—United States
Past and present
My great-great-grandfather and I. S. Chase; S ... 190
Patterson, Mary A.
More assets and liabilities; C ... 560
Paul, Eugene
A battle of editors; S ... 345
Peace
Manifesto to demand abolition of compulsory military service; EP ... 234
Peace on the Rhine moves nearer; EP ... 309
Pledge of Congregational ministers in England; EP ... 520
The [illegible] to European peace; F. Stevenson; S ... 216
The peace department [illegible]; M. Curtis; C ... 247
Why [illegible] peace [illegible]; E ... 49
Pearl of Savoy [illegible]; D ... 514
Pearson, Ralph M.
The plastic artist in America; S ... 364
Peck, R. W.
Castles in the air. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D ... 279
Pekor, Jr., Charles F.; S ... 345
Pennsylvania
The Pennsylvania patriot's duty; elect a democrat. G. W. Norris; S ... 28
What the senate says in Pennsylvania; E ... 50
Perkins, Henrietta; EP ... 520
Pershing, General
Comes out against poison gas; EP ... 678
Persia. See Iran
Peterson, H. G. Allen; C ... 128
Petrarch, Francesco
Sonnet [illegible] a name; J. P. C. Woods; C ... 454
Petroleum
After oil. J. B. Shohan; C ... 691
Gasless America. S. Chase; S ... 586
Oil and the powers of justice; J. Billings, Jr.; S ... 75
When the oil gives out. J. N. Leonard; S ... 557
Pettengill, Richard Francis. Obituary; EP ... 441
Pettingell, Frederick
Who's who in America; C ... 348
Petty, A. J.
Mexico and the church; C ... 222
Philippine islands
General Wood plays Mussolini; E ... 551
Mussolini and [illegible] per [illegible] with [illegible]; EP ... 205
Opinion grows on suppression and rubber; EP ... 160
Phillips, [illegible]
The story of philosophers. M. Herzfeld; C ... 347
Pier, Garret; Chatfield
The jeweled tree. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D ... 435
Pirandello, Luigi
Naked. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D ... 530
Platt, Chester C.
Denmark and the free-trade conference; IS ... 202
Poetry
America
Reflections on [illegible] ... 569
Says the raven; F. Monroe; D ... 540
Poems
Animula vagula. B. Deutsch ... 359
[illegible]; J. C. Dykes ... 197
[illegible]; H. H. Sage ... 76
Chant of the [illegible] in the woods; C. Newman ... 562
[illegible] to John a Pl.; S. F. Damon ... 693
[illegible]; O. Morris ... 248
[illegible]; E. Gale ... 691
[illegible]; M. [illegible] ... 488
[illegible]; E. Bruce ... 359
Dream of the past; H. S. White ... 298
Epitaphs; S. F. Damon ... 274
For a [illegible]; J. W. Gannon ... 107
For all [illegible]; L. R. Gottschalk ... 130
For all [illegible]; L. R. Gottschalk ... 130
For [illegible]; I. Speyer ... 39
[illegible]; A. F. Bird ... 176
Heaven; W. Snow ... 15
Mantis and chrysalis; D. Davidson ... 148
Moon [illegible]; F. Sapir ... 85
Noah; J. Farrar ... 173
Not to [illegible]; O. Perkins; M. Anderson; S. ... 601
Now the [illegible]; M. Van Doren ... 105
Open [illegible]; R. Graves ... 509
Rain; V. Moore ... 431
Retreat. L. Jordan ... 152
[illegible]; J. Stone ... 246
Sirens; H. S. White ... 401
Smoke goes up above; E. Sorel ... 193
[illegible] for a better [illegible]; R. Humphries ... 359
The answer; H. Kemp ... 322
The Clerk; J. Farrar ... 35
The river; J. Rorty ... 359
The [illegible] on [illegible]; H. Mullins ... 422
The [illegible]; C. Sterling ... 455
[illegible]; L. N. Jennings ... 326
What can she do with seven fat years; C. Calkins ... 668

Words for a young woman who wanted to die. J. Rorty ... 2
Poetry
A little poetry; E ... 384
An unknown poet. L. Lewisohn; S ... 95
The Nation's poetry prize ... 441, 481, 511, 538, 566, 618, 646, 672
The road to the spring. M. Austin; S ... 360
Poison gas
Abolition of its use before senate; EP ... 675
Destroys plague of locusts in Crimea; EP ... 596
Is disapproval based on sentiment or knowledge; EP ... 596
Poland
Attempt to get along without Diet thwarted by foreign intervention; EP ... 547
Disturbing upper Silesian elections; EP ... 651
Pilsudski's warning; IP ... 90
Wins semi-permanent seat on league council; EP ... 283
Political prisoners
After prison thanks. C. Cline; C ... 551
Portuguese West Africa
Where slavery still rules; IP ... 253
Post office
The ayes have it. J. B. Barnhill; C ... 128
Potash and Perlmutter. M. Glass and J. E. Goodman; D ... 130
Potemkin. Criticism. E. Evans; D ... 567
"Potemkin"
How old is Will? (Miss) E. Evans; C ... 130
Poyntz, Juliet Stuart; S ... 690
Prairie
The house on the prairie; E ... 287
Praise
He likes us. H. H. Hepler; C ... 130
Indispensability dispensed. Chi-Chen Wang; C ... 482
Listen. W. E. King; C ... 59
Pretshold, Karl
Fred H. Moore; C ... 403
Princess Turandot. C. Gozzi; D ... 567
Prison beauty. (Mrs.) O. Widmayer; C ... 403
Private Benson's treasure. IP ... 64
Private property
Supreme court renders revolutionary decision; E ... 419
Profanity
That glorious word damn. Y. S.; C ... 482
The best use of profanity. J. N. E.-B.; S ... 570
Why profanity declines. S. C. GilFillan; C ... 181
Profits—Service? C. Ainsworth; C ... 129
Prohibition
Criticism of political methods of Anti-Saloon league; EP ... 573
Defeat by senate of "under-cover" appropriation; EP ... 675
Much ado about a very little; E ... 497
Not a dead issue; E ... 497
Oliver Cromwell on prohibition. E. H. Lehman; C ... 106
Paradoxical results in case of growers of wine grapes; EP ... 389
Reed-King-La Follette committee subjects anti-saloon league in Pennsylvania to inquisition; EP ... 4
Sugar as source for a specter; EP ... 596
Ups and downs of wets and drys; EP ... 2
Public health
Sickness largely preventable; EP ... 389
Public Ledger, Philadelphia
Fearful lest it hurt Roman catholic feelings; EP ... 417
The cardinals on Sunday. E. H. Whelan; C ... 508
Public utilities
Who can value utilities? EP ... 648
Publishing houses, new
John Day Company; E ... 578
Vanguard Press; E ... 578
Purity
On the purity of readers. R. J. Cornelius; C ... 175
Officially pure. J. T. Moutoux; C ... 106
Pygmalion. G. B. Shaw; D ... 566

Q

Queen. Hugh L. Scwab and R. G. de Silva; D ... 306
Queen Marie
Aftermath of a queen. Tansy McNab; S ... 45
How she is welcomed; EP ... 417
Marie's Rumania; E ... 470
Democracy receives a queen. Cartoon ... 566

R

Race antagonism
Conflict between white and yellow in Oakland; EP ... 416
Rai, L. Lajpat; IP ... 332
Railroads
Bribery of press charged; EP ... 417
President Coolidge stacks cards against labor; EP ... 68
Rakosi, Matthias; EP ... 140
Rangel, General Jose M.; EP ... 205
Ransdell, Hollace
Disaster loves workers; S ... 450
Ravenswood, Henry J.
Pay that debt in maple sugar; C ... 175
Record, Augustus P.; EP ... 387
Reflections on "The Inside Secrets of Photoplay Writing"; Dt ... 127
Reuter, S. J. Hates H. Mencken and the church. C ... 404
Religion
Is Jesus a myth?; E ... 384
Rent—reform commission
Democrats accept Berger "capitulation" waiting for game; EP ... 446
Restaurants or recreation; E ... 447
Reyes, E ... 625
Rhodes, William E. pens his will ... 538
Robinson, Bevier
Who's who in Wisconsin; S ... 206
Robinson, Karl Spain
Hard nuts and raw eggs; C ... 403
Rockwell, Alvin
The rationalistic jake Wisdom. S ... 490
Their status in Bulgaria. C ... 55
Rogers, Henry Wade. Obituary; EP ... 180
Roman catholic church
Annulment of Marlborough-Vanderbilt marriage by Rota; EP ... 573
Eucharistic congress in Chicago; EP ... 4
Meeting of the Roman church; E ... 96
Persecution policies in Mexico; EP ... 596
The eucharistic congress. A. M. Nesbit; C ... 348
Roots, James
The fixer; E ... 446
The workers build their own; S ... 384
Words for a young woman who wanted to die; P ... 224
Rosenthal, H. M.
Mary Austin on alcohol; C ... 8
Ruhl, Mary; EP ... 653
Rothermere, Viscount [Harold Sidney Harmsworth]
Observations on Europe's debt to America; EP ... 140
Royce, M. W.
An air law for America; S ... 659
Rueda, Tam
E. L. Doheny, LL.D.; C ... 38
Rubber
The trend of rubber; E ... 41
Rubber industry
Financial condition of prominent companies; EP ... 286
Tender concern for it of President and Secretary Hoover; EP ... 285
Russia
A cavalcade into the mountains; D ... 446
Communism—a relapse. L. Fischer; S ... 490
Communism comes to the village. V. Danchakoff; S ... 471
Continuing rule of bolsheviki and progress in past six years; EP ... 165
Continuing untenable sensational news from Moscow; EP ... 140
Declaration in name of communist party; EP ... 221
Hydroelectric development on Dnieper river; E ... 311
Increase of wages in the USSR; IP ... 307
New wages of bolshevism. L. Fischer; S ... 542
Opposition in the Soviet Union. [Stalin's report, and speeches by Kamenev, Trotzky, and Stalin]; IP ... 626
Railways which make a profit; EP ... 65
Russia, the land of contradictions. S. Eddy; IS ... 349, 446
Seizure of power by bolsheviki nine years ago; EP ... 465
Soviet dreams. M. Taylor; S ... 571
Soviet industry. H. Kellock; IS ... 490
Speed, up! W. E. Moorehead; C ... 130
Statement of opposition in Communist party; EP ... 415
The USSR and the Chinese Eastern railway. G. Chicherin; IS ... 543
"What we see in Russia." [report of Danish trade unionist.] IS ... 97
"Zinoviev ousted from political bureau of Communist Party; EP ... 96
Ryder, David Warren
Aimee Semple McPherson; S ... 81

S

Sacco-Vanzetti case
Application for new trial; EP ... 257
Boston Herald reverses position; EP ... 495
Class-prosecution—class-defense. E. Lvons; C ... 104
Demand for congressional investigation; EP ... 548
Demand for new trial impregnable; EP ... 283
Fred H. Moore. K. Pretshold; C ... 403
Implications of federal department of justice; EP ... 283
Judge Thayer refuses new trial; EP ... 439
New light on an old story. T. O'Connor; S ... 263
One hundred members of Paris bar ask for release of Sacco and Vanzetti; EP ... 195
Paving the way. A. Warner; S ... 266
The real guilt. R. W. Dunn; S ... 267
Sandalwood. O. Davis; D ... 384
Sapin, Ruth
Confessions of a movie reader; S ... 214
Sapir, Edward
Music brings griefs; P ... 85
Sargent, John Garibaldi; EP ... 283
Saturday night. J. Benavente y Martinez; D. 488
Savoir, Alfred
The lion tamer. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D ... 408
The northern literary world. B. W. [illegible] ... 242
Schuyler, George S.
[illegible] ... 38
Schwab, J. and R. G. de Silva
Queen Hug. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D ... 306
Science
Chemistry makes possible "drained cow land" ... EP ... 177
Scott, Evelyn. P. Hutchins; D ... 306
Sea Lure; E ... 469
Sesquicentennial fourth of July; EP ... 1
Shadwell, Bertrand
And what about Europe?; C ... 37
Europe and gentlemen; C ... 38
Shapley, Harlow; E ... 163
Shaw, George Bernard
Accepts Nobel prize in literature; EP ... 596
[illegible] Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D ... 306
The importance of being a socialist; E ... 209
Three cures and ten; EP ... 54
Sherman, Stuart
Stuart Sherman. Obituary; E ... 188
Shipping
Royal mail steamship company buys the White Star line; EP ... 575
Shipstead, Henrik
In cahoots with himself; EP ... 549
Price-fixing for the farmer; S ... 101
Shotkin, J. B.
After oil; C ... 691
Siebert, Baron Benno von. Obituary; EP ... 69
Siegel, Eli
Smoke goes up slowly; P ... 193
Sinclair, Upton
Education à la legion; C ... 348
"Singing jailbirds"; C ... 247
Slavery
Where slavery still rules; IP ... 253
Slums
Cleaning up the slums; E ... 419
Solving the slums. A. Heckscher; C ... 482
Solving the slums. W. T. Suender; C ... 649
Smith, H. B.
Naughty Riquette. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D ... 302
Smith, Jesse
Pivot in trial of Harry Daugherty; EP ... 285
Snodgrass, Paul C.
"Dry" [J. E. Martineau]; C ... 247
Snowden, Philip
America should cancel the war debts; S ... 104
Give Germany her colonies; S ... 56
The key to European peace; S ... 216
Sochi dreams. M. Tyler; S ... 477
Socialism and life
The importance of being a socialist; E ... 209
Socialist party
Another kind of animal. A. B. Lewis; C. 482
Something eerie on the Erie. P. Jones; C ... 403
Sorel, Mme Cecile; D ... 697
Sour grapes. V. Lawrence; D ... 278
Souza, John Philip
Reflections on Sousa's refusal to retire as bandmaster; Dt ... 559
South Africa
Undergoes a war of flags; EP ... 259
South America
Professor Sam, militarist; E ... 187
Speyer, Leonora
Further commandment; P ... 39
Spuill; D ... 567
Strikes—Great Britain
American coal breaks British strike; EP ... 335
An invitation to revolution [through the obstinacy of coal-owners]; E ... 51
Churches throw weight to miners' side; EP 68
Coal miners face defeat; EP ... 235
Coal strike in its twentieth week; EP ... 284
Coal strike reaches unhappy end; EP ... 466
Great suffering in consequence of coal strike and lockout; EP ... 159
Proposals by governments heads in coal strike; EP ... 284
Refutation of spokesman for coal owners on unprofitableness of industry; EP ... 389
Starvation and surrender; E ... 339
The unimportance of railways. W. Taylor; C ... 84
Why was the British strike called off? W. N. Ewer; S ... 9
Strikes—United States
Bertha, the sewing-machine girl. A. W. Craton; S ... 689
Breaking strike of Indianapolis street-car men by Judge Baltzell; EP ... 160
Constitutionalism in industry; EP ... 206
Disaster loves workers. Hollace Ransdell; S 450
Exposure of charge that Passaic strike is engineered by Communist Party; EP ... 114
Final lawless effort to crush Passaic strike; EP ... 510
Garment workers settle with "inside manufacturers"; EP ... 548
I. R. T. sues strikers for damages; EP ... 186
Manhunting on the subway. P. Blanshard; S ... 71
Mill-owners refuse to deal with A. F. of L.; EP ... 185
Notable victory of cap-makers; EP ... 206
Passaic strikers admitted to United textile workers of America; EP ... 160
Passaic wants help! C. Michelson; C ... 508
Problem of ladies' garment workers on strike; EP ... 22
Questionable policy of Textile Worker in Passaic strike; EP ... 23

Solidarity of labor behind Passaic strikers; EP
"White-collar strike" in Chicago successful; EP
Stallings, Laurence, and W. E. Harling
Stanton, Elizabeth Cady
Sterling, George
Stolberg, Benjamin
Stone, Claude
Down with everything; C
Stowe, Charles Edward Hell; C.....
Straus, Henrietta
Mrs. Coolidge; M..... 512
From a Richmond garden; C..... 325
Disregarded by China; E..... 522
Suender, W. Frederick
Solving the slums; C..... 640
Sun Chuang-fong
Sunderland, J. T.
S., Y.
That glorious word—damn; C
Syria
Szold, Miss Jessie; D

Tabert, Martin; S..... 479
Tacna-Arica
Promising solution of wrangle between Chile and Peru; EP
Taxation
Income-tax "rebate"; EP
Treason! C. R. Butler
Taylor, Wilson
Teapot Dome
Tenth and Ninth to settle controversy
Texas
Thayer, Jessie Wright; EP
Thompson, Carmi
Philippines; EP.
Thompson, William Gardner
Timrod, Henry
Danish trade unionists report on Russia. M. Hansome; IS.....
Treat, Ida
Tserkovsky, Tsanko Bakaloff; C..... 196
Tuna
France in Algeria and Tunisia. E. Kennedy; IS Turati, Agusto, secretary-general of fascisti in Italy; EP..... 520
Turati, Filipo, leader of Italian socialists; EP.. 520
Pact in senate for resuming diplomatic re-
Tyler, Marian

United fruit company
United States
United States—Intellectual life
Mexico; E.....
Revelry and whispers; E.....
The political zoo; E..... 260
Saving Germany from chewing gum; C.... 106
Progress?; C..... 481
Danish trade unionists report on Russia. M. Hansome; IS.....
Discussion of international affairs in atmosphere of academic tea; EP..... 161
Wilson, William B.
Counted out in Philadelphia; EP..... 652
Prosperity of growers in California; EP.. 389

Van Loon, Hendrik Willem
Venezuela
Vernon, M.
Vivas, Eliseo
The critic's answer; S..... 600
Vlido, George. Obituary; EP..... 285

Should actors be themselves?; C..... 453
An unknown poet. L. Lewisohn; S..... 363
Walsh, T.
Sweden; S..... 104
How America fools herself. L. Fischer; S. 166
Observations by Newton Baker; EP..... 233
Those debts; E..... 97
Warner, Arthur
Discourse on pies; Dt..... 690
Weeks, G. F.
Whelan, Edward H.
"Whispering gallery"; E..... 628
"White-collar" workers
Hal Saunders
"Singing jailbirds"; C..... 247
Williams, George Washington; EP..... 574
War, inc.; C..... 403
Wilson, William B.

Wisconsin
Progressive Wisconsin [illegible] E
S. Alexs., S
Who's who in Wisconsin. B. Robinson; S. 220
Witch [illegible] J. Masefield and Worrell [illegible] D
Women
Another modern woman. S. D. Frankel; C
Comparative achievements in politics; EP
Mother's daughter. Anonymous
The making of a militant. Anonymous
The peacock's tail. Anonymous
Why I earn my own living. Anonymous; AW
Women and politics
Conservatism of women; Dt. 83
Women's international league for peace and freedom
The women's peace congress at Dublin. A. Martin; IS Woods, J. B. C.
How many miles to culture?; C
Something in a name. C
Wood, Leonard
General Wood plays Maecenas; E
Woodward, W. E.
George Washington, the image and the man. I. Schoolboy and swain; II. Gunpowder and petticoats; III. [illegible]; S
World alliance for international friendship through the churches
Favors calling conference to outlaw war; EP
World migration congress
Color and world migration; IP. 332
Wright, R. Charlton. EP

Y

Yglesias, M. Vernon; D
Yale-in-China cooperative [illegible]
Constructs an apartment building. J. Rorty; S
Young men's Christian associations
Whose Y. M. C. A.?; E. 188
Withdraws invitation to American federation of labor to address its meeting. Ed

Z

Zangwill, Israel
Israel Zangwill. Obituary; E
Zanzibar mystery case; E
Zimmern, Geogory; EP
Zorin, Victor
In defense of fascism; C. 588
Zotti, Frank; S. 427
Zulus
Three Isandhlwana women. R. Hopewell; S

BOOK REVIEWS

Books are indexed under author and title, and in some cases under subject.

The following explanatory letters are used in the index.

B Book review
AN Brief annotation
R Reviewer

A

Abbott, Edith
Historical aspects of the immigration problem; B. 250
Abbott, Wilbur Cortez, J. Jusserand, C. W. Colby, and J. S. Bassett
Writing of history; AN. 408
Acoma, the sky city. W. T. Sedgwick; AN. 155
Adams, James Truslow
New England in the republic; B. 279
Addresses. S-K. A. Sze; AN. 328
Adler, Mortimer J.; R. 298, 606
Aegean civilization. G. Glotz; B. 61
After the ball; forty years of melody. C. K. Harris; AN. 155
Aldington, Richard
Voltaire; AN. 134
Alexander's feast. J. Dryden; AN. 155
Alexander, Hartley Burr
L'Art et la philosophie des Indiens de l'Amérique du nord; B. 455
Alexander, Hartley; R. 42
Alvord, Clarence Walworth; R. 379, 485
American foreign investments. R. W. Dunn; B. 108
Americana 1926. H. L. Mencken, editor; AN. 619
American spirit in architecture. T. F. Hamlin; B. 223
American spirit in letters. S. T. Williams; B. 223
American year book. A. B. Hart and W. M. Schuyler, editors; AN. 199
Ananikian, Mardiros, H.
Mythology of all races. Vol. VII: Armenian; B. 88
Ancient inhabitants of the Canary islands. E. A. Hooten; B. 133
Anderson, Sherwood, notebook; AN. 155
Andrews, Roy Chapman
On the trail of ancient man; B. 484
Angell, Joseph K. [illegible]
Aristarchus [illegible]
Arnold, [illegible]
Art of the Academy of [illegible]
Assembly [illegible]
New [illegible] AN
Atkinson, [illegible] Brook AN
Atlantic [illegible]
Sketch book. Henry Theodore Tuckerman. AN Australia [illegible]
Authors [illegible]
Autobiography [illegible]
Ayscough, [illegible]
Babbitt, [illegible]
Bacon, [illegible]
Bailey, [illegible]
Baker, [illegible]
Ballads [illegible]
Sumptuary legislation and personal regulation in England; AN. 199
Barbellion, W. N. P. R. H. Hellyar; AN. 458
Barker, Eugene C.
[illegible]
Barnes, Albert C.
Art in painting. AN. 380
Barnes, Harry Elmer
[illegible]
Barnes, Hazel E.
Germany and the world war. B. 188
Barnes, Harry Elmer; R. 182, 187, 253
Barrès, Jean-Baptiste
Memoirs of a Napoleonic officer; B. 15
Barrett, [illegible]
Barrett, [illegible]
Bartlett, [illegible]
Bascom, [illegible]
Bassett, John Spencer
Southern opposition to secession as reviewed in the present. AN. 277
Bassett, John Spencer, J. Jusserand, W. C. Abbott, and C. W. Colby
Writing of history; AN. 408
Bates, Ernest Sutherland; R. 182, 187, 670
Battye, J. S.
Western Australia. A history from its discovery to the inauguration of the commonwealth. AN. 241
Bauchat, Pierre; R. 546
Bausman, Frederick
[illegible] AN. 156
Bausman, Frederick; R. 198
Bausman, Frederick
Lacroix Europe; P. 564
Beebe, William
Arcturus adventure; B. 226
Beer, M.
Social struggles and modern capitalism. AN. 408
Bell, Laura; R. 89, 199
Belloc, Hilaire
Miniatures of French history; AN. 619
Benedict, Ruth; R. 87
Bénet, Laura; R. 457
Benn, Ernest J. P.
If I were a labour leader. AN. 381
Benson, Stella
Goodbye, stranger. AN. 69
Beyond the milky way. G. E. Hale; AN. 458
Bipolar theory of living process. G. W. Crile. A. F. Rowland, editor; B. 374
Birss, Hath. B. Nims; AN. 110
Black, Jack
You can't win; B. 605
Black, John, translator
Memoirs of Carlo Goldoni; AN. 620
Blake, William, letters to Thomas Butts; AN. 180
Blake, William, prophetic writings. D. J. Sloss and J. P. R. Wallis, editors; B. 176
Blanchard, Frederic T.
Finding the [illegible]. B. 187
Blanchard, Paul; R. 632
Blues: an anthology. W. C. Handy, editor. A. Niles, introduction; AN. 155
Boas, Franz; R. 641
Bodenheim, Maxwell
Ninth avenue; AN. 696
Bölsche, Wilhelm
Love-life in nature; B. 606
Bolitho, William
Murder for profit; AN. 458
Bond, Drew; R. 256
Book lists
Loeb classical library; Broadway translations; Selections, collections, and reprints; AN. 158
[illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible]

Colvin, D. Leigh
Prohibition in the United States. B ... 641
Comparative philosophy. P. Masson-Oursel. F. G. Crookshank, introduction; AN ... 671 Concerning parents. A symposium on present-day parenthood; AN ...
Congress. R. Lorz; B ... 607
Conolly, Grace Hazard
Living folk; B ... 608
Contemporary Russian literature, 1881-1925. Mursky, prince D. S.; AN ... 180
Conversations with Anatole France. N. Segur. J. L. May, translator; B ... 141
Conrad, Joseph
Last essays; AN ... 81
Cornish name. An attempt to explain over 1,000 Cornish names; AN ... 481
Cortes, the conqueror. H. D. Sedgwick; B ... 695
Coster, Geraldine
Psychoanalysis for normal people; AN ... 158
Conjectures and reflections. Richard N. Coe, Europe; B ... 276
Cowper, William.
Selections from the correspondence of W. Hadley, editor; B ... 431
Craigie, W. A., and Sir E. Gosse, collectors
Oxford book of seventeenth century verse; AN ...
Crile, George W. A. E. Rowland, editor
Bipolar theory of living processes; B ... 674
Crookshank, F. G., introduction. P. Masson-Oursel
Comparative philosophy; AN ... 671
Cuchet. D. Goldring; AN ... 18
Cummings, E. E.
Eimi; B ... 271
Cyclop's eye. J. Anderson; B ... 172

D

Daly, Reginald Aldworth
Our mobile earth; AN ... 158
Dark of the moon. S. Tennant; B ... 608
Darwin. G. E. Gifford; AN ... 619
Day from sermons published since 1624. A. Vol. Wynter; AN ... 230
Davis, Elmer
Friends of Mr. Sweeney; AN ... 271
Dear Brutus. R. C. Brown; AN ... 192
Debts and credits. R. Kipling; B ... 502
Debussy, Richard. J. Rich; AN ... 688 de Kooven, Mrs. Reginald
Memories and reflections; B ... 337
Delagoa Bay.
Memories. The Portuguese and American occupation. B ... 61
Democracy and the Organization of Political Parties. F. A. Ogg and V. A. Smith; B ... 641
Depta, Dr. Max Victor
Public Opinion in a Democracy; AN ...
Deutsch, Babette
Banners; verses; AN ... 132
Deutsch, Babette. R ... 350
Dewing, E. B.
My own Life; B ... 447
Dibble, R. F. R ... 91
Dibble, R. F.
Memories; B ... 480
Dickinson, G. Lowes
Introduction. Appearance and Reality. F. H. Bradley. Preface to second edition. H. W. Fowler; AN ...
Die malerei der eiszeit. H. Kühn; B ... 536
Die Renaissance. Supplement. Dr. H. Oncken; B ... 537
Dietrich, Margaret. Das Gedicht; B ...
Dietrich and Gudrun. A. Heusler; B ... 687
Dixon, Roland
Oceanic Mythology; AN ... 110
Dixon, Roland
Race in History; AN ... 398
Dollar diplomacy. S. Nearing and J. Freeman; B ... 398
Dolsen, James H.
Adventures of Peter; AN ... 110
Donegal wonder book. S. MacManus; AN ... 641
Douglas, Norman. R ... 350
Dowd, Jerome
Modern Americans; AN ...
Drama; AN ...
Dramatic Mirror
Mirror of the Stage; AN ...
Dramatic Year
Review of Dramatic Year; AN ... 110
Dunn, Robert W.
American Foreign Investments; B ... 187
Durant, Will Story of Philosophy; AN ... 301

E

Chiffons de papier; B ...
Edman, Irwin
Philosophy and the Modern World; AN ...
Education
Education To-day and To-morrow; AN ... 110
Elder brother. A ... AN ... 87
Eliot, Charlotte
Savonarola: a dramatic poem; AN ... 155
Elliot, Margaret M., and D. Hartley
Life and work of the people of England. A pictorial record from contemporary sources. Fifteenth century. Sixteenth century; AN ... 418
El pensamiento de Cervantes. A. Castro; B ... 535
Elser, Frank B.
Keen sense; AN ... 47
Emil of Lowell Grove. J. M. Kayser; B ... 415
Encrevel, W. R. Inge; B ...
Engelbrecht, E. H. Fenimore; AN ... 47
Enquiry concerning political justice. W. Godwin. R. A. Preston, editor; AN ... 301
Epic of gilgamish. M. Kast; B ...
Essay in criticism, 1850-1926. P. Dobrée; AN ... 111
Essays in appreciation. C. J. H. Haynes; B ... 198
Ethics, mechanical efficiency and. J. AN ... 134
Europe and the east. N. D. Harris; AN ...
Europe from Waterloo to Sarajevo. P. Anderson; B ...
Eva and the derelict boat. F. Molnar; B ... 199
Eve walks in her garden. L. A. Garnett; AN 619
Evolution of prudery. L. Stopes; B ... 47
Excursions of the Jesus. E. E. Lemon; B ... 47
Excavations. C. Van Vorst; AN ... 91

F

Fabre-Luce, Alfred. C. Vesey, translator
Impressions of Germany; B ...
Faerie Queene. T. Roscoman; B ... 641
Fairies in American history. A. P. Russell; B ...
Fairchild, Cedric P.; B ... 87, 138, 415
Fairchild, Henry Pratt
Methods of research; B ... 14
Fallodon papers. Viscount Grey; B ... 644
Farrell, M. Sumner; B ...
Farnell, Lewis Richard
Adventures of a Scholar; B ... 644
Fay, Sidney B.; R ... 488
Fellowes, Edmund H.
Memoirs and Music; AN ...
Fenton, Horace Wadsworth
Longfellow; B ... 693
Ferguson, Charles W. R ...
Fernandez, R. Nathan; AN ...
Fielding, H. Tom Jones (the world's best novel); B ...
Fifty Chinese poems. W. Bynner; AN ... 110
Fiske, D.
Mirror ...
Fisher, Irving
Forma ...
Foundl ... AN ...
Four ...
Palache; AN ...
Fowler, H. W.
English ...
Fowler; AN ...
Fox, J. ...
Frank, Waldo
Mirror ...
Freeman, J. ...
Fugger news-letters. V. von Klarwill, editor; L. S. R. Byrne, translator; B ... 200

G

Gadgil, D. R.
Industrial evolution of India in recent times; AN ... 301
Gale, Zona
Miss Lulu Bett; AN ...
Gale, Zona. R ... 372
Gallup, Donald
T. S. Eliot; A Bibliography; AN ... 18
Gallup, Donald
Ulysses; B ... 42
Galsworthy, John. R ... 15, 245, 484
Galsworthy, John, and Otto Flake, reaction. J. A. Mowat; B ... 300
Garland, Hamlin
Companions of the middle border; AN ... 696
Garnett, Eleanor Ann
Fire Upon the Earth; AN ... 619
Garrison, Theodore, and others; AN ... 511
Gassner, John Waldhorn; R ... 644
Gay, John
The Beggar's Opera in Three Acts; AN ...
Gee, Wilson
Nationalism and Native Industries in the Far East; B ... 15
Geiser, Karl F. R ... 16
Genesis of the United Kingdom. H. E. Egerton; B ... 198
Geneva opium conference. S-K. A. Sze; AN ... 539
Gentile, Theodate
Art motives in Japan; AN ... 199
George, Stefan; AN ... 18
Gerhart-Hauptmann Anniversary. H. C. G. Brandt; AN ... 134
Gibbs, Anthony
Middle-class; AN ... 487
Gibbs, A. Hamilton
England; AN ... 646
Gibbs, Evelyn
Hunter; AN ... 511
Glotz, George
Aegean civilization; B ... 61
Godwin, William, life of. F. K. Brown; B ... 249
Godwin, William. R. A. Preston, editor
An enquiry concerning political justice; AN 301
Gogol. J. Lavrin; AN ... 134
Goldberg, Isaac. F. Stephens, translator
Jesus the Nazarene. Myth or history; B ... 179
Goldberg, Isaac. R ... 274
Golden day. L. Mumford; B ... 601
Goldfarb, Alexander. R ... 226
Goldring, Douglas
Nest; AN ...
Goldring, Douglas
Sicilian noon; AN ... 276
Gomez de la Serna, Ramon. Cafe; memoirs of a literary translator; AN ... 620
Goldring, Douglas
Cuchet; AN ... 18
Goldring, Douglas
Romantic comedians; B ... 456
Goodbye, stranger. S. Benson; AN ... 696
Gosse, Sir E., and W. A. Craigie, collectors
Oxford book of seventeenth century verse; AN ... 301
Gould, Laura Riding, translator
Anarchism. Translated from the French. B ... 131
Gould, Laura R.; R ... 88
Gould, P. ... AN ... 538
Graffe, Dorothy; R ... 224
Graham, Stephen
Memories of Russia; AN ... 110
Grattan, C. Hartley; R ... 62
Graves, Alfred Perceval, and Anonymous; AN ... 619
Graves, Robert. Moon of the Gibbous Ox; AN ... 110
Greece, Ancient. Greek Lyric Poetry; AN ... 276
Greig, Gavin, collector; A. Keith, editor
Last years of traditional ballads and ballad airs; AN ... 135
Grenier, A.
Religious thought and art; B ... 407
Griffin, Bartholomew
Fidessa; B ...
Griffith, William. Life of George Meredith; B. 406
Grimm, H. ... 641
Grimson, H. J. C.
Elizabethan Sonnet Sequences; B ... 641
Gruening, Ernest; R ... 41
Guedalla, Philip
Conversations; B ... 185
Guest, Edgar A.
Poems of the Home; AN ...
Guest, Edgar A.
Poems of the Home; AN ...
Guest, Edgar A.
Poems of the Home; AN ...

Haggin, B. H., R ... 576
Hale, George Ellery
Beyond the milky way; AN ... 168
Hall, G. Stanley. L. Pruette; B ... 42
Hamlin, Talbot Faulkner
American spirit in architecture; B ... 523
Hamlin, Talbot Faulkner, R ... 69
Handy, W. C., editor. A. Niles, introduction
Blues: An anthology; AN ... 155
Hanford, James Holly
Milton handbook; AN ... 168
Hanstein, Otfrid von. A. Barwell, translator
World of the Incas. A socialistic state of the past; AN ... 156
Harding, W. P. G.
Formative period of the federal reserve system; AN ... 43
Hardinge, Rt. Hon. Sir Arthur
Life of Henry Howard Molyneux Herbert, fourth earl of Carnarvon; AN ... 134
Harmer John. H. Walpole; B ... [illegible]
Harper, Wilhemina
Fillmore folk tales; AN ... 511
Harrell, Isaac S.
Loyalism in Virginia. Chapters in the economic history of the revolution; AN ... 619
Harris, Charles K.
After the ball: forty years of melody; AN ... 144
Harris, Norman Dwight
Europe and the east; AN ... 276
Harrow, Benjamin; R ... 17
Hart, Albert Bushnell, and W. M. Schuyler, editors
American year book. A record of events and progress for the year 1925; AN ... 199
Hartley, Dorothy, and M. M. Elliot
Life and work of the people of England. A pictorial record from contemporary sources. Fifteenth century. Sixteenth century; AN ... 458
Hayes, Carlton J. H.
Essays on nationalism; B ... 378
Hearn, Lafcadio. A. Mordell, editor
Occidental gleanings; AN ... 18
Heart of Emerson's journals. B. Perry, editor; B ... 368
Heart of black Papua. M. M. Taylor; AN ... 200
Heathcote, Caleb, gentleman colonist. D. R. Fox; AN ... 43
"H. D."
Palimpsest; B ... 668
Hellas. G. Brandes; B ... 156
Hellyar, Richmond H.
W. N. P. Barbellion; AN ... 458
Hemingway, Ernest
Sun also rises; B ... 642
Torrents of spring; B ... 89
Henderson, Ernest F.; R ... 537, 564
Her son's wife. D. Canfield; B ... 249
Herbert, Life of Henry Howard Molyneux. Sir A. Hardinge; AN ... 134
Herrick, Cheesman A.
White servitude in Pennsylvania: indentured and redemption labor in colony and commonwealth; AN ... 18
Herskovits, Melville J.; R ... 133, 199, 668
Hertz, Friedrich
Rasse und kultur; B ... 644
Heyward, Du Bose
Angel; B ... 485
Hindus, Maurice
Broken earth; B ... 152
Historian and historical evidence. A. Johnson; B ... 223
Historical aspects of the immigration problem. E. Abbott; B ... 250
History of economic progress in the United States. W. W. Jennings; AN ... 134
History of English literature. Two volumes. E. Legouis and L. Cazamian. H. D. Irvine, translator; B ... 109
History of the United States since the civil war. E. P. Oberholzer; B ... 130
History of Russia. Sir B. Pares; B ... 154
Hobart, Alice Tisdale
By the city of the long sand; AN ... 199
Hobson, J. A.
Free thought in the social sciences; B ... 86
Incentives in the new industrial order; B ... 86
Hobson, J. A., R ... 578, 607
Holding, Elizabeth Sanxay
Shoals of honour; AN ... 18
Holmes, John Haynes; R ... 562, 606
Holloway, Emory
Whitman: an interpretation in narrative; B ... 641
Hooten, Earnest A.
Ancient inhabitants of the Canary islands; B ... 143
Horses now and long ago. L. S. Mitchell; B ... 562
Howe, M. A. DeWolfe
Causes and their champions; AN ... 619
How natives think. L. Levy-Bruhl; B ... 153
Hubbard, Elbert, of East Aurora. F. Shay; ... 106
Hughes, Rupert
George Washington, 1772-1782; B ... 131
Hunter. E. Glanville; AN ... 511
Hunting and adventure in the Arctic. F. Nansen; AN ... 90
Hutchison, Keith; R ... 198, 250, 602, 693

I

Ich suche die Wahrheit. Wilhelm, Kronprinz; B ... 131
Imperial Rome. M. P. Nilsson. G. C. Richards, translator; AN ... 180
Immorpart a Japan. T. Gouffaux; AN ... [illegible]
Incentives in the new industrial order. J. A. Hobson; B ... 86
If I were a labor leader. E. J. P. Benn; AN ... 487
India as I knew it. L. F. R. Williams; B ... 67
Industrial economics of India in recent times. D. R. Gadgil; AN ... 181
Inge, Very Rev. W. R.
England; B ... 697
Inner harbor. W. Snow; AN ... 487
Insects of the garden. W. D. Orcutt; B ... 155
Inside the Moscow art theater. O. M. Sayler; AN ... 110
International Anarchy, 1904-1914. G. L. Dickinson; B ... 87
International relations as viewed from Geneva. W. E. Rappard; AN ... 148
Is S. E. F. Communist; B ... 544
Izvolsky and the world war. F. Siloti; B ... 489

J

Jagendorf, M.
Pantaloon, or the children's theatre; AN ... 511
Japanese fairy book. Y. F. Otaki, translator; AN ... 511
Jastrow, Joseph; R ... 16, 433
Jazz. P. Whiteman; B ... 276
Jefferson. A. J. Nock; B ... 481
Jennings, H. S.; R ... 344
Jennings, W. W.
History of economic progress in the United States; AN ... 134
Jesus the Nazarene. Myth or history? M. Goguel. F. Stephens, translator; B ... 179
Jewish anthology. E. Fleg, editor, and M. Samuel, translator; AN ... 18
Johnson, Allen
Historian and historical evidence; B ... 223
Johnson, Guy B., and H. W. Odum
Negro workaday songs; B ... 223
Johns, Orick
Wild plum; B ... 224
Johnstone, James
Study of the oceans; AN ... 110
Jones, Thomas Jesse, report by Education in East Africa; AN ... 190
Jusserand, Jean, W. C. Abbott, C. W. Colby, and J. S. Bassett
Writing of history; AN ... 408

K

Keen desire. F. B. Elser; AN ... 487
Keir, Malcolm
Epic of industry; B ... 223
Keith, Alexander, editor. G. Greig, collector
Last leaves of traditional ballads and ballad airs; AN ... 135
Kennedy, William Sloane
Fight for a book for the world; B ... 641
Keynes, John Maynard
End of laissez faire; B ... 248
Keyserling, count Herman, editor
Book of marriage; B ... 608
Kiddush ha-shem. Epic of 1648. S. Ash. R. Learsi, translator; B ... 670
King of the golden river. J. Ruskin; AN ... 511
Kipling, Rudyard
Debits and credits; B ... 509
Klarwill, Victor von, editor. L. S. R. Byrne, translator
Fugger newsletters. 1568-1605, second series; B ... 250
Klyce, Scudder
Sins of science; AN ... 251
Knight, M. M.
Economic history of Europe to the end of the middle ages; AN ... 408
Kopald, Sylvia; R ... 225
Krassnoff, General P. N.
From double eagle to red flag; B ... 152
Kretschmer, E.
Physique and character; B ... 16
Krutch, Joseph Wood; R ... 167, 181, 299, 570, 582, 484, 536, 603, 669
Kühn, Herbert
Die malerei der eiszeit; B ... 536
Kunst der massenbeeinflussung in den Vereinigten Staaten von Amerika. F. Schoenemann; AN ... 43

L

Labels. A. H. Gibbs; AN ... 646
Langer, William L.; R ... 87
L'Art et la philosophie des Indiens de l'Amérique du nord. H. B. Alexander; B ... 455
Laski, Harold J.; R ... 603
Last essays. J. Conrad; AN ... 381
Last leaves of traditional ballads and ballad airs. G. Greig, collector, and A. Keith, editor; AN ... 135
Lavrin, Janko
Gogol; AN ... 135
Lawrence, William
Memories of a happy life; B ... 606
League of nations at work. P. N. Baker; AN ... 538
Learsi, Rufus, and S. Ash
Kiddush ha-shem; B ... 670
Lee, Muna, translator
Four years beneath the crescent; AN ... 408
Le Goff, Marcel, L. R. Gottschalk, translator
Anatole France at home; B ... 131
Legouis, Emile, and L. Cazamian. H. D. Irvine, translator
History of English literature. Vol. I. The middle ages and the renaissance (450-1660); B ... 109
Leon, Xavier
Renouvier, critique et historien de sa philosophie; AN ... 538
L'Esprit classique et l'esprit romantique dans l'art. Dans la vie du XVIIIe siècle; B ... 43
Letters of Junius to an American watchmaker, 1768-1771; AN ... 201
Levy-Bruhl, Lucien
How natives think; B ... 153
Le Wallon, Ernest Normand. Barbey D'Aurevilly; B. Baudelaire; AN ... 538
Lewis, W. S., editor
A selection from the letters of Horace Walpole; B ... 131
Lewis, Wyndham
Tarr; B ... 299
Library list of children's books ... 619
Lichtenberger, Marcial P., and M. Storey
Conquest of the Philippines by the United States; 1898-1925; B ... 407
Life and work of the English people. D. Hartley, and M. M. Elliot; AN ... 458
Life of Saint Paul. F. J. Foakes-Jackson; B ... 179
Light princess. G. MacDonald; AN ... 511
Limitations of victory. A. Fabre-Luce, C. Vesey, translator; B ... 87
Lindsay, Vachel
Going-to-the-stars; B ... 274
Locke, Alain; R ... 110
Loeb classical library; AN ... 458
Longfellow, Henry Wadsworth. H. S. Gorman; B ... 642
Loomis, Frederic B.
Evolution of the horse; B ... 562
Lovelace, Richard, poems of. C. H. Wilkinson, editor; B ... 176
Love-life in nature. W. Bölsche; B ... 606
Love, Robertus
Rise and fall of Jesse James; B ... 40
Lowell, Amy
East wind; B ... 274
Lowie, Robert H.; R ... 455
Loyalism in Virginia. I. S. Harrell; AN ... 619
Luce, Robert
Congress: an explanation; B ... 607
Ludwig, Emil
Wilhelm der zweite; B ... 534
Luther, Mark Lee
Clean up; AN ... 621

M

McCabe, Joseph
1825-1925 a century of stupendous progress; AN ... 408
MacDonald, George
Light princess; AN ... 511
MacDonald, William; R ... 63, 130, 275, 407, 607
Machen, Arthur
Chronicle of Clemendy; AN ... 434
MacIver, R. M.
Modern state; B ... 603
MacKaye, Percy
Tall tales of the Kentucky mountains; AN ... 155
MacManus, Seumas
Donegal wonder book; AN ... 511
Macnaghten, Hugh, translator
Odes of Horace; AN ... 458
Macy, John; R ... 377
Maeterlinck, Mukerji, and others
What is civilization?; B ... 154
Magic flight. Y. Gaer; AN ... 511
Making of the modern mind. J. H. Randall; B ... 510
Man alone. G. A. Chamberlain; AN ... 18
Mape: the world of illusion. A. Maurois; B ... 178
Marshall, Lenore G.; R ... 485, 608
Mason, Alpheus T.
Organized labor and the law; AN ... 301
Mason, Daniel Gregory; R ... 457
Mason, William, satirical poems of. H. Walpole, notes. P. Toynbee, editor; B ... 176
Massachusetts historical society
Winthrop papers, Vol. I, 1498-1628; AN ... 43
Masson-Oursel, Paul, F. G. Crookshank, introduction
Comparative philosophy; AN ... 671
Maupassant, Guy de. E. Boyd; B ... 669
Maupassant, Guy de, life work and evil fate of. R. H. Sherrard; B ... 669
Maurois, André
Mape: the world of illusion; B ... 178
Maya architecture. G. O. Totten; B ... 42
May, J. Lewis, translator, and N. Segur
Conversations with Anatole France; B ... 131
McConnell, Weston J.
Social cleavages in Texas. A study of the proposed division of the state; AN ... 227
Melting-pot mistake. H. P. Fairchild; B ... 16
Melville, Herman. J. Freeman; AN ... 155
Memories of a happy life. W. Lawrence; B ... 606
Menace of nationalism in education. J. F. Scott; B ... 510
Men and horses. R. Santee; AN ... 155
Mencken, H. L.; R ... 177, 374
Mencken, H. L., editor
Americana 1926; AN ... 621
Mencken, H. L.
Prejudices: fifth series; B ... 603
Notes on democracy; B ... 603
Mental tests. F. N. Freeman; AN ... 671
Merchant of dreams. A. Graham; AN ... 110
Meredith, George. J. B. Priestley; AN ... 155

Meredith, George. J. B. Priestley. B ... 406
Meredith, George, writings and life of. M. S. Gretton. B ... 406
Merriman, Roger Bigelow
Rise of the Spanish empire in the old world and in the new. Vol. III. The emperor. B ... 108
Mesopotamia. L. Delaporte. B ... 91
Methods and one teacher. T. Ramsay. B ... 604
Milne, A. A.
Winnie-the-pooh. AN ... 511
Milton handbook. J. H. Hanford; AN ... 458
Memoirs of a Napoleonic officer. J.-B. Barrès. B ... 15
Miniatures of French history. H. Bellaigue; AN ... 619
Minnigerode, Meade
Some American ladies: seven informal biographies; AN ... 43
Mirror to France. E. M. Foss. B ... 225
Mirsky, prince D. S.
Contemporary Russian literature (1881-1925). AN ... 180
Pushkin; AN ... 135
Mitchell, Lucy Sprague
Here and now story book. B ... 562
Mitsui's best. T. M. Eliot, translator. B ... 91
Modern state. R. M. MacIver. B ... 653
Mohammed. R. V. Daniels. B ... 486
Molnar, Franz
Eva and the dormant bear. B ... 293
Moore, Charles
Family life of George Washington; B. ... 431
Moore, Virginia
Not poppy; AN ... 135
Mordell, Albert, editor, and L. Hearn
Occidental gleanings; AN ... 18
Mordell, Albert, editor
Notorious literary attacks; AN ... 146
Mr. and Mrs. Haddock in Paris, France. D. O. Stewart; AN ... 434
Mr. Shaw and "The Maid." J. M. Robertson; AN ... 110
Muir, Edwin
Translation. B ... 509
Muller, James Arthur
Stephen Gardiner and the Tudor reaction. B ... 360
Mumford, Lewis
Golden day: a study in American experience and culture. B ... 601
Munro, Thomas, and P. Guillaume
Primitive negro sculpture. B ... 370
Murasaky, lady, A. Weley, translator
Sacred tree: being the sacred part of the tale of Genji; AN ... 180
Murder for profit. W. Roughead; AN ... 458
Murder in fact and fiction. Canon J. A. R. Brookes; AN ... 458
Murray, R. H.
Political consequences of the reformation. B ... 87
Museum and laboratory. Mrs. R. de Kay. B ... 407
Mussey, Henry Raymond. R ... 197, 441
Muzzey, David Saville; R. ... 15, 41
My Apprenticeship. B. Webb. B ... 85
My heresy. W. M. Brewer. B ... 603
My mental enemy. W. Cather. B ... 484
My own story. F. Older; B. ... 605
My son John. E. B. Dewing. B ... 407
Mystical cities. T. Gage. B ... 42
Mythology of all races. M. H. Arbaugh. B ... 88

N

Nansen, Fridtjof
Hunting and adventure in the Arctic; AN ... 90
Napoleon and Marie Louise. W. Geer. B ... 15
Nathan, Robert
Peddler in Paris; AN ... 626
Nearing, Scott
Education in Soviet Russia; AN ... 90
Nearing, Scott, and J. Freeman
Dollar diplomacy. B ... 165
Needham, Wright. R ... 197
Neff, Emery; R. ... 486
Negro in American life. J. Dorsey. B ... 603
Negro century, and their problem. C. B. Woodson. B ... 110
Negro scholarship and H. A. Douglas and G. P. Johnson; B. ... 223
Nemesis of the machine. C. E. Bland. B ... 177
New Baltic states and their future. O. Ruthenberg; AN ... 200
New England in the Republic. J. T. Adams. B ... 413
New voices in social science. Appeals to the American economy of [illegible] science; AN ... 135
Nicolson, Harold
Swinburne; AN ... 155
Nile Blanc
Black Haiti; AN ... 146
Niles, Abbe. R ... 197
Nilsson, M. P. G. C. Robertson, translator
Imperial Rome; AN ... 180
Ninth avenue. M. Bodenheim; AN ... 146
Ninth wave. C. Van Doren. AN ... 146
Nock, Albert Jay
Jefferson. B ... 197
Norales, Rafael de. M. Lee, translator
Four years beneath the canopy; AN ... 146
Notes on democracy. H. L. Mencken. B ... 506
Notorious literary attacks. A. Monroe, editor; AN ... 146
Not poppy. V. Moore; AN ... 146
Noyes, Alexander Dana
War period of American finance. B ... 276
Noyes, Edward S., editor
Letters of Tobias Smollett, M.D.; B. ... 671

O

Oberholtzer, Ellis Paxon
History of the United States since the civil war. B ... 180
Occidental gleanings. L. Hearn. A. Mordell, editor; AN ... 18
Odes of Horace. H. Macnaghten, translator; AN ... 135
Odum, Howard W. and G. B. Johnson
Negro workaday songs. B ... 223
Odum, Howard W. and D. W. Willard
Systems of public welfare; AN ... 110
Ogden, Robert Morris
Psychology and education. B ... 132
Oil imperialism. L. Fischer; B. ... 132
Older, Fremont
My own story. B ... 605
Omoto. Hagiwara
[illegible] Kaiser Napoleon III [illegible] 1870 und der [illegible] Band 1870-1871. B ... 507
O'Neill, Eugene
Great god Brown, Fountain, Moon of the Caribbees, and six other plays of the sea; AN ... 170
On the art and [illegible] A. C. F. Schauffler. B ... 146
On the trail of ancient man. R. C. Andrews; B ... 484
Orcutt, William Dana
In search of the perfect man. B ... 407
Organized labor and the law. A. T. Mason; AN ... 90
Origins of the white party. E. M. Coulter. AN ... 146
Our doctors. M. Duplay; AN. ... 434
Our problem with R. A. Daly. AN ... 146
Owsley, Frank Lawrence
State rights in the Confederacy. AN ... 227
Oxford book of English prose. Sir A. Quiller-Couch, editor; AN ... 110
Oxford book of Scandinavian verse. Sir E. Gosse and W. A. Craigie, editors. AN ... 502
Oyved, Moysheh
Vision and jewels. B ... 644
Ozaki, Yei Theodora
Japanese fairy book. AN ... 611

P

Packard, Sidney R. B ... 646
Painted veil. M. W. Cain. AN ... 722
Palache, John Garber
Last days of the old regime. AN ... 458
Palimpsest. "H. D."; B. ... 668
Pan-Europe. R. M. Coudenhove-Kalergi; B. ... 275
Pantomimes for the children's theatre. M. Jagendorf; AN ... 511
Papas, Sir Bernard
History of Russia; B. ... 151
Parsons, Alice Beal; R. ... 154, 433, 608, 614
Peary, [illegible] AN ... 227
Peoples of Asia. L. H. D. Buxton. B ... 42
Pepys, Samuel, [illegible] cellaneous papers of. J. R. Tanner, editor. B ... 60
Perry, Bliss, editor
Best of Emerson's poems. B ... 88
Pershing, [illegible] AN ... 146
Petrarca, Francesco. His life and correspondence. E. H. R. Tatham; B. ... 300
Philippe, [illegible] M. Sturm, and M. L. Lichauco; B. ... 407
Physical [illegible] E. Kretschmer. B ... 506
Physiology of taste. J. A. Brillat-Savarin; AN. ... 382
Pickthall, Marmaduke
Valley of the kings; B. ... 695
Pictures of the Chinese. M. Rossiter, F. Weale, translator. B ... 88
Place, Charles A.
Charles Dickens: portrait and [illegible] B ... 60
Plague pamphlets of Thomas Dekker. F. P. Wilson, editor. AN ... 227
Playne, C. E.
Neuroses of the nations. B ... 177
Political [illegible] H. Morgan. B ... 87
Pollard, A. F.
Factors in American history. B ... 84
Porter, J. Garrison. B ... 276
Pound, L. [illegible] AN ... 467
Powell, A. E. Mrs. A. R. Dennis
Romantic theory of poetry an examination in the light of Croce's aesthetic. AN ... 146
Powers, Hiram
Voltaire. Preliminaries. B ... 506
Prentiss, [illegible] H. L. Mencken. B ... 646
Prejudice, Rachel A. Taylor and W. Irving. An [illegible] for practice and theory. AN ... 722
Preston, Raymond A.; R. ... 249
Priestley, J. B.
[illegible] AN ... 146
[illegible] T. Mann and [illegible] B ... 146
[illegible] the [illegible] J. Fisher. B ... 646
[illegible] United States. D. L. Chaput. B ... 646
Prokosch, Eleanor
Stephen Hall: A biography of mind. B ... 60
Proust, Marcel. R ... 197
Proust, [illegible] M. L. Shanks, translator. AN ... 458
Psychology [illegible] G. Coster. AN ... 459
Psychology and education. R. M. Ogden; B. ... 132

Putnam, Nancy, Nurse
Folk beliefs of the southern Negro; B ... 223
Pushkin. D. S. Mirsky; AN ... 135

Q

Quo Francis [illegible] F. Flaherty. AN ... 185
Quaker [illegible] AN ... 110
Quaker [illegible] AN ... 18

R

Racine, life of. M. Duclaux; AN. ... 110
Ramsay, T. [illegible] Mediterranean [illegible] B ... 604
Randall, J. H. [illegible] B ... 510
Rappard, William E. [illegible] Geneva; AN. ... 538
Rasse and Kultur. F. Hertz. B ... 644
Ratcliffe, S. K.; R. ... 85
Realities of [illegible] B. T. Saposs; B. ... 225
Reese, [illegible] AN ... 155
Reid, Forrest [illegible] AN ... 621
Reise in Polen. A. Döblin; AN. ... 538
Relations of [illegible] America. C. Wissler; B. ... 199
Religion and the rise of capitalism. R. H. Tawney; B. ... 563
Repression of crime. H. E. Barnes; B. ... 133
Richards, G. C., translator, and M. P. Nilsson Imperial Rome; AN. ... 180
Richards, I. A. Science and poetry; AN. ... 487
Riley, Woodbridge; R. ... 153, 299
Rinaker, Clarissa, and J. Zeitlin Types of poetry; AN. ... 458
Ripley, J. Fred. United States and Mexico, 1821-1924; B. ... 41
Rise and fall of Jesse James. R. Love; B. ... 40
Rise of the Spanish empire in the old world and in the new. R. B. Merriman; B. ... 108
Roberts, Elizabeth Madox Time of man. B ... 224
Robertson, field-marshal Sir William Soldiers and statesmen. B ... 693
Robertson, J. M. Mr. Shaw and "The maid"; AN ... 110
Robertson, William Spence; R. ... 108
Rockow, Lewis; R. ... 87, 694
Rogers, Cameron Magnificent idler. The story of Walt Whitman; AN. ... 180
Rogers, Robert W.; R. ... 61
Rolland, Romain, und die erneuerung der gesinnung. E. Lerch; AN. ... 538
Romances [illegible] G. Warren, and H. B. Cheney; AN. ... 180
Roman spirit in religion, thought, and art. A. Grenier; B. ... 407
Romantic comedians. E. Glasgow; B. ... 456
Romantic theory of poetry. A. E. Powell; AN. ... 180
Roosevelt, Harvey W. Boy's life of Barnum; AN. ... 511
Rosecrans, Hales Spain [illegible] AN ... 538
Ross, A. P. A. [illegible] and ethical review. AN ... 135
Ross, Mary; R. ... 249, 456, 565
Rostvtzeff, M. Social and economic history of the Roman empire. Vol. I: Social and economic development; B. ... 368
Rowland, Amy F., editor, and G. W. Crile Bipolar theory of living processes; B. ... 374
Roustan, M., F. Whyte, translator Pioneers of the French Revolution; B. ... 88
Ruskin, John King of the golden river; AN. ... 511
Rutter, Owen New Baltic states and their future; AN. ... 200

S

Sabbatical year. G. Shively; AN. ... 646
Sacred comedy. J. Arcevalo, S. de Madariaga, editor. B ... 89
Sacred tree. Lady Murasaky, A. Waley, translator; AN ... 180
Saga of Billy the Kid. W. N. Burns; B. ... 40
Smaranda. Lord T. of Cardington; B. ... 198
Samuel, Maurice, translator, E. Fleg, editor, Jewish anthology; AN. ... 18
Sanctuary; Sanctuary; D. L. Sharp; AN. ... 434
Sandburg, Carl, and [illegible] R. West, editor; AN. ... 487
Santos Rose Men and horses; AN. ... 155
Saposs, Bertha Tigay, and D. J. Saposs Readings in trade unionism; B. ... 225
Saposs, David J. Left wing unionism; B. ... 225
Readings in trade unionism. B ... 225
Saville, Marshall H. Wood-carver's art in ancient Mexico; AN. ... 276
Savonarola. C. Eliot; AN. ... 155
Sayler, Oliver M. Inside the Moscow art theater; AN. ... 110

Schaumann, August Ludolf Friedrich
On the road with Wellington; B. 15
Shoals of honour. E. S. Hosking; AN 15
Schapiro, J. Salwyn; R. 37
Schoenemann, Friedrich
Kunst der massenbeeinflussung in den Vereinigten Staaten von Amerika; AN 33
Schuyler, William M. and A. B. Hart, editors
American year book. A record of events and progress for the year 1925; AN. 200
Science and poetry. I. A. Richards; AN 41
Scott, Jonathan French
Menace of nationalism in education; B 110
Sedgwick, Henry Dwight
Cortés the conqueror; B. 66
Spain, a short history of its politics, literature and art from earliest times to the present; B 108
Sedgwick, Mrs. William T.
Acoma, the sky city. Study in Pueblo Indian history and civilization; AN 108
Segur, Nicolas, J. L. May, translator
Conversations with Anatole France; B 241
Seligman, Edwin R. A.
Studies in public finance; AN 275
Selincourt, Ernest de
Wordsworth's Prelude; B 176
Serrano, Mary J., translator
Marie Bashkirtseff. The journal of a young artist, 1860-1884; B. 80
Sex expression in literature. V. F. Calverton; B 324
Shakespeare, wesen und werke. J. Bab; AN 108
Shand, P. Morton
Book of wine; B. 172
Sharp, Dallas Lore
Sanctuary! Sanctuary!; AN. 434
Shaw, George Bernard
Translations and tomfooleries; AN 108
Shepard, Walter James; B. 80
Sherard, Robert Harborough
Life, work and evil fate of Guy de Maupassant; B. 462
Shively, George
Sabbatical year; AN. 646
Sicilian noon. L. Golding; AN. 277
Sinclair, May
Far end; B. 142
Sinclair, Upton
Letters to Judd, an American workingman; AN. 301
Singer, Charles
Evolution and anatomy; B. 17
Sins of science. S. Kayce; AN 251
Skazki. I. Zeitlin; AN. 511
Sloss, D. J. and J. P. R. Wallis, editors
William Blake's prophetic writings; B. 176
Smertenko, Clara M.; R. 153
Smirnoff, Karin
Strindberg's första hustru; AN. 134
Smith, G. Elliot
Elephants and ethnologists; B 42
Smith, J. M. Powis, translator
Psalms; AN. 458
Smith, Thomas Vernon
Democratic way of life; B. 694
Smollett, Tobias, letters of. E. S. Noyes, editor; B. 671
Snow, Wilbert
Inner harbor. More Maine coast poems; AN 487
Social and economic history of the Roman empire. M. Rostvotzeff; B. 368
Social cesspools in Texas. W. J. McConnell; AN. 227
Social control of business. J. M. Clark; B. 197
Social struggles and modern socialism. M. Beer; AN. 108
Soldiers and statesmen. W. Robertson; B. 693
Some American ladies. M. Mitmigerode; AN 43
Somervell, D. C.
Disraeli and Gladstone; B. 607
Son of the Bowery. C. Stelzle; B 565
Southern plantation overseer as revealed in his letters. J. S. Bassett; AN 225
Spain: A Short history of its politics, literature, and art. H. D. Sedgwick; B. 108
Spanische wanderungen. H. Roselieb; AN. 538
Spiritual values in adult education. B. A. Yeaxles; AN. 277
Statement and inference. J. C. Wilson, A. S. L. Farquharson, editor; B 670
State rights in the Confederacy. F. L. Owsley; AN. 227
Stein, Leonard
Syria; AN. 538
Stelzle, Charles
Son of the Bowery; B. 565
Stephens, Frederick, translator, and M. Goguel
Jesus the Nazarene. Myth or history; B. 179
Stewart, Donald Ogden
Mr. and Mrs. Haddock in Paris, France; AN 434
Stieve, Friedrich
Izvolsky and the world war; B. 483
Storey, Moorfield, and M. P. Lichauco
Conquest of the Philippines by the United States; 1898-1925; B. 407
Story of Durham. W. K. Boyd; AN. 252
Story of philosophy. W. Durant; B. 248
Story of the Catholic church. C. Wright; AN. 619
Strachey, Lytton
Pope. The Leslie lecture for 1925; AN. 487
Strangers. D. Van Doren; B. 433
Street, Ada and Julian
Tides; AN. 696
Strindberg's första hustru. K. Smirnoff; AN. 134
Studies in public finance. E. R. A. Seligman; AN. 275
Study of the oceans. J. Johnstone; AN. 110
Styrbiorn the strong. E. R. Eddison; B. 605
Summer storm. E. Arnold; B. 180
Sumptuary legislation and personal regulation in England. F. E. Baldwin; AN. 108
See also Love. E. Henderson; B. 141
Survey of international affairs, 1924. A. J. Toynbee; AN. 538
Swarthmore. H. Newman; AN. 108
Swinnerton, Frank
Summer storm; B. 180
L. Stein; AN. 538
Sykes, E. Anker, and H. W. Odum, editors
D. W. Wilcox; AN. 108
Sun-Ke Alfred
Anonymous; AN. 108
Survey of international relations between the United States and China; AN. 538

T

Tales of the Kentucky mountains. P. Mackaye; AN. 108
Tanner, J. R., editor
Private correspondence and miscellaneous papers of Samuel Pepys; B. 60
Tate, W. Lewis; F. 240
Tate, Allen; R. 89, 509, 642, 694
Tatham, Edward H. R.
Petrarca, Francesco. His life and correspondence. A study of the early fourteenth century (1304-1347). Vol. I: early years and later years. Vol. II: Letters and public fame; B. 500
Tawney, R. H.
Religion and the rise of capitalism; B. 563
Taylor, Merlin Moore
Heart of black Papua; AN. 200
Teasdale, Sara
Dark of the moon; B. 608
Teggart, Frederick J.
Theory of history; B. 223
Theories of instinct. E. C. Wilm; AN. 90
Theory of history. F. J. Teggart; B. 223
This believing world. L. Browne; B. 299
Thomason, John W., Jr.
Fix Bayonets!; AN. 134
Thomson, James
Britannia. A poem. 1729. AN. 155
Through misty windows. H. Woodward; B. 614
Tilton, A. and J. Street; AN. 696
Time of man. E. M. Roberts; B. 224
To a lady on her passion for old China. J. Gay; AN. 175
Torrents of spring. E. Hemingway; B. 89
Totten, George Oakley
Maya architecture; B. 42
Toynbee, Arnold J.
Survey of international affairs, 1924. AN. 538
Toynbee, Paget, editor. H. Walpole, notes
Satirical poems by William Mason; B. 176
Trail-makers of the middle border. H. Garland; AN. 696
Translation. E. Muir; B. 509
Translation and tomfooleries. B. Shaw; AN. 620
Types of poetry. J. Zeitlin and C. Rinaker; AN 458

U

United States and Mexico, 1821-1924. J. F. Rippy; B. 41
Up from Methodism. H. Asbury; B. 458
U. S.: A second study in democracy. H. E. Buchholz; B. 371

V

Valley of the kings. M. Pickthall; B. 695
Van Doren, Carl
Ninth wave; B. 372
Van Doren, Carl; R. 456
Van Doren, Dorothy
Strangers; B. 433
Van Doren, Mark; R. 39, 60, 176, 223, 271, 326, 368, 431, 455, 483, 562, 601, 641, 668, 693
Van Vechten, Carl
Excavations; AN. 135
Varney, John
First wounds. A story in five chapters of verse; AN. 155
Verdict of Bridlegoose. L. Powys; B 39
Villard, H. S.; R. 565
Villard, Oswald Garrison; R. 534
Vivas, Eliseo; R. 89, 537
Vision and jewels. M. Oyved; B. 641
Voltaire. A. Aldington; AN. 135
Von Bismarck zum weltkriege. E. Brandenburg; AN. 539

W

Wallas, Graham
Art of thought; B. 152
Wallis, J. P. R. and D. J. Sloss, editors
William Blake's prophetic writings; B. 176
Walpole, Horace, a selection from the letters of. Lewis, W. S., editor; B. 431
Walpole, Horace, notes, P. Toynbee, editor
Satirical poems by William Mason; B. 176
Walpole, Horace, selected letters of
W. Hadley, editor; B. 431
Walpole, Hugh
Harmer, John; B. 565
War journal of Admiral Graves. A. D. Nares; B. 371
Warren, Harris and H. E. Cross
Humanities of science. AN. 108
Washington, George, family letters of. C. M. Thomas; B. 141
Washington, George. R. Hughes; B. 141
Weybright, Carlos. W. E. Woodward; B. 141
Wharton, Edward; R. 509
White, Beatrice
Mr. Aristophanes; B. 80
Whittier, Alice, and Die Gesellschaft schwach und blind; AN. 249
Wiese, Leopold; R. 46
Wells, H. G.
World of William Clissold; B. 536
Westermann, William Linn; R. 565
West, Rebecca, editor
Selected poems of Carl Sandburg; AN. 247
What is civilization? Maeterlinck, Mukerji, and others; B. 154
White, Stanley, in Collaboration with A. Hendrick; AN. 18
Wiers, Walter
Flight; B. 89
Whiteman, Paul
Jazz; B. 275
Whitman, an interpretation in narrative. L. Hollaway; B. 641
Whitman, Walt. J. Bailey; AN. 155
Whitman, Walt. Story of. C. Rogers; AN. 180
Whitridge, Arnold; R. 671
Whyte, Frederic, translator
Pioneers of the French Revolution; B. 88
Wilkinson, C. H., editor
Poems of Richard Lovelace; B. 176
Wild plum. O. Johns; B. 274
Wilhelm der zweite. E. Ludwig; B. 534
Wilhelm, kronprinz
Ich suche die Wahrheit; B. 131
Willard, D. W. and H. W. Odum
System of public welfare; AN. 135
Willard, T. A.
City of the sacred well; B. 42
Williams, Judith Blow
Guide to the printed materials for English social and economic history (1750-1850); B. 486
Williams, L. F. Rushbrook, director of public information, government of India
India in 1924-25. A statement prepared for presentation to parliament; B. 62
William, Stanley Thomas
American spirit in letters; B. 223
Wilm, E. C.
Theories of instinct: a study in the history of psychology; AN. 90
Wilson, F. P., editor
Plague pamphlets of Thomas Dekker; AN. 227
Wilson, John Cook and A. S. L. Farquharson, editor
Statement and inference; B. 670
Wilson, Margaret
Painted room; AN. 621
Winnie-the-pooh. A. A. Milne; AN. 511
Winthrop papers. Massachusetts historical society; AN. 43
Wissler, Clark
Relation of nature to man in aboriginal America; B. 199
Wolf, Robert; R. 509
Wolfson, Theresa
Woman worker and the trade unions; B. 612
Woman worker and the trade unions. T. Wolfson; B. 612
Wood-carver's art in ancient Mexico. M. H. Saville; AN. 276
Woodson, Carter G.
Negro orators and their orations; B. 110
Free Negro heads of families in the United States in 1830; AN. 251
Free Negro owners of slaves in the United States in 1830; AN. 251
Woodward, Helen
Through many windows; B. 614
Woodward, W. E.
George Washington: the image and the man; B. 431
Wordsworth's Prelude. E. de Selincourt, editor; B. 176
World of the Incas. O. von Hanstein, and A. Barwell, translator; AN. 135
World of William Clissold. H. G. Wells; B. 536
Worm Ouroboros. E. R. Eddison; B. 87
Worship of nature. Sir J. G. Frazer; B. 226
Wright, Cuthbert
Story of the Catholic church; AN. 619
Writing of history. J. Jusserand, W. C. Abbott, C. W. Colby, and J. S. Bassett; AN 408

Y

Yeaxlee, Basil A.
Spiritual values in adult education. A study of a neglected aspect; AN. 277
Young, Katharine E.; R. 17
You can't win. J. Black; B. 605

Z

Zeitlin, Ida
Skazki. Tales and legends of old Russia; AN. 511
Zeitlin, Jacob and C. Rinaker
Types of poetry; AN. 458
Zeitlin, Jacob; R. 109, 405

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXIII NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JULY 7, 1926 No. 3183

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS

EDITORIALS:

La Follette—Still Alive ... 3

Much Ado About a Very Little

Degrees of Honor

"Can Cultured People Really Love"

NEWS FROM HEAVEN. By Hendrik van Loon

THE GREAT AMERICAN TRADITION. A CHALLENGE FOR THE FOURTH OF JULY. By Charles A. Beard ... 7

WHY WAS THE BRITISH STRIKE CALLED OFF? By W. N. Ewer ... 9

FLORIDA CASHES IN HER CHIPS. By Stella Crossley ... 11

A CALIFORNIA LIBERAL. By Michael Blaine

IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter ... 13

CORRESPONDENCE

BOOKS:

Margins. By Wilbert Snow

The French Revolution and After. By David Saville Muzzey

Is Immigration an Error? By Karl F. Geiser

A New Science of Character. By Joseph Jastrow

From Plato to Harvey. By Benjamin Harrow

Forces and Men. By Catharine E. Young ... 17

Books in Brief

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:

Peace Tendencies in France. By Alfred Lewey

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor FREDA KIRCHWEY

Literary Editor MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico, to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

THE SESQUICENTENNIAL FOURTH OF JULY is upon us, and all over the land sermons are being preached upon the text that America is the biggest, brightest, busiest country in the world. It is. There are among us a faith in ourselves and our future, a hope, a spirit of achievement which, together with our mineral wealth, our continental frontiers, and the World War, have helped lift us to our new world dominance. And there is also among us a colossal indifference to the signs of rot within us. Few of us are frightened for the democratic experiment by the revelations of million-dollar graft in the State where the Declaration of Independence was pronounced; most of us smile at millionaire Mellon's blessing on corruption and snarl at any radical who dares challenge this government by dollars and suggest a change. We have grown to fear self-criticism. It is a good time to reread the history of the days we are celebrating, and Charles Beard's eloquent address, reprinted in part in this issue of The Nation, is worthy of the men whom it recalls.

NO RELIGIOUS CELEBRATION in the history of the United States has ever approached in magnitude and splendor the Eucharistic Congress of the Roman Catholic Church in Chicago. One hundred thousand men with 100,000 lighted candles knelt before an altar fifty feet high while mass was celebrated on Soldiers' Field. Four hundred thousand people joined in glorifying the sacrament at some of the sessions. Eucharistic congresses, which began in 1881 at Lille, have as their official purpose the spread of the central doctrine of the Catholic faith that the body and blood of Jesus Christ are actually present in the sacrament of the mass. The emphasis of the whole congress was upon worship. It was unfortunate, perhaps, that this purpose should be so obscured in the public mind by the ecclesiastical trappings, the "red train" of the nine cardinals, the size of the audiences, the robes of the church potentates. Ku Kluxers and readers of the Menace will undoubtedly use this display as proof that the Pope is trying to control America. Perhaps he is: we are not overly concerned. America was discovered by a Catholic and if the Catholics can recapture it by appealing to the American love of bigness and conformity, let them go ahead.

"THE SOUTHERN NEGRO is disfranchised as effectually as if he were on the moon," declared William Pickens in his keynote address at the recent Chicago conference of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. The conference launched a drive for a million-dollar fund to fight disfranchisement, segregation, and "Jim Crow" cars. Meanwhile, in spite of a determined fight by a minority, Congress refuses to face the fact that the Constitution is being openly violated not only in the di franchisement of Negroes but in the virtual disfranchisement of millions of other voters by the rotten-borough system. We still officially apportion our congressional seats on the basis of the 1910 census, although there are great cities today which were little more than villages in 1910 and the Constitution calls for reapportionment every ten years. But what do the representatives of Mississippi, Vermont, and Wyoming care about the Constitution among friends? Despite Los Angeles's sudden zeal for the Constitution, her claim for more seats in Congress is defeated for this session at least. This temporary disfranchisement of city voters by the refusal to effect reapportionment should call attention to the permanent incongruity of Southern representation. Los Angeles cast more votes for President in 1924 than Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi combined, but these Southern States have thirty Representatives in Congress and Los Angeles has two. The Southern States are cheating.

THE FARMERS have again been bilked by Congress and the Administration, as it was inevitable they should be, and the Haugen bill has been sent to the ash-heap. Economically unsound as The Nation believes that measure to be, there was no legitimate reason why it should have been rejected by the Republican Party which has long been committed to the principle and practice of subsidies in the form of the protective tariff. Yet the Republican Party, as the watch-dog of big business, obviously could not afford to let the Haugen bill pass. A subsidy is fine for the subsidized so long as they are a limited group, but spread out to 30,000,000 agriculturists it is like trying to grow rich by taking in one another's washing. Subsidies were ordained for the few, not the many. For the Republican Party it is unpleasant to have to face an agrarian revolt in the West, but it was impossible to risk a revolt of big business, East or West—for big business spells the Republican Party itself. So farm relief goes a-glimmering. And so, incidentally, has gone any action in regard to coal, all bills having been postponed until next session—or, more correctly, until another spell of coalless cold calls for fresh oratory and renewed beating about the bush.

IN NEW JERSEY Randolph Perkins, member of Congress and Dry, recently won a renomination, defeating B. D. McClave, Wet. On the same day two other Drys, one a member of the State Senate, the other a member of the State House, also won renomination, defeating Wets. Nothing was changed, but newspaper exaggerations suggested that Wet New Jersey was going Dry. In St. Paul, Minnesota, Melvin J. Maas, conservative bond salesman and Wet, defeated Oscar Keller, member of Congress, who is moderately Dry, for the Republican nomination for Representative of the Sixth District. This may mean that the political climate in Minnesota is moistening or it may mean that St. Paul prefers bond salesmen to ex-dairymen; we will await further particulars. We recall too well the chorus of victory which swelled from Wet throats in the East when Mr. Volstead was defeated by Mr. Kvale. The chorus stopped when news trickled into New York that Mr. Kvale had made his campaign on a platform declaring that he was dryer than Volstead.

FAIRY TALES are among the latest tricks used by the Passaic textile mill-owners for breaking the long strike. The bosses imported several hundred strike-breakers from New England, lodging them in the mills free and paying them forty to fifty dollars a week. Three of these imported workers, refusing to act as "scab," came into the strike headquarters and told their story. They had answered an advertisement at a local agency in a New England town, and been told there were openings in a mill on Long Island. Asking whether there was any trouble in the mill, they were assured that there was only the sweetness and light of patriotism—the owners desired to replace their foreign workers with Americans. These men believed that they were going to Long Island until they heard the railway conductor call out the station of Passaic. The owners may find that instead of breaking the strike they have made new trouble for themselves. They have revealed that they have orders and need workers, despite all their protestations to the contrary.

THE MORALE OF THE STRIKERS has stood an upward curve, fed by resentment at the importation of strike-breakers and by the solidarity of labor generally. During the past month conferences for the relief of the Passaic strikers have been held in five big cities. The 260 delegates in the auditorium of New York represented unions and fraternal organizations of all shades. An American Federation of Labor representative sat beside a Communist of the I. W. W. and joined them in resolutions for participation in work of relief, defense, and the guarding of picket-lines in Passaic and vicinity. A photographic story of the strike in pictures is being sold for funds, to the chagrin of the police of New Jersey, who with their night-sticks, machine-guns and tear-gas bombs figure largely and unfavorably in its pages. These guardians of the peace continue to stage astonishing side-shows of brutality; strikers, even women and children, have been clubbed and there beaten. Sheriff Nimmo, however, who was responsible for the earlier reign of terror, has gently but firmly refused an invitation from the mayor of Garfield to return with his armed deputies. The little man must have found the public eye uncomfortably sharp.

HOW BUSINESS INTERESTS seek to dump unprofitable undertakings like the Cape Cod Canal upon the government has repeatedly been told in The Nation. A similar attempt is being made by business interests to exploit the Boulder Dam and the All-American Canal which are designed to use the waters of the Colorado River for irrigating the Imperial Valley and for giving power to Southwestern cities. Taken by itself the irrigation part of the project would be a financial loss to the government but the dam will yield millions of horse-power of electric energy. This power can be so profitably sold that the whole project would pay for itself in a few years; moreover the power can be sold cheaply and the low rates would tend to set the standards for the Southwest. The power interests do not like this idea. They are perfectly willing to let the government spend $40,000,000 on Boulder Dam and then point to the inefficient character of all government enterprise. When the government proposes, however, to spend $30,000,000 on its own power plant and so make the enterprise profitable, they raise the cry of socialism. They want the power plant for private enterprise and the deficit for government budgets. Fortunately a bill (S. 3331) has already been favorably reported by a Senate committee which aims to make the whole project a public development. It should be passed.

AMAZINGLY GOOD NEWS comes from India, where the Government, yielding to the pressure of world opinion, has at last abolished the famous Calcutta opium auctions and has set at ten years "the period within which the export of opium for other than strictly medicinal purposes will be progressively and finally extinguished." A 10 per cent reduction is to be effected in the current year, and the last export is to take place in 1935. Thus will end one of the most infamous instances in history in which a great government has openly profited by debauching the rest of the world. The British Government is to be congratulated upon its changed attitude. Meanwhile in India a strong public opinion against opium use is developing, and a recent study by the Opium Research Committee of the [American] Foreign Policy Association has cast a striking light upon the divergent accounts of opium consumption in India. The Government, producing national averages, has always held that it was slight; Indians, from experience, have insisted upon the contrary. The study shows that while large sections are virtually opiumless, consumption reaches appalling totals in certain urban districts and industrial centers. These are precisely the districts where medical assistance is most available, and there can be no excuse henceforth for government refusal to take action. Gandhi's national temperance campaign is already having its effect. Within six months of his visit to Assam, where opium-smoking and opium-eating are at their worst, consumption dropped 22 per cent.

IF ANYBODY can save the French franc it is probably Caillaux. He accepted the Ministry of Finance in [illegible]'s tenth cabinet on his own terms, with the understanding that he was to have a free hand in regard to policy. As a propitiatory sacrifice he demanded the ousting from the war portfolio of Painlevé, whom Caillaux holds responsible for his own forced retirement from the former's cabinet after the failure of the Franco-American debt negotiations last year. Caillaux then removed the Governor of the Bank of France, who was opposed to the further use of that institution's gold reserve to support the franc. Caillaux proposes to use that reserve in his program and is reported to favor the speedy ratification of the Bérenger-Mellon debt agreement with the United States if it can be made the basis for a Wall Street loan to further bolster the currency. The new Minister of Finance proposes heroic measures to save the franc, and if they fail there will probably be nothing left for anybody else to worry over. But no oxygen pumped into the franc can revive it unless the Government can balance its budget. A cut in the interest rate on the internal debt would help toward this, but the chief hope is in taxation, presumably of the wealthy, since other classes are already sucked about dry. Here is Caillaux's tug of war, because the big industrialists and the financial manipulators are profiting by the decline of the franc—as was the case in Germany when the mark collapsed—and will fight taxation of their wealth to the end, no matter what disaster overtakes the rest of the community.

WHAT IS A COLLEGE PRESIDENT? The regents of the University of Oregon are ready to tell us. The official statement of their investigating committee which nominated Dr. Hall gives the reasons for their choice:

> Dr. Hall as president of the University of Oregon will prove to be a very popular man. He is very easy to meet, has a pleasant smile, and one is immediately impressed by his unbounded energy. He is not only a real college executive but has had business experience as well in connection with one of the banks in Madison, Wisconsin. Dr. Hall is a very able public speaker, and his services undoubtedly will be in great demand throughout the State. We are very enthusiastic about the new president.

Possibly Dr. Hall has other qualities besides those which led to his selection, but at any rate he has a voice and a pleasant smile and has been connected with a bank. Is anything more needed?

HONEST MEN are the trustees of Olivet College, Michigan. They recently dismissed Professor J. E. Kirkpatrick from the faculty, because of his radical views on student self-government, but they boldly told why. Frank N. Green, secretary of the Board of Trustees, in informing Mr. Kirkpatrick of his dismissal, wrote:

> I am instructed by members of the executive committee and of the Board of Trustees to say that this resolution was adopted not because of any inefficiency on your part as a classroom teacher but because your views of college administration, which views you have always been free to express and advocate, are not in harmony with the views of the Board of Trustees and of substantial friends of Olivet not on the board who are giving financial support to Olivet College. Experience has shown that these two conflicting views cannot live in harmony on the same campus.

The same issue of the Olivet College Echo which recorded his dismissal also announced that "the endowment drive had passed successfully its first unit in its million-dollar effort." Hip, hip, hurray for Olivet and its million dollars! What does it matter who teaches there or what, if only the "substantial friends" give their "financial support"?

La Follette—Still Alive

MEMORIAL services for Senators are usually perfunctory and poorly attended, but at the service in the Capitol in Washington on June 20, last, a year after Robert La Follette's death, all available space was packed. Old-timers could not recall a more stirring demonstration. The New York World, in commenting upon it, observed:

> The tribute to La Follette's memory in the Senate on Sunday called forth a demonstration of esteem and admiration which would have been impossible just after his death a year ago. For the greater part of his career in Washington he had been a leader of the opposition, a merciless critic of his own party. His command of invective, his intense individualism, made more enemies than friends; his unsparing keenness in debate, his unwillingness to compromise used more fear than liking. But twelve months had softened the memory of old antagonisms.

This is true, but it is not the whole story. We do not impute intentional hypocrisy to any of the Senators who lauded La Follette at the memorial service, or to the newspaper editors who now praise the man they once denounced, but the fact remains that a live mouse is more dangerous than a dead lion. It is easy to speak well of a man when you are no longer in danger of being called on to help or support him. The World, for instance, now concedes that > Senator Robinson was not extravagant when he declared that La Follette was the real leader of the progressive movement during his generation. . . . He laid down a program aimed at predatory wealth; he helped convert men like Dolliver, Hadley, and Bristow; and when his enemies united against him Roosevelt was able to take over his half-launched progressive movement. The events which followed gave the Democrats their chance. For much of the progressive legislation which made the years 1913-1917 important La Follette was really responsible.

But although "La Follette was the real leader of the progressive movement during his generation," neither Senator Robinson nor the World found it expedient to support him when he was alive. They stuck to the shibboleths of the dead Democratic Party and its hopeless candidature in 1924, thus permitting Mr. Coolidge to remain in the White House. La Follette was too democratic, too unyielding, too sincere for most even of our "progressive" politicians or liberal newspapers like the New York World. He was the loneliest political leader of his generation, the object of the most bitter and continuous press hostility. Bryan was denounced as bitterly during free-silver days, perhaps, but in later life he was tolerated, or merely ridiculed. Roosevelt was commonly praised as a man by those who condemned his principles—due, perhaps, to the ease with which he divorced his principles from his personality. La Follette, lonely and tenacious fighter of the people's battles, never divorced his principles from his personality. New York newspapers may have feared rather than liked him, but millions loved him as few men are loved. His principles and his personality are still living forces in American life.

Much Ado About a Very Little

THE Reed-King-La Follette committee has continued to plow the golden soil of Pennsylvania. It has discovered that the pious Mellon-Pepper crew spent nearer two million dollars than one; that their Mayor of Pittsburgh instructed city officials to vote for Pepper if they valued their bread and butter (the gentleman blandly denied the shorthand report of his speech, but it was plain that he lied); that their Pittsburgh Chief of Police cheerfully violated the law by instructing the policemen to see to it that the Pepper majorities were fat; and that both Mr. Vare's and Mr. Mellon's henchmen distributed enough money in cash, of which no records were kept, to have bought a dozen New York City elections in the good old Tammany days that were once considered the epic era of graft. But interest in this exposure of contented corruption seems, to judge by the newspapers, slight compared to interest in the effort of Senator Reed to expose the heinousness of the Anti-Saloon League and the W. C. T. U.

The Nation has never been fond of the Anti-Saloon League or of its methods. The League browbeats people into behaving as it wishes them to behave; it cares nothing for the Constitution and its safeguards of search and seizure if they seem to stand in the way of enforcing prohibition; and, while it has forced some Wets, fearful of their political future, hypocritically to vote Dry, it has blackened the characters of its honest opponents by denouncing them as seditious tools of the bootleggers and brewers. We do not think the Anti-Saloon League has itself played fair, but we do not like to see unfair tactics used against it. The genius of the organization, Wayne B. Wheeler, was an impressive witness under Senator Reed's inquisition. He became interested in prohibition in college; he served the cause for years at one hundred dollars a month, and he now earns eight thousand dollars a year. That is little enough for the head of an organization which in the years preceding the enactment of the Eighteenth Amendment spent two and a half million dollars annually. Mr. Wheeler had no hesitation in reporting the sums spent, and the worst things brought out against him were that, like Mary Pickford and Babe Ruth, he signed a series of articles which he did not write, and that he occasionally hired Congressmen to make speeches. It did not appear that he hired Congressmen who did not honestly believe in prohibition, or that they made more than pin-money out of their speechmaking.

Nor did the W. C. T. U., as it seems to us, appear in a more unfavorable light. The New York World and other organs denounce its action in raising money to enforce a statute when the Pennsylvania Legislature refused to do so. The legislature to please the Drys voted a Dry law, and to please the Wets refused the money to carry it out. The W. C. T. U. then took it upon itself to enforce the law. There was nothing secret or underhand about it; it [illegible] in the State Capitol and, with the cooperation of Governor Pinchot, sought to enforce the orphaned law. Doubtless a State does better to enforce its own laws. But is it a crime for citizens to help a State enforce laws that the legislators put on the statute-book, even if the legislators who put them there hope they will not really be enforced? The remedy would seem to be to have an honest legislature which either would not pass unwanted laws, or would take seriously the laws which it does pass.

The calm observer, undisturbed by this partisan racket, will not forget that the vast sums spent by the Dry leagues have been raised in small offerings from men and women who have no selfish stake in prohibition. Even if misspent they would still be in a different class from the millions spent in Pennsylvania to save the manufacturers from taxation. Why cloud the issue by comparing them?

For good or ill, prohibition has again become a live political issue. We have said before that we welcome any live political issue in a country where the citizens have been too busy with the radio to think before they voted. Wets and Drys, we believe, are equally sincere; let them argue, not accuse each other of corruption. The evil of corruption in politics is independent of this issue. The Mellons and the Peppers who tried in vain to buy Pennsylvania straddle the liquor question; the important thing is to get rid of corruptionists—Wet, Dry, or straddling. We suspect that the Mellon-Vare gangs are rather relieved by the elaborate attention paid to the Reed-Wheeler Wet-and-Dry battle of wits.

Degrees of Honor

THE season's crop of honorary degrees reveals several new varieties, produced by methods of cross-breeding whose secret is best known to university administrations. The honorary degree used to be for the most part a simple though glowing recognition of scholarly or artistic or scientific achievement, with an occasional stooping from academic heights to pick up a gem from the vague field of public service. But a complex civilization has changed that, until now one never knows where our sharp-eyed university heads may discover a Doctor of Laws. It may be in the House of Representatives, where New York University found Speaker Nicholas Longworth. Or it may be in the embassy of a nation for whose friendship we yearn. Columbia University went bravely fishing in political seas and, despite its very Republican president, caught Governor Al Smith, upon whom it conferred his first academic degree. But fishing was best in the President's Cabinet, where Georgetown University caught Herbert Hoover, and Washington University (St. Louis) caught Secretary of War Davis, and any number of lines hooked a great scholar in the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. Mellon, in this annual hood-collecting contest, was close pressed by Owen D. Young. Mr. Mellon won with Harvard, Yale, and Amherst to his credit, but Mr. Young was not far behind with Rutgers and Princeton. The Yale degree was conferred upon Mr. Mellon with the tribute "No man in office has given up so much with such benefit to the country." Very true—he gave as much as $25,000 in the Pennsylvania primaries, and he very likely has several thousands left for worthy educational institutions. Mr. Young's service on the Dawes Commission and his pronouncements on the problem of power development might have qualified him for the old brand of academic degree—with a touch of modernity in the fact that he sits on dozens of wealthy corporation boards. But in the business of delivering degrees for cash, paid up or prospective, Harvard was this year boldest of them all. She presented her LL.D. to George Fisher Baker, of the First National Bank of New York, who recently gave $5,000,000 to her Graduate School of Business Administration. Mr. Baker's degree cost more than a Pennsylvania primary.

At Amherst an old custom has taken on new significance. The seniors confer honorary membership in their class as they see fit, but it has been usual that the president of the college should be among those so honored. This year President Olds was conspicuously neglected. On the list of honorary members in absentia, however, appeared the name of Alexander Meiklejohn. This was not, we believe, primarily meant as a slight to Dr. Olds, who has always been regarded with affection, especially during his long years of deanship. In 1923 Dr. Meiklejohn had spent eleven years in making Amherst the reality of his dream of a liberal college. By that time the trustees thoroughly regretted the rashness which had prompted them, in the height of a fashionable progressive wave, to intrust the sacred traditions of Amherst to the hands of such a man, and they requested his resignation. The class of 1926 had just finished its freshman year. It was perhaps too young to take a large part in the demonstrations of undergraduate indignation at the time—thirteen seniors refused their diplomas—but evidently it was not too young to have profited by its brief experience of a liberal president and to have learned self-determination. The last Amherst class which knew Dr. Meiklejohn effectively recorded its undergraduate stand, while the trustees were following the academic procession of honoring millionaires.

"Can Cultured People Really Love?"

SATIRE threatens to become a lost art, for in these days folly outruns imagination and the most extravagant burlesque comes limping after the real thing. Mr. Mencken discovered how far quotation can exceed invention, and now any one with a pair of shears can outdo the fertile brain of Sinclair Lewis. For example we turn to Screenland for June.

In a single number advertisements inform us that "Excess Fat Is Not Forgiven," that "Daring Young Men Are Needed in Aviation," and that "There Is a Way" to develop the bust. A strong man enjoins us to "Make Marriage a Success" by his method, and a lady in scant attire asks the pertinent question "Why Starve Yourself to Reduce?" when you need only "chew Silph like ordinary gum." A handsomely hirsute young man confesses that "Sixty Days Ago They Called Me 'Baldy'," and two ingenious inventors offer mechanical devices, the one guaranteed to straighten our noses and the other (worn only at night) serving the double purpose of improving the lips and inhibiting any tendency to snore. To even the bow-legged man science holds out hope through an appliance supplied by M. Trilety, Specialist, and in a remarkable set of ten books "The Eternal Mystery of Woman Is Now Almost Completely Laid Bare Before You" by authors who have not hesitated to tell the entire truth about a group of ladies which includes Helen, Cleopatra, Poppea, Salome, Magdalene, Messalina, Catherine, and Dolly Madison. "If, while concealing nothing, they tell you of the faults of women, it is to accentuate their virtues; if they tell you how a Russian countess in winter had water slowly poured over nude girls to provide new statues for her gardens, they also tell you how Joan of Arc inspired the people of France and how Lady Godiva helped those of Coventry."

Yet ingenious as are these advertising columns they are more than matched by the text of the magazine itself, in which the featured article for the month is a symposium conducted by Elinor Glyn upon the subject with which we have headed this column. Madame Glyn, as those familiar with her philosophy of life might have predicted, is upon the side of culture. "If," she concedes, "it is merely the creative instinct you are alluding to—then culture has nothing to do with the emotion." But, she continues in a passage equally remarkable for its ideas and its syntax, > if you mean by "love" that quality which is half spiritual and which raises the individual when under its influence then, naturally, the higher the cultivation is and the greater the refinement of mind, so love would be felt and enjoyed more by such persons than the merely uncultivated being who has no sense of values.

Most of the screen stars who contribute their opinions are, however, inclined to put more faith in the simple heart. "I think that the part I am playing in Edmund Goulding's production 'Paris' answers this question perfectly," says Joan Crawford:

> That is the story of a young girl of the slums of Paris, uncultured and uneducated. She is in love with an apache, who is also an uncultured person. A very wealthy, refined young man is in love with her and while he offers her money and power and all of the refined, cultured things in life, she chooses her apache lover and never once wavers in her affection. This uncultured girl has an infinite capacity for love. There seems to be enough evidence to prove that love has nothing to do with education or culture. It is an emotion of the heart and the shopgirl has a heart like that of the princess.

Renee Adoree, in spite of her somewhat coquettish name, prefers to consider mother-love, which she regards as unrelated to culture; and Eleanor Boardman, discussing the same subject, remarks rather ambiguously that "we see unintelligent mothers giving up everything for their children." Conrad Nagel retires into a magnanimous skepticism with the remark that "We cannot look into the heart of anyone but ourselves," but Ramon Novarro comes out clearly that "the more sophisticated and cultured a person becomes the harder it is for him to throw himself into love," and thus we are left with Mr. Novarro and Madame Glyn upon opposite sides of the great question. The article is illustrated with a picture of Madame Glyn pouring tea for Douglas Gilmore who "was selected by this world authority on love to demonstrate that cultured people are the best lovers," but unfortunately Corinne Griffith, who is pictured upon the next page and, we are told, "wears no jewelry except sapphire eyes and ruby lips, for she has a more precious treasure—the softest kindest heart in the world," expresses no opinion upon the subject under discussion. We feel that she could have settled it.

It is reported that when Mr. Charles Chaplin and Madame Glyn first met the latter remarked "You do not look as funny as I expected," and that Mr. Chaplin replied "Neither do you." As to the truth of this report we cannot speak, but we are not surprised to note that the editor of Screenland in an editorial entitled A Plea for Imagination finally delivers himself of the following counsel: "Be gullible, be easily deceived."

News from Heaven

The Great American Tradition*

A Challenge for the Fourth of July

By CHARLES A. BEARD

"I HAVE sworn upon the altar of the living God eternal hostility against every form of tyranny over the mind of man." This powerful blast against all oppression of the human spirit was written by Thomas Jefferson, author of the Declaration of Independence, draftsman of the Virginia statute for religious liberty, and founder of the University of Virginia. And yet, vigorous as it was, this proclamation of freedom by Jefferson was but an echo from an age-long battle waged by those who dare to think against those who, with hemlock, faggot, gallows, irons, and prisons, vainly seek to strangle the irresistible power of inquiry and change.

If a beginning of this great battle must be sought, let it be in the noble words of the "Apology" offered by Socrates twenty-four centuries ago. There he said that if his accusers would spare him on condition that he would cease to search for truth his answer would be: "Athenians, I love and cherish you, but I shall obey God rather than you, and as long as I draw breath and have the strength, I shall never cease to follow the love of wisdom and to exhort and persuade any one of you whom I happen to meet." With a smile upon his face and the light of eternity in his eyes, he drained his cup of poison to the dregs. Who remembers the legislators, the judges, and the accusers who brought him to that doom of immortality?

If an immediate forerunner of Jefferson, one in the stream of our own civilization, must be chosen, let it be the blind poet of the Puritans, John Milton. In 1644, a quarter of a century after the landing of the Pilgrims at Plymouth, he issued an indictment of official censorship bearing the title Areopagitica: a Speech of Mr. John Milton for the Liberty of Unlicensed Printing, to the Parliament of England—a brief essay that stands out like a gleaming beacon above the dark oppressions of that age. Once a book which good and wise people feared as they did plague and death, it is now read in our schools by tender youth as a work of noble idealism enshrined in the finest imagery of the English tongue. For the timid, shrinking, frightened cowardice of the persecutor who would impose his little designs on the thought of mankind and keep his country asleep in inherited tradition, Milton offered the daring idea of free inquiry and free argument—an idea that would arouse the nation to greater and greater achievement.

> Methinks I see in my mind [he said] a noble and puissant nation rousing herself like a strong man after sleep and shaking her invincible locks. Methinks I see her as an eagle mewing her mighty youth and kindling her undazzled eyes at the full midday beam; purging and unscaling her long abused sight at the fountain of heavenly radiance; while the whole noise of timorous and flocking birds, with those also that love the twilight, flutter about, amazed at what she means, and in their envious gabble would prognosticate a year of sects and schisms. . . . Give me liberty to know, to utter, and to argue freely according to conscience, above all liberties.

Nearly a hundred and fifty years after Milton made this eloquent plea the American people wrote in their national Constitution a provision which expressed in a solemn avowal the principle which he had asked from the English Parliament: "Congress shall make no law respecting the establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press." Jefferson had urged this amendment and rejoiced in its enactment. It was in keeping with his spirit and indeed an inherent part of the American political system.

That system embraced no king ruling by divine right, no house of lords ruling by prescriptive tenure, no established church claiming God's sanction on its monopoly. On the contrary, it was founded on the faith that governments derive their powers from the consent of the governed; that officials are not divinely appointed masters, but elected servants; that periodically the voters should, on reviewing the conduct of their servants, approve or condemn according to their judgment. To give to any set of officials—legislative, executive, or judicial—the power of censoring, controlling, or suppressing the opinions of the people would be to place the servants above the masters, defeat the first principles of the government, and restore a regime of special privilege. An election without discussion would be an impossibility. Discussion without freedom to inquire and to argue would be a farce. Inexorably out of the logic of the American system flowed the principle of freedom of press and speech.

It would of course be doing violence to history to imply that this creed was universally accepted among the founders of this republic. Every school-child knows the history of the Sedition Act of 1798. Frightened by the criticisms of the Jeffersonians bent on ousting them from power, the Federalists hurried through Congress a law drawn in broad and loose language which in effect penalized everyone who passed severe strictures upon the Government of the United States. In fact, this measure gave to Federalist judges, prosecutors, and executive officials the authority to arrest, fine, and imprison any of their political foes who were especially objectionable to them and in practice it was so applied. And all know the verdict of history on this act of partisan fury and tyranny. The party that passed it was buried in oblivion, and for more than a century, in peace and war, no such sweeping violation of political liberty was placed upon the statute books of the United States. Even the Southern Confederacy, recoiling before the irresistible might of Northern armies and assailed by criticism within, did not adopt any measure of law comparable to the Federalist Sedition Act of 1798.

* This discussion of the American tradition of liberty formed the opening sections of an address presented by Mr. Beard on June 29, before the Fourth Commonwealth Conference, in session at the State University of Iowa. In his concluding paragraphs Mr. Beard outlined a proposal for the appointment of a representative national committee which should "study . . . the whole question of the nature and limits of political toleration; . . . examine the charges of maladministration made against certain governmental agencies during the recent crisis; . . . formulate . . . a model statute indicating the proper limits on freedom of speech in time of peace and a second setting forth such limits appropriate to war time; . . . describe . . . the procedural conditions under which prosecuting attorneys, police officials, judges, and juries should operate in dealing with persons accused of expressing forbidden opinions."

Under these historical circumstances, and in keeping with Jefferson's faith in the long judgment of the people, there grew up in America a great tradition of political liberty. Though difficult to define in law, theory, or practice, though often violated in spirit by mobs and private organizations, that tradition contained certain elements which stand out in undoubted patterns of thought. It did not declare that no alterations might be proposed in our form of government. It did not lay down the rule that in time of war the majority which controls the Government of the United States may exercise the powers and prerogatives of a Caesar. No, the tradition of American political liberty was formulated by fearless and robust men who had the honesty to apply to others the principles they claimed for themselves.

Let us seek what it meant in the language of its first great expounder, Thomas Jefferson. He did not urge the jail and the gallows for those who proposed to dissolve the Union and change our form of government. In his first inaugural he calmly said: "If there be any among us who would wish to dissolve this Union or change its republican form, let them stand undisturbed as monuments of the safety with which error of opinion may be tolerated where reason is left free to combat it." Jefferson knew that there were limits to the political freedom which he proclaimed. He could read the definition of treason in the Constitution. It was explicit. It ran: "Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort. No person shall be convicted of treason unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or on confession in open court." In those lines stood the two words which Jefferson regarded as vital to any limitation on freedom of discussion, namely, "overt act." In expounding religious liberty he made this firm declaration: "To suffer the civil magistrate to intrude his powers into the field of opinion and to restrain the profession or propagation of principles on the supposition of their ill tendency is a dangerous fallacy which at once destroys all religious liberty, because he, [illegible] of course judge of that tendency, will make his opinions the rule of judgment, and approve or condemn sentiments of others only as they square or differ with his own." The same principle Jefferson applied again nearly twenty-five years later, showing that it was with him a rooted conviction. In a letter addressed to Elijah Boardman of New Milford, Connecticut, on July 3, 1801 (now in the possession of Dr. George H. Wright, of that town), Jefferson objected to the idea that an opinion could be "an overt act," and added: "We have nothing to fear from the demoralizing reasonings of some, if others are left free to demonstrate their errors and especially when the law stands ready to punish the first criminal act produced by the false reasonings; these are safer corrections than the conscience of a judge."

All down through the nineteenth century great leaders of American opinion continued to uphold the principles which Jefferson had expounded. A cloud of witnesses could be summoned to support this statement. "This country, with its institutions," said Abraham Lincoln in his first inaugural address, "belongs to the people who inhabit it. Whenever they grow weary of the existing Government, they can exercise their constitutional right of amending it or their revolutionary right to dismember or overthrow it."

It is not only liberty that has been celebrated but liberty in season and out. "Thrice has been war declared," said William Ellery Channing more than a century ago, "and that all opposition should therefore be hushed. If the doctrine be admitted, rulers have only to declare war and they are screened at once from scrutiny. . . . We should teach our present and all future rulers that there is no measure for which they must render so solemn an account to their constituents as for a declaration of war; that no measure will be so freely, so fully discussed. . . . In war, then, as in peace assert freedom of speech and of the press." Years afterward, in the midst of the Mexican war, Theodore Parker exclaimed: "If the people cannot discuss the war they have got to fight and pay for, who under heaven can?" In the very midst of the life and death struggle over which the immortal Lincoln presided, the Democratic Party in its platform declared the war a failure, called for a cessation of hostilities, and protested against the violation of civil rights by the federal Government. Lincoln believed that the Democratic Party was wrong and the judgment of history runs with his opinion, but neither he nor his countrymen thought opposition to war and the advocacy of peace in war time a crime to be suppressed by violent and inquisitorial processes. Interference with the armed forces and the prosecution of the war were of course forbidden and in practice there was no little violation of civil liberty; but the expression of hostile opinions in political discussions (even a demand for immediate peace) was not a crime. "If this blessed old republic," urged Senator Borah long afterward, "cannot rest upon the free and voluntary support and affection of the American people in time of war as well as in time of peace, if we cannot, as a people, be free to discuss the political problems which involve limb and life, even in time of war, our government rests upon a very brittle foundation."

From the close of the eighteenth to the opening of the twentieth century the great tradition of political liberty was regarded as a sacred element in our political philosophy and practice. In time of war it was often strained by dominant parties; in time of peace it was sometimes violated by mobs; but it was consistently upheld as a guiding principle. Its essential terms were clear. The people were free to criticize and discuss their government and its acts, subject to the law of libel and slander; they were liable to pains and penalties only when their language definitely threatened an immediate overt act.

Broadly speaking, this was where we stood when the storm of the World War broke upon us in 1917. In that year Congress passed the Espionage Act for the entirely proper purposes of preventing interference with the enrolment and operation of the armed forces of the United States. The terms were explicit and the acts against which it was directed were made reasonably definite. This legislation was soon followed by the Sedition Act, and by State statutes often in terms still more general and inclusive. The provisions of these acts and the history of their enforcement established precedents so unusual that the Hon. Charles E. Hughes was led to declare: "We may well wonder, in view of the precedents now established, whether constitutional government as heretofore maintained in this republic could survive another great war even if victoriously waged."

Surely that is a grave warning that bids us pause and survey our conduct and prepare for the future. And it is best that we should do this in time of peace when the perils of battle do not thunder at our gates and the calm voice of reason can be heard.

Why Was the British Strike Called Off?

By W. N. EWER

London, May 15

IT was, I think, the battle of Spion Kop. Anyway, it was one of the series of battles on the Tugela, five and twenty years ago, when Buller was struggling to break through the Boer lines and to raise the siege of Ladysmith.

The battle had gone well for the British. The troops had advanced a considerable distance. They held good positions. Their losses had been slight. Their morale was excellent. They were confident that at last they were "through." The Boers also were convinced of the same thing. They were getting ready to retreat. The heavy gun teams were "in-spanning." The orders were given. Suddenly their scouts reported an astonishing thing. The British were not preparing to pursue. They were actually beginning to withdraw. They were evacuating their strongest positions.

The Boers shrugged their shoulders and thanked their God for the folly of the Rooinek. The Englishman, they had often heard, did not know when he was beaten. Apparently he also did not know when he was winning. The gun teams were outspanned. The riflemen wheeled about and moved, not northward in retreat, but southward in pursuit. Botha was able to wire to Pretoria the news of another victory.

Just what had happened no one knew—except the plain fact that just at the critical moment when the Boers were preparing to quit, someone at the British G. H. Q. decided for some reason or other to break off the battle.

That, or something very like it, happened in London on the fateful day of Wednesday, May 12.

It was the eighth day of the General Strike. The strike had been a success beyond all calculation, beyond all expectation. The response to the call had been unanimous; even more than unanimous, for thousands of non-unionists came out with their unionist fellow-workers, not under coercion, but moved by a sudden wave of class-consciousness which swept over the country. Let one tiny instance of this suffice—a South London machine-shop. It employed fifty men. Only five of them were trade unionists, but when the order came to those five, the whole fifty struck.

From end to end of Great Britain the same thing happened. Not the oldest trade unionist can remember such solidarity. Not the oldest agitator can remember such enthusiasm. In sleepy cathedral towns, where Labor meetings were almost unknown and where a handful of men and women had struggled hard to keep a feeble organization in being, men left their work and great crowds gathered at demonstrations, to the bewilderment as well as to the delight of those stalwarts. Everywhere intense enthusiasm. Everywhere, in accordance with orders, perfect calm. The "incidents" and the "riots" which figured in the news were of a trivial character. More people were arrested in a tuppenny-halfpenny Royalist demonstration in Paris last week than in any of the "strike riots" in Britain. The Government strove hard to give melodramatic value to a situation which was for them unnerving because of its grim quietness. They paraded armored cars and tanks about the streets to "keep order" where there was no disorder. They enrolled "specials" by tens of thousands. And the poor specials had nothing to do but bore themselves stiff parading empty streets, or else combine "police duty" with the conducting of scab omnibuses. They sent a squadron of cavalry and a battalion of guards and a fleet of tanks to fetch a food convoy from the London docks. Nobody had been stopping food convoys and a couple of policemen would have done the job. But the Government—it was a sign of nerves—must needs send a miniature expeditionary force. Five miles and more through the crowded East London streets those unhappy troops had to march. Five miles through crowds who cheered and laughed. A humiliating, demoralizing business. No Communist could have devised a better plan for "creating disaffection in His Majesty's Forces." The experiment was not repeated.

A whole week of orderly strike. Nothing for a Napoleon-Churchill or a Mussolini-Jix to get hold of. Not an excuse for a whiff of grapeshot or even for a dose of castor oil. The calm of it was in itself disconcerting. The confidence of the men, their quiet readiness to stick it out as long as might be needed were alarming. "The first two bloody years of this strike are going to be the worst" was the slogan in the East End. "What about the Christmas number of the British Worker?" was the favorite jest of the strikers in Fleet Street.

They had dug their toes in for a long struggle. At the end of a week the strike was as solid as a rock. The British Gazette cried in headlines that it was breaking, that the men were dribbling back to work; but try as it might, it could find nothing to put under those headlines to justify them. Day by day the numbers of the strikers increased instead of dwindling. From every district came the same report—that the hard thing was to persuade the men to stay in and await orders.

And every day the quiet, relentless, economic pressure increased. The spectacular running of perilous "skeleton" services of passenger trains, the exploits of young gentlemen from the universities who drove buses and lorries, often to the public danger and nearly always with disastrous results to engines and gearboxes, were of no importance at all. Every considerable industry in the country was at a standstill or rapidly coming to a standstill, unable to function for want of fuel, for want of raw material, for want of transport. Business men, seeing their losses mounting into the millions, were beginning to ask why they should be sacrificed in the interests of the coal-owners. The Anglican church began to call for peace. The saner elements in the Government became anxious.

Over the week-end the tentative approaches were made. Sir Herbert Samuel was sent to explore the possibilities of agreement. That meant, in fact, that the Government was preparing for a compromise, for a settlement, provided that its face could be saved. Sir Herbert was to prepare the way for a retreat. The propaganda of the British Gazette grew less violent. The appeal of the Archbishop was allowed to be broadcast, was even published in the British Gazette. Sir John Simon, a day or two before the darling of the die-hards, was put up to support it in the House of Commons. The big gun teams in fact were in-spanning. The retreat was being organized. And the Labor forces, scenting what was happening, grew more confident than ever.

Wednesday morning saw the Government wavering, shot through and through by internal dissension, under growing pressure from the business men and from the "saner" elements. It saw the Labor ranks unbroken, unbent, more enthusiastic than at any moment of the strike.

Suddenly there came word of comings and goings, of a meeting with the Premier. And then the brief announcement that the strike had been called off: that the Trade Union Congress General Council were satisfied, after seeing Mr. Baldwin, that the miners would get a "square deal."

The first news was greeted with a roar of enthusiasm and delight. No one doubted for a moment that a resounding victory had been won. Probably some arrangement had been made to save the Government's face. Obviously the General Council had been promised that the Government would adopt the plan which Sir Herbert Samuel had devised and which had been adjudged by the council to be a reasonable basis for negotiation. Obviously they had been promised that the lockout notices would be withdrawn during the negotiations. For quite plainly they would not otherwise have called off the strike.

That was the heartening first impression. It was followed by agonizing doubts as the evening wore on and the wireless screamed that the Government had won a decisive victory, that the strike had been called off unconditionally, that no promise and no pledge had been given, that the T. U. C. had surrendered at discretion. And then came the verbatim reports of the Downing Street conversation as confirmatory evidence. There was a shudder of doubt, a feeling of bewilderment, a suspicion that perhaps after all this was not the expected victory.

A few more hours made it terribly clear. Men reporting themselves for work in accordance with the order were told that they must wait until wanted, that if they were taken back it would be at reduced wages.

Automatically the line rallied, closed, held firm. Twenty-four hours after the strike had been called off scarcely a man was back. When news came to the railwaymen's meetings on the Thursday afternoon that they were to stay out, they cheered frantically. What had been happening they did not understand. But this they understood. It was the fight again, if only a rearguard action.

Those two days' stubbornness saved a terrible disaster. The employers' counter-offensive on wages had been launched in the belief that the strike was broken. It checked and broke against the firm front which it found. But, however splendid the troops, a retreat is a difficult operation in which loss is unavoidable. And some of the big unions—notably the railways and docks—signed, as the price of a settlement, humiliating admissions that the strike had been a wrongful act and promises that it should not be repeated.

Moreover, days passed—and there was no word of the lockout notices being withdrawn. The general strike was liquidated: but a million miners were left to struggle alone. Mr. Baldwin produced his proposals. They were not the Samuel memorandum. And the miners were invited to consider them under the coercion of the lockout.

What the miners will do I cannot foretell. They are sore and angry. They feel themselves deserted. And they do not understand why. So with the rank and file of the other industries. They feel that they have been balked of victory. They also are puzzled. If I have been asked once I have been asked fifty times in the last two days: Why did they call off the strike?

It is a vitally important question, but singularly hard to answer. In some measure it seems certain that the General Council was duped by one of those pieces of ill-faith of which only the most honorable gentlemen are capable. It seems clear that they understood that the Samuel proposal was the Government's own proposal, and that the moment the strike was called off the lockout would be ended. There can be little doubt that the Government was prepared to do this: that only, when, to its amazement, the order to resume work was given without any guaranties being exacted, did it decide to repudiate any understandings and to claim an unconditional surrender.

But even so we are driven back upon the question, Why were no guaranties exacted? Why was there no clear-cut understanding, too precise for repudiation?

The answer must probably be sought in the fact that many, perhaps most, of the General Council had never really liked the General Strike. They had got themselves into a situation in which they were bound to order it—or to order something which would lead directly to it. But up to the last moment they had hoped for some miracle or some formula which would avert it. The Government's slamming of the door on further negotiations, Mr. Baldwin's tactical retreat to his bedroom in order to avoid even conversations, forced their hand. They found themselves suddenly leading a great movement of which, in their hearts, they did not approve. The very success of the move, the unanimity of the response, the solidarity, the enthusiasm must have dismayed many of them. Here was a situation which might, if prolonged, develop into anything, a great force which might carry them farther than they dared think of, force upon them powers and responsibilities from which they shrank instinctively. The Government's declarations, the conveniently obtained judicial ruling that they were acting illegally, must have had its desired psychological effect. The Government propaganda, the insidious atmosphere of the West End of London, may have unconsciously worked upon men who were of necessity out of touch for the time being with their own people. The fighting line was as rigid as steel. But one cannot resist the conclusion that the nerves of G. H. Q. were shaken. They were in a mood to catch at the first opportunity of honorably breaking off the battle and returning to their normal habits. And so, when opportunity seemed to have come they did catch at it, over-eagerly, without waiting to consider whether it was, in fact, an opportunity or a trap.

All big struggles are at bottom a test and a trial of nerves. Reduced to its simplest terms the explanation of the whole business seems to be that the nerves of the General Council gave way a few hours before the nerves of the Government.

It is too soon to strike a balance of gain and loss with any confidence. But one has the impression that the ill effects of the bad days which closed the strike will, though serious enough, be transient, whereas the effect of the realization during the week of struggle of its own power will leave a lasting impression on the British Labor movement.

Florida Cashes in Her Chips

By STELLA CROSSLEY

THE Florida boom has collapsed. The world's greatest poker game, played with building lots instead of chips, is over. And the players are now cashing in or paying up.

Most of them, of course, are paying up; for, just as in poker, the chief winners are the big boys who had had experience in the game and a large roll of money to start with and were able either to quit early with their winnings or play on to the end of the game when the stacks of all the little fellows had melted away.

Some big fellows who didn't expect the game to break up so soon and gambled heavily toward the end lost heavily, and some little fellows who took a few hands when the game was going best and cashed in before the finish are also rich or better off. But for the most part, uncountable numbers of Americans, who believe cards and gambling sinful, have staked their all in Florida's feverish game and lost. And the roads leading northward are today black with these sadder and wiser, but poorer people.

And it is a strangely quiet exodus. To see and realize conditions throughout Florida today and compare them with what they were only a short time back one would expect, if not a great hue and cry, at least great lamentations throughout the nation. But perhaps it's too soon for those cheated at the game to "squeal." Too many still have hope of getting their money back.

"For land's sake," exclaimed my neighbor in Sinclair Hills Subdivision (four miles outside Tampa's city limits), "now you've unloaded your place and are going North, don't say anything about Florida till we can unload ours. We've been knocking Florida among ourselves, but if we have to board up this house and go off and leave it vacant after trying these three months to sell it, believe me, when we get back to Illinois we're going to praise Florida to the skies! They say they're buying better up North than here anyway, and we've just got to sell!"

The circumstances of this woman and her family are typical. With all their savings they came to Tampa last summer and immediately plunged. First they paid $1,000 cash as down payment on a $3,800 "business" lot in Temple Terrace Estates, a far-out subdivision. The "high-pressure" salesman promised immediate street paving, water, etc., and my neighbor, with typical confidence, expected just as immediately to resell at a handsome profit. Then, withdrawing more from their savings, they made down payments on three lots in Inglewood Park (three being necessary because they were of 25 foot frontage) and built there a small house especially to sell. And finally, with virtually the last of their savings, they "invested" in Sinclair Hills and built a "garage apartment" of one room and sleeping porch on the back of their "restricted" lot for temporary living quarters and, of course, eventual sale.

But about the middle of last November buyers or "investors" became noticeably scarce. Our neighbors and the thousands of others in like circumstances grew somewhat restive. Everyone whisperingly admitted "there's a slump on now." Invariably, however, this admission would be followed by some encouraging explanation. First it was: "It's always slow this time o' year; wait till the Christmas holidays are over." Then: "Wait till after the South Florida Fair in February," or "Wait till the races are over"; and finally: "It's bound to pick up in April—last April was our biggest month."

But it never "picked up." On the contrary, like a gigantic balloon that had been punctured, the gas began noiselessly and gradually but surely to escape until by early March it had to be admitted by all, even the most frantic Florida boosters, that the end had come and that nothing but the shriveled skin of that enormous thing was left. Roger Babson, the statistician of Babson Park, Florida, fame, declared that "anyone who doesn't know the subdivision business is dead, is dead himself from the nose up."

When full realization of this began to dawn on all, such as our friends in Sinclair Hills, quiet panic began. The big boys and the bankers, who, incidentally, take 8 per cent interest in Florida but lend nothing with a subdivision lot as security, declared: "We are now back on a stable basis." But ordinary folk said: "The boom is busted."

Throughout the State today are the eloquent signs of the boom's collapse and, as the native Floridian contemptuously describes it, "The rats are scuttling the ship," or "The 'binder boys' are marching through Georgia." Indeed, this hegira is described best by a Georgian, lounging on his doorstep along the highway: "'Pears like they's mo' comin' out o' Florida than evah went down. I've timed twenty-seven Florida cars goin' by in the last hour and they been goin' by like that fo' mo' than a month now."

This is almost true. The larger cities like Tampa and Miami, where but lately the streets were teeming with traffic, forcing the installation of new traffic and parking systems, are now nearly as lifeless as the street on a theater curtain. And where once neither living quarters nor office space could be found, the wind now whips For Rent signs on every other building.

My own experience is typical and shows this contrast of conditions. In cities like Tampa and St. Petersburg on the West Coast the landlords last October were holding people up for $150 a month on dingy two-room apartments, and these could scarcely be found at that price. In Miami they were demanding $250 a month for similar quarters, requiring tenants to pay the first and last two months on a year's lease in advance. It was this situation that forced us to buy a lot in far-out Sinclair Hills and build, finding that there the down payment and monthly payments would be somewhat lower than such rent prices and we considered that, even though the boom collapsed, it was the more economical choice between two gangs of thieves.

By March this situation had completely reversed. In Miami, as a friend there expressed it, "the landlords are crawling up and down Flagler Street on their hands and knees, begging you to take their $250 apartments at $50 a month." This friend, who by the same conditions we encountered on the West Coast had been forced to make a down payment of $5,000 on an $18,000 home in Coral Gables and who last winter could not accept offers of $20,000 to $25,000 because he could find no place else to live and could not leave the city because his business was at stake, today finds that he cannot get $10,000 for his home. Indeed, there are no buyers at any price.

The result of this situation is that the big "developments" throughout Florida are having lots thrown back on their hands into their resale departments. There are instances where from 50 to 75 per cent of the buyers, unable to sell and unable to meet their second payments, have forsaken their "investments" for the development companies to do with as they may.

And since even most of the largest developments were "shoe-stringing"—making their promised improvements only as the deferred payments came in—their improvements were halted; contracts with construction companies canceled; salesmen, workmen, clerical help, and others laid off, and bills mounting into the millions of dollars for advertising, building materials, and such left unpaid.

Every few days now one hears the underground rumbling of the collapse of one of the big developments, the whispered bankruptcy of a leading realtor. A Tampa landlady who had made big money on two rooming houses during the fall and winter, charging fabulous prices for unsanitary rooms and so-called apartments, told me the last week in March that out of fourteen roomers in one house only two were left, and eight out of ten roomers in the other house had "stood her up" for the rent. She said they were clerical workers, advertising men, and salesmen employed by "a $100,000,000 development" in Tampa who had failed to receive their pay or had been discharged.

Thus, like a house of cards, the slight disturbance of one card has laid the house low—all industry and commerce throughout Florida is seriously affected. The newspapers and magazines which grew fat on wild, hullabaloo advertising of real estate have enormous sums written in red on their books today. The auditor of one leading magazine told me "on the quiet" that it was $190,000 "in the red." In a new court recently created in Hillsborough County, of which Tampa is the seat, to care for civil actions, 80 per cent of the cases have been replevins of automobiles, payments on which have not been met.

Every day now the Florida newspapers in articles and editorials declare in heated terms that "business is good," that at present there is "merely a readjustment that had to come," and they denounce violently anyone who makes a statement to the contrary. In true American fashion they cast about for a scapegoat to blame the "readjustment" upon. Presto! Two are found! "Northern propaganda founded on jealousy of our prosperity" and the "binder boys."

There is some measure of truth, perhaps, in the statement that "Northern propaganda" hastened the collapse; but most of it was not vicious but rather genuinely truthful descriptions of Florida conditions. But the last thing the man with his fortunes at stake in the Florida boom really wanted was the truth. "Truth," to him, was always a flattering, exaggerated talk about Florida's climate and advantages. "Lies" were anything the least discouraging to possible "investors."

As for blaming it on the "binder boys"—hypothetical gentlemen always of the hated Jewish extraction—who bought short-time options on property with intention to sell the option or the property before the option was up, that is something of a joke to an unbiased observer who has lived through the boom. The truth is that a very high percentage of all those who played in the Florida real-estate game were "binder boys" of greater or lesser degree. Most property was bought, not for use, nor even to hold long, but to sell quickly at the biggest possible profit. And a great majority of those who made down payments on expensive properties or lots had no plan or notion of making the second payments; nothing, in fact, but an assurance of "a quick turnover" whenever desired.

A California Liberal

By MICHAEL BLOUNT

IN 1910 Hiram Johnson became Governor of California, promising to "kick the Southern Pacific out of politics." He did kick the Southern Pacific out of politics; and he kept it out by means of commissions designed to regulate public utilities and empowered to make their rulings final save for a review by the State Supreme Court.

But in 1916 Johnson went to the Senate, and the story of California since then has been the story of the gradual seizure by the big corporations of the very commissions Johnson created to watch over them. These commissions are appointed by the Governor. The incumbent Governor, Friend William Richardson, has been able, through a number of vacancies, to pack the commissions with men who by nature and inclination are corporation supporters.

Until a year or so ago, however, the State Supreme Court, possessed of the power to review the acts of the commissions, was a check upon their too often arbitrary holdings. Today, because of resignations and other circumstantial factors, the Supreme Court itself is composed of a majority of appointed justices, including the Chief Justice, and to appeal to the court from a decision of a commission is to undertake a task well-nigh futile in the face of the natural tendency of the appointed justices to sustain the acts of the appointed commissioners. The check which once kept the commissions within the limits of judicial decency has been destroyed, and the Governor, as the appointing power, is virtually the head of the judiciary.

Friend William Richardson boasts that he has never listened to a plea for clemency. He is reported to have said that the jury which convicted Anita Whitney of criminal syndicalism, on evidence which proved she was opposed to violence in any form, should have brought in a verdict of death. This sort of rumor has caused even his former backers to wonder how they can get rid of him.

But the Governor's opponents for the Republican nomination in the August primaries have not been able to evoke much enthusiasm. One, the present Lieutenant Governor, C. C. Young, is intelligently progressive and of no little ability. He is a quiet man, however, and has done little more than ripple the political pond. The other—Rex Goodcell of San Bernadino—has wet tendencies, and these tendencies hurt him in the south, where he should be strongest, while he is relatively unknown in the north.

Until recently it seemed probable that out of this lethargic condition Richardson would emerge with the nomination, and nomination in this case means election. A short while ago, however, a new figure entered the lists, and the situation has undergone a change. In an address to the lawyers of Fresno County Thomas J. Lennon, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court, announced his candidacy for the chief justiceship, and made certain pertinent remarks which startled the State. After twenty-four years of unostentatious service on the bench Lennon told his hearers that he was weary of watching the disintegration of the Supreme Court, that what California needed was not more courts but more work by the courts now in existence, and that the present situation, wherein the acts of appointed commissioners must be passed on by a court the majority of whose members are also appointed, is intolerable and destructive of the State constitution. He asserted that "a coterie of high-powered corporation lawyers and ex- and incumbent judges of high- and low-powered courts handpick and handicap judicial appointments," that there is "a beaten path from the door of the chief justice to the door of the chief executive," that "there should be no such link between the judicial and executive branches of the government," and that the judiciary must be restored to the people, to whom it belongs.

Lennon's announcement, wholly unheralded, has put steam into the Young and Goodcell boilers, and raised Lennon overnight from a quiet, unassuming, hard-working magistrate to the most-talked-of political figure in the State. Here, it seems, is one judge at least who will not pussyfoot. He appears to know nothing of circumlocution. He states his case without a softening word, breaking through the hedges of that sacrosanct dignity which is supposed to surround judicial office.

The opposition is furnished by the present Chief Justice, William H. Waste, appointed by the Governor, whom the Governor refers to as "my chief justice." Waste is a nice, nervous little man who took office following the resignation of Louis W. Myers. Myers had been appointed by Richardson following the resignation of Lucien Shaw, who had been appointed by Richardson following the resignation of Curtis D. Wilbur, who had been appointed by Richardson following the resignation of Frank M. Angellotti. Angellotti had been elected by the people, but resigned to become chief counsel for the Western Pacific. Wilbur resigned to become Secretary of the Navy. Shaw resigned because, it is understood, he agreed to do so after one year so that Myers might have the job; and Meyers resigned to make room for Waste.

Waste is making a typical Y. M. C. A. campaign. As the head of that organization in California some years ago, Waste promulgated the rule forbidding the admission of Negroes to its rites. He has courted the support of the Klan in the sparsely settled districts, and will have the support of the Governor. He is bone dry and opposed to any referendum on the Volstead Act.

Lennon has gone on record as saying that "a verdict from the people, one way or the other, can do no harm on any question." Indeed, Lennon consistently has championed the right of the people to control a government they own. He dissented from the opinion ruling the 1924 La Follette electors from the California ballot. In his dissent, which was marked by a restrained and modulated vehemence, he reduced the opinion of the court to absurdity, and pointed out that no technical interpretation of a liberal statute should be permitted so to pervert the meaning of that statute as to deny the people the very rights that the statute sought to give them. He also dissented from the order denying Anita Whitney a hearing by the Supreme Court of California.

It is possible that Waste may win. It is also possible that Richardson may win. But there is hope at least that California in 1926 will have occasion to congratulate itself as it did in 1910, and that the nomination of Lennon and the defeat of Richardson will result in the emancipation of the judicial and executive branches of its government.

In the Driftway

AS a rule the Drifter doesn't read the political news with great assiduity. Commonly it bores him and it never seems to make much difference who is chosen at the primary or final elections. The Drifter thinks the situation was admirably summarized by Pat, a janitor friend whom somebody once chided for having failed to vote. "It's this way," explained Pat. "Whoever is elected I'll have to get up and go to work tomorrow morning just the same."

* * * * *

BUT the other day, through a sense of duty or boredom or some other insufficient reason, the Drifter read all the way through an account of the Maine primaries. And was rewarded. For down at the very end of the dispatch from Portland he found a gold nugget: "In Allegash plantation, Aroostook County, all the male voters were absent on a log drive on the St. John River. The women apparently were timid about going to the polls, and not a single vote was cast." That is what the Drifter calls a sensible—and probably a happy—community. What should any red-blooded men care for politics when there was a log drive to occupy them? A feminist friend of the Drifter's resents the assumption that the women were too timid to go to the polls, insisting that that is merely a statement of the reporter's prejudices; more likely the women were too busy tending the babies or feeding the chickens. Well, so much the better. That's a further indication that the community is a sensible and a happy one. Anyhow the Drifter's fancy was so much tickled that at once he looked up Allegash on the map and found it way up in the northwest corner of Maine, twenty miles from a railroad track and twenty thousand miles from politics. The Drifter contemplates a speedy visit to Allegash. Only he thinks he will go in winter, when he will probably be snowed in and will thus have a good excuse for making a long stay. He has hopes that in Allegash there is not more than one radio per family and that they have not yet heard of the crime wave or the failure of prohibition—never having tried either.

* * * * *

HAROLD HERSEY amiably protests because this oracle on June 16 said that the Quill was founded by Arthur H. Moss:

> The fact of the matter is three of us conceived and carried into effect the Quill. They were Forrest Mann, Arthur Moss, and myself. At the time I had just enlisted as a buck private in the army and was editing Le Dernier Cri, the Spectator, and other Village "mags." We had our office in an old ramshackle structure on Sheridan Square, now a highly respectable, commonplace apartment house. One evening we had nothing better to do and so we founded the Quill. I thought I could conduct its editorial affairs from the ranks of the army while Moss handled business details, but it proved too much for me and Moss and I soon disagreed on every possible matter that came up, although we still remain the best of friends.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Bill Hard Translates Catullus

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: In the delightful article by Ludwig Lewisohn, Catullus in Verona, I find a charming translation of the famous first six lines of Catullus's fifth poem.

I cannot rival this translation for poetry, but I venture to send you another translation which may be interesting from another standpoint. I have rendered each line of Catullus by an exactly corresponding line of English; I have used Catullus's exact figures of speech; I have retained Catullus's flippant tone in lines two and three; and I have used Catullus's own hendecasyllabic meter. Thus, while the reader will not be so charmed as by Mr. Lewisohn's translation, he will, as a minor matter, learn more precisely just what Catullus said, and how he said it, in this eternally appealing passage.

With tremblings by the author, here this literal translation is:

> Live we, Lesbia, live and love and love, dear.
> [illegible]
> [illegible]
> Suns can set and can then return awakened.
> We, when once has our little light gone from us,
> [illegible]

Washington, D. C., June 20 William Hard

Free Traders Convene

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: There is to be an International Conference to promote the Taxation of Land Values and Free Trade at Copenhagen, Denmark, from July 20 to July 31. The Genus Homo, species Free Trader, is about extinct in this country. The truth which W. G. Sumner, David A. Wells, Henry George, and John DeWitt Warner once made so plain has become eclipsed, proving Roger Babson right when he said:

> The war taught the employing class the secret and power of widespread propaganda. Imperial Europe had [illegible] power. It was new to the United States. Now when we have anything to sell the American people we know how to sell it. We have learned. We have the schools. We have the pulpits. The employing class owns the press. There is practically no important newspaper in the United States but is theirs.

The Copenhagen Conference will be held in the Parliament building. Charles O'Connor Hennessy of New York has been chosen to preside. On the program the following topics are down for discussion: World Peace, Unemployment, the Housing Problem, the Importance of Free Trade for the Recovery of Europe, Taxation of Land Values in Practice, Land Valuation, Henry George and Denmark, Land Division in Germany, the Historical Development of Danish Agricultural Rights. Excursions to the farming districts and the colonies of small holders will be particularly interesting. It was the reform of farming conditions, getting the land back to the farmer, that put Denmark on such a basis of general prosperity that the little country weathered the war years and did so much to feed all Europe. The Danish farmer has done away with the middleman.

This conference is called by those who believe that taxation should be used to prevent monopolies, not to create them; to equitably diffuse wealth, not to unjustly concentrate it; to promote liberty and equality of rights and not to abolish them. Besides representatives from England and America there will be delegations from Germany, Austria, France, and other countries.

New York, June 10 Chester C. Platt

SPUNK

The Foundation of American Independence

In the rock-ribbed State of Maine, a veteran of the Civil War was running for the office of First Selectman. On Saturday night he wound up his campaign with an eloquent attack on his opponent, the village saloon-keeper, who thereupon rose to his feet and remarked testily:

"If you didn't shoot off your mouth so much, Rogers, you might get an office in this town sometime."

The Colonel drew himself to his full six feet, and replied:

"I wouldn't forego the pleasure of shootin' off my mouth for any office in the town of Patten."

In New England
they call it spunk
In Pennsylvania
they call it nerve

From Pittsburgh a subscriber to The Nation writes:

"You had a lot of nerve to inform me of the expiration of my subscription at the very time you castigate our method of shelling out the coin here in Pennsylvania when we want to select an honorable representative to the U. S. Senate. . . .

"It is this attitude of yours on public questions that makes it a pleasure to renew my subscription to an honest, fearless publication."

Spunk or nerve, whichever you call it, it is the essence of American independence and the spirit in which THE NATION has been edited for sixty-one years.

THE NATION
20 Vesey Street, New York City

Please send me The Nation for a year.

Name . . . . . .

Address . . . . . .

$5 a year Canadian $5.50. Foreign $6

7-7-26

Books

Margins

By WILBERT SNOW

The birds frequent the entrance to the wood,
And fish patrol the edges of the shore;
March breezes that anticipate May's mood
And nuzzle round torn fences token more
To me than mid-May's lilac-scented noons;
A friend who leaves me at my inmost shrine
Is dearer far than one who importunes
From me the secrets I would still keep mine;
And even lovers stale not who retreat
From chambers in love's mansion where alone
Their loved ones sit determined to defeat
Gregarious hours challenging their own—
Aware that half the secret of a star
Is grace to know the sun's heat from afar.

The French Revolution and After

L'Esprit Révolutionnaire en France et aux États-Unis à la Fin du XVIII^e Siècle. By Bernard Fay. Paris: E. Champion.

Napoleon and Marie Louise: The Fall of the Empire. By Walter Geer. Brentano's. $5.

Memoirs of a Napoleonic Officer. By Jean-Baptiste Barrès. The Dial Press. $4.

On the Road with Wellington. By August Ludolf Friedrich Schaumann. Alfred A. Knopf. $7.50.

THE fascination of the heroic period of French history from the eve of the revolution to the overthrow of Napoleon Bonaparte continues to make itself felt. Here we have four books, two by Frenchmen, one by an American, and one by a German, all written with contagious enthusiasm and each contributing, by way either of new material or of new interpretation, to a better appreciation of the period. M. Fay has embodied in a volume which should be translated into English at the earliest possible moment the results of long labors in France and America upon the mutual influence of revolutionary ideas and ideals as they developed on both sides of the water in the last three decades of the eighteenth century. Hitherto there had been no adequate study of the interpenetration of the philosophic, religious, and literary ideas of the two countries during this time in which took place "the greatest battle of ideas in modern times." Nor is the author content merely to trace the origin and weigh the abstract value of these ideas; he attempts to show also how they leavened the spirit of the masses in both countries and so made permanent contributions to the mutual national psychologies—both in their sympathetic and in their antipathetic elements. Passing easily and frequently from Philadelphia to Paris and from Paris back to Philadelphia, Boston, or Charleston as his center of thought, M. Fay skilfully weaves his threads into a convincing pattern, showing the struggle here between sympathy and repulsion for the triumphing philosophy of Jacobinism, and the eclipse of fraternity in "the great schism" of 1795-1800.

Mr. Geer's book is a companion volume to his "Napoleon and Josephine." Yet is it hardly a supplement to that. Chronologically the new volume repeats the second half of the old; but the treatment is from an entirely different point of view. Josephine was the outstanding figure there, and Napoleon's fortunes were considered from the point of view of the influences and the fate of the charming Creole who played an important part even in the days of repudiation and quasi-exile. Mr. Geer's theme now is "the Austrian marriage and its effects on the Russian alliance." Beginning with the Polish campaign of 1806-1807, the author treats in detail the formation of the alliance of Napoleon with Alexander of Russia, and the complicated results of that alliance in the diplomatic and military relations between Napoleon and the Powers of Europe. He looks upon Tilsit as the critical event in Napoleon's career. Had the entente negotiated there "been consolidated and perpetuated," he says, "it is probable that England would have given up the struggle and that his object would have been attained. The rupture with Russia, to which the Austrian alliance directly led, revived the almost extinct coalition, drew Napoleon into disastrous enterprises [the Moscow campaign], and ended in his downfall." It is to the disastrous enterprises and the downfall that the second half of the volume is devoted. The elements that entered into Napoleon's downfall are so complex that it is perhaps a bit rash to emphasize any one of them unduly. Napoleon himself, at St. Helena, attributed his downfall to the Spanish revolt: "Cette malheureuse guerre m'a perdu." Scholars may quarrel with Mr. Geer on this point. But they will all have only praise for the thoroughness, clarity, and charm of his work. Especially to those readers who are not acquainted with the writings of Vandal he will bring a new revelation of Napoleon's contacts with Russia.

Jean-Baptiste Barrès (the grandfather of Maurice Barrès) rose from being a 20-year-old skirmisher of the Guard at the time of Napoleon's coronation in 1804 to be lieutenant and member of the Legion of Honor before the overthrow of the Emperor. He made his peace with the Restoration government, adhered to the Revolution of 1830, and after thirty years of service under one regime or another died in the early days of the July Monarchy. His diaries, transcribed from "dozens of little note-books, tattered and soiled, which he had carried about with him, in his haversack, for twenty years, over half the highways of Europe," are now published by his distinguished grandson. Barrès had no need to hang himself, like "brave Crillon," for he was "there" at all the great battles of the empire: Austerlitz, Jena, Eylau, Friedland, Dresden, and Leipzig. He bore a charmed life, like his great commander. But, unlike his great commander, he has given us a most vivid picture of the daily life of soldiers in camp and on the march.

While Barrès, under the shadow of the imperial eagles, was jotting down a record of victories and hardships across the Rhine, a fair-haired Hanoverian commissary in the army of the Duke of Wellington was keeping a detailed diary of the campaign against Napoleon's marshals in the Iberian peninsula. This diary, designed only "for the entertainment and edification of his family," lay hidden in the author's German home for a hundred years, until, in 1922, it was published (like that of Barrès) by a grandson. From the original German work in two large volumes Mr. Ludovici has selected for translation the part dealing with the Peninsular War. From the moment that Commissary Schaumann landed in the raging surf off the shores of Portugal, in August, 1808, until an August day six years later, when he returned to London to celebrate the wild Peace Festival and was unable to reach his lodgings at two o'clock in the morning for "the stream of people who poured down the Strand with me" and "dragged me along with it," this is a tale of uninterrupted excitement. And the tale loses nothing in the telling because the diarist is something of a swashbuckler and more of a Lothario. Some passages of the diary rise to the heights of genuine eloquence and pathos. The description of Sir John Moore's retreat to Corunna, for instance, is as harrowingly vivid as any page of Tolstoi's "War and Peace." Commissary Schaumann was an artist with the brush as well as with the pen. The volume is illustrated with twenty of his sketches in color, including as the frontispiece a Selbstbildnis which looks like a sweet Little Lord Fauntleroy!

DAVID SAVILLE MUZZEY

Is Immigration an Error?

The Melting-Pot Mistake. By Henry Pratt Fairchild. Little, Brown and Company. $2.50.

THE fundamental thesis of this book is indicated by its title. "The purpose of the melting-pot figure was to convince the American people that immigration did not threaten its unity but tended to produce even a finer type of unity. It failed because it did not take account of the true nature of group unity, of the conditions of its preservation or of the actual consequences of such inroads upon unity as are involved in an immigration movement." Race, nationality, group contacts, the making of a nation, the menace of recent immigration, assimilation, Americanization, the meaning of America, the making of Americans, and the duty of America are among the topics that receive special and well-argued consideration. But race and nationality, which, according to the author, are the two universal foundations of group unity, are the major problems upon which differences of opinion will arise. Racial assimilation, it is argued, is impossible because racial traits, being biologic facts, are transmitted from generation to generation unchanged; they may mix but they do not amalgamate; and in dogs mixture produces a mongrel. Thus a human being made up of numerous strains is a sort of human mosaic, neither more nor less than the sum total of his biologic existence. Mr. Fairchild might have quoted Solomon: "Though thou shouldst bray a fool in mortar with a pestle among wheat yet will not his foolishness depart from him." Pulverized though he might be, the fool would still be all there. Up to 1882 there was no race problem in America because the immigrants came from those races in Europe that were essentially like the American. Then the trouble began: the strains from Eastern and Southeastern Europe brought the new menace that is with us today and that threatens our unity and civilization.

Nationality, on the other hand, being an acquired characteristic, may be socially transmitted and become the basis of national unity. But when the concussions of the Great War had died down "the melting-pot was discovered to be so badly cracked that it is not likely ever to be dragged into service again." The remedy, therefore, is practically to shut out all aliens and Americanize those who are now with us. This logic of course justifies the passage of the pending Alien Registration bills—with an initial fee of ten dollars, subsequent annual fines of five dollars, and the inauguration of a general system of espionage. It should be said at once, however, that the author does not recommend such treatment of the alien now in our midst; he simply does not believe that in general the foreign-born person can become a real American; he believes that only those born and educated here can understand the meaning of America.

Condemning, as Mr. Fairchild does, the melting-pot symbol as a mistake, one may be justified in asking whether the new symbol indicated by his title is not also an assumption unwarranted by facts. This book impresses one as having been written by one who knows his subject and has mastered his material; it is an excellent statement of his philosophy. But it will leave many unconvinced that the war demonstrated the impossibility of Americanization. Was dragging a German pastor through the streets and compelling him to kiss the flag evidence on the part of the German-Americans of failure to assimilate? Could it not, in the light of what we now know, be truthfully asserted that in view of the policy of our government during the war the German-Americans showed a spirit of loyalty and forbearance unparalleled in the history of war? What proof has ever been adduced to show that the Nordics, apart from environment, have a preeminent claim to democratic ideals of liberty and justice? Were the followers of Mazzini less inspired by these ideals than the adherents of Bismarck? Did Morel, Russell, and MacDonald endure imprisonment to preserve a biologic formula? Is it safe or scientific to assume that Mussolini commands the spirit of the Italians today or Horthy that of the democratic Hungarians? In none of these typical cases is the basis of dissent a racial one; in all it is caused by a mistaken policy on the part of governments or by unscrupulous leaders dominated by the idea of imperialistic aggrandizement. The war proves absolutely nothing about assimilation. The significant thing that it does prove is not that different races and nationalities cannot live in concord under one flag—Switzerland is an outstanding denial of this assumption—but that a certain school of sociologists have no faith in the power of ideals to win and keep men to a common standard.

KARL F. GEISER

A New Science of Character

Physique and Character. By E. Kretschmer. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $5.

AS a technical contribution this volume is presumably caviare to the general, even to the fairly omnivorous, reader; but its theme should intensely interest the layman. It is a straightforward attempt to solve anew the enigma of personality, to find the correlation of bodily features and mental traits. As such it takes its place as the latest development of an ancient and persistent inquiry which in its long career has invited many an ambitious and fallacious solution. Quacks have read character, predicted careers, and collected fees. Undisciplined minds have launched fanciful systems of interpretation from Athens and Rome, London and Boston. The problem is legitimate and important; the conviction remains that nature has written the answer in anatomy and physiology and psychology, and it will not be a rare genius but the convergence of well-devised investigations that eventually penetrates and reveals the answer.

Dr. Kretschmer makes a strictly scientific approach, but he conceives scientific method liberally, using all available instruments with allowance for their imperfections. He realizes that measurements and tables do not tell the whole story, and that impressions and pictures are significant even when not reducible to equations. Furthermore, facts require interpretation; hypotheses are needed to give unity and intelligibility to the data. He focuses the entire armory of established methods upon the two terms of the personal equation—physique and character.

The problem is threefold: to determine the distinctive types of bodily physique (constitution); to note the characteristic trends of psychic disposition (temperament); and to establish some relation between these. Dr. Kretschmer recognizes three types of physique: the "asthenic," the "athletic," and the "pyknic." Physique is a composite, complex but objective; character is a still more complex composite with inevitably subjective components. The casual, the amateur, the socially experienced, the scientifically trained observer are all impressed with the differences in response to ordinary situations and stimulations. The critical question is: What are the distinctive types of temperament? The psychoanalysts speak of introvert and extravert; James of tender-minded and tough-minded; Wells of poietic and kinetic; and Burgess of bromide and sulphite. Dr. Kretschmer belongs to a recent movement which has not yet found authoritative formulation, but which proceeds upon a convergence upon a significant set of conclusions. A leading principle is that the clue to psychic dispositions lies in the field of the abnormal. Stated popularly, if you want to know to what variety of homo a given specimen belongs, try to determine what kind of mental disorder he would exhibit if he lost his balance. At first blush this suggests a harsh and almost a cynical judgment; but it is an eminently sound one. For insanity is but the end-term, the extreme expression, the magnified picture of tendencies present in all of us; and only those protected by the impervious cuticle of mediocre dulness are hopelessly sane. So by defining the goal toward which a man is tending—even though he goes but a moderate way along the route—you stamp his type. That also is an older conception, refined and enriched by modern study.

Dr. Kretschmer follows the Kraepelin classification, which recognizes as the most comprehensive divisions the "cycloid" temperament and the "schizoid." While it is hardly likely that the census-taker of the future will ask whether you are a cycloid or a schizoid, the question may well play a part in questionnaires addressed to the psychoanalytically inclined. Distinctions must be shaded, alloys recognized, and a large allowance made for the deviating types, or the "dysplastic" groups, in turn composed of several wholly different variants. The additional complications of age and sex, of social habit, of direction of talent and endeavor, of facilities and disabilities, aid in projecting the endless varieties of humans—each, however, still with affinity to a type. Of the two orders of men, the schizoids far exceed the cycloids in psychological interest. "Cycloid men are sleek and uncomplicated beings whose feelings rise directly, naturally, and undisguised to the surface, so that everyone can soon get a correct judgment of them. Schizoid men have a surface and a depth." Yet there are average schizoids as well as geniuses within the class, and to each a chapter is devoted. In its complicated development the theme leads to engaging speculations and suggestive excursions.

Finally, for correlation: the most striking conclusion is that pyknics are cycloids and most rarely schizoids; the manic-depressives have a pyknic body type. The exceptions are few. By contrast the schizophrenic disorders draw most largely on the asthenic type, but the athletics and certain of the variant forms contribute measurably. These data are drawn from cases of mental disorder, but are confirmed in trends among the normal. The conclusions can be rationalized and carried out in far-reaching corollaries. They are certainly open to modification and completion; and many a critical reader will be more impressed with the speculative than with the established points in the argument. It particularly needs supplementation from the normal approach. But when the largest allowance is made for the many uncertainties of fact and interpretation, the impression remains of a distinct contribution to the topic, and of a well-handled, fairly convincing analysis. Dr. Kretschmer has not formulated a definitive science of characterology; his types may be but first approaches. But every future contribution will consider his directive ideas; he is launched upon a promising enterprise.

JOSEPH JASTROW

From Plato to Harvey

The Evolution of Anatomy. By Charles Singer. Alfred A. Knopf. $4.

THIS is a scholarly work, written with rare literary skill and demanding from the reader but the most elementary knowledge of anatomy and physiology. The history commences with the Greeks and closes with the work of Harvey in 1628. There pass before us Plato and Diocles, Aristotle and Theophrastus, representing the Athenian school; Herophilus, father of anatomy, and Erasistratus, father of physiology, representing the Greek Alexandrians; Galen, "the prince of physicians"; the incomparable Leonardo da Vinci; Vesalius, the reformer of anatomy; Eustachius, the rival of Vesalius; and Fabricius of Padua, one of the greatest of all teachers of anatomy; and finally William Harvey.

Harvey's great work, "An Anatomical Dissertation on the Movement of the Heart and Blood in Animals," appeared in Frankfurt in 1628 as a miserably printed little quarto. By this brief tract the whole scientific outlook on the human body was transformed. From now on men began to think physiologically even when occupied in purely anatomical study. Harvey took up his theme practically where Galen had left it. With Harvey, at last, a clear idea again emerges that each organ has a discoverable function and is related in its mode of working to all the other organs and to the body as a whole. The point of view of Harvey, however, is very different from that of Galen, so that in the coming centuries we hear less of design and more of machine. Dr. Singer has treated the history of anatomy as a secular conversation between great minds—a debate continued through the ages. His book is the kind we have been led to expect from the foremost medical historian in England.

BENJAMIN HARROW

Forces and Men

Europe from Waterloo to Sarajevo. By Percy Ashley. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

ACCORDING to the author this is a sketch of the political development of Europe from the downfall of Napoleon in 1815 to the outbreak of 1914. To a reader familiar with the salient features of nineteenth-century European history the work will seem fragmentary and incomplete. Mr. Ashley ignores entirely or mentions only casually many aspects of economic and social history which are closely connected with the political history of the period. Although he attributes a due share of the blame for the catastrophe of 1914 to the imperialistic expansion of Europe after 1870, he says very little of the underlying causes of that expansion. In the preface he defends himself by reminding us that everything cannot be included in a work of such narrow compass. This is quite true; yet in the same preface he betrays the fact that his book was written with a purpose.

> In the first half of the century statesmen could call into being, or at least could guide, forces whereby the map of Europe in 1815 was greatly changed; in the second half of the century, and especially in its last five-and-twenty years, they were driven by forces which they had not evoked and could do little to direct or restrain.

It is in defense of this thesis—one which few well-informed students of recent and contemporary history would support—that Mr. Ashley writes. It must be admitted that at first glance he seems to have succeeded fairly well. Certainly, as we follow him on his lucid way to the dawning of the world tragedy of 1914, we become more and more inclined to feel that, after all, individual acts and motives played but a negligible part. The statesmen of Europe seem like puppets in the grasp of a brutal force. The problem of war guilt is being warmly debated, and Mr. Ashley's point of view about it is interesting. It is a comfortable one as well, for it absolves everybody of responsibility. Yet its implications give not even a faint hope for the future. If the forces which bathed Europe in blood in 1914 are utterly beyond the possibility of human control, then we have little in store for us but an endless series of similar catastrophes.

It is therefore a relief to turn to the supplementary chapter on the causes of the World War which Harry Elmer Barnes contributes to the book. For Mr. Barnes writes from exactly the opposite point of view. He admits the titanic qualities of the forces engendered by the system of political organization which developed in Europe after 1870, but he does not exonerate the statesmen of Europe from their share of the blame; for, after all, it was the statesmen who manipulated the system. Consequently Mr. Barnes's chapter has a judicious quality and a stamp of sober conviction which Mr. Ashley's work lacks.

CATHARINE E. YOUNG

Books in Brief

The John Quinn Collection of Paintings, Water Colors, Drawings, and Sculpture. Huntington, N. Y.: Pigeon Hill Press.

Now that the John Quinn collection is scattered the catalogue remains a noble if inadequate memorial to one of the finest collections of modern pictures America has ever seen. It is an invaluable book to keep on a convenient table and thumb through at odd moments. With its 200 reproductions of modern pictures it is a perfect supplement to Faure's volume on modern art, Clive Bell's "Since Cézanne," Gordon's "Modern Painters," and Pach's "Masters of Modern Art." The influence of French painting upon American art is incalculable, and much of that influence reached American artists through the collection of John Quinn, who was ever ready to exhibit his pictures publicly or privately. For that reason the catalogue of his collection, even though it illustrates predominantly French painting, is an important item in the history of contemporary American art.

Occidental Gleanings. By Lafcadio Hearn. Edited by Albert Mordell. Two volumes. Dodd, Mead and Company. $6.

A collection of Hearn's contributions to the Cincinnati Enquirer and Commercial and to the New Orleans Times-Democrat, Item, and other papers. In themselves the articles are lucid and undoubtedly valuable to the Hearn scholar, but it is less certain that they add much to their author's fame. At best they only confirm the range of his sympathies and his curiosity, for already in the eighties the passion for things rich and strange is manifest in subjects as diverse as Creole grammar and Creole songs, the Touarick Arabs and aphis-eggs.

Gandle Follows His Nose. By Heywood Broun. Boni and Liveright. $1.50.

Gandle spent his childhood close to dragons, so when at eighteen he goes adventuring into life there is nothing that he does not willingly encounter. At first his whims are fulfilled by a magic cap and a genie, but the charm of their gifts does not divert him long, and he sets out a second time to seek more substantial romance. There is fantasy as well as mild humor and pleasant philosophy upon the road that Gandle treads as he follows his nose; but it must have been a rather straight and simple nose after all.

Cuckoo. By Douglas Goldring. Robert M. McBride and Company. $2.

A [illegible] English novel of the "Constant Nymph" school. Sincere and smutty, with a tapering plot and no redeeming qualities.

Man Alone. By George Agnew Chamberlain. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.

A dull story. The progress is from child to herculean Master of the Glass Works.

The Shoals of Honour. By Elizabeth Sanxay Holding. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.

It is hard because of its excellent and finished style and its keenness of characterization to dismiss this book as merely unsuccessful. Basil Hazeltine, parasitical hanger-on of society, suggests an immediate comparison with the famous Lily Bart, but he emerges as a somewhat more flexible and modern piece of psychological construction. In his case, however, after the debacle an attempt is made to show that his weakness is mostly environment-made habit and that he has a genuine level in life among the average middle-class suburbanites. This is where Mrs. Holding fails. The working up of the story has been too slow; the shift, while logically provided for, comes too quickly to be dramatically convincing; the balance is lost.

White Servitude in Pennsylvania: Indentured and Redemption Labor in Colony and Commonwealth. By Cheesman A. Herrick. Philadelphia: John Joseph McVey. $4.50.

The apportionment clause in the American Constitution mentions "those bound to service for a term of years." Constitutional commentaries usually dismiss this quotation as referring to apprentices, and most American histories dealing with the colonial period give it little more than a passing notice; but the fact is that "those bound to service" referred to a class of laborers constituting a form of servitude that played an important part in the economic system in several of the colonies, notably Virginia, Maryland, and Pennsylvania. Dr. Herrick's book is a complete and very excellent study of this institution in all its phases in the colony and commonwealth of Pennsylvania. The "Indentured servants," or "Redemptioners" as they were called, were a class of immigrants who were unable to pay for their passage on embarking and who arranged with the captain or master of the vessel to be transported without payment in advance, but with the understanding that if on landing in America their friends would not redeem them they would bind themselves to service for a term of years, usually four to seven, to anyone who might pay their passage. Thus originated a system of servitude, midway between slavery and free labor, which developed into a fixed system regulated by contracts and laws, and in Pennsylvania was an important part of the labor system from the founding of the colony until after the revolution. This is by far the best account yet written of this important subject.

The Jewish Anthology. Edited by Edmond Fleg. Translated by Maurice Samuel. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.50.

Those who seek short cuts to knowledge will welcome this work which sums up as effectively as possible the characteristic literary and philosophical expression of the Jewish mind during the past twenty-five hundred years. Some notion of the diversity of the contributions may be had from the fact that the originals of these utterances include every important language of Europe in addition to Hebrew, Aramaic, Latin, and ancient Greek. Naturally the material is fragmentary and inadequate.

Georgian Stories, 1925. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50.

The skill which characterizes English writing is almost oppressively present in this volume. This craftsmanship is exhibited on diverse themes, none significant, and applied to varied characters, none profound. A fling with high society by Michael Arlen, an allegory by E. M. Forster, a pleasant satire by Aldous Huxley, and an essay rather than a story by C. E. Montague are the high spots.

THEATER

THE THEATRE GUILD Presents
AT MRS. BEAM'S
A Comedy by C. K. MUNRO
with ALFRED LUNT, LYNN FONTANNE, JEAN CADELL, HELEN WESTLEY, HENRY TRAVERS AND OTHERS.
GUILD THEATRE, 52nd St., West of B'way. Evs. 8:30. Matinees THURS. and SAT., 2:30.

THE GRAND STREET FOLLIES
4th Annual Revel of NEIGHBORHOOD [illegible]

International Relations Section

Peace Tendencies in France

By ALFRED LOWRY

Paris, May 30

ONE of the significant signs of the times in France is the marked increase of interest in the problem of the right of conscientious objection to military service. In a country where conscription has hitherto been accepted as a matter of course, like death and taxes, and where any opposition was regarded both by the state and by public opinion as one of the basest forms of human depravity and cowardly selfishness, no change in the mental attitude of the people could be of greater moment, as indicating the growth of a will to peace.

This interest may be said to date from September of last year, when those in charge of the Twenty-fourth International Peace Congress, held in Paris and subsidized by the Government, sought most unwisely to stifle all discussion of the problem. In the months which have followed many meetings have been held where this question was the chief topic under discussion. Georges Pioch, literary critic and distinguished orator in a land of orators, has courageously espoused the cause of the C. O. Articles keep appearing in the daily press and in more thoughtful journals, both for and against; the subject is being aired and is becoming a live issue. André Ripert and Jules Brunand, representing the interesting organization known as l'U.S.T.I.C.A. (l'Union Syndicale des Techniciens de l'Industrie, du Commerce et de l'Agriculture) are out for it, and even the prudent Ligue des Droits de l'Homme, which has done so much for oppressed individuals from Dreyfus onward but which has hitherto fled the question of conscientious objection like the plague, recently opened the columns of its Cahiers to the problem. Ferdinand Buisson, its valiant and aged president, would appear to be undergoing a pronounced modification in his own attitude to the question.

La Jeune République (often described as the Marc Sangnier movement, Catholic for the most part, pacifist but cautious) has not come out for the extreme position. But at a dinner recently given to some forty carefully selected people, in the interest of the great peace conference and demonstration which is being organized for the month of August at Bierville, near Paris, Marc Sangnier called upon two persons to speak, whose position he knew beforehand was that of out-and-out pacifism, clearly showing that what the group will not yet announce themselves they will at least gladly listen to.

Last autumn a young author, André Chamson, brought out a novel called "Roux—le Bandit." It is the simple, artless story of a Cevenol peasant who, because he could not as a Christian go to the front in 1914, vanished into the mountains to lead a parlous existence threatened by starvation, the cold, and the rifles of the gendarmes. The book has run to some 13,000 copies, and is still selling well. Instead of being privately printed obscurely in a province, it is issued by Grasset, a publisher of established reputation. The book is being discussed and reviewed. (One might add that the story is in essential points true to fact, and that the original of Roux is at present serving his eighth year of a twenty-year sentence in a prison in the South. Efforts are being made to secure all important information in the case, with a view to obtaining his release.)

For young Frenchmen who have their military service before them the personal problem is a knotty one, indeed. One would be content to suffer if one could by so doing bring the whole question to a head and bear witness to what one is convinced is the better way. But the authorities hush up as promptly as possible any cases of refusal, and unless one succeeds in fleeing the country one is spirited away—to prison, to an asylum for the insane (no man in his senses could hold such fantastic views!), or, even worse, to one of the penal colonies—Africa, Guiana, New Caledonia—the twentieth-century equivalent of the ancient "oubliettes," where one may languish helplessly for a score of years or longer. It is a real and terrible dilemma, and there are those who are agonizingly seeking the right course.

Leaving this personal aspect of the peace question in France, one may ask what groups are doing active work. A careful investigation of some twenty-six societies or organizations professing pacifist principles was not too encouraging. Bulletins and banquets, gestures and a marvelous prudence seemed to characterize a number of them, and traces were not lacking of what the French call arrivisme, which includes the unashamed love of bits of ribbon and the joy of seeing one's name on a letterhead. As in other countries, the activities of such groups are of little concern to the Government. The authorities know that they preach peace in times of peace, but will drop all and flock to the colors at the first threat of war. Hence the state subsidizing of the Congress last September.

But of these twenty-six, at least ten organizations are sincere and serious. Among the groups actively concerned for peace are the French sections of the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, the Fellowship of Reconciliation, and the Society of Friends. Then there are the distinctly French associations, such as Les Libérés de Toutes les Guerres, La Ligue pour la Reconnaissance Legale de l'Objection de Conscience, La Mère Educatrice, etc. Large groups of war veterans are taking a strongly pacifist position. A list of individual public men and authors might be prolonged indefinitely: Henri Barbusse, Victor Margueritte, Armand Charpentier, Pierre Hamp, Madeleine Vernet, Banville d'Hostel, Madame Sévérine, Georges Pioch, Madame Malaterre-Sellier, Madame Duchêne, André Jouve, Charles Brun, Gouttenoire de Toury, Jeanne Melin, Marcelle Capy, Charles Richet, Grillot de Givry, Han Ryner, Professor Georges Demartial. And the number grows.

Of the Paris daily papers those most far-sighted along lines of international understanding are of course L'Œuvre, la Volonté (very new), and le Quotidien. The latter, though but three years old, is already the fourth paper of France. A number of weekly papers and magazines might be named: l'Europe, l'Europe Nouvelle, la Paix par le Droit, la Jeune République, le Semeur, les Libérés, l'Universel, l'Echo des Amis. The last-named published its first issue on February 1 under the direction of Victor Margueritte and Armand Charpentier, and is a serious, well-edited monthly review, definitely devoted to questions concerning international reconciliation.

Mention has been made of the movement centering about Marc Sangnier, which is distinctly but by no means exclusively Catholic in character. After a series of five international conferences, held in Paris, Vienna, Freiburg, London, and Luxembourg, the plan is this year to hold their gathering again in France, at the Chateau de Bierville, near Paris. In planning for this occasion, when they hope to assemble 2,000 or more young people from many different countries and to organize a great international camp, the Jeune République is taking a leaf from the book of two other ardent peace workers, Dr. Demarquette, the enthusiastic leader of the Trait d'Union, and Dr. Dumesnil of the Mouvement Pacifiste Chrétien, joint organizers for the past two years of a successful international camp at Chevreuse.

The most interesting peace work of a definitely Protestant character is that of the group of alert, vigorous young pastors in the new outpost stations of the North (the departments of the Nord and Pas-de-Calais). The spiritual father of the movement, working among the miners and factory-hands of this region, is Pastor Henri Nick of Lille.

Over in the Rhine Valley another pastor, Monsieur Rambaud, is working effectively on both sides of the frontier for reconciliation. It is true that this effort is purposely limited to Protestants of Germany and France, but the limitation is one which defines and focuses the work, without narrowness or bigotry.

Among the masses of the population both in the cities and in the agricultural or mining communities one finds a hatred of war and a realization of its consequences. There is inertia and innate conservatism. But these people know what war is and where it has brought them. They have fought in the trenches and wasted years in prison camps. They have buried their dead, they have borne the grievous burden of their mutilés, their widows, and their orphans, under economic conditions that grow steadily more difficult. They know that even Fritz, the individual, was not bad sort, and they ask nothing better than to be allowed to work hard for a most modest living, thriftily contriving to make a little surplus where most people would be compelled to write a deficit. "Live and let live—even the boches!"

Contributors to This Issue

HENDRIK W. VAN LOON has written and illustrated several books, the most recent of which is "Tolerance."

CHARLES A. BEARD is a well-known historian, among whose publications are "American Government and Politics" and "Contemporary American History."

W. N. EWER is foreign editor of the London Daily Herald.

STELLA CROSSLEY is a writer who has been living in Florida.

MICHAEL BLOUNT is the penname of a journalist living in California.

WILBERT SNOW is a New England poet, author of "Maine Coast."

DAVID SAVILLE MUZZEY is professor of history at Columbia University.

KARL F. GEISER is professor of political science at Oberlin College.

JOSEPH JASTROW is professor of psychology at the University of Wisconsin.

BENJAMIN HARROW is a New York physician and professor of biochemistry at Columbia University.

CATHARINE E. YOUNG is instructor in history at Hunter College.

ALFRED LOWRY is the representative in France of the American Friends Service Committee.

accept nothing but

Non Depressant
non Habit Forming
In Convenient
Aluminum Boxes
At every drug store

3 Tablets 15c.
10 Tablets 40c

Midol
for HEADACHE

GENERAL DRUG CO., - 94 N. Moore Street New York

BOOKS

WORKING CLASS BOOKS on ECONOMICS, HISTORY, SOCIAL SCIENCE and EVOLUTION.
Ask for our 1926 catalog, newly revised.
CHARLES H. KERR & CO., 347 East Ohio Street, Chicago

REAL ESTATE

HOME BUILDERS—NOT SPECULATORS

While land at Mt. Airy (Croton-on-Hudson) is selling for considerably less than unimproved lots in the surrounding districts, and while the Mt. Airy property is steadily increasing in value, we want only HOME BUILDERS, not speculators, in this community of artists, writers and thinking people.
We frequently deny applications for land in justice to those already home owners at Mt. Airy.
Beautifully wooded ¼, ½ and 1-acre plots—some with river views—still available; $350 and up each or terms; 60 minutes from city; 100 trains daily; schools and stores near.
HARRY KELLY, 70 Fifth Ave., New York
Chelsea 0432

Are You Getting Your Share of Country?
Northern Westchester is accessible but wild, inexpensive but beautiful. Where one can yet find valleys, mountains, rivers and pond commuting within 40 miles of New York? Cottages for rent; houses, farms and estates for sale.
Margaret Lane, Croton-on-Hudson, N. Y. Croton 400

LECTURES

DR. WILL DURANT
author of "The Story of Philosophy" will lecture twice weekly this summer at
CAMP GREATER UTOPIA
LACKAWAXEN, PA.
1st lecture, July 3rd
A FREE LOG BOOKLET

FORUM

An Invitation for an Expression of Opinion
THE SUNDAY EVENING FORUM of the HEBREW EDUCATIONAL SOCIETY, at Sutter and Hopkinson Avenues, Brooklyn, New York, will resume its activities the first Sunday in November. In order to obtain the greatest benefits from these meetings, the Committee invites suggestions as to speakers and subjects which might be of interest to them. If you plan to be one of the audience, and have no courses to offer, kindly write to:
NATHAN SWEEDLER, Chairman
11 Court Street Brooklyn, N. Y.

Summer Time!
Camps, hotels, summer homes, boarding houses,
—and those who seek such accommodations
Those who have an apartment they wish to rent
Those who want to rent an apartment
we recommend placing an advertisement in the classified section of The Nation, as the best means of bringing the right person and the right place together. Rates on request. Address Dept. C, care of The Nation.

When writing to advertisers, please mention The Nation

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXIII NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JULY 14, 1926 No. 3184

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS .. 21
EDITORIALS:
For Sale—18,000,000 Horses .. 24
Big Brother or Big Bully .. 25
Cruelty of Censorship .. 26
Dr Hanbury Hankin Says: .. 26
PROPAGANDA! By Hendrik van Loon .. 27
THE PENNSYLVANIA PATRIOT'S DUTY ELECT A DEMOCRAT By George W. Norris .. 28
COTTON GOES WEST By Max Stern .. 29
IS CHINA BEING AMERICANIZED? By Lewis S. Gannett .. 30
JUSTICE IN GEORGIA By Elbridge Colby .. 32
WOMEN IN GUAM By M. S. Lea .. 34
THE COCK. By Jake Falstaff .. 35
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter .. 36
CORRESPONDENCE .. 36
BOOKS:
Further Commandment. By Leonora Speyer .. 38
First Glance. By Mark Van Doren .. 38
A Labyrinth of Trickery. By J. Salwyn Schapiro .. 39
'Sblood. By R. F. Dibble .. 40
A Century of Misunderstanding. By Ernest Gruening .. 41
Bryan by His Wife. By David Saville Muzzey .. 41
Mayas, Greeks, and Cambodians. By Hartley Alexander .. 42
Americana in Brief .. 43
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
What Is the British Empire? .. 44

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor FREDA KIRCHWEY

Literary Editor MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

ONE, TWO, THREE, FOUR, FIVE, SIX, SEVEN, EIGHT—the wallops of an awakening Westland upon the apostles of the Administration of, by, and for Big Business. The myth of Economy Cal is fading; the fact of Millionaire Mellon, the real Best Mind who shapes the so-called Coolidge program, is dawning on middle-class America. Gerald Nye has swept North Dakota, defeating Mr. Coolidge's man Hanna for United States Senator, and the Nonpartisan League, which supported Nye, has also nominated its candidate for Governor. Norbeck of South Dakota defeated his Coolidge-indorsed opponent; Watson and Robinson in Indiana defied the President's orders but won their renominations; McKinley of Illinois, Pepper of Pennsylvania, Stanfield of Oregon, and Cummins of Iowa, all staunch Coolidge men, have gone under in the primaries—and in all these weary months not one Coolidge candidate has won at the polls. The Keep-Kool-with-Koolidge slogan has lost its force.

OUT IN THE WEST the farmers know why they are discontented—because the Government which subsidizes Big Business refuses to countenance similar aid to farmers. A good old-fashioned war against the tariff seems to be in germination. That is well enough in its way—the sins of the protective tariff can hardly be overdrawn—but the good old-fashioned tariff war is not good enough. The American people have been arguing the tariff for a century, and where are they? The Democrats, generally speaking, are low-tariff folks, but the record of the Democrats in Washington is a record of fiddling and footling. Shall we simply put into office the men who, while talking desultorily about the tariff, helped give away Muscle Shoals and assisted Mr. Mellon to put through his tax relief for millionaires? These men have no philosophy; they do not see or understand the real problem of freeing America from its domination by millionaires; and if the 1926 movement of revolt rides on their coat-tails it will get nowhere at all.

LA FOLLETTE'S PROGRESSIVE MOVEMENT in 1924 promised for a moment to give American politics a new orientation. But the leader was old and tired; and the lieutenants lacked courage and energy; despite the record of five million votes the army disintegrated. Will the new revolt go further? Signs of hope are scant. Agrarian discontent rises and falls, throughout American history, in inverse proportion to the price of wheat; it lacks steady fuel value. The labor movement, meanwhile, is playing pusillanimously safe. The old leaders fight new movements harder than they fight the industrial bosses; and they do not dare give themselves to a political movement which cannot claim immediate success. That is the vice of hustling America: it demands P. D. Q. results; it is impatient with attempts to plan before building. The apathetic aimlessness of politics in the East is typified by the situation in Pennsylvania. The Republican organization stands convicted of mass corruption, but it expects to win at the polls. Senator Norris, pleading in this issue of The Nation for decent Republicans to vote Democratic, is thus far almost a lone voice in his besotted party.

BY A WAVE OF HIS WAND Mussolini has reestablished the nine-hour day in Italian industry. Thus the most precious possession of European labor, the eight-hour day, is abolished without discussion or appeal on the part of the workers. Where are the vaunted Fascist labor unions now? The dictator nods and they submit. The Italian workers, without the power to strike, cheated out of their own labor unions, with appallingly low wages and with lengthened hours, have only one thing left—the right to work—when Mussolini lets them work. Mussolini's emergency measures are all proposed in the name of national economy, but, as usual, they fall most heavily upon the workers. Business is not disturbed. Real wages in Italian industry have gone steadily down since the Fascist dictatorship was established. Last year they averaged less than a dollar a day in the leading industries; in buying power they were about 85 per cent of the 1922 level.

CANADA HAS BEEN PLUNGED into a bitter parliamentary election campaign by the defeat in quick succession of two premiers, Mackenzie King, Liberal, and Arthur Meighen, Conservative. Mr. King, whose majority in Parliament depended upon the cooperation of the Progressives, had been in constant danger of defeat since the election in October, 1925; his downfall finally came in connection with scandals in the customs administration. The defeated premier immediately asked Governor General Byng (who is appointed by the King) to dissolve Parliament and call an election, but the Governor General refused and summoned Arthur Meighen, leader of the Conservative Party, which actually outnumbers the Liberal Party in Parliament. When the Meighen Government was defeated by a margin of one vote through the opposition of the Progressives, Parliament was dissolved and an election called for September. The Conservatives thus, by action of the King's representative, have the tactical advantage of holding office—and patronage—during the campaign. Free trade and the customs scandals would naturally be the leading issues, but all that may be forgotten in the bitter fight which Mackenzie King has started against the powers of the viceroy. The battle-cry of Canadian freedom has been raised. The West will line up against Quebec in a struggle that is bound to be desperate.

IT IS NICE to be the president of a republic and still nicer to be a self-elected one, or practically such, like Louis Borno of Haiti. Unlike Mr. Coolidge Mr. Borno does not have to worry about reelection, because he appoints the Council of State that casts the votes. But like Mr. Coolidge he has to please the financial interests of the United States or lose his job—self-elected or otherwise. Apparently he is still persona grata with those interests, for he has just concluded a visit to the United States, in the course of which Wall Street paid him special honor, concluding with a farewell luncheon by Charles E. Mitchell, president of the National City Bank. Mr. Mitchell dilated on the progress in Haiti since the United States had established what he benignly termed its "protectorate." Mr. Borno's visit had done much, he said, to convince American business men that Haiti was now a safe field for them. It looks that way. Haiti is now safe for almost everybody except the Haitians.

TO FREE CUBA was one of the professed objects of the United States in going to war with Spain twenty-eight years ago, just as to make the world safe for democracy was one of our reasons for entering the world conflict in 1917. The first purpose has been realized hardly more successfully than the second. Leland Hamilton Jenks, formerly of the history department of Amherst College, made a study of conditions in Cuba last winter, and had this to say at the summer conference of the League for Industrial Democracy:

> After we had conducted an election and turned Cuba over to the Cubans in 1902, we commenced a policy of continuous intermeddling in Cuban affairs. This was a policy in flagrant violation of the pledges given by President McKinley and Elihu Root at the time the Platt amendment was adopted. . . . Our interference culminated after the financial crisis of 1920 when the bottom dropped out of the sugar market.
>
> General Crowder was sent to Cuba on a battleship as "personal representative" of the President. This was a status not known in international law. It was lawless. If it meant anything it meant that Crowder impersonated the President of the United States in Cuba. It became menacing when our Minister to Cuba resigned, and we remained without ordinary diplomatic intercourse with the island. Crowder addressed himself directly to the President of Cuba in tones of authority, not through diplomatic channels. He upset one Cabinet and approved the naming of successors, who were naturally more solicitous to please him than to satisfy the elected President of Cuba.

FORTY THOUSAND WORKERS in the ladies' garment industry of New York have gone on strike. The controversies which led up to the strike are not simple. The ladies' garment industry by virtue of our erratic tastes in style is a peculiar one. Seventy-five per cent of the clothing made is farmed out by jobbers to small contractors. The jobbers are really middlemen, but they are the only responsible parties capable of making an agreement for most of the industry. Governor Smith's Advisory Commission, appointed to investigate the evils of the industry, described the jobbers in these words:

> This outside system of production is fraught with waste to all concerned. Counting all the partners in the submanufacturing shops, there are several thousand men whose energies are mostly spent in going from one jobber to another in search of orders. . . . The greatest burden of waste falls upon the workers through shortened seasons and through substandard conditions of employment. . . . When work is scarce, as it usually is except for a few weeks in each season, the workers are told that in order to meet the exigencies of price competition and to bring some work into the shop, they must enter into secret arrangements contrary to the minimum labor standards which have been agreed upon and which are pretty successfully enforced in the larger shops of the inside manufacturers. . . .
>
> From an industrial point of view this is chaotic and demoralizing. Were it practicable, the workers would be justified in taking the stand that they would work only in inside shops and would refuse to work in outside shops where they were removed from all direct contact with the owners of the capital involved [italics ours].

THE INTERNATIONAL LADIES' GARMENT WORKERS UNION in the present strike seeks to compel the jobbers to be responsible for the labor conditions in their contractors' shops. The jobbers could maintain union conditions by sending work only to registered contractors approved by the union, who might be compelled to give bond that they would maintain labor standards. If a jobber is caught sending work to any unsatisfactory outside shop, then all workers in contract shops doing his work would strike until the offending contractor had reformed. By a similar method the Amalgamated Clothing Workers has handled the less serious problems of small contractors in the manufacture of men's garments. The strikers are also demanding the forty-hour week and a guaranty of thirty-six weeks of continuous employment, but these demands are unimportant compared with the demand for organized responsibility on the part of the employers. In the background of the strike is the fact that the workers are demanding more than Governor Smith's Advisory Commission recommended as an immediate solution; there is also a bitter controversy between Rights and Lefts in which the Lefts have emerged triumphant in control of the union. We hope that both wings of the union will see the necessity of a united struggle toward a constructive end.

NEW YORK CITY is having another subway strike, and some of the newspapers ask how the strikers expect to get higher wages out of a nearly bankrupt company. Well, the nearly bankrupt company spent $2,025,481 to break the 1916 strike, and we do not doubt it will find banks willing to lend it money to pay strike-breakers twice the meager wages it pays its regular workers. (A responsible motorman gets about $36 a week—half a carpenter's wages in the city.) The sudden strike is undoubtedly inconvenient to the public, but a public that refuses to accept any responsibility in time of industrial peace must bear the brunt of industrial war. Did anyone really think that labor troubles were ended forever when General Manager Hedley smashed the regular union in 1916 and installed a hand-picked "company union" in its place to delude the public if not the men? Or will it take another disaster due to the use of inexperienced strike-breakers to rouse the public to demand that men who hold its lives in their fingers be decently paid for their work at the throttle?

A THIN LINE separates loyalty to established institutions from treason to human beings. When the executive council of the American Federation of Labor denounced the Passaic strike because there were Communists among its leaders it committed treason to labor in the name of official labor loyalty. While 10,000 strikers and their families are fighting against intolerable conditions, the United Textile Workers, the only A. F. of L. union in the textile industry, is circulating the June copy of its official organ, the Textile Worker, with large display advertisements from the three firms on strike, Forstmann and Huffmann, Botany Worsted Mills, and Gera Mills. That looks like accepting pay for treason. Nearly all the advertising in the issue is paid for by large textile manufacturers many of whom are bitter opponents of unionism, and there is not an item about the Passaic strike. The only bits of Passaic news printed by this so-called organ of the textile workers are of this ilk:

> Since the beer, ice-cream, and soda season is upon us again, with a diminishing of activities in official organization work, we are going to indulge in a little personal gossip of Branch 17, its members and the shop. . . . The volley ball season has again opened up on the Onyx Courts with most of the old stars warming up. . . .
>
> Spring not only brought flowers but several Dodges and Auburns with an occasional Nash to the Passaic Knitters. We are pleased to note that Earl White has at last discarded his old war horse, "Flivver"—may she rest in peace. Horses are still allowed on the road even though John Duffy needs most of the road for his new Chevrolet.

A RACE RIOT IN THE NORTH is properly the occasion for Southern comment upon Northern self-righteousness. The burning of the Negro First Baptist Church in Carteret, New Jersey, in April and the ejection of more than a hundred Negro residents from their homes by a white mob were shocking outbreaks of white violence. But some of the Southern comment went wide of the mark. The July Crisis quotes the Little Rock (Arkansas) Gazette as saying that race clashes in the South "do not spring from economic roots" and that Southern mob victims are "almost invariably guilty of an atrocious crime." That is a hoary myth which facts disprove. The Houston (Texas) Post-Dispatch declares that "in the South, while individual Negroes are attacked, the Negro race as such is never molested," but the Memphis (Tennessee) News-Scimitar thinks that the Southerner draws the race line but "accepts the Negro individual for what he is." Two recent Northern outbreaks, one in Brooklyn, New York, the other in Beverly, New Jersey, are worth studying. The Brooklyn riot was caused by white resentment at the residence of Negroes in the neighborhood and by Negro resentment at the white resentment. It appears that the Negro resentment was the hotter of the two, for Negroes opened the hostilities. The cause of the fighting in Beverly is undetermined, but both Negroes and whites were arrested. In Carteret, we recall, the police arrested the Negro accused of killing a white man, and extended protection to the innocent Negro community. There was no lynching in any of these riots, and no unpunished demonstration of white lordship. It might well be argued that these riots were less signs of Northern brutality than of Negro health. Where in the South would a Negro dare to move into a white community? In the North he moves in, defends himself against white violence, and if he loses the fight he has a chance of winning before the law, as did the Sweets in Detroit.

THE DAMNED SOULS SOCIETY of the University of Rochester is suing Clinton Howard, prohibition orator, for $10,000 damages for libel because he is alleged to have called them perverts, moral degenerates, and intellectual morons. The society is composed of five students, headed by a 19-year-old ex-Catholic freshman, who champion the cause of atheism. When their suit came into the courts Justice Rodenbeck ordered them to prove that atheism was normal, thus establishing their own mental normality. But why should these atheist students prove the normality of atheism? New truth is always abnormal. Shelley was dismissed from Oxford in 1811 for writing "The Necessity of Atheism" and the world has ever since done honor to his abnormality. There are a number of reasons why we would like to see these Rochester students get enough damages from Clinton Howard to complete their college education. In the first place, they probably need the education. And then, Mr. Howard is one of the champion featherweight vilifiers of the country.

HEYWOOD BROUN said it so well that there is no reason to rewrite this little sermon on censorship and the death of a bad play, from the New York World:

> "Bunk of 1926" has closed. It was not killed by the play jury, the district attorney, or the police. Lack of public patronage caused it to shut up shop. It is said the producers lost approximately $80,000 on their venture. Throughout the run the piece had only one good week, which came at the time steps were taken to suppress the performance.
>
> And it seems to me that the moral of all this is that the community can very well afford to let the public decide for itself. It is no longer possible to put a show over merely by hinting that it is shocking. Theatergoers have come of age and need no guardianship.

THE EASTWARD PROGRESS of Western civilization has at least one sure index in that symbol of energy which has converted the jaws of the nation into a machine of perpetual motion. With the American industry producing fifty million dollars' worth of chewing gum a year—an increase of 17 per cent in 1925 over its record in 1923—Mr. Wrigley has announced an energetic foreign policy for the next year. Germany, he finds, is making rapid progress, but France is hampered by financial instability—quite naturally, for the repeated dropping of the French jaw in alarm at the falling franc must seriously interfere with the chewing of friande à mâcher. In the Far East the index is revealing, with Mr. Wrigley's business progressing well in Japan, but "not so well in China." China must really be a backward nation.

For Sale—48,000,000 Horses

THE fight for the control of the St. Lawrence River water-power has begun in earnest. Roy Finch, New York State Engineer, has recommended private development of the project with the possibility of State ownership after fifty years; Governor Smith stands squarely for public ownership and development now. The New York battle is typical of the whole struggle of private against public interests for control of America's power. The St. Lawrence project is big in itself (it is estimated that it would provide four times the power that can be generated at Muscle Shoals), but it is only one of many giants that the power industry is raising up to serve or enslave us. The force of 48,000,000 horses lies hidden in the dynamos of our present power system. They are clean, swift horses, the strongest and most obedient that the world has ever known. They can empty our slums into garden cities or they can accentuate the difference between green-lawned suburbs and gray Passaic.

If Congress should attempt merely to destroy the great power combinations which are gradually extending their control, the only people to profit would be a few oratorical politicians trained in capitalizing the voters' antipathy to Wall Street. Nor is the old program of municipal ownership adequate to meet the present crisis in power development. City ownership of electric plants is usually an excellent thing for the consumer, but the generation and transmission of power is becoming State-wide and nation-wide in its scope. Small municipal generating plants are often unable to compete with large privately owned ones. When they sell out to private owners there is great glee in the camp of the power interests, but their occasional failure is not so much a failure of public ownership as a failure of small-scale production. The situation demands a national program of power development and control.

If the United States were suddenly faced with a war, such a program would be worked out in a month. Why should not a program of national service be worked out in time of peace? Or in our present war of man against nature, of the consumer against high prices, of the worker against low wages—an ugly, endless war in which millions suffer daily for the want of proper rationing of food, clothes, houses, health, vacations, and security? If we could act as the economic generalissimo in that endless war we would map out a national program for power development that would begin with two modest but important steps:

1. National or State development of the chief water-power resources, notably Boulder Dam, Muscle Shoals, and the St. Lawrence. These great water resources are the most vulnerable spots in the private-power program. The government already owns the water at these points and a strong minority in Congress stands for the public development of the water-power. Just as the Ontario hydro-electric development smashed the skepticism of Canada in regard to public ownership of power, so a few similar experiments in this country would smash the bugaboo, the so-called "failure of public ownership," which is kept alive by the shoutings of the Saturday Evening Post and the allied power interests.

Although Congress has adjourned without taking any action on power development there is an excellent chance that a beginning will be made at the next session. The Boulder Dam project is almost won for the public. Senate Bill 3331, if carried by the Senate, will appropriate $125,000,000 for the dam, an all-American Canal, and a power house which would yield 3.6 billion kilowatt hours at only 3 mills per kilowatt, paying for the whole project in twenty-five years. After Boulder Dam comes Muscle Shoals, which is now generating power at the rate of 670 million kilowatt hours a year and selling to private companies. In spite of the Coolidge proposal to lease Muscle Shoals to private interests for fifty years the project may yet be redeemed for public development, with the aid of progressive additions from the Middle West to the senatorial phalanx led by Senator Norris. The St. Lawrence project is still in the dream stage, but it may reach completion before Muscle Shoals and Boulder Dam, because of the demand of New York business interests.

These water-power projects present no insuperable obstacles to public development. The water is ours, and the federal law provides that we cannot lease this water irrevocably to any private interest for more than fifty years. We can do more than generate power at these centers; we can construct our own distributive system. And since the cost of power to the consumer is about one-fifth generation and four-fifths distribution, it is important that the public ownership of water-power should include the public development of the main transmission lines for that power.

2. A more aggressive federal regulation system for all power companies. This is required to prevent the theft of too much wealth by the power interests while the public is waking up to its own responsibilities. It is more important than the development of water-power, because about two-thirds of all our power is produced by coal. We need a definite contractual arrangement between the government and all the power companies establishing the present valuation as a base for all future rate negotiations; otherwise our grandchildren will be mulcted out of billions of dollars.

Today the great steam-generating power plants are regulated by the public-service commissions of the various States. These public-service commissions are overworked with a mass of rate disputes which demand immediate action. They have little time to guard the consumer against the dangers of overcapitalization. Twenty-four States have no legislation at all for the control of security issues by the power companies. New combinations are reported almost daily in the press; last year's power investments totaled seven and one-half billion; and Wall Street acts on the assumption that anything is worth what a sucker will pay for it. If we ever succeed in nationalizing the power system we may have to pay twice what it is worth—as we shall have to do for the railroads. Today we even pay the power companies' bills for fighting against us. If we ask for cheaper electric lights from a public-service commission, the private companies hire costly experts to dispute our claims, then ask for rates which cover all their expenses and include the experts in their expense account!

A federal regulation system would naturally begin with a law giving some federal body the same authority over the financing of all power companies doing interstate business which is now exercised over water-power companies. That authority would be similar to the authority of the Interstate Commerce Commission over railroads. A new federal power body would be necessary, because the present Federal Power Commission, composed of three overworked cabinet members (the Secretaries of War, Agriculture, and the Navy), is inadequate for such a task. They have done effective service in water-power development, but they have no legal authority to create an adequate regulatory system for the steam-generating power plants which dominate the Eastern field.

A more extensive program would be doomed to death by the opposition of power interests and reactionary political groups. There is no virile movement toward public ownership in this country today. Believers in public ownership should begin the fight for publicly controlled power by creating samples of successful public enterprise, the while guarding carefully against the worst abuses of private monopoly.

Big Brother or Big Bully

WHAT are we up to in Nicaragua now? With the withdrawal of our marines from that republic last year, and the resumption of control by Nicaragua of its bank and railways, there appeared to be hope that the long period of interference on the part of the United States had ended. Vain expectation! When we are not interfering for the selfish advantage of big business, we seem destined to be meddling for what defenders of such a policy would doubtless call "Nicaragua's own good." We are playing either the big bully or the big brother. And a policy that permits us to play the big brother allows us also to play the big bully.

It will be recalled that the present President of Nicaragua, General Chamorro, obtained office last year by forcing out his predecessor. General Chamorro belongs to a party and a family that have long been serviceable to the commercial interest of the United States, but we have refused to recognize him because of the treaty signed in 1923 with Central American republics in which it was mutually agreed that recognition would be refused to governments set up by force. Commenting on this action in our issue of June 23 we observed that the Department of State was deserving of credit for logically standing by its announced policy in an instance where it worked against our interests. But we added: "Whether the policy itself is a sound one is another matter. The Nation believes that the old practice of international law, by which any established government is recognized regardless of origin, is wiser and less provocative of meddling in other people's affairs."

Recent news from Nicaragua seems designed expressly to bear out the last sentence. Advices received by Nicaraguans in this country, if accurate, indicate that our chargé d'affaires at Managua has been conducting what amounts to a deliberate and organized attempt to drive General Chamorro out of office. A telegram from President Chamorro himself, dated June 10, says, when translated:

> The American chargé d'affaires, Mr. Dennis, came today to see me and notified me that he was going to undertake a campaign to enlighten the Nicaraguan people about the necessity of forcing me to retire from power, and that in case I did not retire voluntarily the United States would compel me by force, because it was going to accomplish its purpose whether I was willing or not. He has already had the first handbill distributed.

Another telegram says that on June 15 Mr. Dennis called a meeting at the legation of various members of the Conservative Party (that of General Chamorro) to discuss the situation and had previously made public a statement in which he said that "my Government cherishes the hope that the Nicaraguan people by a return to a constitutional form of government will make it possible for the United States Government to extend recognition to such a government and to enter into formal diplomatic relations therewith."

All this, it must be obvious, is an entirely different thing from merely refusing to recognize an existing regime because it was set up by force. It is a practical invitation to the friends of General Chamorro to desert him as they would a sinking ship—and to his opponents to overthrow him by any means at their command. When one recalls that President Cleveland sent a British ambassador packing because he indicated a preference in a pending presidential election, one realizes the extent of the breach of diplomatic etiquette and practice of which we are guilty in Nicaragua.

But the Department of State and the sponsors of the treaty of 1923 will reply that the intrigue is for "Nicaragua's own good." We don't doubt for a minute that in their opinion it is. And that's precisely the point we would make against a treaty that prevents the recognition in Central America of a government that is set up by force. Our own republic could not have been recognized in 1776 under such a rule. To decide if a country has what Mr. Dennis piously calls "a constitutional form of government" involves a judgment upon its domestic affairs which cannot well be neutral. It is none of our business to play either the big brother or the big bully in Latin America or elsewhere. We are rapidly becoming the world's worst meddler both at home and abroad. And we won't get back to legitimate international practices until we cancel the Central American treaty of 1923.

The Cruelty of Censorship

MANY of our readers are probably familiar from newspaper accounts with the main facts of the censorship of the New Masses by the Post Office Department. A copy of the May issue, with which the magazine made its first appearance, was sent to Washington with an application for second-class mailing privileges. Instead of receiving such privileges, the editors were presently informed that the issue was unmailable in any way under the statutory provision forbidding the postal service to lewd or obscene matter. No specifications were given, but when a representative of the periodical went to Washington in person one brief poem, the general tone of a story, and several passages from other contributions were cited.

Now, it happens that in all the press comments in regard to the first issue of the New Masses—including considerable that was not favorable—we had not seen any complaint that the magazine was improper up to the time of the ruling of the Post Office. It would seem odd, with the array of periodicals nowadays intentionally catering to vulgar and prurient instincts, that a serious-minded purposeful publication like the New Masses—whatever its shortcomings—should be singled out for censorship. But there is a reason. The real sin was not obscenity but heterodoxy—the fact that the magazine attacked current economic and political beliefs. As the editors say in the July issue: "We do not believe that if the verse or prose in question had appeared in any magazine with a more conventional economic point of view—or none at all—it would have met with censorship." We don't either.

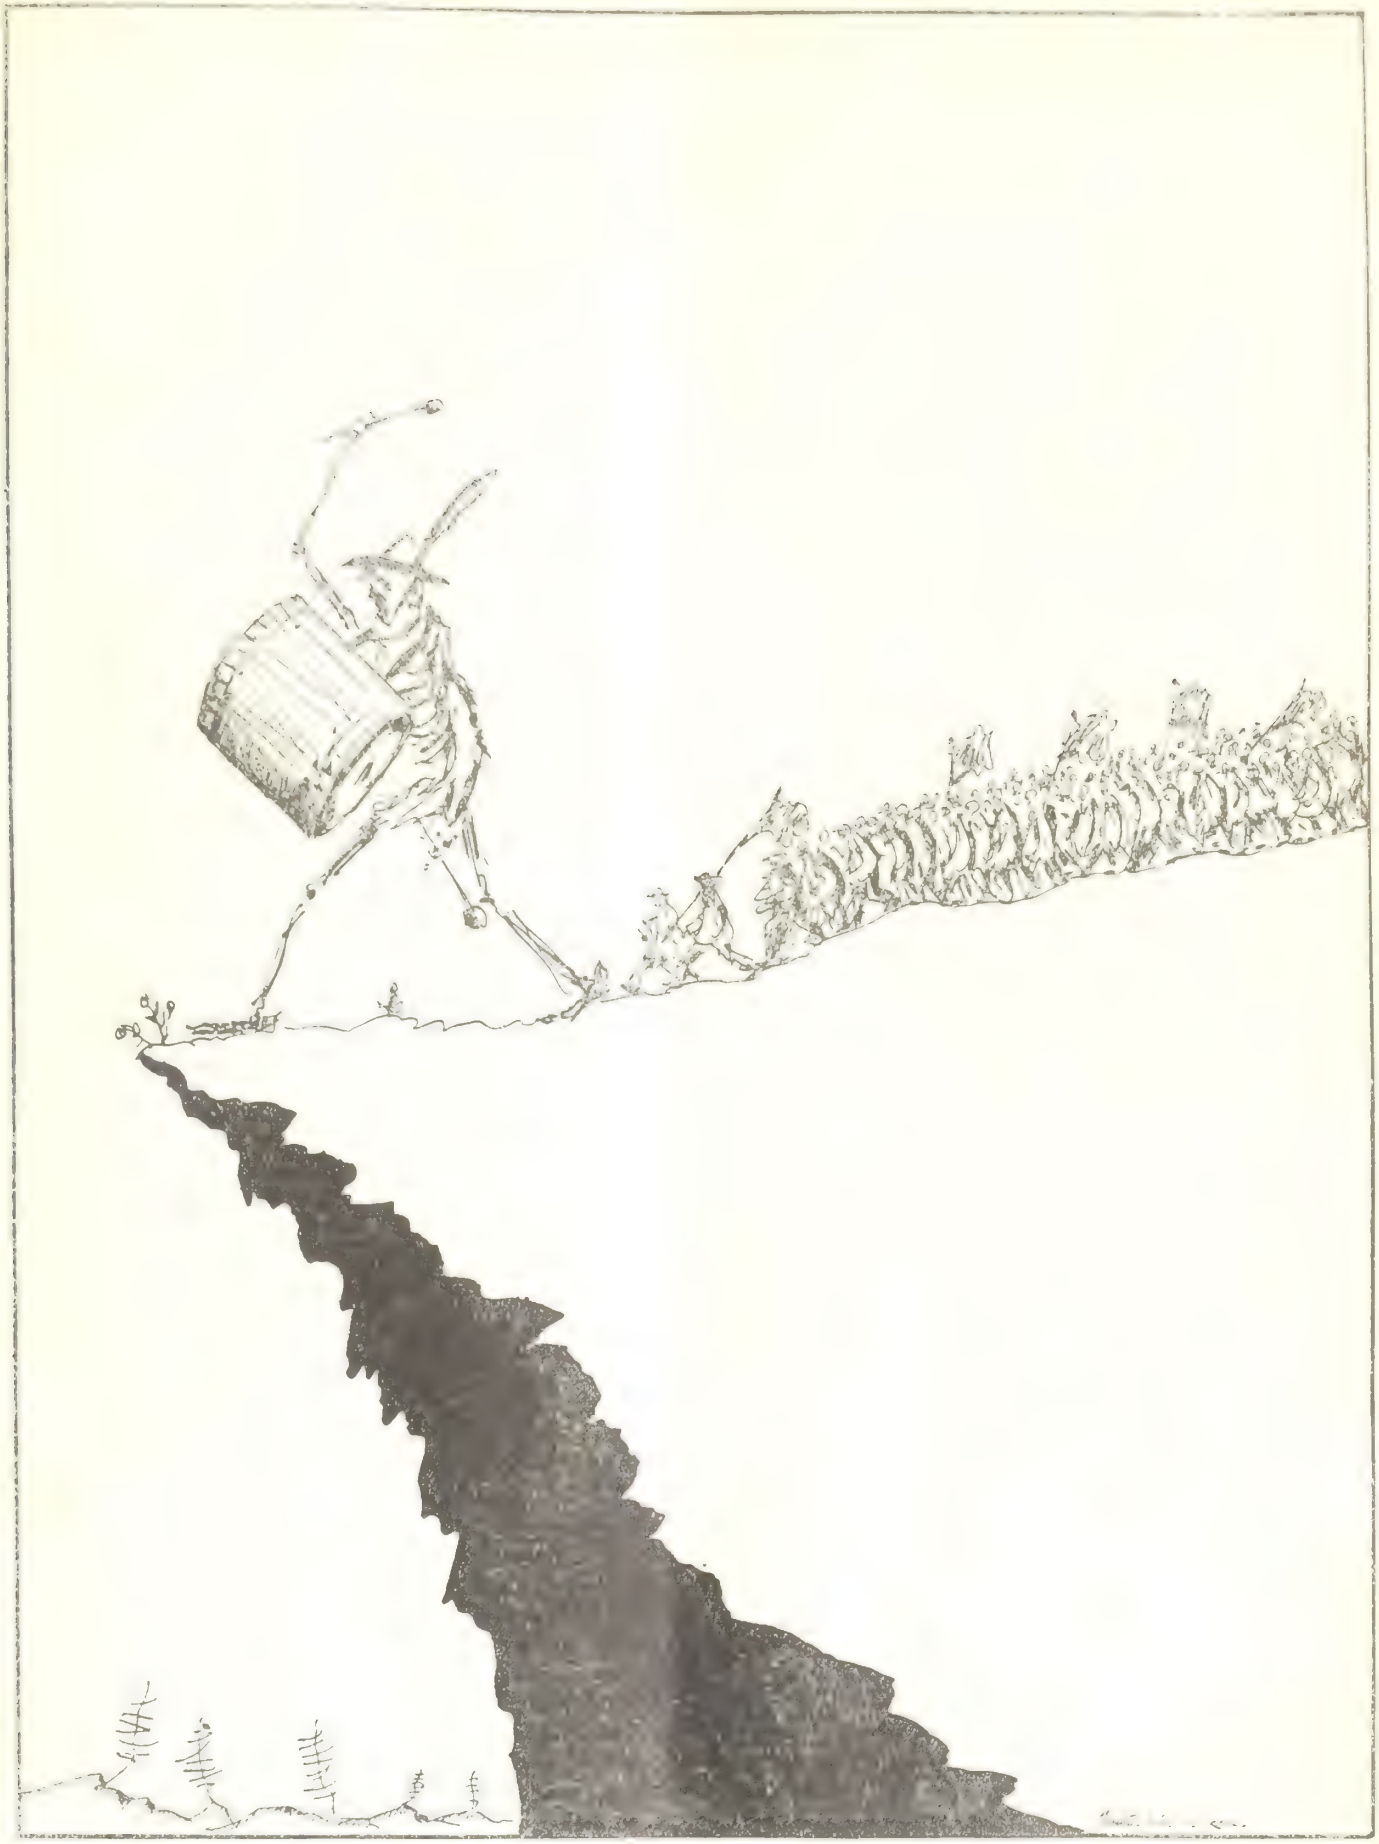
The New Masses was not greatly injured. At the time of the Post Office's ruling the May issue had already been mailed to subscribers and no ban has been placed upon the subsequent issues. Newsstands sales, of course, were increased by the publicity. But the by-products of such actions are frequently more damaging than the direct results, and it has proved so in this instance. Although the objections of the postal officials were based upon the work of a considerable number of contributors, only one name became public, that of Hal Saunders White, a young man of the highest character and a poet of promise. Mr. White was an instructor in English last winter in Yale University and has a contract with the University of Montana to teach in its summer school this year. But when Mr. White arrived in Missoula to take up his duties he was not allowed to do so. The university officials, quailing before newspaper publicity and afraid to risk their jobs in a stand for academic freedom, told Mr. White he could not teach and made every effort to get him to resign. Fortunately he has refused to do this. The issue between him and the university is a plain one of sticking by or repudiating a contract. Mr. White is under no obligation to apologize for or to defend his poem; it is no part of his work for the university. If the university were a private individual there should not be the slightest difficulty in enforcing such a contract through the courts. But a State, if it chooses, may break its word and set up its sovereign rights in defense. Is it possible that the great State of Montana will be guilty of so dishonorable and so mean a course?

Dr. Hanbury Hankin Says:



ON more than one occasion in the past American captains of industry have been known to take a fling in their own crude way at higher education, but it has remained for an English physician, an M. A. and a late fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge, to turn the logic which he learned at the university against logic itself. In his volume called "Common Sense and Its Cultivation" which Dutton's have just brought out in this country he proves, to his own satisfaction at least, just why it is that both knowledge and the power of orderly thought are very undesirable possessions indeed. Others have charged that colleges do not teach people to think, but it is the gravamen of this author's charge that they do.

Business men, says Dr. Hanbury Hankin (for such is his name), judge well because they judge unconsciously. Somewhere below the surface of that every-day self of theirs which amazes the learned by its ignorance and the logical by the number and brilliance of its apparent non-sequiturs lies an unconscious mind which uses the knowledge it does not know that it has and follows processes of deduction which it cannot understand. Like those mathematical prodigies who perform unconsciously the most intricate arithmetical calculations without having the least idea how they do them and who generally appear more than ordinarily stupid in regard to everything else, your man of affairs arrives at his conclusion quickly and surely without ever taking the trouble to make his process conscious or running the risk of error involved in the intricacies of formal thought. To the vast irritation of the thinker he apparently jumps to the right conclusion hours before the logician has laboriously arrived at the wrong one, because he really thinks with his unconscious mind instead of trying to think with his consciousness.

Hence, Dr. Hankin concludes—by logic, we fear, rather than by intuition—education is useless. But that is not the worst. Education, by loading the mind with facts and encouraging one to remember them, prevents knowledge from disappearing into that apparent forgetfulness where it would be really useful and teaches one to rely upon that very deceitful instrument, conscious reason. Your college don goes out into the world with the surface of his mind cluttered up with irrelevant information and his natural judgment corrupted by the habit of logical thought; no wonder he goes down in the struggle for life before the young man whose knowledge is stored safely in his forgetfulness and who thinks without knowing it.

Dr. Hankin would, however, prefer to reform education rather than abolish it. Hitherto it has proceeded upon a false theory and hence achieved undesirable results. Of late years, especially, the attempt has been made to develop education programs which would be useful in content and interesting in method, with the result that students have tended both to remember what they learned and to contract a taste for conscious mental processes, whereas the most useful education would be one which, while providing certain mental exercises for the mind, would leave no burden of fact behind and would encourage no habit of conscious thought. Hence history, literature, and the sciences should be ejected from the places which they have recently won in curricula and yield their places to such things as the declensions of foreign language, which are neither interesting nor logical. By way of specific suggestion Dr. Hankin recommends to our attention the educational system of the Baniya caste of successful traders in India, which contents itself with teaching to the young almost nothing except a set of multiplication tables in fractions which go after the following fashion: Four and a half times one and a half are six and three-quarters; four and a half times two and a half are eleven and a quarter; four and a half times three and a half are fifteen and three-quarters.

Dr. Hankin—whose book is not, as might at first be suspected, a work of elaborate irony—conducts his argument largely by the method of illustrative anecdote, proving, for example, that the untrained mind judges better than the trained one by telling jokes on college professors and captains of finance. This is not an unassailable technique of scientific inquiry, but we shall not undertake any attack upon his conclusions and shall content ourselves with the remark that, sympathizing as we do with the classical philosophers, who held that contemplation rather than success in business was the ultimate end of life, we are glad we got our education before Dr. Hankin instituted his reforms, and that humble as is our position in the world we would not exchange it for wealth and that merely unconscious mind which seems necessary for its attainment. That, however, is merely a matter of taste.

Propaganda!

The Pennsylvania Patriot's Duty: Elect a Democrat

By GEORGE W. NORRIS,

Republican United States Senator from Nebraska

THE perpetuity of the American government depends upon the free and uncoerced exercise of citizenship by the citizens. A democracy cannot exist if the people are too ignorant to exercise the franchise intelligently, or if the citizens are denied the right of suffrage or coerced in the use of it. If elections are controlled, through the manipulation of machine politicians and political bosses, by the use of immense quantities of money, the result is the same as if they were determined by military force at the point of a bayonet. Self-government ceases to exist.

A primary election is just as important as the general election. It is even more important in Pennsylvania, where, under any ordinary circumstances, no one but a Republican stands any show of election. The total salary of the Senator to be elected in Pennsylvania will be, in six years, $60,000, and yet in the recent Republican primary, to elect a nominee for that party, $3,000,000 was expended. A few years ago the nation was shocked by the disclosure that a little less than $200,000 had been spent in the Michigan primary. The Senate, although seating Newberry, solemnly declared that the expenditure of such amounts of money was contrary to the fundamental principles of our government, and denounced it in the severest of terms. In obedience to the demands of an incensed nation Senator Newberry had to resign from the Senate. After all, public sentiment is the strongest law and the most effective governmental force in civilization. When organized and crystallized in behalf of an honest, free citizenship it can overcome the intrigue and the demoralizing evil influence of the greatest of political machines. But in the light of recent disclosures in Pennsylvania, the machine behind Newberry in Michigan was a tight-wad.

If the Senate of the United States is to be controlled by men securing their right to serve in that body by the expenditure of huge sums of money, the liberties of the people will disappear and the ultimate destruction of our government will follow as surely and as naturally as the rising and the setting of the sun. If the special interests are willing to spend $3,000,000 to control one vote in the Senate, what can be expected from the highest law-making body in the land? Does any one believe that the manufacturers represented by Mr. Grundy, or that the interests represented by Mr. Mellon, do not expect a return for their cash? They not only expect their money to be returned—they expect a high rate of interest on their political investment. How much better it would be if the Senatorship were openly placed upon the auction-block and millionaires boldly and openly invited to bid for the coveted prize! If we are to sell public office as we do chattels, why not do it openly and let the contributions be paid into the Treasury of the United States?

Are we helpless? Must we who do not live in Pennsylvania say that after all this is a matter entirely under the control of that State when the men who have spent their money there expect to get it back through national legislation? The taxpayers of the Pacific Coast, of the great Middle West, of the South, of the North, of New England will have to share the burden with their fellow-citizens of Pennsylvania, for after all, these millions were only an investment and we will be expected to pay them back tenfold. The Senator-elect from Pennsylvania will help make laws for every State in the Union; and the citizens of California or of Maine are as much concerned in the issues involved as the people of Pennsylvania.

Does Pennsylvania realize that in electing a Senator it acts for the nation as well as for itself? Do Pennsylvanians understand that if they permit their millionaires to buy a seat in the United States Senate, we must extend the same privilege to every other State and to every other combination of millionaires? It seems to be taken for granted that Mr. Vare, the beneficiary of this public sale of public office, will be elected, and that the only remedy the country has is to demand of the Senate that it refuse to seat him. This would be a rebuke, it is true, to the methods that obtained in the Pennsylvania primary. But would it be a remedy? It must be remembered that in the primary contest in Pennsylvania the Governorship was likewise on the auction-block. The Vare machine and the Mellon machine were contending for supremacy. One machine won the Senatorship, but the other machine won the Governorship, and if Mr. Vare were elected and the Senate refused to seat him, the vacancy would be filled, by appointment, by the new Governor of Pennsylvania. Is it not fair to presume that the Governor would appoint a Senator satisfactory to the machine that gave him his own office? The result would then be that instead of having a Senator representing the Vare machine, we would have one representing the Mellon machine. The only result would be to throw out Mr. Vare and instal Mr. Mellon's man, thus giving the highest bidder the prize after all. Perhaps, if we are to sell Senatorial positions for money, it is as well to be square and let the highest bidder name the man.

Are the citizens of Pennsylvania so hidebound in politics that they will never, under any circumstances or conditions, scratch their tickets? Why should not the honest, patriotic people of that State vote for the Democratic nominee for Senator? If this condition confronted any Western State there would be no doubt of the result. The citizenry, regardless of party, would repudiate corruption and gladly avail themselves of the opportunity on election day to elect a man free from such contamination. It happens in this case that the Democratic nominee for United States Senator from Pennsylvania is a man of national reputation. He has served in the House of Representatives and made a fine record. He was the first Secretary of Labor, and in the handling of that great office gave to the country an eminently satisfactory and efficient administration; in the coming campaign, no word of criticism of his private or official life will be uttered. He is able; he is honest; he is patriotic and courageous. Only one charge will be made against him. He is a Democrat. And will Republicans heed that cry? Will Pennsylvanians put partisan politics above the duty they owe to their country? Are they going to say to the nation that party regularity stands higher with them than the liberties and principles that underlie a free government? In the face of a shocked nation-wide citizenship, will they blindly carry out the mandate of corrupt millionaire politicians? It is shocking to think that such corruption as obtained in the Pennsylvania primary could succeed; it would be more shocking still if the people of Pennsylvania gave it the seal of their approval in the coming election.

The election of Mr. Wilson would not only put a good man in the Senate from Pennsylvania, but it would be the most severe rebuke that could possibly be administered to a corrupt party machine. And why should Republicans not inflict this deserved chastisement of their leaders? Is it the duty of a Republican to overlook corruption in his own party and denounce it only when he finds it in the other party? If he is moved only by the one idea of purifying his own party, how can he do it better than by refusing to follow corrupt leaders? He would not stand for such things in business; he would not stand for them in his lodge or in his own family. He chastises his own children when they commit wrong, because he has a sincere desire to improve their conduct. The Republican of Pennsylvania, if he wants to make the Republican Party of his State respectable, will vote for the Democratic nominee.

Do the Republicans of Pennsylvania want a precedent for such action? These leaders who now cry "Vote the ticket straight, yellow dog and all," do not themselves practice what they preach. In Iowa a little more than a year ago Mr. Brookhart was nominated as the Republican candidate for Senator. There was no question about the regularity or the honesty of his nomination. But he had shown an independence of action that displeased the party leaders, and they called upon the people of Iowa to vote for the Democratic nominee. They spread their anti-Brookhart literature over the State, in the name of the Republican Party; the sacredness of a Republican nomination meant nothing to them when they had no strings on the nominee.

But that was not all. After the election was over and the Republican nominee had been elected and had received the certificate of election, they still kept up the fight. In the name of the Republican State Committee of Iowa they came to Washington and asked their fellow-Republicans in that body to vote for the seating of a Democrat. While this contest was pending, the Assistant Secretary of War, with the influence of a Republican President behind him, camped in the corridors of the Capitol and used every means in his power to induce Republican Senators to vote against the seating of Brookhart. The arguments used in the main were not that the Democrat had been elected and a Republican defeated, but almost universally that the Republican elected with the regular Republican nomination held views contrary to those held by the so-called Republican leaders. The result was that this powerful combination of Republican leaders nullified the voice of the voters of Iowa, threw out a Republican, and put in a Democrat.

In the face of such conduct these same leaders now demand regularity of the Republican voters of Pennsylvania. If they can justify their conduct in refusing to support Brookhart, whose nomination was honest and unquestioned, how can they demand that Pennsylvania Republicans overlook the disgraceful influences controlling the Republican primary in Pennsylvania?

I speak for millions of patriotic people throughout the length and breadth of our land, who are earnestly hoping and praying that their brethren in Pennsylvania, regardless of partisan politics, will go to the polls on election day and repudiate the political machines that are a stench in the nostrils of the nation. It cannot be that the great Keystone State, that has always been in the foremost ranks in defense of justice, liberty, and freedom, will falter when it is called upon to settle this question, not only for Pennsylvania but for the whole United States.

[The Nation has asked the other Republican United States Senators whether they advise honest Pennsylvania Republicans to vote for Vare or Wilson. Among the early returns were: Senator Pepper—"out of town," and Senator McKinley—"suffering from sciatica." Further returns will be reported next week.]

Cotton Goes West

By MAX STERN

KING COTTON, who counts his subjects, black and white, old and young, by the million in the South, is broadening his dominion to the far Southwest and chiefly to California. His advent into the fertile fields of the San Joaquin and Sacramento valleys has been about as sudden as the coming of the gold diggers in the rush of forty-nine. Practically overnight fruit, raisin, alfalfa, and melon lands have been transformed, as a snowstorm transforms an Eastern scene, into "fields of snowy white."

The peculiar adaptability of California climate and soil to cotton growing has been known for some time. The Imperial Valley's low, hot plains have been yielding superior and profitable cotton for more than seven years. It has been the agricultural and horticultural depression of the past few years, causing economic disaster to raisins and other fruits, that has drawn the farmers of the two great valleys of central California into the cotton belt. It was found that these valleys, with plentiful water for irrigation and with long hot summers, can produce not only more cotton per acre than any other area in the United States but a better quality. The yield here is about 370 pounds per acre as compared to the nation-wide average of 165.5 pounds, and it is entirely free from the pestiferous boll-weevil of Southern ill-fame.

Hence it has happened that with the winter's crop all picked, ginned, and baled California has awakened to find cotton up among the State's six headline crops, ranking with raisins, prunes, and oranges. Last year California harvested 77,000 bales. This year it has jumped to 130,000. The cotton fields stretching from the Lower California border up to the rice fields of the Sacramento Valley cover 170,000 acres. If the great Miller and Lux plantation goes into cotton, as is expected, next year's acreage will mount to about 400,000.

The California Development Association, the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce, "Californians Incorporated,"

and the boost clubs of the valleys unite in "pointing with pride." They point to more than seventy gins springing up through the valleys; to the two big textile mills employing hundreds of women and girls in Oakland and Los Angeles, sending out the music of the looms; to a harvest worth in raw cotton $16,500,000. San Francisco and Los Angeles, their docks piled high with bales of cotton, are vieing with each other for the honor of being called the "New Orleans of the Pacific Coast," with San Francisco claiming the lead. The hydro-electric companies will have a new market for their fast-developing industry. The hard-pressed grower of the valley will jingle some real coin in his jeans and his banker will breathe easier. It has remained for the social workers to view the situation with anything but delight.

Recently the new cotton lords met in the Bank of the Southwest assembly rooms in Los Angeles to consider common problems. One paper particularly impressed those of the social workers who attended. It was written by a young man named "Jack" Millar, head of the big Oakland cotton mills and also head of the California Manufacturers' Association.

"We must have," he said, "what we could term a cotton manufacturing atmosphere, and by that I do not refer to climatic conditions, but to the surrounding influences that cooperate with the development and success of the cotton industry." He then explained what cotton atmosphere means. "In Alabama, for instance, any new mill pays no local taxes for five years. . . . The Massachusetts minimum-wage law exempts textile workers," etc.

Now, California has been proud of its labor code. Certain bulwarks have been built against corporate greed and, with the possible exception of Wisconsin, California leads all other States as a pioneer progressive commonwealth. The result is that for living conditions among its workers it stands first. Are these standards to be exchanged for the privilege of nursing into power a new infant industry? Will the labor code be traded for the "cotton atmosphere"?

And what of King Cotton's retinue? In the South it consists of blacks and poor whites. In California it is more or less tacitly assumed that, for the time being at least, Mexican ex-peons will largely make up the army of pickers, ginners, loom-hands, and other servitors to his majesty. Since the war Negro migrations to the West have been conspicuous. But they pass by the cotton fields. Apparently they have turned their backs on the ancestral calling of picking the white man's cotton, and they are seeking jobs in the cities or in the fisheries and lumber camps of the Northwest. Mexicans, on the other hand, are here in numbers. More than 250,000 of them are scattered throughout the State today, toiling in section gangs and construction camps and "following the fruit" as seasonal labor. Next to Texas, California has been the Mecca of the Mexican workers. Until recently they have been seeping across the border at an estimated rate of 125,000 a year. Were it not for certain untoward developments all would be well with the big owners and employers. As the Southern Pacific's Maintenance of Ways superintendent recently said, a Mexican is an ideal worker—"he is patient, obedient, religious, and free from bolshevistic tendencies."

But two things are happening to this reservoir of cheap and patient labor. The Mexican and American Federations of Labor have entered into a "gentlemen's agreement" to halt Mexican migration, and apparently it is working. Jose W. Kelly, the Mexican Federation's American delegate, recently stated that the flow of workers across the border has virtually stopped. Although this is probably an overstatement, it is true that the pull on the southern side of the line is at work almost as strongly as the push on this side, and that the flow will undoubtedly slacken.

On the other hand, the bankers are trying to discourage big plantations of cotton such as would employ Mexican hands on a wholesale basis. With the examples of the raisin and prune men here and the Iowa corn farmers freshly in mind, they are trying to prevent the California farmer from putting all his eggs in the new cotton basket. "Diversify!" is the cry down the valleys. "A little cotton on a lot of farms" has been suggested as the slogan.

There is another type of immigrant coming into the State. These are the small Oklahoma farmers. In their second-hand flivvers, piled high with furniture and family, they have been pouring through the divides by the hundreds and joining the annual migrations of fruit pickers that swing around the State over the long harvest season. Heretofore there has been a hiatus between the grape harvest in September and the early February sugar-beet thinning and asparagus cutting. With the cotton harvest beginning in October and continuing through January, the gap will be filled and the cycle of seasonal occupation complete. Doubtless many of the new families from the Middle West will take root on small farms in the valleys.

Herein the social workers sense a new menace—child labor. The laws forbid children between the ages of eight and sixteen staying away from school, but laws are elastic things. And the social workers know all too well the ways of cotton. Loopholes in the minimum-wage law for women, women's eight-hour day, and the compulsory-education laws are certain to be sought by the new cotton capitalists. Already their spokesmen are sending out the first lines of battle with such clarions as "labor shortage," "Eastern competition," "irksome legislation." As a warning of what is coming one need only read this paragraph in a recent issue of the California Cotton Journal on the Thorn in Cotton:

> At this moment the labor shortage is the most serious confronting California's cotton history. Its solution must be undertaken at once. Immigration laws that levy a head tax on laborers have plugged the gateway through which the Mexican laborer had entered and child-labor laws have seemingly estopped the children from aiding. Certain growers have imported Negro labor from the South, employed it in harvesting their crops, and turned it loose to eke out a precarious existence. This system savors too much of one-man selfishness at the expense of the commonwealth. California does not want to saddle itself with a Negro problem.
>
> Well, then, what does the Journal suggest? you may ask. The Journal believes there are thousands of boys and girls in California's public schools who are without the range of the child-labor laws and who are not only willing but eager to help harvest the cotton crop. The growers, the ginners, all should seek, yes, should demand, the cooperation of the school department in this most important matter. The Journal has every respect for and will ever advocate a religious observance of the law, yet it thinks a way may be found to so interpret the law that when a growing industry is threatened its provisions may be legally brought to the rescue. Law is common sense. Is it common sense to ask it to save an industry from damage?

Is China Being Americanized?

By LEWIS S. GANNETT

TWO or three Greek temples, a few structures with traces of Gothic inspiration, and a miscellany of imitation warehouses and factory-buildings stand on the campus of the Chinese government university in Nanking—an architectural hodgepodge worthy of an American State university. Half a mile away are a group of magnificent buildings with heavy black overhanging roofs curling skyward at the corners, carved banisters, and richly painted paneled ceilings, redolent of old China. They are the lovely Asiatic shell of a Christian mission college founded and supported by American Methodists.

That is typical. In fifty years the great port cities of China will have left hardly a trace of the lovely old Chinese architecture—except in the mission-college buildings and in the few joss temples which will doubtless be preserved to gratify the tourist trade. The foreign mission schools, hurriedly Chinafying themselves to meet the nationalist attack, are spending tens of thousands of dollars in adapting the old Chinese style to modern requirements. The sweeping green roofs and gaily painted beams of the Peking Union Medical College, built with Rockefeller money, are a joy to the eye. Nanking University and Ginling College for women near by are good to look upon. But in four months in China I saw only one beautiful recent building which did not owe its existence to foreigners—the Returned Students' Club in Peking, a remodeled temple; and there the students may be suspected of having learned abroad their respect for old China.

Shanghai is a great British city, of solid British masonry; Tientsin is as foreign; even Canton, which has providentially escaped the curse of great foreign settlements, is enormously proud that Chinese have actually built a ten-story building on its Bund without foreign aid; and Canton's new buildings are as foreign to China as any suburb of Cleveland, Ohio, or Birmingham, England. Peking, a capital of politics rather than of commerce, resists the current most effectively.

You can buy Standard Oil kerosene in any village in China, and British-American cigarettes. The great corporations behind those products have in a generation taught the Chinese to change their habits in order to make them buy—the Standard Oil, indeed, used to give away lamps in order to create a market for the strange new fuel. If any third foreign product is on sale in the village it may well be Wrigley's chewing gum. I saw Spearmint gum on sale in the streets of Urga, the capital of Mongolia, 700 miles across the Gobi Desert from the most accessible railroad.

Architecture and chewing gum are outward symptoms of a profound inner change. Western architecture is spreading because it is cheaper. Gum and tobacco cost less than opium. Only American church-people can afford painted paneled ceilings and bright tile roofs with gargoyle corner ornaments. The Chinese—like the Europeans, like the whole world—are abandoning old beauties and old customs for cheaper and more efficient models. They are becoming modernized, standardized, Americanized, like Japan. Mystery, leisure, charm are ebbing; cost accounting is defeating tradition.

The cult of the efficient seems a matter of course to most Westerners and almost all Americans, but to the Chinese it is a revolution. Old "China-hands" will laugh at the suggestion that it has touched Chinese psychology—but old China-hands need a vacation and a perspective. The Chinese has for untold centuries followed tradition and has believed that it was wicked to deviate from it. His young men and young women are beginning to despise custom and tradition; and his middle-aged business men, almost unconsciously, are beginning to ignore it. It was only forty years ago that the first railroad tracks laid in China were torn up by superstitious officials; today they are an indispensable instrument of civil war, as is the once-despised telegraph. The only opposition to them comes from Westernized Chinese who know how easily international politics slips into an engineering contract. Once a contract is let, there is no longer much difficulty about arranging to remove the graves that beset all the short cuts. And a wanderer through the black lanes of an old Chinese city may be surprised to discover that the squeaky Chinese music that wails to the night is produced not by a stringed instrument but by a Victor record.

Foreign railroads, manners, oil, and architecture are prevailing because they are more efficient. American wheat, when it costs a dollar a bushel in Chicago, can be landed in Hankow, ten thousand miles away and six hundred miles up the Yangtze from Shanghai, cheaper than it can be brought from Shensi, only a thousand miles away, where it may sell for twenty-five cents. Railways and steamships make the difference; no wonder they and their products are breaking the crust of old China. Foreign clothes have made less progress because, in cold weather at least, they are less efficient than the old Chinese robes. Foreign hairdressing—including the bob—is making its way among the women. Curt foreign manners are replacing the leisurely old Chinese courtesy. The streets are being widened, and the intimacy of the old Chinese workshop, opening on a narrow street and aware of all that its neighbors said and did, is disappearing. Foreign machinery is revolutionizing Chinese industry. Foreign ideas—and the railway, taking the young people away from their homes to study and to work—are breaking up the immobile unity of Chinese family life upon which the whole structure of Confucian ethics is based. Boys go away from home to study, and refuse to return to the wives of their parents' choice. In the port cities one meets sad young men who are homesick for New York, prefer fox-trotting to Mah Jong, and inquire eagerly about the Charleston.

Chinese, with their habit of explaining everything by thousand-year-old parallels, will tell you that there were student revolts in the Han dynasty, before Christ was born, but it seems to me that even the nationalism of the student movement today, passionately denouncing foreigners and all their works, is essentially a part of the cult of Western efficiency. This political nationalism, this conception of national sovereignty as a precious right to be cherished and preserved, has its roots in foreign education and practice—in part in Allied war-time propaganda. The old Chinese patriotism—a patriotism profounder than anything known in the West—was cultural rather than political, inclusive rather than exclusive. It was a loyalty to a civilization rather than to a state, conservative rather than aggressive. It was powerless to halt the intrusion of Western men and methods into the political and economic control of China, and was satisfied because the Westerners were so obviously inferior in the refinements of living. These young students are the counterpart of our flapper generation; flaunting their posters and banners, parading by thousands against the unequal treaties, and making soap-box speeches about self-determination, they express contempt for the passivity of their elders and of repeating a lesson learned from abroad. Theirs is not the language of old China but of young Europe. When it defies us most violently young China is most certainly expressing its determination to be like us.

China is so picturesque, so obviously different to the outward eye—her people are so readily distinguished from the Westerner by the color of their skin and the tilt of their eyes—that we are tempted to make her out more different from us than she is. I once asked an Asiatic scholar how the East could preserve its essential Orientalism while submitting to industrialization; he replied: "I don't think there is anything peculiarly Oriental and Occidental. There is merely medieval and modern." China has been separated from us through four thousand years of recorded history, and has developed what seems a very different civilization. Yet much which we call "Chinese" or "Oriental" is to be found in our own Middle Ages. When the Chinese have a network of railroads—which will inevitably break up the old village economy—and good roads and rapid local transit, other differences will fade and disappear. We may discover our essential likenesses too late. And then the problem, for the Chinese as for us, will be how to regain those essentially medieval virtues which China still has and which our restless, mobile, industrialized West has lost.

Meanwhile the process which has reached its apex in bustling, rushing, goalless America goes on. There is, as yet, no power in China to stop it. Men may prate till doomsday of the enormous inertia of the vast rural masses of China; the fact is that, like the peasants of Russia, they have only inertia—no active, creative force of their own. The great central force which has maintained China's identity through fifty centuries is her worship of the past, but the mechanical superiority of the present has already proved its power to defy that ancient citadel. And as the other civilizations of antiquity crumbled when their beliefs decayed, so the old China is yielding to the new West. What happens in the port cities of China today will happen throughout China the day after tomorrow. The feverish, abnormal life of those cities has a significance out of all proportion to their share of China's four hundred and fifty million people; the rest of China too will adopt the Western—or modern—method of working hectically while it works, and of playing madly while it plays; it too will forget the Chinese—or medieval—knack of combining work and play so that long hours seem short. The port cities are a hint of China's tomorrow.

[Lewis Gannett's next article on China, I Never Liked Missionaries . . ., will appear in The Nation for July 28. Other articles will follow.]

Justice in Georgia

By ELBRIDGE COLBY

IN the town of Americus, Georgia, there is temporarily quartered a portion of Company K, 24th Infantry (colored), of the regular army. These doughboys have left their rifles and soldierly equipment many miles away and are temporarily in Americus to dig iron pipe out of the site of the now-abandoned Souther Field for transport and reinstallation in Fort Benning, where the wooden water mains are rotting away.

On September first of last year a white night watchman in a lumberyard had his "dinner" brought at about ten o'clock by his wife and child. They came down a street through the Negro section of the town, past a crowd of Negroes congregated in front of a dance hall; as far as can be discovered they were not molested or accosted in any way. About an hour later, the family of three walked up the street, on a sidewalk eight feet ten inches wide. On the curb, with his back to the sidewalk, talking to another colored soldier of the same regiment, stood Private Smith, known as one of the best-dressed and best-behaved men in the 24th Infantry; he was wearing the uniform of the United States Army. The night watchman, named E. J. Fulbright, kicked him from behind in that part of the anatomy usually employed for seating purposes, kicked him into the road, and exclaimed: "Get off the sidewalk." The sidewalk, you will recall, was eight feet ten inches wide. The kicker declares that the soldier turned and said: "Who's going to make me?" Six other witnesses declared that Smith said nothing. In any event, Smith was unarmed. He made no threatening gesture. And yet night watchman Fulbright drew a gun and shot the soldier dead on the spot.

Although the offender was indicted he was not kept in jail in spite of the charge of murder against him. Three months later came the trial. The general argument for the defense was to the effect that the jury knew the law and knew they were sworn to defend the law, and that any Southern gentleman would have done the same as did the kindly family man named Fulbright. Great stress was laid on the fact that this was a "Northern nigger" hailing from Montclair, New Jersey. A Mr. Fort, serving as attorney for the defense, recited the events of the years from 1860 to 1865 with many oratorical flourishes. He even referred with tender feelings to "our sainted and beloved commander, General Robert E. Lee."

Late in November another colored soldier had visited his permanent station at Fort Benning and while there had stolen an army automatic. At the time of the Fulbright trial he was in custody of the sheriff for carrying concealed weapons, and was also awaiting trial by a court martial for the pilfering of the pistol. Neither he nor his offense had anything to do with the Fulbright case. Yet, because the prosecution might emphasize the fact that Company K at Americus was unarmed and doing fatigue work, he was brought into court by the sheriff and seated near the jury, with the automatic dangling conspicuously. His name was not mentioned. No apparent reason existed for his appearance in that court at that time except a desire to prejudice the jury.

The proceedings of the court were signalized by the tremendous amount of chewing and spitting of tobacco that went on, and by the fact that all windows were kept tightly closed, just as if there were a law in Georgia that courts must suffocate justice with foul air.

Some officers of the army, legal advisers and higher commanders of the killed soldier, came to court to listen to the proceedings, wearing the uniforms which all officers are supposed to wear when on duty. Their uniforms brought forth many a slurring remark about "those damned Northern officers." It was observed, by persons present, that the watchman accused of murdering the soldier had an intelligence and an appearance far below that of the average Negro soldier in the army. It was thought by some that the neat and soldierly appearance of Private Smith might possibly have been the provocation of the attack.

The verdict? Is there any question that an attack upon a Negro soldier would result—in such a court and in such a community and in such a State—in anything but an acquittal?*

Women in Guam

By M. S. LEA

AS late as the fifteenth century a woman of Guam was free to have as many children as she wanted. This was because a woman who was capable of bearing a great many children was looked upon as a paying investment by the young buck who chose her to be his wife. She was sent in early adolescence to the living hall of the island bachelors with the purpose of testing her fecundity; and she went every year until she was twenty-five years old or thereabout and usually possessed a large and active family to help her with her farm by the time she was married. The more children she possessed the more desirable she appeared in the eyes of homing men, for their number denoted her popularity and charm as well as her actual money value.

The Spanish priests, chancing upon the island with Magellan in the sixteenth century, knew no rest until they had remedied this state of affairs. After the wars which gave them the land had ended they set about definitely to establish the doctrine of the church of Spain. The native form of government was destroyed and the cross raised to stand among the palm trees on the tiny coral shore. The Spaniards were kindly, after their military authority was acknowledged, in matters pertaining to childbearing in the cross's shadow. Women no longer began their ordeal as little girls, and they were safely and immediately married with church rites in as many cases of natural pregnancy as was possible. Where this was impracticable the matter was overlooked. Life on the island was simple and a thatched dwelling hut, with its accompanying animal household of cariboos, pigs, and chickens, often sheltered a man several of whose children were in reality his grandchildren, where mothers accepted the responsibility for their daughters' lapses from grace, and the padres gave absolution to everyone provided church attendance was good. There were many ways in which Spanish rule in the South Seas was brutal and neglectful, but to the family it seems to have been uniformly lenient.

After a decade of American rule Calvinism began reaching voracious fingers toward the beaches of Guam. The day of the padres was passing. Round-stomached friars with ruddy faces and flapping frocks continued to pace the streets benignantly offering the crucifix for the passerby to kiss, but there was an insidious whispering of rational thinking in the air. Rational thinking made its appearance finally in the ascetic flesh of a Baptist missionary, who, with the funds of his church, engaged a bleak little house on the beach road and endeavored to lure into it such of the natives as he could induce to accept austere discourse in place of high-church ceremonial. Perhaps they did not know what the discourse was about more than they knew what the ceremonial was about. Some of them may have gone from a love of novelty, and it is likely that he gathered in many who, for reasons of their own, were escaping the ire of the priests. His meetings made a poor showing and his influence was thought to be negligible, but in the end it was felt.

Filomena was my maid. I recall clearly that day on which she stood before me, her crooked eyes glistening, her blunt hands quivering where they were crossed upon her stomach as she said, "Ah, m'am, can do go mi rancho good afternoon? I ask you plees!"

"Oh, Filomena," I replied, "that is three holidays in two weeks. Last week it was to get ready for a Novena, and this week it was for a saint, and now——"

"M'am," said Filomena humbly, "mi bullock have got babee cow!"

I was not the person to come between Filomena and a young thing. She spent the afternoon at her rancho admiring her talented bullock's offspring; for to a Chamorro all cattle are bullocks and to Filomena the young of all the animal kingdom were babies. Yet no man would marry her. Her eyes were crossed and her body was queerly built and clumsy. Moreover she loved human young things to distraction, and they and the church were her economic undoing. What passion she could spare from the one she lavished upon the other. What love and holiness she could borrow from the other she spent upon the one. She was everybody's godmother, and the office of godmother carried with it monetary responsibilities. Gifts of layettes were involved, and ornaments of cloth and paper flowers, beautifully fashioned, to decorate the altar for the christening. Likewise a fat pig for the christening supper. All of these things Filomena provided; bent above yards of muslin and cheap lace bought at the trading shops she concocted snowy, fine-sewn petticoats and caps and dresses. Baskets of pink and white and yellow roses bloomed under her skilful fingers to come at last to the old cathedral beyond the plaza, where, massed against the wine-red calico curtains at the back of the altar, they gleamed delicately in porcelain arabesque.

But the real joy of her work for her foster children

* The author has discussed the full legal implications of military personnel in State courts in an article in the Georgetown Law Journal, for January, 1926.

lay in acquiring little pigs, later to be the gustatory delight of the older, craftier recipients of her largesse. Too poor to buy pigs of her own, other people gave them to her when a sow died and they would otherwise have been abandoned to death by starvation. Then Filomena took them to her broad and kindly lap and fed them with a spoon. How many scores of little pigs she brought to adulthood in this manner, how many tens of hundreds of spoons of milk she must have put into their squealing mouths, would have proved a neat problem in figures.

"Ah, m'am!" she would cry, "have got plenty little pig for take care of now! The ol' mother ain' no good no more!"

In her judgment of human mothers she was exact and critical. One sensed a cunning trying out of popular opinion in her comments; she would look a little curiously with her one straight eye upon the person she was addressing and say without adornment of her speech, "You see dat 'oman, m'am, she ain' no good! 'Ave got babee, no 'ave got 'usban!" There hung in the air about her a fine suggestion of parrots and catechisms, her crooked eye wandered, her thick fingers crossed themselves in restlessness upon her stomach.

My cook, who was a lanky native man of nearly thirty summers, put the public point of view concerning Filomena very simply. He said, "Filomena, she's crazee." Filomena seemed crazy to him. He had six babies, to four of whom she was godmother, and when the seventh arrived he would not even leave the plaza, where he was playing baseball, to go home and look at it.

"A little boy was here asking for you, Joaquin," I said.

"Das nothing, m'am," said Joaquin. "I fin' him. My wife she say have got nodder babee. I see him tonight."

Babies were a matter of prose to the wife of Joaquin. There had been a time, probably, when she had been round and slim and golden-skinned, with eyes like black moths and hands delicate and slender. She had worn her camisa, with its embroidered pattern, like a lovely dragonfly about to set sail across ponds of hyacinth. Her feet were like little cats and followed each other as silently and lightly under her trailing skirt. Joaquin had seen and loved her and now she had seven babies. Next year she would have eight.

That Filomena would have liked eight babies there could be no possible doubt, although it was unreasonable to suppose that she would ever have them. Yet all that happened seems to me today to have been inevitable when viewed in the unvarying sagacity of retrospect.

It happened that that year I became ill with a lingering infection and for months lay in the flimsy government hospital, built lightly of boards to sway with typhoons and earthquakes, watching the tops of palm trees through the small, high window and listening to the drone of surf along the black reef fringing the lagoon. Service among nurses on the hospital staff was irregular and hospital fare unpalatable, and Filomena came and went like a soft, brown bumble-bee, bringing me bowls of soup from my own kitchen, padding about on sandaled feet, the tail of her bright skirt following her like the whisper of an ave; for she had forever about her the breath of prayer.

What was it that blinded my eyes to what I was later to learn had been the jest of the old capital town for weeks? I can only offer that I was spellbound by the palm trees, by their silver surfaces under the sun and moon and their surreptitious, steely chatter in the trade winds. Filomena was always squat. Indeed, the women of the South Seas have such round figures that only a person occupied with such speculation would be apt to notice much change in them in pregnancy.

One night at midnight the head girl among the native apprentice nurses, a pretty, yellow wench called Luisa, came to me on the pretense of taking my temperature; saying laughing beneath her breath, "M'am, das bery fonee 'bout Filomena."

"Filomena?" I said sleepily, "Filomena?"

"Filomena have got babee," she said slyly. "Born tonight."

"What rot!" I said sharply. Despite her protests I took the thermometer from my mouth and sat up in bed.

"Das true!" declared Luisa.

"You're foolish," I argued with her fretfully. "Filomena can't have a baby! Filomena——" In my mind there arose the vision of Filomena's one straight eye, its honesty as she parroted, "Dat 'oman no good——" But the other looked past me, communing with a power I could not see.

Morning brought no lightening of the nightmare, for nightmare it was in that island so rapidly being translated into terms of harshest Anglo-Saxon morality. Filomena had long been in the employ of Americans attached to the naval base at Guam. She was well known in that stratum of native society spoken of among the white people as the slipper gang. Her blood was crossed with the blood of Spain, and she was Spanish trained. And now she had a son out of wedlock of whom her people were newly, bitterly ashamed. All this and more I learned from the tittering Luisa as she arranged my breakfast tray beside the bed. Filomena, whose life and substance had been spent for other people's children, had no money saved with which to buy clothes for her own child. She had been shut in her room by her senile old mother, a wrinkled hag whose youngest daughter was said to be her granddaughter, and refused companionship or assistance of any kind.

Distracted I thrust a gold piece into the giggling yellow girl's hand. "Send her this quickly for me," I said to her. "Tell her to get whatever she needs. Tell her that I'm coming to see her as soon as I'm well." And Luisa fled from the room to deliver the money and spread the story of my own depravity.

At ten o'clock the missionary's wife called to see me. Her small, white face was taut with mixed feeling, she pulled a chair to my bedside reluctantly as one having a distasteful thing to do. She spoke first of my health and I admitted great weariness of body and spirit; whereupon, the formalities dispensed with, she left me as a topic and fell upon her point. In tones that rivaled the chattering palm leaves in steeliness she asked me what I knew of Filomena's child.

"Nothing," I told her, "utterly nothing."

At that she scrutinized me with sharp unfriendliness, but I was very young and very ill, and obviously she concluded either that I was a fool or lied.

"What," she asked next, "are you going to do about it?"

It hadn't occurred to me that I was expected to do anything about it. It did not even occur to me at the time that the missionary's wife was impertinent, although I had never, to my knowledge, set eyes on her before that moment. I responded honestly, for I was alive with memories of Filomena's baby cow, her baby pigs, her grandiloquent, profiteering baby godchildren, that I had sent her a sum of money. Then I turned my eyes to the palms for preference as she heaped contumely upon me that I had not, that morning, dismissed the native woman from my employ.

I made what haste I could to recover from my malady and on the day upon which I was released from the hospital went direct to the small house which sheltered her and her multitude of kin. At the corner of the plaza I met a friend who told me that the governor was having the island searched for her betrayer, and that a rascally old keeper of trading shops was discovered to have disappeared from the place; but these things seemed trivial to me then as, a number of years later, it seemed trivial to learn how another governor was having the names of all mothers of illegitimate Chamorro children published in the Guam News Letter.

It seemed to me that a fetid air hung about the house as though the thoughts of an island full of mocking, spiteful people wrapped it in a shroud. At the porch I was met by the old woman, her toothless mouth smeared with the scarlet of the betel she chewed. When I asked to see her daughter she seemed unwilling to admit me; nevertheless I inserted the toe of one foot within the crack she had opened in the door and called through the gloom, "Filomena!"

At once a sad voice answered from behind a partition, "Ah, m'am, I tink bery good you not come here!"

I thrust the old woman aside and feeling my way past chairs and a table found another door and a veritable pit of darkness. So closed was it against the sunlight that not a solitary ray penetrated to show me where she stood.

"Filomena," I begged her, "tell me where you are."

Only a sob answered me out of that pit of night. Slowly my eyes became accustomed to the darkness; I was able to make out different objects in the room. There a chair stood. That was a bureau. The long oblong under the window shutters was a table. And that—that was a crib! A low, iron crib which some former employer had given her now filled with a mass of musty bedding. No use, I concluded, to try and locate its occupant. But the woman beside it, crouching where she sat on the floor against the bars, I recognized, thick shoulders bent, soft, brown face bowed, hiding the crooked, ever-questioning eye; a figure like an image of Grief's self crying into locked hands. I put my arm about her, but she drew away from me shivering and I heard her moan, "I plenty 'shamed!"

"Filomena," I stammered helplessly, "Filomena——"

"Ah, m'am!" She cowered lower, grinding her cheek against the rusted iron of the crib.

"Filomena, let me see your baby!"

Again that pitiful plaint arose in torment to her lips and she flung out her arms to hide him from my sight.

"I 'shamed!"

"Who told you that, Filomena?"

"Eberybody, m'am! All de people—mi madre——"

From among the shadows on the floor the low voice rose brokenly, repeating the terrible, blasting things that the old woman had said, stabbing her anew with the sharpness of their venom.

I let her cry for a little, soothing her with what dreary platitudes I might, and then resorted to strategy to see the child. "If you won't show him to me, Filomena, I'll pick him up myself and my doctor will be furious."

At that she flew to slide back the wooden shutters, crying, "You too much sick, m'am! You sit down!" And so, by running, I came face to face at last with the cause of all the turmoil.

He was wrinkled and rather black, and I thought him unattractive (like all of the newborn babies I had ever seen, save for his color. But I could not tell Filomena that; so I said, "He's a beauty, isn't he! Oh, Filomena!"

Swiftly she knelt at my side, for I had taken him into my lap, as though she feared that in my admiration I might covet him for my own; circling the tiny, squirming body with her arms, murmuring against his rumpled face a single, breathless word.

"Babee!"

But the next moment she had returned with a flash of memory to the bitter, familiar cry.

"I 'shamed!"

Through the open window the stench of drying copra drifted, wafted on the sensuous benediction of the trades.

The Cock

By JAKE FALSTAFF

Give me a hot summer,
Says the cock,
With the prints of hooves in the caked hogwallow
And the yellow dust smooth as water on the road.
Give me a hot sun to bake the leaves
So the caterpillars will fall from the pig-hickory
And the pinch-bugs walk wobbly on the flagstones.
Give me the blue sky cloudless
So I can spot the hawk at the horizon,
Giving the calls that the hens know,
Making them run to shelter.
Give me the heat rising over the stubble
And the sparrows threshing the shock.
A hot day and a cool dusk,
Says the cock,
With the swallows gibbering under the muddy eaves
And the bats blundering around the dinner-bell.
A hot day, says the cock,
And the hens wallowing in the dust-puddles
And the chicks running stiff-legged after butterflies.
I will forsake the hen-house
And roost in the apple-tree;
In the morning I will fly
To the reel of the binder and crow.
Give me the flowers swooning in the sunshine,
The spiders growing fat in the box-stall,
A hot summer, a hot summer,
Says the cock.

In the Driftway

LIKE a good many other persons who do not believe that this is the best of all possible worlds, but would like it to be such, the Drifter occasionally gets discouraged about what is called the labor movement. He sees the labor but he can't always make out the movement. Then again in more optimistic moments the Drifter discerns progress. One mark of progress, he thinks, is the emphasis placed by modern labor organizations upon educating the children of workers in proletarian philosophy. Heretofore the goal of ambitious workers has been to educate their children for "something better," in the course of which the best young minds have mostly been lost to the proletarian cause.

* * * * *

THE Drifter has remarked with interest on the part taken by children in the strike of the textile workers in and near Passaic, New Jersey, where the younger generation has furnished the shock troops in various parades and demonstrations. To some it may seem that these children have been exploited by their elders—that they have been used as window-dressing and advertising matter when they should have been playing hop-scotch or marbles. It all depends, the Drifter thinks, on whether the hearts of the children have been in the strike, or whether the young folks have been used as unwilling or indifferent actors. Those who have seen these children testify to the genuineness of their interest, and the Drifter has lately read a composition on the strike, written by a girl ten years old, which points in the same direction. In her odd and alien English this little girl mingles snatches of the phraseology which she has heard at labor meetings with her own vivid and personal impressions. She writes:

> Our life are very miserable as I know. Our parents were compeled to work very hard, long hours, under fears and cruelty, for so little wages they were not able to make human living for us and themselves. Our parents were compeled to work very hard, not only in the mill but they was work exhaustly at home also. They awaken early morning to get ready on time to work, to prepare all necessary for all day for us and selves. They go to grocery, make lunch, cook food, awaken us even early, to give us full instruction, warn us to be careful, what we got to do, how to use poor food and poor home. They then see if windows are nailed, gas tied with string or wire, knives forks, matches are lock up, then we are lock up too.

* * * * *

"HOW to use poor food and poor home!" A lot of the education of the worker, young or old, is just that. And those who have wondered how a mother manages who has to go off to work in the gray of the morning, leaving young children behind by themselves, may get hints from "gas tied with string or wire" and "matches are lock up." This ten-year-old proletarian then goes on to say:

> We older do what mother did, we warn our brother and sister when we hear alarm clock ring we leave them to school and turn come to guard on themselves. Imagine our mothers and fathers at mill their double work, double think and double fears. Our parents return home exhausted to work again at home, to make warm supper and order. But let me tell you that ours parents return to us overworked, gloomy, find us at home crying, hungry, food all over floor, chair upside down, ours dresses torn and some one are hurt or sick. What is then? Whos punish is that? Who is that? What for is that? For whom is that? Where is that?

* * * * *

THE Drifter will not try to answer those six staccato questions. Who can? But children who at ten years of age are pressing such queries will not be likely at twenty to forget the workers' cause for "something better." For our young writer speaks from experience.

> I proof that all on my selves. I was locked up at home that time I was six years old. I guard my brother four years and sister two years. My mother was working at Botany mill till got completly exhausted and knocked to bed. My mother cannot work hard now. I am ten years now but never forgotten that days.

* * * * *

IT is tragic that a child of ten has to look back upon bitterness which she cannot forget, but it is more tragic that many so easily forget that such bitterness exists. America suffers from too great prosperity and too much good-nature. The American labor movement will have more motion when it is inoculated with some of the bitterness that now distinguishes European proletarianism from our own.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Negroes and Artists

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Langston Hughes, defending racial art in America, forgets that the Negro masses he describes are no different from the white masses we are all familiar with. Both "watch the lazy world go round" and "have their nip of gin on Saturday nights" (love of strong liquors is supposed to be a Nordic characteristic). If there is anything "racial" about the spirituals and the blues, then there should be immediate ability to catch the intricate rhythm on the part of Negroes from Jamaica, Zanzibar, and Sierra Leone. Such is not the case, and we must conclude that they are the products of a certain American environment: the South. They are American folk-songs, built around Anglo-Saxon religious concepts.

An artist, it seems to me, is one who, able to see life about him, and, struck by its quick interchange of comedy, drama, and tragedy, attempts to portray it or interpret it in music, poetry, or prose, on canvas or in stone. He can only use the equipment furnished him by education and environment. Consequently his creation will be French, British, German, Russian, Zulu, or Chinese, depending on where he lives. The work of the artist raised and educated in this country must necessarily be American.

It is the Aframerican masses who consume several millions' worth of hair-straightener and skin-whitener per annum in an effort to reach the American standard in pigmentation and hair-texture. This does not look as if they did not care whether they were like white folks or not. Negro propaganda-art, even when glorifying the "primitiveness" of the American Negro masses, is hardly more than a protest against a feeling of inferiority, and such a psychology seldom produces art.

Atlanta, Georgia, June 21 GEORGE S. SCHUYLER

Escaping Seventh Street

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: No person with an innate love of justice can fail to be greatly heartened by the thought that the colored race is producing men like Langston Hughes.

But isn't Mr. Hughes a bit impatient with the growing intelligentsia of his race? After all, what is racial experience but the expanded spiritual history of the individual? For a man to deny his own soul and try to mold himself after the pattern of someone else is pathetic, of course, but, oh, how human and understandable!

Mr. Hughes revels in the colorful and inspirational aspects which the Seventh Streets (the colored ghettoes, so to speak) present to the artist. But he must not forget that the Seventh Streeters are filling the schools and universities with their children. When these youngsters emerge from the crucible of education, would Mr. Hughes have them go back to Seventh Street? It wouldn't be human of them, would it, not to want to move away from Seventh Street, in order to build new worlds for their wider horizons?

Washington, D. C., June 25 DOROTHY FOX

Brown-Skinned Nordics

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It is encouraging to read Mr. Langston Hughes's article in The Nation of June 23. He has manfully tackled a subject which hitherto could be discussed only within closed doors.

I can quite well remember the distressful reaction manifested by one member of a theater party, comprising young Negroes, a few years ago, when it became known that Paul Robeson had been secured for a Negro Broadway play. Imagine any one going to see Negro artists perform! And so this pale, emotionally repressed caste, too proud to breathe the rhythm of life and too childish not to warm themselves at its glowing spontaneity, lives daily under a yellow mask of illusion.

Mr. Hughes would have us believe that Negro art would be possible if this brown-skinned Nordic could be eliminated; but he fails to see that in our present environment the development of any true Negro art remains an utter impossibility. Where is the motif, where are the symbols, where is the sympathetic background upon which every true art develops? I am constrained to agree with Mr. George S. Schuyler that Negro art "made in America" is only a myth. All this noise is strongly charged with commercialism. Negro art is not possible on a soil alien and entirely unsympathetic to its germination and development.

Yet the budding Negro artist must struggle on despite the handicaps and the mushroom minds within his group, for the struggle is more joyous and more pregnant with real life than its abandonment. He must never tire to bellow and write and laugh the brown-skinned Nordics from a place of recognition.

New York, June 28 HEADLEY E. BAILEY

Where the Battle is Fought

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: How in the name of Hank Ford can a Negro or a Jew or a Chinaman or even an Irishman escape his environment? Especially when that environment is the most insistent the world has ever known; pounding like an obsession at the ears and nerves and brain—America the gigantic?

The Negroes are not quite as isolated in America as were the Jews in Russia. And yet, even before the Revolution, the younger Jews were Russianized, were quite different from German Jews or American Jews. Even our old orthodox Jews, prisoners of ghettoes, were differentiated when they came from Salonika or from London or Prague. Environment had changed them even in the ghettoes.

If Negroes think they can build up some special racial culture in this huge America, they are either optimists or are blinded by race patriotism. It can't be done.

I have known little Chinese flappers in San Francisco, one generation removed from the joss-house, who rouge, wear silk stockings, read Snappy Stories, and do the Charleston. One sees hundreds of them on the streets there. If the young Chinese-Americans develop a poet, would it be proper for him to go back to Confucius and forget America? He would be as futile and reactionary if he did as some of our white poets who try to escape their age by sentimentalizing among the tombs. We Negroes, Jews, Germans, Chinese, Anglo-Saxons are all part of America, for better or worse. We are citizens of a new age, bloodier yet more hopeful than all the ages of the past.

wilder than any mere continent crawled over by human beings. What he judges here as elsewhere is the principle of existence itself.

What Mr. Powys thinks of existence it would be impossible to repeat in temperate terms, for he deals in extremes—in the two extremes which exactly meet in any fine and experienced imagination. He is convinced that life is stale and brutish; yet he is continually finding it fresh, amusing, and lovely. He believes nothing and nobody—voluntary poverty, a tireless critical faculty, and the disease which furnished the subject of "Skin for Skin" have seen to that; yet he is continually giving himself to persons and things determined in their innocence to take him captive. He knows the world is bad, and he feels that it is good. In a word, he is one of those happy, unhappy men who have worked their feet down through the slush of opinion until they stand on fairly solid ground—in his own words, on "Eternal Matter, bereft of divine innuendoes but capable still of sustaining, after its sublime manner, the fearful and wavering soul of man." Hence these books of his, books in which everything touched—man, star, and beast—responds in its own clear voice.

MARK VAN DOREN

A Labyrinth of Trickery

International Anarchy, 1904-1914. By G. Lowes Dickinson. The Century Company. $4.

NOTHING is more depressing than diplomatic history. It is Africa, Harvard, or the bootleg cabarets.

A last thought. In this battle, as I have observed him, the black worker thinks, feels, and acts very much the same as the white, yellow, or red worker the world over. Only he uses the Southern dialect.

New York, June 27 MICHAEL GOLD

Real Indians in the Real North

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In "Mantrap," his new novel, Sinclair Lewis maligns our Canadian Indians. He represents them as burning and destroying the store and home of an independent fur-trader at Mantrap Landing, a Hudson Bay post in the hinterland of Saskatchewan. Every one knows that the Indians have been peaceful as a prairie sunset ever since 1885. The humane treatment has appealed to them, and in any case they are nature's gentlemen. The bad Indians are an invention of the fiction writer.

It might have been Lewis's to kill with one mighty blow all the romantic lies and misconceptions of an heroic North. There are heroes up there, but they are not smooth-faced boys rescuing mysterious girls from hard-bitten rogues and scoundrelly half-breeds. They are serious men—missionaries, traders, police who go about their business as a matter of course. Sinclair Lewis's portrait of Joe Easter, the one redeeming feature of the book, shows that he has felt this. But why did he vitiate the real merits of his story by half-baked romanticism re Indians and half-truths re the Mounted Police? He must have noted even during his short stay that the real police work in Saskatchewan is done, not by the Royal Mounted but by the provincial police, an efficient body of men if ever there was one. Yet the only policeman in "Mantrap" is romantically a scarlet rider. "Mantrap" is just another exploitation of Canada as background when Senegambia or the moon might have done just as well.

Regina, Saskatchewan, June 15 AUSTIN BOTHWELL

placed by modern labor organizations upon educating the children of workers in proletarian philosophy. Heretofore the goal of ambitious workers has been to educate their children for "something better," in the course of which the best young minds have mostly been lost to the proletarian cause.

* * * * *

THE Drifter has remarked with interest on the part taken by children in the strike of the textile workers in and near Passaic, New Jersey, where the younger generation has furnished the shock troops in various parades and demonstrations. To some it may seem that these children have been exploited by their elders—that they have been used as window-dressing and advertising matter when they should have been playing hop-scotch or marbles. It all depends, the Drifter thinks, on whether the hearts of the children have been in the strike, or whether the young folks have been used as unwilling or indifferent actors. Those who have seen these children testify to the genuineness of their interest, and the Drifter has lately read a composition on the strike, written by a girl ten years old, which points in the same direction. In her odd and alien English this little girl mingles snatches of the phraseology which she has heard at labor meetings with her own vivid and personal impressions. She writes:

> Our life are very miserable as I know. Our parents were compeled to work very hard, long hours, under fears and cruelty, for so little wages they were not able to make human living for us and themselves. Our parents were compeled to work very hard, not only in the mill but they was work exhaustly at home also. They awaken early morning to get ready on time to work, to prepare all neces-

Contributors to This Issue

HENDRIK W. VAN LOON has written and illustrated several books, the latest of which is "Tolerance."

GEORGE W. NORRIS, Republican United States Senator from Nebraska since 1913, was reelected in 1924 despite the fact that he did not leave Washington for his campaign, make a speech, or spend a cent.

MAX STERN is a staff correspondent for the Scripps-Howard Newspaper Alliance.

LEWIS S. GANNETT, associate editor of The Nation, recently spent six months in the Orient.

ELBRIDGE COLBY is a captain in the United States Army (Infantry), stationed at Fort Bennington, Georgia.

M. S. LEA was at one time assistant editor of the Guam News Letter.

JAKE FALSTAFF is on the staff of the Akron (Ohio) Beacon Journal.

J. SALWYN SCHAPIRO is professor of history at the College of the City of New York.

R. F. DIBBLE is the author of "Strenuous Americans" and "John L. Sullivan: An Intimate Narrative."

ERNEST GRUENING, former managing editor of The Nation and of La Prensa (New York), has spent much of the last three years in Mexico.

DAVID S. MUZZEY is professor of history at Barnard College.

HARTLEY ALEXANDER, author of "Manito Masks: Dramatizations with Music of American Indian Spirit Legends," is professor of philosophy at the University of Nebraska.

The P. O. Censor as Gropper sees him.

Note his shears behind his back. That means he decided that the

NEW MASSES

IS

MAILABLE

Our July issue has gone out to our subscribers, and future numbers of the NEW MASSES will go through the mails with no more than the usual scrutiny directed toward radical publications—and all other publications, for that matter. Subscriptions are now in order. They should be sent at once to make sure of all the summer issues. We don't mind changing addresses. Tell us where you have escaped for the hot weather, and where you will return in the fall. We will see that the NEW MASSES follows you without fail.

The important thing is to subscribe now.

NEW MASSES, INC.
39 West 8th St.,
New York, N. Y.

Enclosed is $2.00 (check....money order....cash....), for which send the NEW MASSES for one year.

Begin.....

Name.....

Address.....

WORKING CLASS BOOKS on ECONOMICS, HISTORY, SOCIAL SCIENCE and EVOLUTION.
Ask for our 1926 catalog, newly revised.
CHARLES H. KERR & CO., 347 East Ohio Street, Chicago

DOUBLY A PRIZE WINNER

PRECIOUS BANE

By MARY WEBB

"A novel in ten thousand."—KATHARINE LEE BATES

"Something rare and fine and beautiful."
LOUISE M. FIELD
in The Evening Post (Literary Review)

"Filled with moving tenderness, pathos and beauty."
JOHN W. CRAWFORD
in The New York Sun

E. P. DUTTON & CO., 681 Fifth Ave., New York $2.00

Books

Further Commandment

By LEONORA SPEYER

Thou shalt not choose affliction;
Saying: Of this I lack,
This worthy grief I still can bear
On my submissive back;
Or: This small visitation
Fits nicely in my pack.

Thou shalt not choose affliction,
But take the one that comes;
Greet it with sigh or psalmody,
With swords or funeral drums;
Or like Jack Horner in his corner,
Relish the bitter plums.

First Glance

ONE must say of Llewelyn Powys that he writes well—that, in fact, each new book from him, so short and yet so full, makes it more probable that his is permanent prose. One must also say, both in explanation of this fact and as evidence of its importance, that he seems to have invented the kind of book which he should write. Doubtless among all the books in the world there are several in the mode of those by Mr. Powys on Africa, England, Europe, and the United States; but I do not remember any now, and at any rate I am convinced that the effort he must have put forth in order to discover—perhaps create—his precise medium was the authentic effort of an original soul. Few modern works in any art have given me purer pleasure than that which I have got from Llewelyn Powys's "Ebony and Ivory," "Black Laughter," "Skin for Skin," and now "The Verdict of Bridlegoose" (Harcourt, Brace: $2.50).

This new volume is fed by memories of the five years which Mr. Powys spent in America. But nothing could be more stupid than the expectation or the hope—or the fear—that the author herein has passed judgment upon our land and us. To be sure, no less than always before he is as frank as an adder about his dislikes and as direct as a puppy in the expression of his likes—my images are inspired by a practice of Mr. Powys himself, who never loses an opportunity to compare a person with an animal, and who in these two hundred pages has invoked for the purpose "detestable malt-weevils," "frantic whistling mice," "an old salamander," "a green-hooded snake," "a barn-door owl," "a little red flea on a nipping frosty morning," "a red-legged Palestine jackal," "a wood-pigeon cooing over its two white eggs," and "a dry old stationary heron." He hits off many a knave and many a zany, and he rises to magnificent praise for a few magnificent specimens—Theodore Dreiser, John Cowper Powys, C. E. S. Wood—of a race which he confesses it is "extremely hard to think of as noble." And he delivers himself of generalizations concerning us which are interesting because acute. But it could never have been his intention to pronounce a "verdict" upon America. His hunting ground is wider and wilder than any mere continent crawled over by human beings. What he judges here as elsewhere is the principle of existence itself.

What Mr. Powys thinks of existence it would be impossible to report in temperate terms, for he deals in extremes—in the two extremes which exactly meet in any fine and experienced imagination. He is convinced that life is stale and brutish; yet he is continually finding it fresh, amusing, and lovely. He believes nothing and nobody—voluntary poverty, a tireless critical faculty, and the disease which furnished the subject of "Skin for Skin" have seen to that; yet he is continually giving himself to persons and things determined in their innocence to take him captive. He knows the world is bad, and he feels that it is good. In a word, he is one of those happy, unhappy men who have worked their feet down through the slush of opinion until they stand on fairly solid ground—in his own words, on "Eternal Matter, bereft of divine innuendoes but capable still of sustaining, after its sublime manner, the fearful and wavering soul of man." Hence these books of his, books in which everything touched—man, star, and beast—responds in its own clear voice.

MARK VAN DOREN

A Labyrinth of Trickery

International Anarchy, 1904-1914. By G. Lowes Dickinson. The Century Company. $4.

NOTHING is more depressing than diplomatic history. It is written either by bitter partisans who can interest only those that agree with them or by historians who record the facts of diplomacy as if they were always inevitable. An undertone of pessimism pervades the work of the latter. They assume that the moves of diplomats are always dictated by conflicting national interests the outcome of which, sooner or later, must be war.

Mr. Dickinson's book is a new kind of diplomatic history. The central theme is the calamitous outcome of a system of international relations called international anarchy—"the juxtaposition of a number of states, independent and armed." Unlike other histories of diplomacy this one is concerned chiefly with the fundamental aspects of international relations, not with the policies of this or that nation. No more impartial account has yet appeared of the diplomatic background of the World War. Not the slightest trace of partisanship, conscious or unconscious, to be found on any page. Mr. Dickinson unravels diplomatic mazes with the simplicity of one who has conquered his material, and the style is felicity itself. Like his master, Plato, Mr. Dickinson is artist as well as teacher; he, too, has the power of charming his readers into the paths of knowledge.

The first portion of the book is devoted to a general description of the European situation, especially to armaments, the balance of power, and the policies of the Great Powers. Diplomacy was the only means yet devised to prevent the "cosmos from plunging into chaos." And a most ineffective means it proved itself to be! Secret in its ways, dishonest in its methods, having no power behind it save that of the nation of the negotiator, it created an atmosphere of distrust and fear which was provocative of war. All the nations practiced the same methods, and the result was a labyrinth of trickery. The coolness with which a nation could double-cross, even triple-cross, an ally was due less to calculation than to fear. The fundamental principle of diplomacy was the balance of power which, however, was an invitation to war, not to peace.

The Triple Alliance of Germany, Austria, and Italy was a classic example of the old diplomacy. Its treaty contained secret clauses. Its object, acclaimed defensive, was aggressive: to aid Italian aggression in North Africa and Austrian aggression in the Balkans. Germany promptly sold out Austria by making a secret arrangement with the latter's enemy, Russia. Italy sold out Germany by making a deal with France. Austria remained loyal to her allies; she had no one to whom to sell them. One part of the Triple Entente was based on a definite treaty, the Dual Alliance between France and Russia; the other part on the Entente Cordiale between England and France. According to all accounts the Entente was not an alliance but a "gentlemen's agreement." Mr. Dickinson is skeptical, and well he may be. The idea of a "gentlemen's agreement" between nations is absurd for the reason that nations are not gentlemen. England and France did have a treaty to support each other in North Africa. England and Russia did have a treaty to support each other in the Middle East. England did have "military and naval commitments to France which were like a suction pipe to draw her, whether she would or no, into the war." If France went to war with Germany the status of Morocco might be seriously affected. If Russia went to war with Austria it would certainly involve France and Germany. How then was England "free" to act? The so-called Triple Entente was as much an alliance as the Triple Alliance. It was devised to lull the British public into the belief that their government had not committed the country to an alliance against Germany.

The second portion of the book describes the international crises that succeeded one another in rapid succession. As Europe was divided into two great coalitions no dispute could be "localized"; a quarrel between two Powers immediately drew in their allies. Like a Greek chorus Mr. Dickinson appears at each tragic scene—in the Balkans, in North Africa, in Asia Minor—to comment on the situation. Always his theme is the lack of a super-national machinery with power to compel the nations to arbitrate their difficulties.

The Powers were "ready" in 1914. Mr. Dickinson's treatment of the great crisis is a masterpiece of objective historical writing. He does not point to Germany as the guilty nation; neither does he apportion the guilt nicely among the belligerents. According to the author the war was not desired or willed by any of the belligerents; it was the outcome of the "anarchy of armed states pursuing by war the maintenance or the extension of power." They all strove for peace, but the strivings of diplomats for peace after they have brought about a situation that leads to war is all too familiar. Every nation acted as it did by force of circumstances.

England, even more than the other nations, urged a peaceful settlement. Did not Sir Edward Grey from first to last strive for peace? His efforts came to naught largely because of his ambiguous statements in regard to England's commitments to France. At no time did he declare bluntly that England would support France against Germany, as did Lloyd George in his famous Mansion House speech during the Agadir crisis. On the contrary he reiterated the statement that England's hands were "free," which convinced the Germans that she would remain neutral in case of a conflict. Poincaré, nothing if not downright, told the British that if they refused to intervene war would be inevitable. In regard to Belgium Grey was equally ambiguous. He said plainly enough that England would intervene if the neutrality of Belgium were violated, but when the German Ambassador asked him whether England would keep out of the conflict if Germany respected the neutrality of Belgium Grey declined to give him any assurance in the matter. There can be only one explanation of Grey's ambiguities and shiftings: he had to assure the British public that Britain was free to intervene or not to intervene, and at the same time he had to assure France of support against Germany. He was helped out of his difficulty by the colossal blunder of Germany in violating the neutrality of Belgium. And yet the legend of Grey persists. Even Mr. Dickinson accepts it, though he is careful to point out Sir Edward's shortcomings. What an advantage it is to be an English gentleman and a lover of nature!

"What little puppets knocking away with Lilliputian hammers the last stays that restrained the launch of the great deathship War!" exclaims Mr. Dickinson. The senile Francis Joseph and his reckless Berchtold, the imbecile Czar and his tricky Sazonov, the grotesque Kaiser and his stupid Bethmann, the envenomed Poincaré, the fumbling Grey! Where were the Napoleons, the Pitts, the Talleyrands, the Metternichs, those warmakers who could inspire a Hardy to write the "Dynasts"?

At the Peace Conference only one man, Wilson, repudiated in its entirety the system that resulted in the World War. He saw clearly that the evils of secret diplomacy and the balance of power could be abolished only by a League of Nations. And he clung to the League ardently and desperately. What solution does Mr. Dickinson propose? The only possible solution that has yet appeared, the League of Nations. "All the States," he declares, "must enter the League. The legal openings left for war must be closed, as was provided by the protocol. . . . There must be arrangements for an equitable distribution of important raw materials and the abandonment of protective policies. And above all, there must be general, all-round disarmament."

J. Salwyn Schapiro

'Sblood!

The Saga of Billy the Kid. By Walter Noble Burns. Doubleday, Page and Company. $2.50.

The Rise and Fall of Jesse James. By Robertus Love. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.75.

GONE forever are the incandescent days of the dear dead West. Where once the slinking coyote and the furtive rattlesnake were supreme in endless solitude the all-conquering Hereford now chews her placid cud; the great open spaces are chopped up into dull little ranches or city lots open principally to radios and Fords; the sweat-toughened pick of the Forty-niner has suffered a sea-change into towering oil-derricks; the crack of the six-shooter finds a ghostly echo in the thud of Spalding's spheres against bats or mitts; and the picturesque profanity of flaming frontiersmen has paled into the flatly verbose curses of the football coach. Briefly, a rip-roaring wilderness has become a tame, dirty back-lot, and what was once a dashing, devil-may-care hombre is now (save in the movies) only a mere man. But Romance, bless her heart, must not be allowed to die; and at this very moment scores, and possibly hundreds, of Underwoods and Remingtons are busily clicking down lurid tales about the embattled deeds of black-eyed, black-bearded, black-souled Bad Men, from Galveston to Seattle, who strive, invariably without success, to prevent heroic Him from rescuing virtuous Her. Of late a few writers have made more subtle attempts to revive the glittering past. They have sedulously ferreted out the cloudy, entangled episodes in the lives of epic demigods whose gallant accomplishments are today feebly plagiarized in a monotonous flood of horribly printed Western magazines; and so, almost simultaneously, appear two books that chant two glowing cantos in the Odyssey of the Frontier.

For surely Jesse James and Billy the Kid committed deeds that, strummed on Homer's lyre, might easily have matched the stormy wanderings of Odysseus. One cannot help wondering, indeed, whether the crafty Greek rogue might not have extricated himself and his band with far greater expedition from some tight places had Billy or Jesse been there. What chance would one-eyed Polyphemus or a whole crew of nasty suitors have had against a Kid who killed a jackrabbit or a man with equal nonchalance—it was all in the day's play—and who, trapped in a blazing building, surrounded by half a town posse holding cocked rifles aimed at every avenue of escape, rolled a cigarette and, wanting a match, waited till a huge piece of blazing roof fell within a foot of his head, bent and lighted his cigarette with the comment, "Much obliged," then dashed outside with a forty-four in each hand and, leaving one dead and another sorely wounded enemy behind him, escaped without a scratch? Could Odysseus have thought up a better retort than Jesse may have been the author of, in rebuking a Protestant bishop who objected to losing his watch? "We don't really like to compel a parson to do our bidding, but we are poor men for the time being, sir, and the world owes us a living. As to your watch, you really don't need it; your Master the Nazarene never owned one. And as the good Book commands you, when traveling, to take along neither purse nor scrip, we propose to put you in good standing with the Lord. Therefore, parson, shell out!" And might not Odysseus have learned Christian gallantry from these two modern desperadoes who never deigned to dally with pliant Circes on desert isles? For history solemnly assures us that Jesse and Billy each loved but one woman: Jesse was a happy husband and father when Bob Ford's treacherous shot whizzed rearwards through his skull, and Billy's boyish heart—he was only twenty-one—was pierced by Sheriff Pat Garrett's bullet before he had virtuously led his solitary inamorata to the altar. In other ways, too, they belied the hallowed traditions that have been woven about the generality of bold, brave, bad men. Neither was particularly large nor good-looking; both had hair blond enough to satisfy the most egregious Nordic; Billy was left-handed, and Jesse—in a whisper be it spoken—was bow-legged, had granular eyelids, and was a Baptist fundamentalist long before the term was invented.

Both of the present books are competent performances, but the "Saga" surpasses the "Rise and Fall" as much in its style as in its title. Mr. Burns wisely neglects to give definite data for a history that, by its very nature, cannot be positively authenticated; and if he occasionally verges on melodramatic tears (his hero's grave, we are informed, is perfectly bare today save for "a gnarled, bristly, heat-cursed cactus crawling like a snake across the heart of Billy the Kid"), his work nevertheless constantly impresses one with its relative aloofness and its lucid sincerity. Mr. Love, on the contrary, habitually tries to differentiate between fact and fiction, with the result that the reader generally accepts the fiction and doubts the fact; his dreadfully jocular journalese ("But, perhaps you are asking, what about Jim Cummins, recently introduced and suddenly sidetracked? Impatient friend, Jim Cummins will keep until the more serious business of this bloody but not thundery opus is transacted") has about as much detachment as a calliope, and Jesse thus remains a palely ineffectual hero not much superior to his brother Frank or any of the Younger brood, whereas the dry bones of Billy the Kid are fleshed with life. Both works suffer from too much padding: whenever the sisters, cousins, aunts, uncles, or casual companions of either scapegoat are mentioned a wealth of tiresome biographical detail ensues. But why cavil? Here are two books packed with a greater quantity of romantic dynamite than a ton of average detective tales.

R. F. DIBBLE

A Century of Misunderstanding

The United States and Mexico, 1821-1924. By J. Fred Rippy. Alfred A. Knopf. $5.

THE periodic crises in the relations of the United States and Mexico invariably disclose an almost total ignorance on the part of our people and press of the immediate causes of the difficulty. A wretchedly inadequate and inaccurate news service to the American press from the Mexican scene and the governmental habit of diplomatic secrecy are responsible for this general lack of information. Nevertheless, a more or less definite public opinion in regard to Mexico has always existed in the United States. During the past century this has [illegible] hostile, aggressive, interventionist, and mildly tolerant. At present it has crystallized into a friendlier and more sympathetic attitude than ever before. If this national state of mind, so highly desirable for both countries, is to be maintained, facts which are facts, unbiased information, and intelligent interpretation are increasingly necessary.

Professor Rippy's conscientious and detached review of neighborly differences provides an admirable foundation. Packed into its well-documented pages is an accurate and readable account of a century of misunderstanding. It is depressing to note how constantly recurs the same motif, how virtually identical are the utterances of statesmen and politicians on both sides of the border in every crisis, how automatically the newspaper comments repeat themselves, and how unvarying are the ambitions and intrigues of those financially affected. The French aphorism, "Plus ça change plus c'est la même chose," tellingly describes this international relationship. On neither side does much, if anything, appear to have been learned. And yet the United States stands today in a new and unprecedented world position, while in Mexico a fundamental transformation is in process. Professor Rippy leads us to the threshold of these changes, for the scope of the book, while including the diplomatic correspondence until 1924, does not permit an analysis of the social reforms which have been brewing south of the Rio Grande for a decade and a half. His excellent survey should be read above all by newspaper editors and by those who desire to make an intelligent approach to what in this country is denominated "the Mexican problem" and by our neighbors is felt to be "the Yankee peril."

ERNEST GRUENING

Bryan by His Wife

The Memoirs of William Jennings Bryan. By Himself and his Wife, Mary Baird Bryan. Philadelphia: The John C. Winston Company. $3.75.

ON the sixty-sixth anniversary of Bryan's birth the House of Representatives devoted two hours to speeches eulogizing the Commoner. Mr. Tilson of Connecticut struck the true note when he characterized Bryan as "a genuine crusader." The volume before us fully bears out Mr. Tilson's contention. It is a tribute by a devoted wife to Mr. Bryan as a good husband and a Christian gentleman. It is rather a glorified scrap-book than a serious biography. Chapters on the children, on friendships, on Mr. Bryan as a college student, an orator, a traveler, a story-teller, a total abstainer follow one another without any apparent plan. Perhaps a hundred pages in the book are concerned with matters of significance to the historian, or indeed to the public in general. Although the first 200 pages are written in the first person, as the bona fide "Memoirs," one cannot be sure that even for them Mrs. Bryan is not more responsible than her husband. She confesses to having "polished" them, whatever that may mean. Mr. Bryan was never a careful and methodical writer. From his first battle to his last plea against evolution, his pen was only the servant of his mouth. He relied upon "presence" and the spell of oratory to win his point rather than upon the calm persuasion of reason. At any rate Mr. Bryan's part of the book brings us only to the convention of 1912 (with many hiatuses), and we have to depend wholly on his wife for the interpretation of Mr. Bryan's policies as Secretary of State and his part in the conventions of 1916, 1920, and 1924. The only chapter in the first part of the book that throws any new light on Bryan's career is the long apology for his conduct in the Baltimore Convention of 1912. It is hardly of a nature, however, to convert many of the followers of Champ Clark.

Mrs. Bryan assumes direct responsibility for Part II. She is certainly better qualified than many wives would be to write the memoirs of her distinguished husband, because she always took an active interest in his problems and shared his labors and confidence to a remarkable degree. She attempts a more consecutive narrative than Part I furnishes, relying on her diary and on memorandums and letters left by Mr. Bryan. But Mrs. Bryan's work is so obviously and naively a "tribute" to her husband that it has little value as an objective study. There is something pathetic, in view of the revelations cast by the House Papers on the cavalier fashion in which Mr. Bryan was ignored as Secretary of State, in Mrs. Bryan's naive rejoicing that "many are thankful that the peace-loving Mr. Bryan is at the helm"! And there is something misleading, at times, in her justification of Mr. Bryan's actions. For example, she says that after the sinking of the Lusitania "Mr. Bryan took the position that, in order to maintain strict neutrality, we must send a note to England protesting against her interference with our shipping, as well as one to Germany for destroying the Lusitania." As if we had not been sending such notes to England for some months. Again, in defending the resignation of Mr. Bryan in June, 1915, she cites the famous House memorandum discussed with Grey in February, 1916, as a contributing cause, remarking: "Obviously, these conditions made the position of the Secretary of State extraordinarily difficult." She also maintains that the second Lusitania note was "very much softened" in the final draft, "just before Mr. Bryan's resignation took effect," but that "he had no knowledge of this change at the time his resignation was tendered and accepted." This conflicts with the testimony from several sources that Mr. Bryan was present (in spite of the proffer of his resignation) at the cabinet meeting in which the final text of the note was agreed upon. But these matters of state, after all, occupy only an incidental place in Mrs. Bryan's personal narrative.

DAVID S. MUZZEY

Mayas, Greeks, and Cambodians

Maya Architecture. By George Oakley Totten. Washington, D. C.: The Maya Press. $25.

The City of the Sacred Well. By T. A. Willard. The Century Company. $4.

Mystery Cities. By Thomas Gann. Charles Scribner's Sons. $5.

Elephants and Ethnologists. By G. Elliot Smith. E. P. Dutton and Company. $6.

"THE Greeks of the New World" is a phrase which I seem to recall having myself in a moment of incaution applied to the Mayas of Central America and Yucatan. But when I encounter it in others, employed with a high seriousness which I trust can never have been mine, it gives me certain pause. The Maya civilization was the most outstanding in pre-Columbian America; it did resemble the Greek in the multitude of its notable cities and in their inability to form a stable nation; and like the Hellenic culture the Mayan has left a notable array of architectural ruins, profoundly impressive, and of artistic fragments in sculpture, pottery, painting, gems, and gold-work. The Mayas also present an analogy to the Greeks in the more abstruse field of science, for none can deny that their numeral-calendric system is one of the remarkable intellectual achievements, and there have even survived three of their hieratic books (out of the many thousands of volumes burned by zealous devotees of the God of the Spaniards) which compare favorably as works of art with the best out of Egypt, and which represent, we have reason to believe, a liturgical, historical, and scientific literature of no less value. In the prime fields of human achievement the Mayas mark a true civilization and a great moment of time.

But Greeks—that is another matter; for the best in the Maya is as inferior to the Hellenic as the level of the New World as a whole was to the Old World of Columbus's day or perchance as it is in our own. Were we to compare the Mayas only with the ancient Orientals, and indeed all that went before the Greek miracle befell, then the Americans would certainly suffer little, and might carry the palm, but Mr. Totten and the Maya Society and the other enthusiasts (including myself) should habitually utter a little prayer for the preservation of the white light of sanity before we launch unrestrainedly into the movement for a Maya Renascence.

Hence it is that we (and, perhaps, Mr. Morley and Mr. Spinden and Mr. Joyce) should take blithely to the Cambodians. Elliot Smith is really thinking of Cambodian ambassadors (such as I recall years ago when "Wang" was sung), ambassadors of culture, in pirogues and outrigger craft, bee-lining it across the Pacific to teach the native savages to carve makaras and elephants on their shrines (makaras being more or less lizards and more or less elephants); and to make the lesson vivid he shows analogies that take us progressively back to the pyramids and stepped temples of Babel, and permit us to be comfortably (albeit adventurously) monogenetic in our myth of the origin of human ideas about how to do and to decorate. There are puzzles which the Cambodian embassy theory—even if the ambassadors traveled by relays, a century or so to the lap—ravels out. But, per contra, we mustn't forget our Greeks and the landbridge via Atlantis; for from what other source, I should like to know, did the pre-Columbians get the Phrygian cap and the caduceus of Mercury and the thunderbolt of Jupiter? As for the Roman cross, a dragon-fly, a tree, a man are all safe sources.

It is rather fun to see the Mayas breaking through the staid reports out into press-agented books. In the pile before me Mr. Totten's is a really notable collection of plates—the finest that have appeared since Maudsley and the Peabody Memoirs (to both of which he is indebted). Whether its effect will be, as he hopes, a new blossoming of Maya architecture, this time north of Mexico, is a matter for betting, and the odds need not be great, for the possibilities are genuine. Certainly, the artists and architects should add the volume to their libraries and the images to their imaginations. They should be cautioned that the text is unscholarly and sadly in need of an editor, but it is the plates, not the text, that make the book, and the bibliography is full. As for the eight color plates—well, there is a difference between barbaric color, which is often beautiful, and color-blindness, and I do not believe that the Maya were so hopelessly inferior, say to the Apache, in this sense. The eight plates may be excised with no loss.

Of the others Mr. Willard's book tells the story of Thompson's years of work at Chichen Itza and Mr. Gann's tells principally of excavations at Xunantunich and Lubaantun carried on by himself. Interesting plates and a great deal of personal narrative, sentiment that not infrequently topples over into the purples, archaeological enthusiasm, snakes, scorpions, and jaguars—all these sugar the science or spice it. They are books that belong to a distinct genre highly developed of late years—in the same character as the news service that introduces the screen show, but just as much better as a literate drama is superior to a film-play.

Elliot Smith's two-year-old book I have introduced because he is carrying the war into the enemy's camp, and that is always good sport; there has been too much tame concurrence. Besides we are looking for a new book from his pen. For the reader subject to sudden captivations I should recommend a suspense of judgment, at least until we have the remaining parts of Jacques de Morgan's posthumous "Histoire de l'Orient," of which the first volume appeared last fall.

HARTLEY ALEXANDER

Americana in Brief

Some American Ladies: Social Informal Biographies. By Meade Minnigerode. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $3.50.

In May, 1925, the good citizens of Nashville, Tennessee, held an indignation meeting at which Mr. Minnigerode was publicly branded as a "coward, liar, cur, and recreant" on account of a recent magazine article on Rachel Jackson. This particular essay, together with five other sketches of Presidents' wives or near-wives, now appears in book form. It is evident that the wrathful Nashvillites might, after all, have made out a very substantial case against the author. They might have pointed out the abundance of stale tricks that have become commonplaces of the "new" biography: the labored attempt to appear "informal," the boredom of stereotyped sprightliness of treatment, the strained and hectic narrative tone, the excessive number of paragraphs beginning with "And," and ending thus. . . . Mr. Minnigerode might—and sometimes does—write naturally and forcefully, but he seems destined eventually to be classed as a third-rate Guedalla; and one closes the pages of his handsome volume longing to feast again upon the rounded serenity of Plutarch or the long, rolling thunder of Gibbon.

Caleb Heathcote, Gentleman Colonist. By Dixon Ryan Fox. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.

The prevalent interest in antique American furniture seems destined to extend to antique Americans. First came gorgeous Lord Timothy Dexter, and now comes sober Caleb Heathcote—English emigrant, trader, wealthy resident of Scarsdale, Mayor of New York (when its population numbered about 6,000), and staunch Anglican. His various activities are meticulously detailed in a rather pompous and solemn-faced manner that does not belie the frontispiece of the hero; furthermore, one-sixth of the book properly consists of notes. It is a valuable document for students of early colonial history, and the members of the Town Club of Scarsdale, to whom it is dedicated, ought to be proud of it.

Winthrop Papers. Volume I, 1498-1628. Boston: The Massachusetts Historical Society.

Of the Winthrop manuscripts, "the largest of known private collections on the early colonial history of English America," selections only have thus far been available in print, chiefly in Robert C. Winthrop's "Life and Letters of John Winthrop" and in the publications of the Massachusetts Historical Society, now the custodian of the collection. The definitive and complete edition, of which the first volume has just appeared, promises to be one of the most notable of the long list of documentary publications for which the society is to be thanked. The contents of the present volume have to do with the early history of the Winthrop family in England, and presumably contain about all of the papers prior to the launching of the Massachusetts enterprise. In addition to a mass of data illustrative of social conditions in England in the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries, students of the Puritan character will find some interesting revelations of John Winthrop's religious and moral views in the records of the minute self-examinations to which he subjected himself. The editing, for which Mr. Frederic Winthrop appears to be responsible, is masterly, and the format the handsome one which the society has for some time been giving to its publications.

Origins of the Whig Party. By E. Malcolm Carroll. Durham, N. C.: Duke University Press. $2.50.

Professor Carroll has made a notable contribution to the history of American politics from the time of John Quincy Adams to 1840, the period in which old party lines disappeared and new parties gradually emerged. What is principally stressed in the narrative are the unsuccessful maneuvers of all unsuccessful, of Adams, Clay, Webster, and their friends to organize a presidential campaign which should give them control of the government. It is at least a chastening reflection to observe that victory, when it came, was attained by the sacrifice of political consistency to appeals to popular emotion, the Whigs in this respect taking a leaf from the book of Democratic experience under Jackson. Only the national aspects of the story, however, are emphasized, the growth of Whig organization in the States being but lightly touched, and the fortunes of the party in the South, already treated with some fulness by A. C. Cole, are summarized rather than elaborated.

The Formative Period of the Federal Reserve System. By W. P. G. Harding. Houghton Mifflin Company. $4.50.

The exigencies of the war combined with some obvious needs to give the Federal Reserve Board practically all of the important powers which a central bank would have exercised directly and in plain view. The present volume by the "War Governor" of the board may be taken as the official apologia for its course in the war and as a good account of how in modern times war and financial activities are tied together.

Die Kunst der Massenbeeinflussung in den Vereinigten Staaten von Amerika. Von Friedrich Schoenemann. Deutsche Verlags-Anstalt.

The purpose of the author, who during the war was a teacher of German at Harvard and who at present lectures on American civilization at the University of Münster, is to explain to Germans the nature of American war propaganda, not only in order to show what actually happened but also—curiously enough—to teach Germans a lesson in undaunted patriotism and unity of action. The presentation is made with skill and accuracy, although the German point of view naturally prevails. Of the pillars of American propaganda the following are discussed in detail: the schools, the church, women, the press, the moving picture, polite society, and social and political organizations. The book is important chiefly because it gives a clear, authentic conception of the basis upon which German post-war opinion of America must rest.

THEATRE

THE GRAND STREET FOLLIES
4th Annual Revue of NEIGHBORHOOD
Playhouse, 466 Grand St. Drydock 7516. Evgs. (Except Mon.) at 8:30. Matinees Friday, July 9, and Saturday, July 17.

THE THEATRE GUILD Presents
AT MRS. BEAM'S
A Comedy by C. K. MUNRO
with ESTELLE WINWOOD, JEAN CADELL, EARL LARIMORE, HELEN WESTLEY, HENRY TRAVERS AND OTHERS.
GUILD THEATRE, 52nd St., West of B'way. Evs. 8:30. Matinees THURS. and SAT., 2:30.

DEBATE

SESQUICENTENNIAL DEBATE
George Hiram Mann, Nat'l Security League
Jay Lovestone, Workers Party
RESOLVED: That the present form of government is not in the interest of the American Masses.
CENTRAL OPERA HOUSE, 67th St. & 3rd Ave., N. Y. C.
Friday, July 16, 9 P. M. Admission 35c.
Auspices of the Workers School

International Relations Section

What Is the British Empire?

THE South African Premier, General J. B. Hertzog, speaking at Stellenbosch University on May 15 on The Relationship of South Africa to the Empire, made something like a declaration of independence. His speech is of peculiar importance to Americans because of our proximity to Canada and of the "Six-to-One" debate on the representation of the British Empire in the League of Nations. General Hertzog referred to a speech made last November by his predecessor, in which General Smuts said that the future existence of the British Empire could be assured only by maintaining imperial unity in foreign relations. General Hertzog then said, according to the Cape Times (Cape Town) for May 17:

The full significance of this principle, with all that it implies, will, I think, be better understood by looking back over the struggle for international freedom by the self-governing Dominions of Great Britain, more particularly the Union of South Africa.

With the grant of self-government, from time to time to one or other of the Dominions, the question has repeatedly arisen as to its scope, i. e., as to what is implied under self-government. It is obvious that the Dominion concerned, continually striving for freedom and the satisfaction of its national aspirations, had to put the widest and, for itself, the most favorable construction on its powers and authority.

In almost every case, therefore, the grant of self-government has been regarded by influential leaders of public opinion in the Dominions as an emancipation from hitherto existing bonds of subordination to the United Kingdom, coupled with a definite grant to that Dominion of autonomous power and authority, also in regard to the outside world and its relations with foreign Powers.

A Common Sovereign

According to this opinion each Dominion is, by virtue of its self-governing constitution, created a free, independent state, with the right to international recognition by foreign Powers; but with a common connecting link between itself and Great Britain, centered in the King. This mutual connecting link should, therefore, be regarded as no more than an actual—de facto—personal bond, without any legal or constitutional subservience to any authority other than that of the sovereign will of the people of the Dominion concerned. According to that opinion, therefore, each Dominion, by virtue of the self-government granted it, would be on the same footing with Great Britain, as a sovereign, free, international state; and, apart from the personal bond of their common sovereign, there would be no bonds between them other than those which may from time to time be agreed upon. Therefore, all unity among the Dominions themselves and between the Dominions and Great Britain must originate in agreement and cooperation.

This doctrine, to which I have subscribed ever since the establishment of the union, has not been without its opponents either here or elsewhere in the Dominions. . . .

Before Versailles

So far as I am aware, the principle of independence of the Dominions, binding themselves to Great Britain by means of the personal bond of the King, was never accepted by any of the Dominion governments as such before 1919. Whatever may have been the opinion of individual ministers, in this or that Dominion, governments, like that of the union, carefully avoided advocating it, and never endeavored to put it to practical test; excepting in a few instances where, under force of circumstances, they were compelled to move in that direction and act in accordance therewith.

They were constantly possessed by the fear, to which I have just drawn attention, of the disruption of the Empire, and they knew of no means of avoiding this danger other than by the acceptance and even the defense (as was the case with the Government here) of a status of subordination to and dependence on the United Kingdom. Not everywhere did this fear lead to the acceptance of the doctrine of subordination to such an extravagant degree as with us. But fundamentally the attitude taken up by the various Dominion governments has been the same, viz., rejection of individual state independence.

One of the consequences of this has been that nowhere has any attempt been made by any of the Dominions to obtain formal recognition of its international status by foreign Powers.

Britain's Attitude

That no encouragement has been given thereto by Great Britain is a matter of course. What is more natural than that she should likewise harbor the fear which the Dominions and Dominion statesmen so obviously allowed themselves to be influenced by? . . .

In all fairness we should admit that, considering the opinion of the majority in the Dominions themselves, the British Government in general took up a correct attitude toward the Dominions and acted patriotically toward Great Britain. Where justice has not been done in this respect to the Dominions, the responsibility rests with the Dominions themselves and with their responsible leaders, who, sometimes, as here in South Africa, took it upon themselves to declare that we were not entitled to a measure of freedom expressly assigned to us by eminent British statesmen.

The result was that until the conclusion of the Versailles Treaty in 1919 it was in practice as well as in theory the general opinion in government circles that the Dominions, notwithstanding the possession of self-government, were, nevertheless, subordinate to Great Britain and had no rights in regard to matters of foreign policy.

It speaks for itself that there was no lack of experts and others to show that on legal and theoretical grounds this was exactly as it should be; that self-government to the Dominions did not in any way create these Dominions independent states, and that they could, therefore, have no right to an international status.

Meanwhile this subordination of the Dominions to Great Britain drew more and more attention, and disclosed to an ever-increasing extent the dissatisfaction of the people of the various Dominions. When thus at the outbreak of the great World War the Dominions suddenly appeared on the battlefields as belligerents, fully armed, the international significance thereof could not be concealed either from the Dominions themselves or from the outside world, and as the full significance thereof increased it necessarily led to an awakening of the people, and no less of responsible statesmen, to a measure of international self-consciousness, such as never had been the case before.

That it was therefore no longer possible to continue to accept the doctrine of Dominion subordination to Great Britain was generally felt and accepted when the time arrived for the conclusion of peace. The Dominions, by what they had achieved during the war, had not only become fully conscious of their international status but they had also been put on their guard, by their bitter experience and sacrifices, against being compelled to repeat these sacrifices, in the matter of a dispute to which they had been no party, and between Powers with whom they, as presumed subordinates of Great Britain, had no voice and enjoyed no right of expressing their views.

When, therefore, the war was at an end and peace had to be concluded the Dominions had to decide whether, dominated by the fear of disruption of the Empire in case they accepted the status of sovereign states, they should continue to adhere to the position of subordination or whether they should accept the independent status of international states. Urged on by the additional fear which they had felt during the course of the war, namely, that their position of subordination might again plunge them into a war in the prevention of which they had no say, and spurred on by their awakening to national self-consciousness, the Dominions could no longer be satisfied with their former status, as hitherto exercised.

To satisfy this new insistence on more right of action in matters of foreign policy, they had necessarily to take up their stand on the basis of international freedom and independence. This was, in fact, done by the statesmen who represented them at the Peace Conference.

The course adopted by these statesmen is peculiar and deserves our attention.

1919 and After

This brings us to the second period—the conclusion of peace in 1919 and thereafter.

It is clear to me that the unambiguous and sound course which our statesmen should have followed there should have been that of the recognition of the personal bond of a common King with Great Britain, without any other legal ties, but strengthened by such further ties as historical contact, common interests, and mutual agreements as the will of the people of each separate Dominion might have been prepared to approve of. The leaders of the Dominions at the Peace Conference were, however, not able to carry their convictions as far as that. The furthest they would go was to effect a compromise between the viewpoint of Dominion independence and that of Dominion subordination.

To obtain this, the idea of the unity of the Empire group was created, according to which the Dominions, in foreign affairs, would be on the same footing as Great Britain; while at the same time no one, not even Great Britain, should have the right to act as a separate state entity in international affairs. In order to arrive at any decision in international matters, or to take any action, it would be necessary that the group should discuss the matter as a single unit, and as such arrive at a decision. A doctrine was, therefore, created according to which each of the Dominions, as well as Great Britain, would be individually subordinate to the group as a fictitious state Super-Power or supreme state authority.

The question might be asked whether, according to that doctrine, the decision of the majority of the group was to be binding on the minority. There is no reference made to this anywhere. It seems to have been simply assumed that there would and could be no minority. The argument appears to have been: the group must decide as one unit: therefore, the group will be unanimous.

Group Unity

On this basis the Dominion statesmen, after consultation with those of Great Britain, arrived at an agreement during the Peace Conference, and accepted the doctrine of a "free and equal status"; and when the peace treaty itself had to be signed, an endeavor was made to give expression thereto, in different ways, one of which at once strikes the attention. This was the manner in which the treaty was signed by the Dominions.

The idea of the unity of the group with subordination of the Dominions to the group had, of course, to replace the old theory of unity by subordination to Great Britain, which had to be sacrificed as obsolete; and, as in the case of the rejected theory, the impelling motive for the adoption of this idea was—the fear of disintegration, accompanied by the all-too-anxious desire to find a preventive in what must necessarily, if adhered to, result in nothing less than a quasi-federal Empire, with the highest authority vested in the Imperial Conference; where in case of difference Great Britain would of necessity, by virtue of her powerful world influence and world interests, be the decisive voice; while in international affairs she would be considered as the only internationally recognized state of the group.

Let us now consider whether in practice the idea of the unity of the group has answered its original purpose, or whether matters followed a different course, as just indicated.

The main objects it was intended to achieve were originally two:

1. The recognition of the Dominions as independent international states.

2. The assurance of the continued existence of the Empire by united action in foreign policy.

What has become of these objects? I think I am not saying too much if I maintain that so far nothing more has been attained along the fresh path than a further obscuring of the status of the Dominions and an endangering of any desirable cooperation between the Dominions and Great Britain.

In order to give you an opportunity of judging how far I am right, I may cite in the first place the following:

First, concerning our status. We are informed in the press that in the Portuguese Senate a question was asked on the 4th instant concerning our international status, as the result of a statement on the subject which I had recently made in Parliament. After a certain Senator had expressed the opinion that "the union could not be considered an independent country," the Minister for the Colonies stated that South Africa is "a colony with large autonomy but dependent on British sovereignty." . . . In other words, notwithstanding our free and equal status with Great Britain, we remain in the eyes of the outside world subject to British sovereignty, i. e., a subordinate of Great Britain. . . .

In the second place, I wish to examine with you the question, in how far the group-unity idea proves to be conducive to the continued existence of the Empire, and therefore to what extent it answers its purpose as a remedy against disruption. Let me first of all refer to a contribution to the March number of the Round Table by a prominent Canadian politician, by whom in all seriousness the following question is put:

> Is there a place in the British Commonwealth of Nations for Canada, if she becomes a sovereign state precisely as Great Britain is a sovereign state?

To which question the writer answers as follows:

> This is the question to which Canadian nationalists want an answer. Obviously if there is room in the British Commonwealth of Nations for Great Britain as an independent nation, but no room for any other independent nation, Canada and the other Dominions are not nations, are not equal to Great Britain, but are in fact glorified colonies pretending in the face of the world to be something which they are not.

I feel convinced that when a public man of authority in a country such as Canada feels and speaks like this, all that can be said is that the principle upon which we have been engaged in building up the Empire since 1919 is more calculated to bring about its fall than to serve as a foundation for its future existence.

Reality a Necessity

It is clear that a Dominion such as Canada wishes to see in its equal status real international independence, and that if it is prevented under the regime of the existing group-unity idea from obtaining that independence it will be compelled to obtain it along a different way. The national aspirations of the peoples of the young Dominions are too forceful to be satisfied with mere appearance, where the reality has become a necessity.

But apart from the question in how far the theory of the unity of the group satisfies the national demands of the Dominions, I wish to answer the question briefly as to what extent that theory has proved to be feasible in practice.

The main idea of that theory is the united action of the group—i. e., of all the Dominions together with Great Britain—in treating with foreign Powers. No conference with a foreign Power, in which the group may be interested, may therefore take place unless all the members of the group, at least if they so desire, are represented thereon.

But it has happened more than once that the most important international conferences have been held without proper representation thereat being granted to the Dominions.

I do not wish here to examine the reasons for this. My intention is only to state that in actual practice the two main objects of the idea of the unity of the group have proved to be failures.

Britain Recognizes Independence

The most convincing proof thereof we find in the Treaty of Locarno, which was recently concluded. This treaty has been entered into by the British Government in such direct conflict with the principles on which the group-unity idea is based that it has been found necessary to exempt the Dominions from any responsibility resulting therefrom and also to give each of the Dominions separately the option of ratifying the treaty or not. . . . The British Government, by acting as it has done, not only has for good rejected the idea of group unity as being impracticable but has also, by leaving it optional to each separate Dominion to be a party to the treaty or not, recognized that the Dominions cannot be prevented from acting in international matters as independent states.

Thereby it has finally broken with the idea of the unity of the group and group sovereignty, and we have fortunately returned to the recognition of the Dominions as international states. . . .

"Independent International States"

The fear that scared us from following this road of independence has been an idle fear. But not only idle. Dominated by that fear, we have taken recourse to a preventive against mutual conflict which today proves to be a Nessus shirt and which will tend more to wreck than to save the Empire.

If we are called upon, in our own interest, to preserve the good and intimate friendly cooperation between the Dominions and Great Britain, we are equally bound to maintain our international independence. There is, however, no reason whatever why the possession and maintenance of the one should occasion less guaranty for the safe preservation of the other. I maintain that just the reverse is the case. According as the Dominions realize to a greater extent their international obligations, responsibilities, and dangers, the feeling of the necessity for closer and more cordial cooperation between the Dominions and Great Britain will grow and convert itself into practice.

I have therefore no doubt that, if we have to return to a sound basis, we can accomplish this only by accepting the doctrine of Dominion independence, based on our rights under the constitution and recognized at Versailles by the foreign Powers of the world; and by developing on that basis any further relations between Great Britain and the Dominions, so as to give every guaranty that can be expected for permanent cooperation.

In order to act for the future in conformity with this point of view and with full international effect, something more will be required from Great Britain and the Dominions than a mere declaration of constitutional rights among themselves. That declaration will have to be formally communicated by them to the outside world.

Should any of the Dominions not be prepared to give adherence to the principle of Dominion independence, they will, of course, be free to remain constitutionally where they are or where they desire to be. But their fearfulness should not be an obstacle to those Dominions to which international independence has become an unavoidable national necessity.

STUDENT WORKER CONTEST

First prize $100 Second prize $50 Third prize $25

For particulars address

The Nation 20 Vesey Street New York, N. Y.

RECOMMENDED FOR SUMMER READING

William C. Bullitt — Fourth large printing

IT'S NOT DONE

This novel is a "best-seller." "Whoever reads it puts his teeth into thick slices of life."—N. Y. World. $2.00

Sinclair Lewis — By the author of "Main Street," "Arrowsmith," etc.

MANTRAP

Babbitt goes off on a vacation to the north woods. "Better than the best of the thrillers."—Chicago Tribune. $2.00

Paul de Kruif

MICROBE HUNTERS

"It tells a story of thrilling and universal interest. Read the book!"—Atlantic Monthly. Illustrated, $3.50

Carl Sandburg

ABRAHAM LINCOLN

"Good for a lifetime."—Saturday Review. "Will become a permanent part of American literature."—N. Y. Times. 2 vols. $10.00

Harcourt, Brace and Company

383 Madison Avenue New York

THE ROGUES' BOOKSHELF

Edited by Ernest Brennecke, Jr.

The world's picaresque classics are here made available for the first time in a uniform format, in modernized English, unexpurgated, and at a popular price. Each volume is printed in large type, on good paper, and is sturdily and attractively bound.

NEW TITLES

THE ROAD	Jack London, Intro. by Glen Mullin	$2.00
BARRY LYNDON	Wm. M. Thackeray, Intro by Joseph Wood Krutch	2.00
MOLL FLANDERS	Daniel Defoe, Intro. by G. H. Maynadier	2.50
HAJJI BABA	James Morier, Intro. by Samuel C. Chew	3.50
THE ROGUE	Wilkie Collins, Intro. by Frank W. Chandler	2.00

PRESS COMMENTS

The Nation: Both the editors and the titles as announced are a guarantee that the library will be varied in what it offers and expertly selected as it appears . . . This is a superb beginning.

The Brooklyn Eagle: The Rogues' Bookshelf restores color to a drab year's booklist. They don't come any better than these perfect examples of fantasy. Read them, unless you want to cheat yourself . . . of as much as a literary enjoyment as can be smuggled.

The New York Herald: This is one of the most appetizing (both in format and contents) of series associated with this type of letters. . . . A collection of masterpieces that time has approved.

The New York Sun: Rarely does a series of reprints begin so amazingly well . . . And speaking of the Introductions, they are uniformly excellent.

SEND FOR PROSPECTUS

GREENBERG, Publisher, 112 E. 19th St., New York

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXIII NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JULY 21, 1926 No. 3185

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS
EDITORIALS:
Why Not a Peace Department?
What the Senate Will Do
An Invitation to Revolution
CARTOON. By Hendrik van Loon
HENRY FORD'S UTOPIA. By Samuel Crowther
EVADING THE WASHINGTON TREATY. By Louis Fischer
GIVE GERMANY HER COLONIES. By Norman Angell
TWO UNPUBLISHED TALES. By Hugo Ganzenmüller
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter....
CORRESPONDENCE
BOOKS:
First Glance. By Mary Ann Jones
An Early Master. By Talbot Faulkner Hamlin...
Asia. By Robert W. Rauch
India's Struggle. By W. Norman Brown
G. Stanley Hall. By C. Harvey Gardiner
Family History. By William MacDonald
Drama: Four Notes. By Joseph Wood Krutch
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Hauptmann Deciphers an Hour
Peasant Revolts Threaten
Pilsudski's Warning

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor FREDA KIRCHWEY Literary Editor MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS drew into the summer with an illuminating credit and debit balance. It successfully withstood the ultimatums of the lesser Powers which demanded permanent seats on its Council; and although Brazil and Spain more or less withdrew from the League in consequence its prestige probably made a net gain. The June session of the Council saw two vast League undertakings brought to an honorable conclusion—the financial reconstruction of Hungary and of Austria. It was nearly four years ago that the League, backed by the great banks of the world, floated a $50,000,000 loan for Austria and put that ruined country in charge of a Dutchman as its High Commissioner. Before the money was made available Austria had to agree to a financial dictatorship comparable to Mussolini's. The Parliament was, indeed, allowed to sit, but not to act. Under this stringent regime Austria has pulled through; she has a stabilized currency and a new hope for the future. That the "sanitation" has been accomplished at the cost of much unemployment and some social reform is true, and Austria's fundamental difficulty—that she is today, as a result of the peace treaties and post-war nationalism, a tiny industrial island cut off from her natural markets by high-tariff walls—continues. Hungary's problem was perhaps simpler, for she is a self-supporting agricultural country. Under her American financial dictator, Jeremiah Smith, Jr., of Boston—who amazed the Hungarians by his characteristic action in refusing any compensation or even decoration for his work, a return to old standards of Americanism—Hungary, too, has stabilized her currency and got a fresh start. Still another task well done under the auspices of the League by an American is the settlement of a million Greek refugees from Asia Minor in the homeland, ably directed by Charles P. Howland of New York.

FOR LITTLE NATIONS the League can do much, when their interest coincides with that of the great financial and political powers of the world, and against their threats its defenses stand firm. But when a Great Power defies its principles and the world's peace, it yields with bowed head. In all its mixed history there is hardly a more pusillanimous act than the approval by its Mandates Commission of French misrule in Syria. We cannot too often requote the pious phrase with which the League Covenant introduces the mandate system:

> To peoples not yet able to stand by themselves under the strenuous conditions of the modern world [it says] there should be applied the principle that the well-being and development of such peoples form a sacred trust of civilization and that securities for the performance of this trust should be embodied in this Covenant.

The "tutelage" of these peoples is to be "intrusted" to "advanced peoples," and on that theory France holds Syria. That the origin of its claim lies in the secret war-time treaties the League does not recognize. To what extent does it live up to its high words?

IN SYRIA, NOT A BIT. The Syrians have been fighting for their country's independence; and France, in the name of the League's "sacred trust of civilization," has slaughtered men, women, and children by the thousand, using for the purpose hired butchers from Turkey and virtual slaves, colored conscripts from her other colonies, raining death from the air upon defenseless villages, bombarding on short notice residence quarters of the capital, Damascus, and generally acting as European peoples do when their darker-skinned subjects demand self-government. So lawless have the French been that even the Consular Corps was moved to violate its usual diplomatic reserve and to declare:

> Without any warning they [the French] subjected the city to a prolonged and widespread bombardment such as ordinarily only fortified cities must suffer. The Consular Corps . . . dares to express the hope that such a bombardment may be avoided and that should repression become necessary it be in accordance with the methods commonly used in case of disorders in cities, methods calculated to punish the guilty without striking the innocent, especially women and children.

The protest has remained without effect. Recent dispatches report continued bombardments and more Schrecklichkeit. And when these stories of murder and rapine came before the League's Permanent Mandates Commission it listened to the French excuses and gave them its blessing. When a Syrian arose to protest, the League's private detectives sat him down again. "Sacred trust of civilization," indeed!

ONE MIGHT THINK that France had troubles enough at home without squandering millions on these sacred trusts of civilization in the Orient. The franc continues to sink; and Parliament, while it has voted semi-dictatorial powers to the new Briand-Caillaux Government, has not conferred upon these wizards of politics any new magic with which to stop the financial debacle. The advances to the Government by the Bank of France continue; Caillaux seems to plan to use its gold reserves as a dam against the tide; but without more stringent economies and more biting taxes than any politician is likely to dare it seems impossible to arrest the falling franc. Like the old paper mark, it is slipping out of existence; but what kind of Dawes Plan can be established to safeguard a new gold unit? When the governor of the American Federal Reserve System and the governor of the Bank of England spend their vacation in the same French seaside town one suspects that a new form of international financial supergovernment is in gestation; but it will be a harsh blow to proud France if she has to tread the pathway worn by Austria, Hungary, and Germany. The spirit of war days gleamed again when 20,000 cripples paraded her streets to protest against the American debt settlement, but whatever one may think of the Mellon-Bérenger debt settlement it is but a drop in the bucket of France's financial troubles.

MUSSOLINI HAS OUT-BONAPARTED Napoleon so consistently that his name should supplant the Frenchman's in all future histories as the symbol of one-man power. He abolished the anti-Fascist press; then he abolished the eight-hour day; then he limited the Fascist press to six pages an issue, cutting to the bone all foreign, sporting, art, and literary news; then he made his cowering editors print three cheers for his journalistic wisdom. Now he has decided to suspend "indefinitely" all provincial and municipal elections. This last decree is scarcely necessary, but it will save the local Fascisti some bother. Since the beginning of the Fascist castor-oil crusade there have been no genuine elections in Italy. The new measure will simply confirm the dependence of local officials upon the central Fascist authority in Rome.

TO THE PREPARATORY DISARMAMENT CONFERENCE which has just concluded its weighty deliberations at Geneva we are indebted for an enrichment of our vocabulary. Our dictionary tells us that "global" means world-wide, but the naval experts called together by the League of Nations have squeezed it into a narrower bed. To them it means at most nation-wide. Led by the French and Italians, they have decided that comparisons of navies for disarmament purposes shall be by their "global," or total, tonnage. To this the United States and Great Britain objected, thanks to those researches in metals lighter than steel which Mr. Bent describes elsewhere in this issue; they would have preferred to compare tonnage by classes of ships, and they prevailed on the Argentinian and Chilean delegates to join them in this minority report. Japan, although she voted with the majority, announces gravely that she has no objection to comparison by classes; for Japan, joyful at the deadweight-tonnage joker in the Washington Treaty, has also made her experiments with light metals. Obviously France and Italy, who expect to fight their next war from the air and undersea, wish to put most of their naval tonnage into submarines, and for that reason insisted on the "global" clause. Washington assures us cheerfully that it doesn't much matter, because this is but a preliminary conference, so that its reports are not binding. But now that we know that none of the principal naval Powers is observing the spirit—or the ostensible spirit—of the Washington Treaty, none of us can hope for much from Geneva.

WU PEI-FU and Chang Tso-lin, the two great warlords of China who were so long enemies, have ridden in triumph through Peking streets carpeted with golden sands; they have shaken hands and sworn eternal brotherhood. But they have not been able to agree on any division of the spoils. Dr. W. W. Yen, Wu Pei-fu's man, served a month as Premier without a Cabinet (the gentlemen he named prudently remained in distant cities) and then resigned; the cables have not reported his successor. Meanwhile the National Army which in March abandoned Peking to Wu or Chang—whichever could get there first—has reformed itself behind the Nankow Pass and is spreading down into what was once known as the model province of Shansi. Shansi's "model governor," Yen Shi-shan, is the only tuchun in China who has held office since the Revolution of 1911, but he acquired military ambitions last year and turned his mint into an armory; now China's last peaceful province is sinking into the quagmire of militarism. The most hopeful spot in China is still the radical province of Kwangtung (Canton) in the South, and the Nationalist Party which centers about it. Canton is having its usual share of excitement. General Chiang Kai-shek has driven out some of his too obstreperous Russian advisers; the strike pickets violently closed the old and excellent Canton Hospital; there has been fighting to the north, in Hunan; and there have been occasional shooting affairs with the British launches that smuggle passengers to the boycotted British boats. But Canton has a government, and a passionate nationalist spirit that radiates over all China.

THE STATE OF LOUISIANA has never been known as the abode of sanctimonious reform. It has allowed its citizens to think and largely to behave about as they pleased, and has upheld a policy of private ownership and control of morals and beliefs. But no State is safe, it appears, when rural virtue and piety organize for an attack. Two bills were introduced in the last legislature. One made it a misdemeanor to teach "the theory of evolution or any theory pretending to trace the descent of man from a higher or lower order of life." The second bill was more sweeping; it prohibited the teaching of "any theory or doctrine subversive to the creed or belief of any pupil." The press opposed the bills, the president of the State University spoke against them, people treated them as a joke. They were finally defeated, but they were no joke. The Bible Crusaders and other fundamentalist reformers came down from the northern hills and established an active lobby; their adherents in both House and Senate did not hesitate to threaten the defeat of salary bills affecting politicians great and small if their anti-evolution bills were rejected. Both bills were passed by the House. Both bills were rejected, each by exactly two votes, in the Senate. The Bible Crusaders and their representatives have presumably retired to the hills defeated but not, we fear, disheartened, and Louisiana's freedom is safe—until the next session of the legislature.

CONCORD, MASSACHUSETTS, was recently the scene of a battle of words, eggs, vegetables, and ideals in which a number of town hooligans undertook to break up a conference of the Fellowship of Youth for Peace. The students who were attacked on their way home, instead of resisting the attack, fraternized with their enemies, explained their ideals, and within twenty-four hours pacifists and hundred-percenters were dancing together. So the Fellowship of Youth for Peace gave an effective demonstration of its principles. In spite of a hostile mass meeting which denounced the F. Y. P. the American Legion repudiated the violence of the hooligans, and even the Boston papers were not altogether cordial to the jingoes who used the name of the Massachusetts Public Interest League to attack the speakers. The hero of the fracas was the Rev. Smith Dexter, Episcopal clergyman, who opened his church to the conference after the Unitarian church had refused. His courageous stand was worthy of the traditions of old Concord.

THE SUPER-PATRIOTS are particularly unfortunate in the kind of men who represent them before the public. One of the speakers who attacked the Fellowship of Youth for Peace at Concord was Fred Marvin of the New York Commercial. Mr. Marvin has an infinite capacity for becoming alarmed. His chief claim to distinction is that he traced the attack on Harry Daugherty to Moscow. His Concord speech led even the reporter of the conservative Boston Herald to comment:

> He aroused some surprise when he declared that the Fellowship was a lineal descendant of the secret order called the Illuminati which was founded in Austria 150 years ago for the purpose of overthrowing all government and religion. . . . The six tenets of the Illuminati included the destruction of all government, of all inheritance laws, of religion and the home. . . .
>
> Although Mr. Marvin was repeatedly warned by Judge Keyes [the chairman] that his allotted time had expired, he proceeded with an attack on the New Masses, a radical publication, from which he read a questionable joke. He concluded with a eulogy of his mother.

WE HAIL THE BATHING SUIT as the summer costume of the future. It never bags at the knees and rarely shines on the seat. It is reasonably cheap, can be rolled in a small bundle, and is easily washed. It reveals feminine softness and manly muscle. It puts the daughter of a subway motorman on the same sartorial plane as the daughter of a Pennsylvania politician. We know that Bernard Shaw dressed his Utopian ancients in "Back to Methuselah" in amorphous, sack-like things, but he was wrong. The human form was never made to be hidden or boiled. We are not sure that it was made for clothes at all—in the summer-time. Certainly it was not made for the furnace-model sack-suits affected by our conventional males.

Why Not a Peace Department?

OUR federal, State, and city governments spend many million dollars every year to prevent fire, crime, and disease. Everybody accepts this preventive policy as sound common sense. Now comes Kirby Page, effective peace pamphleteer, with the question: Why not apply this notion of governmental prevention to war? Why should government be captured by the militarists? Why not a Peace Department alongside the War Department?

Propaganda has become one of the chief functions of our government departments. Mellon preaches against large taxes; Kellogg preaches on the dangers of Soviet recognition; Hoover preaches on standardization; all the generals preach on preparedness; the White House spokesman preaches on "economy." This national homiletical chorus is nearly always special pleading of the rankest sort. It shouts investing-class economic creeds and old-party nostrums. Done in the name of community welfare, it is no more entitled to the public frank than, let us say, the preaching of Aimee Semple McPherson. If we must continue to pay for the preaching of generals to make us more military we might as well pay some one to make us more pacific. Why not have a Peace Department to preach peace at us?

Mr. Page has put down in businesslike figures a plan for spending $100,000,000 a year (less than the annual pay roll alone of another army or navy) for a national Peace Department. His results are rather astonishing. For one-third of the cost of the battleship Colorado we could have a Federal Department of Peace with a cabinet secretary, assistants, clerks, and stenographers; ten regional secretaries at $6,000 salaries; forty foreign offices with five foreign secretaries each and liberal allowances for running expenses. For thirteen million more there would be peace publications galore, an International Peace Review with a circulation of a million, twelve million peace pamphlets, five million dollars' worth of posters, twenty peace films a year, and peace libraries distributing a million books a year. Add five million for an International University; then forty million for 10,000 American students abroad and 10,000 foreign students coming to America at $2,000 a year each. Take a million for an annual Peace Day, a few millions more for exchange professors and "Citizens' International Friendship Camps," and there are still five of the hundred millions left for disaster relief funds and international health service.

Every item of this Peace Department program offers a peace counterpart to some military institution which is considered necessary. An International University is to stand over against West Point and Annapolis; world friendship cruises would be designed to offset the flourishing of our navy in the Pacific; peace monuments would compete with our war-memorial atrocities. Our military leaders have been acting on the assumption that if they talk military ideas long enough and lustily enough the new generation will succumb to the volume and repetition. They are quite right; so is Mr. Page. Official propaganda may be the best thing with which to kill official propaganda.

When Mr. Page's Peace Department is established we would like to be assigned the task of spending the five million a year on posters. We recall those posters in front of our federal buildings which picture trim young gentlemen writing letters under palm trees, the caption being, "Where Will You Spend the Winter? Join the Marines and See the World." Our posters would be more realistic. We would have pictures of marines cleaning up a native village in Haiti with rifle fire or breaking a strike of Chinese students in Shanghai, and perhaps a marine peeling potatoes. Underneath there would be statistics of the proportion of marines who never reenlist. Then if some unemployed youngster joined the marines he would know what he was getting into.

What the Senate Says to Pennsylvania

$2,793,587.02 is the latest total announced for the expenditures in the Republican primary election in Pennsylvania. Governor Pinchot and his friends spent $188,866.23; Mr. Vare and his friends $800,114.60; and the Pepper-Mellon gang spent $1,804,983.25.

Is the country satisfied to let its elections thus become an auction game for millionaires? Are the people of Pennsylvania hopelessly "corrupt and contented"? Do the members of the United States Senate feel any responsibility to speak out against this degradation of their body? The Nation, following its publication last week of Senator Norris's appeal to his fellow-Republicans in Pennsylvania to cleanse their party by this year voting Democratic, telegraphed every Republican in the United States Senate, stating Senator Norris's position and asking their views. The answers are illuminating.

One bit of history. Six years ago Truman H. Newberry defeated Henry Ford for the Republican nomination for United States Senator from Michigan. It was charged and proved that what was then regarded as the colossal sum of $195,000 had been spent in Senator Newberry's behalf in the primary. Senator Newberry and his associates were accordingly indicted under the federal Corrupt Practices Act, and convicted. The Supreme Court, however, held that Congress had no power to legislate regarding the primaries, which are the affair of the States, and that the act was therefore unconstitutional. On that technical basis Senator Newberry escaped jail. The question came to the Senate: Should it, being, according to the Constitution, "the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members," admit Senator Newberry? The result was long in doubt. Senator Newberry was finally admitted by a vote of 46 to 41, upon a compromise resolution, devised by Senator Willis of Ohio, which concluded:

> Whether the amount expended in this primary was $195,000 as was fully reported and openly acknowledged, or whether there was some few thousand dollars in excess, the amount expended was in either case too large, much larger than ought to have been expended. The expenditure of such excessive sums in behalf of a candidate, either with or without his knowledge and consent, being contrary to sound public policy, harmful to the honor and dignity of the Senate, and dangerous to the perpetuity of a free government, such excessive expenditures are hereby severely condemned and disapproved.

The only Republicans to vote against that resolution voted to unseat Newberry. They were Senators Borah, Capper, Wesley Jones, Kenyon, Ladd, La Follette, Norbeck, Norris, and Sutherland, and of that honorable list not one has since been defeated at the polls. Two have been raised to federal judgeships; two have died; the other five still sit. Of the forty-six who voted to seat Newberry seven have died, eight have been defeated in primary elections, and nine at the regular November elections. There is ground for renewed faith in the American people in those facts.

And now we come back to 1926 and Pennsylvania. Pennsylvania has twice as many voters as Michigan, but nearly fifteen times as much gold was poured out to buy the nomination there as led the Senate in 1922 to condemn the Michigan outlays. In all the sordid history of political corruption there is nothing to compare with Pennsylvania's colossal expenditures. It is nonsense to contend with Senator Reed and Mr. Mellon that this money was spent in honest propaganda; we have had honest propaganda in other States. Postage has not gone up; the cost of printing has not materially changed; but the Republican leaders of Pennsylvania spent millions where two hundred thousand had seemed high.

As Senator Norris points out, there is no time to be wasted. Senator Vare may, if elected, be unseated by the Senate—although the record in the Newberry case is not encouraging; but if he is unseated it is probable that the Mellon henchman who was Pepper's running-mate in the primary will be the Governor to name Vare's successor. And what does the cause of honest government gain if Vare is replaced by a tool of the men who spent $1,804,983.25? If a United States Senator cares about honest government in Pennsylvania and the nation, the time to speak his mind is now.

Robert M. La Follette, Jr., in his reply to The Nation's poll of Senators, spoke clearly:

> The disclosures of tremendous sums of money used in the Pennsylvania primary in an effort to debauch the electorate have staggered the country. Unless the citizens of Pennsylvania take drastic action the corruption in that State will destroy representative government within that commonwealth. Every citizen in that State who holds dear the fundamental theories upon which our government was founded has an opportunity to register his protest against existing political corruption in Pennsylvania by voting for William B. Wilson, Democratic nominee for the United States Senate.

Not another Republican Senator could be found to set principle so clearly above party. Senators Frazier and Nye of North Dakota had left Washington, and telegrams sent to them in the West were returned undelivered. Twenty-one others could not be found in the closing days of the session. Senators Greene and McKinley were reported ill. Senators Borah, Butler, Ernst, Gillette, Hiram Johnson, and David Reed were interviewed, but declined to make any comment for publication. (Senator Reed may have been appalled by the criticism of his earlier defense of the primary expenditures.) Senator McNary said he had been too busy with farm relief to consider the matter, and Senator Cameron solemnly asserted that he had "had no time to give the subject thought." It was Senator Cameron who filibustered to death, in the last hours of the Senate, the La Follette and Neely resolutions limiting campaign expenditures! Following that successful action to stave off discussion of Pennsylvania corruption, it may be added, Senators Butler, Fess, Wadsworth, and Watson stepped forward and publicly congratulated the Arizonan. Senators Goff, Willis, Harreld, Fess, and Couzens felt that it would be "unethical" for them to comment upon the matter at this time—some of them because the Senate might later be called upon to act as judge. Senator Willis's remarks demand quotation:

> I myself am a candidate for reelection to the Senate this year. I think, therefore, that it would be indelicate and improper for me to discuss candidates and conditions in other States with which I am not particularly acquainted.

This from the author of the resolution that so eclectically seated and condemned Newberry!

Five of the Republicans dared, in more or less precise terms, to condemn Vare without indorsing Wilson. Senator Howell of Nebraska said that "The situation presented to the voters of Pennsylvania demands their attention and they should act in no unmistakable manner." Senator Cummins, just defeated by Mr. Brookhart in Iowa, cryptically remarked: "I am a Republican but I have not always voted for Republicans." Senator Norbeck first thought he had nothing to say for publication, then added: "You know, I voted against Newberry." His fellow-Senator from South Dakota, W. H. McMaster, said:

> There are no grounds for the assumption that the Democrats will spend money less lavishly in the coming election in Pennsylvania than the Vare combination. The election of an independent candidate would have a wholesome influence in Pennsylvania politics.

Arthur Capper of Kansas also suggested a new candidate:

> In view of the disclosures in connection with the recent Senatorial primary in Pennsylvania [he said] it seems to me that the Republicans of the State owe it to the party and to the State to present a new candidate for the United States Senate, who shall be nominated in such a manner as to represent the honest sentiments of the rank and file of the party and to leave no possibility of interest-control or corruption in his selection.

A few of the standpat Senators were as frank. Senator Moses of New Hampshire ducked the issue with the remark "Why should I tell the voters of Pennsylvania what to do? I have troubles enough in my own State," but Senator Smoot of Utah said flatly "If I were a voter in Pennsylvania I would not vote for Wilson." Senator Wadsworth's secretary predicted that he would say "A Republican is a Republican; to the devil with the Democrats," but the New York Senator, informed by telegraph of this prediction, replied "The people of Pennsylvania are competent to manage their own affairs without advice from me"; Senator Keyes of New Hampshire sang the same song. Senator Shortridge of California asked "Are the Democrats any better?" and added boldly "No corruption has been proved against the Republicans." Senator Edge (New Jersey) said:

> The Republicans of Pennsylvania have nominated Congressman Vare for United States Senator and should and will elect him. While I am in favor of consistently limiting primary as well as election expenses the utter ridiculousness of permitting Nevada $10,000 with a population of 77,000, and Pennsylvania, with a population of 9,000,000, $25,000, as proposed, is inconsistent and discriminatory.

Senator Pepper himself in a letter too long to quote expressed his hope that the expressions of opinion, "even when emanating from Senators who know little or nothing about the State [Pennsylvania], will be considered with respect by our electorate," but he doubted if they would "prove helpful." Unlike the Senators who avoided the issue because it might be "unethical" for them now to express an opinion on a question upon which they might later have to vote, Senator Pepper suggested that since he would "not be a member of the Senate when and if [the seating of Mr. Vare] comes up for consideration," he ought not to be included in our poll!

Senator Curtis, the Republican floor leader, when asked if he would advise Pennsylvania Republicans to vote for a Democrat, replied with emphasis "That is a foolish question"; and "Jim" Watson of Indiana said, characteristically, "I don't advise folks to vote for Democrats. I never have yet, and I shan't begin to now."

And that is how the Republican Senators, faced with million-dollar primary expenditures, stand.

An Invitation to Revolution

THE British coal-owners seem determined to have their pound of flesh. They are seeking to defeat the miners on all three issues of the miners' strike—to reduce wages, to lengthen hours, and not to reorganize the industry. Since the end of the general strike it has been evident that the miners must lose on at least one of these issues. But which loss will they accept with the least disturbance? Baldwin decided that the eight-hour day was the least bitter pill he could ask the miners to swallow. Amid scenes of wild disorder a bill was passed by the Commons and Lords allowing the mine-owners to lengthen the working day from seven to eight hours. Most of the owners posted notices inviting the miners back to work at the old scale of wages for the lengthened day. But the workers did not come; for laws do not dig coal.

The miners are being denounced as stubborn for refusing to yield temporarily in order to save a bankrupt industry, but if they yield on hours there is no guaranty against defeat on wages and reorganization also. The mine-owners may cut wages after a return to work and they can doubtless stave off any reorganization of the industry for many years. The miners have just one weapon, the strike, and when they lay that weapon down the most stubborn and stupid employers in Great Britain may take advantage of their disarmament.

The tragedy of the situation is that the strike is taking the life-blood of an already anemic industry; the miners are doomed to defeat no matter what the official settlement may be. Their one hope is that they can compel sufficient reorganization of the industry to recoup their temporary losses. The hope of such gains from new efficiency is slight. The Baldwin Government has proposed a bill for the amalgamation of some collieries, but it is far from the nationalization which the coal industry needs.

What shall a minority group do when it is suffering from almost intolerable conditions and the rest of society refuses to heed its logical demand for change? The answer made by the Trades Union Council in the general strike was: Make it so uncomfortable for the rest of society that they will be forced to listen to the minority's case. But what if society still refuses to give due weight to the miners' case after several coal commissions have reported and after a general strike as well? The British Labor moderates reply: Elect a Labor Parliament. But a certain impatience with the slowness of democratic machinery is spreading rapidly; Labor does not want revolution, but it may be goaded into a revolutionary position by the stupidity of the opposition. It is difficult to see how the moderate leaders of British labor can prevent a sharp swing to the Left. There was something portentous in the scene in the House of Lords when the Labor members from the Commons shouted "murderers" at those very well-fed gentlemen who had never tried to support a family on $10 a week.

TWO YEARS AGO GEORGE W[illegible] was declared to have been the first of American Realtors. A year later a learned graduate of Amherst College proclaimed Jesus Christ the first of the Rotarians. Not to be outdone a committee of true patriots has just elected God to be an American citizen. Up to the hour of going to press, however, the nominating committee had not yet been received.

Henry Ford's Utopia

By STUART CHASE

IT is impossible to overrate the importance of Henry Ford, of his tangible achievement and his industrial philosophy. The man who can persuade other men to do the things which he records in his textbook of life, "Today and Tomorrow";* who can turn tradition upside down and from the inverted structure wring thousands of horse-power, millions of tons, and tens of millions of dollars; who is strong enough to tell bankers that they are a set of swindlers, and brokers that their occupation is vicious nonsense; and who has the unheard-of audacity to say that his buildings and machines—a cool billion dollars' worth—belong to the public who paid for them, and that his trusteeship is only valid so long as he makes a sound and useful product on the principle of the highest possible wages and the lowest possible price—when this man speaks, if we are more than the shallowest of moonbeam-chasers, it is our duty to listen to him. (Incidentally, he is today by all odds the most popular writer in Soviet Russia.) What he has to say, whether we like it or not, is influencing our common life in America to a profound degree, and is destined to influence it more and more as the years go by. And the leaven is working around the margins of the Seven Seas. For Ford is the first great industrialist who has followed the deliberate policy of making the machine serve man, instead of man machine. That this policy has led inevitably to an open rupture with the whole intrenched framework of capitalism, profit-taking, and price-economics disturbs him not in the least. He welcomes the battle, and delivers another broadside at the "scavengers of finance."

If he were shooting spitballs out of a faculty-club window, or even out of union headquarters, his assault might be amusing enough, but we sober citizens would regard it as impractical and unimportant. Sober citizens of the Right and sober citizens of the Left would so regard it—applesauce! But it is the richest man the world has ever seen who is denting plug hats, and what is ten times more important, he has an organization behind him that works such miracles as leave us gaping like village idiots—miracles in power-generating; in revising the whole methodology of lumbering; in showing railroad men how to run railroads; in by-product reclamation; in keeping inventories on the move and never frozen in storehouses; in eliminating the bulk of bookkeeping; in showing farmers how to farm and how to coordinate farming and manufacturing; in making transportation per unit of output ever shorter, lighter, less bulky; in never giving a man a job a machine can do; in realizing — and acting thereon — that waste-elimination means prevention, not recovery—preplanning, not salvaging the breakage; in utilizing waterways as no industry before has ever had the intelligence to utilize them; in taking pride in the fact that "we have no trade secrets"; in building hospitals around a standard room instead of jamming rooms into a predetermined wall space; in keeping every square inch of his immense holdings spotlessly clean, sanitary, and, so far as may be, comfortable for the human beings which must inhabit them.

"One cannot hope to live on a community but in a community. . . . We have never put in a plant without raising purchasing power and standards of living." When, according to the behest of supply and demand, local tradesmen and landlords seek to cash in on Ford's high wages, the company proceeds to knock the bottom out of their laudable schemes and to insure higher living standards by opening stores or building houses itself.

Three-quarters of the book is factual description of what Ford has done, what changes he has wrought in the crust of this planet. There they stand for anybody to see—and I suspect no engineer can see those new Fordson turbines without weeping for joy. The other quarter is prophecy, statement of policy, and assorted general philosophy. The latter is mostly pretty terrible and need not detain the careful reader. The heart of the matter is policy, the new industrial synthesis, the new way of organizing economic life, which Ford earnestly and impressively advocates, and to which these stupefying concrete achievements in horse-power, steel, and high living-standards bear witness. Upwards of three million human beings, and three hundred times as many dollars, bear witness.

The policy is this: "The face of business is bowed toward the stockholder and not toward the consumer, and this means the denial of the primary purpose of industry." "Money men" make dividends, but engineers make goods. Business has fallen into the hands of money men, and they are doing their best to ruin it socially and financially. They make often a dubious product, and their costs are prohibitively high. "The profit motive, although it is supposed to be hard-headed and practical, is really not practical at all, because it has as its objectives the increasing of prices to the consumer and the decreasing of wages, and therefore it constantly narrows its markets, and eventually strangles itself." Hence business depressions. All this is wasteful; these muddle-headed bankers must give way to captains of industry, engineer-minded—such, for instance, as Mr. Henry Ford. They will run industry as it ought to be run, without waste, without speeding up, without adulteration, without "illth," and with the satisfaction of the public as the sole criterion of their stewardship.

"A machine does not belong to the man who buys it or who operates it, but to the public. We do not regard the public's money returned to the business (in the form of profits) as an investment on which interest should be charged. That money is the public's money, and the public, having confidence enough in our product to pay the money to us, is entitled to benefit by its confidence. We have no right to charge the public interest on its own money." (If the doctrine of private property ever received a more resounding wallop than this, I never heard it.) In other words, profit is not to be abolished, but its function is narrowed to financing plant improvements for the elimination of more waste, for higher wages and lower prices. Profit becomes the price paid for necessary improvements in keeping up with the technical arts. Ultimately all goes back to the consumer in the form of lower prices. And to insure the balanced working of the system, wages must always be a jump ahead of prices in order to liberate sufficient purchasing power to keep the industrial structure operating at capacity. This is what Ford calls the "wage motive," which must supersede the old private-profit motive.

* "Today and Tomorrow," by Henry Ford. Doubleday, Page and Company.

"Is the manufacturer going to create a thing that will help people, or only something to sell to people?" If the former, he belongs with the true captains; if the latter, he is proscribed. There is no place in Ford's Utopia for the higher salesmanship. Money returns to its function as a medium of exchange and ceases to blind men's vision to underlying physical realities. There is no virtue in money as such. Unemployment, except for necessary shifts from one activity to another, becomes unthinkable, as do all attempts at restriction of output by either management or worker. Ford hates the "make-work" theory as he hates the investment banker. "All our efforts to reduce the number of men on a single job have resulted in more jobs for more men." With the need of America for unlimited quantities of consumable goods, and with unlimited natural resources with which to supply those goods, there are always more jobs than there are men to fill them—granted the engineer-manufacturer in control.

Henry Ford is very specific as to the technique of managing men under this dispensation. It is the technique of his own company. Perhaps 5 per cent of employees are skilled craftsmen—designing, planning, blue-printing, toolmaking, repairing, inspecting. The 95 per cent are "taught in a day" the simple duties and motions which operate the machines and the processes already planned. Tools are delivered waist high to obviate the labor of stooping over to pick them up. Any worker who shows the ability will readily be taken into the planning division. As for monotony, "we find that many workers prefer simple automatic tasks," which, combined with short hours, and plenty of time for leisure and the cultivation of hobbies outside the shop, reduces the danger to the vanishing-point. This is particularly noticeable in the decentralization experiment-stations along the River Rouge, where farmers and farm women put in their spare time making valves, taps, and generator cut-outs. . . . However wild, improbable, or treasonable the theory laid down, it is invariably supported with the fait accompli. It is working; nay, it is working well. Come, you scoffers, and see it work!

And there we are. The machine brought to heel at last, but run by engineers subject only to referendum of the public as reflected in its buying power. The government is invited to keep out and stay out, along with bankers, trade unions, reformers, charitable undertakings of all kinds, and, perhaps not so surprisingly after all, "experts." Our author hates experts and outside efficiency men of all kinds. He apparently works on trial and error within his own organization. This control, he thinks, should embrace not only manufacturing proper but agriculture as well. Farming must be coordinated, its units greatly enlarged, and locked with manufacturing, as in the River Rouge plants. One gathers that most public-service industries—gas, water, power generation, local transportation—must be taken from the government and put under the new control. As why should they not, if public service be the sole motive of the controllers?

The industrial Utopia of the modern Croesus is before us. We first have to ask whether it is a serious one, or whether it constitutes an unconscious rationalization on the author's part to defend his billion, and to convince himself and us that the services he has rendered warrant the title-deeds which still stand in his name—however much they may in theory "belong to the public." The cohorts of Rotary make obeisance before Service largely on such grounds. How does Ford differ from them, if at all? I think there is an important difference. Few Rotarians are paying a minimum of $6 a day for their common labor voluntarily, few reduce prices as Ford has done, few labor so single-heartedly in conforming themselves to sound and useful products, and none has ever dreamed of such applications of applied technology. This man, in my opinion, is not sublimating greed, despite the size of his fortune. The bulk of his profit has gone back into plant and not into personal swank. He means what he says, and his amazing organization is proof of it.

Our next and final question drives deeper. Granted the policy has worked for Ford, and that the American people have won great benefits therefrom, is it applicable to America—to Western civilization if you please—as a whole? Can we resign ourselves without further scrutiny to the stewardship of the engineer-business man? Is this indeed, as Mr. Filene has dared to hope, the Way Out? This is a question not lightly to be answered. Furthermore, while we are conning it, it may be answered for us. But I for one would be profoundly hesitant of giving it an unreserved affirmative. To begin with, Ford was himself the product of circumstances over which he had little control. The times demanded a cheap and dependable motor car. He happened to be the man that first met that demand—and was raised to unlimited power on the strength of it. If it had not been Ford it would have been somebody else—with the chances, to be sure, in favor of a greedier man. Old-line businesses, like shoes and soap and coal, have had, and will have, no such opportunity thrust into their hands. No such opportunity will probably come again until somebody makes a cheap and foolproof airplane. To generalize too broadly from a special case is always dangerous.

And other questions come on the run. What earnest have we that the Ford tradition will animate all our engineer-overlords after we have meekly handed over the earth to them? What earnest have we that Edsel will carry on; that inheritance will work any better here than it has worked with Romanoffs and Hapsburgs? What is the true danger of monotony implicit in the plan? Ford's experience on this point is conflicting and far from conclusive. What are the psychological imperatives for turning the profit motive upside down; why should public service take the place of selfishness in the general run of large manufacturers, almost overnight? Ford, due to the fortunate circumstances recited above, was made rich enough to afford the public-service point of view. Can we put all our captains through the same training?

Finally, and most important of all, I find nothing in his book or in his Utopia which contemplates any industrial general staff for coordinating national requirements with production. That vital necessity remains in the hands of free competition. A thousand Fords might make untold savings within their own organizations, but, lacking any community synthesis, they might well waste in the aggregate—due to their wars and reprisals—more than they saved. Purchasing power forms no very effective check against competitive waste, particularly when the competitors are giant vertical organizations. Coal and oil and lumber and minerals—aye, and man-power—may go faster down this chute than they do even under the prevailing rules of the game. If the captains can agree not to step on each other's toes, and can set up, furthermore, a coordinating overhead machinery, there might be something in it. But this contingency Ford never mentions, and I suspect would refuse to indorse. He has the usual mystical faith in "my business." He has never placed his business, with all its implications, in the whole economic framework of the nation.

I might be willing to vote for Ford as industrial Czar of America during good behavior; but his Utopia of competitive giants flares, dims, and turns to ashes before my eyes.

Which is not saying that my children will not live under it.

Evading the Washington Treaty

By SILAS BENT

THE treaty for the limitation of armament adopted at Washington in 1921 was heralded as putting an end to naval competition among the Great Powers. It did no such thing. Competition continues, with only a change of direction. The treaty merely limits tonnage, and to evade it metals lighter than steel are being used in the naval craft of the United States, Great Britain, and Japan. The covenant became effective August 17, 1923; but even before that time the chief signatories, which had voluntarily met to frame it, had set about finding ways of wriggling out from under its provisions.

The United States Navy, for example, has just let a contract to the Cramps for the construction of a cruiser, the Salt Lake City. The treaty limited cruisers to a standard weight of not more than 10,000 tons; and this craft is no heavier. But consider, if you will, its dimensions. It will have a length over all of 585 feet 8 inches. We have four battleships of the first line not so long as that, although they have greater draft and beam. These are the Arkansas, 562 feet over all, built in 1912; the Nevada, 583 feet, built in 1916; the New York, 573 feet, dating from 1914; and the Utah, 521 feet, from 1911. The answer is that this giant cruiser is not built of steel. A companion cruiser, the Pensacola, about to be constructed at the New York Navy Yard, promises to be even bigger and better. And in future construction, as the navy's research unit proceeds with its experiments in compounds of aluminum and duralumin, the use of lighter metals will be extended. The goal is to get warcraft which, weighing but two-thirds as much as if built throughout of steel, can be proportionately larger and more powerful. Such floating fighters, although within the precise wording of the treaty, will, in fact, give the lie to those terms.

Hailed as a magnificent achievement in the cause of world peace, the treaty proves to have been but another international pleasantry. The joker is that naval vessels are not limited as to size, but only as to deadweight (and, in some cases, in number). A post-treaty battleship may not weigh more than 35,000 tons; but when its interior structure is of lighter metals, a much more formidable manslayer becomes possible. Whether the convention was framed with a tongue in the diplomatic cheek I cannot say. But it seems unlikely that all the naval experts who foregathered in the Pan-American Building while the treaty was being drawn could have been blind to the possibilities latent in that joker. Certainly many of us who watched the proceedings saw well enough that not peace, but temporary governmental economy in a world shattered by war, was the motive of the conference.

The United States Navy Department has been experimenting for years with light-metal compounds, and it is no secret in Washington or in London, whence I recently returned, that Great Britain and Japan have been doing the same thing. The results of these experiments are "military secrets."

It is a fact, however, that, although the task of research has been by no means concluded, our own navy has found a light-weight metal compound suitable for battleships which is less subject to corrosion than steel, and recommends itself as an economy in that way aside from its weight saving qualities. Reducing weight also makes possible a higher freeboard, and so makes possible greater speed. Destroyers, for instance, have a rating of thirty-five knots, but they can make no such rate in heavy seas. The figure is an ideal maximum. Constructed within the treaty limitations, but of lighter metals, they may overcome the speed handicap to a great extent.

Greater size, even without increase in weight, requires more powerful engines. Thus another innovation for post-treaty craft is under consideration by the United States Navy: the utilization of higher steam pressure. The pressure now accepted as standard is 300 pounds; the pressure sought by our naval engineers is 700 pounds, which is without precedent in naval construction. Such craft would be driven by geared turbines, and the contemplated higher pressure means, when achieved, wholly new designs of boilers, packing glands, and other parts.

The ostensibly pacific gesture at the Pan-American Building means, therefore, not only a revolution in the structure of sea warriors but a revolution in their motive power. It means, possibly, greater manslaughter. The United States Navy, so steel experts say, has exercised an influence on the development of the industry in this country out of all proportion to the metal it has used. The construction of steel ships began in 1889, and since then the navy has used somewhat more than two billion tons of steel and iron—mostly steel—or about one-fourth of 1 per cent of the enormous output. If that has been true of steel, we may seek to comfort ourselves with the ironic reflection that a corresponding influence in the improvement of turbines and light metals will compensate for the potential greater manslaughter at sea.

For men of war which must take the first line of battle nothing has been found to replace steel as an armored sheathing. They must be built to withstand a gunfire capable of penetrating eighteen inches of steel before the shell explodes. They must have heavy protective decks and be secure against under-water projectiles. For these purposes steel must still be used. But all the furniture, all the watertight inner compartments, all the cross-bracing is of metal too; and by the use of the new compound enormous economies in weight can be effected. And cruisers, which are not meant to take the first line of battle, do not require the heavy steel sheathing of dreadnaughts. The Pensacola and the Salt Lake City will not be expected to withstand a broadside.

The Cramps, who are to build the Salt Lake City, will provide engines both for her and for the Pensacola. Their bid was ten million dollars for the whole job, almost a million lower than any other. The Salt Lake City is to have a speed of at least 32½ knots, a beam of 65 feet 2 inches, and a draft of 19 feet 6 inches. Each cruiser will carry a main battery of not less than ten eight-inch guns. It is interesting to note that Congress was persuaded to appropriate $11,100,000 for each of these ships, as a maximum. Having saved more than a million on the first, with the engines provided for the second, the Navy Department is well-set for its experiments in light metals to use in the second. That is why we may expect a bigger and better craft in the Pensacola. The money is available for more expensive alloys in a brand-new compound, if necessary. Truly, our naval competitors may well sit up and take notice!

Not merely greater size but heavier batteries become possible through the use of lighter metals in naval craft. The Washington treaty specifies how many guns ships of each class may carry, but not their caliber nor their range. Our best anti-aircraft gun will shoot five miles vertically, and our naval officers were rather chesty about it until they heard that the British had a new gun, around the construction of which a great deal of mystery was thrown, which would throw a projectile six miles vertically. These are the most powerful of their type so far devised, and are of five-inch caliber, whereas four inches had been the limit theretofore. It was disquieting news, and the ordnance branch of our navy, we may be sure, is a-tiptoe.

About ordnance some secrecy may be maintained, but about the main facts as to the dimensions and type of motive power, in the great navies of the world, there is a general knowledge. Why, then, this secrecy about the use of light metals? So far as I know nothing has ever been printed about it, and I am unable to offer official confirmation of the facts I have set down here. Our Navy Department has made no public statement, and Secretary Wilbur declines to be interviewed. A naval officer, undertaking to explain the general silence, told me this bit of history:

"When we went into the World War," he said, "we heard that the German battleships were equipped with more powerful guns than we had, and we worked night and day to bring our ordnance up to that standard. Finally we succeeded. We even built guns a little better than the armament we supposed the enemy to have. But when the German fleet was raised from Scapa Flow we learned that we had been misled as to the power and range of their armament. The guns were no better than those we had when first we heard the rumor.

"Now, if it becomes known what metals we are using in our post-treaty ships, and how we are using them, it will stimulate other governments to surpass us if possible."

But in view of the excellent system of international espionage which I understand to be maintained, this explanation seems to me hardly to hold water. Possibly the truth is that the Great Powers are a little shamefaced at evading the terms of a treaty into which they entered freely and voluntarily, with such grandiloquent mouthing of world peace.

Give Germany Her Colonies

By PHILIP SNOWDEN

IF Germany enters the League of Nations, with a permanent seat on the Council, she will be entitled to all the rights of a Great Power. She cannot then be regarded as disqualified from exercising mandatory powers over backward areas, such as are enjoyed by other members of the League.

The Treaty of Versailles deprived Germany of all her overseas possessions. This was one of the gravest of the many injustices of that treaty, and one which, if left unredressed, is bound to lead to serious consequences. There is little danger of another war arising out of conditions in Western Europe. But if the legitimate economic aspirations of a great commercial nation like Germany are suppressed, and if her trade rivals are permitted to monopolize the wide areas which supply essential raw materials and provide an outlet for surplus population, an economic conflict will arise which will sooner or later inevitably lead to another war.

Such a calamity must be avoided. The Treaty of Locarno was an effort to remove the possibility of war through the conflict of interests and ambitions in Western Europe. The spirit of international amity and conciliation which prompted that treaty must extend its preventive measures to cover the whole field of international relations.

That part of the Treaty of Versailles which deprived Germany of all her colonies was not merely a distinct breach of the pledges given by the Allies during the war but it was a deliberate attempt to cripple the economic development of Germany for the trade advantage of her commercial rivals. President Wilson declared that when peace came to be made he "would eschew anything that might lead the German nation to think that he contemplated a peace which would contravene its legitimate economic aspirations." Other Allied statesmen gave utterance to similar intentions. But in the vindictive spirit which dictated the treaty these pledges were forgotten or ignored. To excuse the seizure of the German colonies a widespread propaganda was carried on to give the impression that Germany had proved incapable of good colonial government.

There was no real foundation for such a charge. It is true that in the early days of German colonization there were incidents which could not be defended. But that can be said with truth of every colonizing Power. After Germany had gained experience her colonial government became a model for the admiration and emulation of Great Britain. British Foreign office reports published before the war bore testimony to that fact.

Mr. Winston Churchill, when Colonial Secretary, speaking at the Imperial Conference on June 21, 1921, said:

> We have endeavored to equip it [German East Africa] with a government not inferior to the German administration which it has replaced. . . . I am afraid for a year or two this territory will compare unfavorably with its progress and prosperity when it was in the hands of our late opponents.

The present Under Secretary for the Colonies said two years later of this territory:

> It is absolutely incumbent upon us to give that vast territory at least as good and complete an administration as was given by the Germans in that country before the war.

This testimony disposes of the war-time propaganda about the unfitness of Germany to administer backward areas. On the ground of fitness it places Germany at least on an equality with Great Britain as a colonizing Power.

Two other important facts about German colonial policy may be noted, which were in striking contrast to the colonial policy of France. Germany adopted the policy of the "open door" for the trade of other countries and she did not train the natives for military service. France, in the exercise of her mandate from the League of Nations, and in violation of the spirit and letter of the Covenant, is militarizing the natives.

Apart from the moral aspects of this question of depriving Germany of her overseas possessions, and the impossibility of denying her rights when she joins the League which other Powers possess under the Covenant, there is the imperative need of Germany having access to essential raw materials and having the means of expansion. It is inconceivable that good relations can be maintained if Great Britain, France, Belgium, Portugal, and Italy have vast colonial possessions and such a nation as Germany is denied such possessions and opportunities.

France, with a population of thirty-eight millions, has a colonial empire of nearly five million square miles; Belgium, with a population of seven millions, has colonies with an area of a million square miles; and Great Britain has an empire which comprises about one-fifth of the world's surface. Peace cannot be maintained permanently if Germany, the third greatest commercial country in the world, is excluded by her rivals from colonial expansion.

By the loss of her overseas possessions Germany was deprived of some of the most productive parts of her territory. At present she is obliged to import from foreign countries one-third of her essential food and raw materials. Her population is increasing. The need for expansion increases with her growing population.

Great Britain has no interest in opposing the claims of Germany to colonial mandates. Great Britain has an empire large enough to satisfy the most voracious appetite. Her task is the development of what she has, not the addition of more territory to her responsibilities. The settlement of Germany's claim to colonial mandates must be the outcome of friendly bargaining. The mistake made in 1919 will have to be tacitly admitted. Some of the territory then seized had been acquired by Germany by purchase, other parts had been ceded for concessions elsewhere. Some of the areas now administered under mandate by other Great Powers would have to be transferred to Germany. When Germany enters the League the whole question of colonial mandates will naturally be reopened.

Mr. Asquith said in the early days of the war: "The aim of the Allies in this war is to smooth the path to an international system insuring the principle of equal rights for all civilized nations." That must now be the practical aim of the late Allies, who, in the matter of extending equal rights in regard to colonial mandates, will be supported by the smaller nations.

The peace of the world, which is a vital interest of every nation, demands the just settlement of this problem of colonization. It will involve the surrender of mandates now exercised, but that is a small matter compared with the denial of equal rights to Germany and the certain consequences which would eventually follow a policy of exclusion. There are precedents of recent date in transfers by Great Britain to Italy and Belgium.

It is of vital international concern to bring the spirit of amity and conciliation to the solution of this perplexing and menacing problem of colonial mandates, assuring always that the mandatory Power exercises its trusteeship, first of all, for the well-being and progress of the native peoples.

Two Unpublished Tales

By HANS CHRISTIAN ANDERSEN

[Georg Brandes once wrote to Hans Christian Andersen: "You are the writer who has done more wrong to criticism than any other, who has supported all popular prejudices against this art and has brought upon it contempt and scorn." These two hitherto unknown tales illustrate what Brandes meant. Andersen, however, thought so well of them that he made three versions of one, though they were never published during his lifetime and were only recently discovered. They illustrate not only Andersen's charm, but also his almost morbid sensitiveness to criticism. The translations printed below are from the German of the Berliner Tageblatt of April 9.]

Quack

THE birds of the forest sat on the branches of the trees where they really had leaves enough. But there were some who insisted on having a new good leaf, a leaf which they fervently desired, a critical leaf* of the kind which men have in such abundance and of which half would be more than enough.

The song-birds wanted musical criticism, each for his own praise and for the censure of others—where there was cause for censure. But they could not agree where an impartial critic might be found.

"It must be a bird," said the Owl, who had been elected chairman of the meeting—since she was the bird of wisdom. "He can hardly be chosen from another species of animals, unless perhaps he might come out of the water. There the fish fly about as the birds do in the air; to be sure that is the only family likeness. But there are other animals which are neither birds nor fish."

Here the Stork asked for the floor. He clattered: "Yes, there are beings between the fish and the birds, creatures of the swamps—the frogs. These I nominate. They are very musical; they sing in chorus like chimes

* There is a play on words here which cannot be reproduced in English. Blatt, means "leaf," but it also means "journal," and is so translated throughout the remainder of the tale.

in the lonely wood. My peace is gone and I grow very restless when I hear them sing."

"I am for the frogs, too," said the Heron. "They are neither birds nor fish, but they dwell with the fish and they sing like the birds."

"That would settle the musical end," said the Owl. "But this journal must deal with everything beautiful in the forest. There must be collaborators. Let each review his family for possible candidates."

Then the little Lark sang, beautifully and unconcerned: "The Frog must not be editor-in-chief. Oh no! The Nightingale must be that."

"Stop that squeaking!" said the Owl; "I hoot for order! I know the Nightingale. We are both nightbirds. Each bird sings according to his bill. Neither she nor I must be chosen. Otherwise this journal would take on the character of an aristocratic, a philosophic, a beaumonde sheet, in which only the distinguished had a part. But it must also be the organ of the common man."

It was proposed to call it Morning Quack or Evening Quack or merely Quack. The last was finally agreed upon.

Thus a long-felt need of the woods would be relieved. The Bee, the Ant, and the Mole promised to write about industry and engineering. They were experts in that.

The Cuckoo was a nature poet. He was not really counted among the song-birds, but was of the greatest importance for the common man. "He is advertising his own work everywhere; he is the vainest of the birds and yet he looks so plain," said the peacock.

Then the Blue-Bottles came to the editor: "We offer our services. We know men; we understand this business of editing; we are well versed in criticism. We sit down on fresh meat, soil it with filth—and it is spoiled before a day is past. We can annihilate a talent, if necessary, in the service of the editor. As a partisan sheet, one may attain such a position of eminence that one can afford to be vulgar. If one subscriber is lost, sixteen others will be gained. Be blunt, call vile names, place in the pillory, whistle with your fingers like the gamin of the street—and you are a power in the state."

"Such a windbag!" the Frog said about the Stork. "To think that I actually thought myself the smaller and looked up to him and felt a trembling veneration for him! And when he paraded about in the swamp and spoke of Egypt, how my horizon was widened to extend to far-distant, wonderful lands! But now he does not impress me any more. All that was but plagiarism and imitation. I have grown wiser, more thoughtful, more important. I write critical articles in Quack. I am what is called in good English a quack-mouth! The species is also found among men. I wrote a feuilleton on that in our last issue."

The Copy Clerk

THERE was an official, part of whose duty it was to be also a good penman. He was well fitted for his office, but he could not write very legibly. He therefore inserted an advertisement in the paper to obtain someone who could. So many answered the advertisement that he could have filled a barrel with the applications. But one was sufficient, and he employed the first that came. This person wrote a hand that was as beautiful as that of a calligraphic machine. The official had the brains to write intelligently. And since his documents were done in such beautiful script all the people said: "That is very well written."

"I did that," said the copy clerk, whose mind was in fact not worth a farthing. After he had listened to praise for an entire week, he grew vain and wanted to take the place of the official.

He might really have been an excellent teacher of penmanship and looked well at tea parties with a white neckerchief. But now he wanted to excel all other writers. So he wrote about painters and sculptors, about the theater and music.

He published terrible stuff, and when it became too stupid, he stated the next day that it had been a printer's error.

Everything he wrote was a printer's error, and in print one could unfortunately not see the beautiful handwriting which was his chief asset.

"I can annihilate; I can raise to the heavens! I am a devil of a fellow, a little god—and not such a little one at that!"

That was the raving of a megalomaniac. He died of it and received a handsome obituary notice in the papers. Now, was that not a sad thing, to be praised by a friend who really knew how to invent tales, when his whole life, with its brag and blow and bluster, was nothing but a miserable invention itself?

In the Driftway

THE Drifter has a friend, skeptical by nature and by training, who teaches history in a large Eastern university. There is one story he always tells his students in American history—a story which he recently also told the Drifter. As a boy, so it goes, the Drifter's friend was taken to visit a churchyard in northern New York. On an elegant headstone, placed there by the Daughters of the American Revolution, he read that his illustrious forefather, Peleg by name, had been a Major in the War for Independence; that he had been close friend and companion of Washington, and finally, at Valley Forge, aide-de-camp of the General. The boy descendant of this glorious warrior was mightily impressed. As he grew older his interest in Peleg increased, and he decided to consult the records and learn the thrilling details of this courageous career which had long been one of the most honored of the family traditions.

* * * * *

PELEG, it seemed, lived in the old family home in a New Hampshire village when the Revolution broke out. Early in the war he served two enlistments, five months in all. He spent this period in Boston, where he may have seen Washington. By the end of the five months he had reached the rank of Sergeant Major, in the Quartermaster's Corps. When his second enlistment expired, Peleg returned to the farm in New Hampshire and, like his neighbors, forgot all about the war. Two years later, when it seemed likely that Burgoyne, on his way down from Canada, might choose a way through New Hampshire, the State woke up to the fact that a war was going on, and assigned quotas to the towns of the State. Peleg's home village was asked to contribute six soldiers. A town meeting was convened—all this is a matter of record—and volunteers were asked for. Two men volunteered. But six had to go. Consternation reigned. Finally, the meeting voted to give one hundred hard dollars to each of four men who would go to war. In those days a hundred hard dollars was a good-sized fortune—an excellent farm could be bought with it—and four young men, among them Peleg, consented to fight for their country. Then, however, the two volunteers struck. They refused to enlist unless they too were paid one hundred hard dollars each. The town meeting could not refuse. So six young men with six hundred hard New Hampshire dollars to their credit set out for the war. Somewhere in New Hampshire they joined the State regiment and Peleg at once took his former rank of Sergeant Major in the Quartermaster's Corps. The regiment finally pushed on to Fort Ticonderoga. On the way they fought a few skirmishes with the British but, to quote his descendant, "since Peleg was probably sorting peas it is doubtful whether he ever saw a red-coat." For a year and a half Peleg stayed safely at Ticonderoga, a Sergeant Major in the Quartermaster's Corps. At the end of that time he obtained a discharge on the ground of ill health and returned to New Hampshire. Less than a year later there is recorded a letter from the town clerk protesting Peleg's discharge. The clerk stated that because of the discharge the town meeting had had to vote another hundred dollars to provide a substitute, while Peleg, whose health seemed unimpaired, had married and was raising a family. The protest came to naught. From here on the records are voiceless until years later when Peleg's application for a pension, sent from somewhere in New York State, is recorded. It was granted without protest. The Revolution was already taking on the aura of glory, which has become blinding with the years.

* * * * *

"MY students," concluded the Drifter's friend, "laugh heartily at my ancestor. But I have my inning too; for the laugh gives way to rather resentful consternation when I remark at the end of the hour: 'Remember, please, that that was the Spirit of '76.'" THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Our Airfleet a Century Ago

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: War with Japan is again predicted in the daily papers and in magazines, and in Hector Bywater's "1931: The Great Pacific War" a whole book is devoted to the anticipation of this calamity.

Perhaps the writers of these modern fantasies, as we would fain hope their productions will turn out to be, and some of your readers will learn with interest, if they do not already know of it, that a war between Japan and the United States was foreseen one hundred years ago; not only that, but the destruction of Tokio by an "imperial American airfleet" (Kaiserlich Amerikanische Luftflotte) was also foretold. This prediction, with an illustration showing what the prophet conceived an airship to be like, may be found mentioned in an interesting volume: "Johann Konrad Friederich, ein vergessener Schriftsteller," by F. C. Ebrard and Louis Liebmann. Frankfurt, 1918. Page 112.

San Francisco, June 13 L. N.

Is Grammar Bunk?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: "A Young Conservative" writes you in protest against "a rebel who states that usage alone determines correct English and that rules of grammar are the bunk." Who's a rebel and who's a conservative? The "Art of Poetry," containing the words "usus, penes quem est jus et norma loquendi," was written by Horace, who died before the birth of Christ. This "Art of Poetry" immediately took rank as one of the most classic manuals of the rules of style, and has maintained that rank to this day. Does this Conservative know of any equally early attempt to propagate the heresy that rules of grammar were the thing to look to?

Ballard Vale, Mass., April 20 STEVEN T. BYINGTON

They Starve in Bulgaria

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have received a letter from a friend in Bulgaria giving facts which will, I believe, interest readers of The Nation. If anyone should care to send money for the relief of the persons whose plight is described and others in similar circumstances, I can guarantee that the author of this letter will handle such funds wisely and conscientiously.

> Now I have a special question to ask and a request to make. The widow of the poet George Mileff, who died a martyr—killed without a trial—is in desperate need. She has heard through a sister-in-law in America that Bulgarians in Chicago are interested in his writing. He wrote in behalf of the oppressed people and against the political slaughter we have here from time to time. I wonder whether some help would come to her if one were to have some of his poems translated and printed as a little booklet.
>
> Then I wondered whether you have any way of making an appeal for funds or small gifts to help these destitute widows of writers, journalists, and other intelligent men who were killed so unjustly. A committee from the English Labor Party came last summer and raised quite a fund in England to help sufferers through the winter. But now the fund is exhausted, and yet there is a great economic crisis, shortage of work, low wages, people failing in business, etc. There is a girl taking meals at —— whose father has been sentenced to lifelong imprisonment and whose mother has gone crazy and is being taken care of by her mother. Judging by the girl and her aunt, a medical doctor who was also interned for a while, her father is probably as innocent as you or I. His mistake lay in having belonged to the "accused" party. The girl has been helped by the committee, but she is a schoolgirl and one wonders what will become of her next. Recently I heard of a whole family's having disappeared last spring excepting the old grandmother whom they did not see and who was too deaf to hear the commotion. Those who have lost the bread-winner have not even been given a death certificate so that they might draw on their insurance money. I know a former minister's wife who manages to sew five jersey blouses a day and receives 50 leva, or about 35 cents, for all this work to support her two children. . . .

New York, June 20 ANNA ROCHESTER

[Contributions sent in care of The Nation will be forwarded to the writer of this letter.—EDITOR THE NATION.]

Listen!

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Permit me to congratulate you on the book number just at hand. Your book reviews are always fearless, honest, and dependable. One is always safe in going by them in the purchase of new books.

Bay City, Michigan, June 9 WILLARD E. KING

Books

First Glance

HOW much of the Pepys who is familiar to us through the "Diary" is to be come upon in the two volumes of the "Private Correspondence and Miscellaneous Papers of Samuel Pepys: 1679-1703," edited by J. R. Tanner from the Pepys Cockerell Collection (Harcourt, Brace: $12.50), may be gathered from three facts: that most of the letters published therein are by others than Pepys himself, that a great many of the subjects discussed have only a remote connection with his familiar life, and that when he does speak he speaks chiefly out of his seventh decade. The "Diary" was kept between his twenty-seventh and thirty-sixth years; the present papers, although they introduce him at forty-six, really become consecutive as he is nearing sixty. The Pepys of a hundred amours, then, and the Pepys who bickered with his dear wife, and the Pepys who ran literally everywhere after news and seemed to have the knack of appearing in ten important parts of London at once—this Pepys is gone. In his place we have a man already old, a man frequently in pain from the same stone which caused so much comment in the "Diary," and a man so sober as he looks at life that he has little patience with the generation growing up around him. The most charming portion of the correspondence printed here is composed of the letters which passed between Pepys and the even older John Evelyn; and the bond between these gentlemen was more than anything else, I am sure, their agreement upon the badness of the age. "Never was this Nation," wrote Evelyn to his friend in 1701, "so atheistical, false, and un-steady; covetous, selfe intrested, impudently detracting and uncharitable; ingratefull, lewd, and luxurious; in summe, so universaly vitious, dissolute, and perverted." Pepys was milder than that, but he could write to Dr. Charlett of "gross, contagious, and destructive pleasures" which contemporary youth in his view found too attractive. Gone is the Pepys who sat up late at night confiding to himself that he had kissed more than one willing cheek that day.

Yet he is not gone either. Pepys, examined closely enough, seems after all of a piece. The significant fact about the earlier man was that he did keep a diary, that he did make his entries in it secret. The world knew him then as one curious after respectable knowledge and experience. It is as such a one that he appears in these letters, and it is certainly as such a one that first and last he liked to think of himself. Here, at any rate, is the Pepys who was both curious and respectable—the historian of the British navy, the antiquarian, the collector, the bibliophile, the amateur scientist and mathematician, the poker into mysteries. Here, in a word, is the "virtuoso"; a virtuoso being by Evelyn's definition one with the capacity to "know, and (which is more) effect, a world of ingenius things without vanity," and by Pepys's own definition one aware of the blessed fact "that nothing that brings knowledge with it can be either tedious, unprofitable, or unpleasant." Pepys as correspondent with the astronomer Wallis, with the antiquarians Wanley and Hickes, and with Isaac Newton; Pepys as inquirer into the "second sight" of Scotch Highlanders; Pepys as encourager of new schemes in education; Pepys as collector of prints, portraits, manuscripts, medals, and historical evidences; Pepys as monitor to his nephew John Jackson, who on his tour of Europe must "pry and ask questions" and write home every particular—this Pepys is abundantly here. And he is less interesting than the immortal Pepys only in so far as learning is less interesting than love.

MARK VAN DOREN

An Early Master

Charles Bulfinch, Architect and Citizen. By Charles A. Place. Houghton Mifflin Company. $15.

THE life of Charles Bulfinch bridged a great historical chasm. Educated in Boston during the Revolution, he knew it as a small colonial port city whose architecture was dominantly Colonial English; by the time of his death, in 1844, American architecture had set out on its own eclectic course, American life had begun to develop those special characteristics that we recognize as ours today. Mr. Place's book gives a new opportunity to evaluate the part which Bulfinch played in this change, and some little insight into the reaction those changes produced in him. In addition it is indispensable to anyone interested in the origins of American taste.

Bulfinch was more than an architect; he was by inheritance as well as by experience a public character. His family was wealthy, distinguished—one suspects, at heart rather Tory. His father was a financier as well as a doctor; in 1787 he contributed largely to the fund that sent Kendrick and Gray cruising on the Pacific Coast; his money helped buy and equip the Columbia, whose name was given to the river Gray discovered. Thus from an early day Bulfinch must have been in close touch with the excitement and later the inflation due to the sudden expansion of the new nation. And it would seem that this excitement, with its consequent urge to speculate, penetrated and fired his imagination.

Mr. Place gives a detailed and valuable account of Bulfinch's public service. He was particularly interested in the question of new streets, new land, new bridges. He was an ardent town planner. He designed the development of the old Mill Pond; he assisted in planning the newly made land around Washington Street. He recognized the practical as well as the aesthetic basis of town planning in almost a modern way; his scheme for Broad Street and the India Wharf Development proves this, just as the dignified simplicity of the India Wharf stores show his skill in the straightforward design of industrial buildings.

It was this interest in the physical betterment of Boston, combined with a thirst for speculation strange in a man so retiring, that brought Bulfinch twice into disaster. First, there was his scheme for Franklin Place, a crescent of simple connected houses in the English manner. This "Tontine Crescent" was an ambitious design for twenty-four houses of large and ample dignity. Bulfinch had not the capital to swing it himself, and one by one his partners and backers withdrew. The result was inevitable bankruptcy, in 1796, and the loss of the entire family fortune. But the houses were built; for years they were among the pleasantest and most-sought-after dwellings of their type in the town. And fifteen years later he again ran into trouble with real estate. His acquaintances were making fortunes in filled Back Bay lots; he owned a tract, spent a great deal of money in it, could not sell at once, was pressed by his creditors, and actually spent a month in a debtors' jail!

The moment one examines the designs which Mr. Place so lavishly illustrates, the inexplicable mystery of the creation of beauty in art arises. For Bulfinch was never a great architect in the sense that Brunelleschi or Michelangelo or Bertram Goodhue were great. His originality was strictly limited, his taste at times at fault. And yet building after building lasts today not only as a monument to its time but also itself as a living inspiration; the west façade of the United States Capitol—Bulfinch's contribution—is one of its loveliest features.

Bulfinch seems rather the careful craftsman than the brilliant creator. Mr. Place shows his debt to Somerset House in London for the Boston Capitol; at Washington he merely improved upon that. His houses are monotonously similar. His use of a square-headed window under a brick relieving arch became an obsession. And yet the whole lasts—and lasts, it would seem, for two reasons. The first is a prophetic sensitiveness to the popular taste of his time which makes his work almost impersonal in its perfect expressiveness. But if this sensitiveness kept him from aberrations and gave to all his work its peculiar appropriateness, it was another factor that raised it to a high plane—a deep and quiet reverence for beauty. This took the place of genius and sometimes it was genius. It was a little thin, perhaps, a little retiring and aristocratic, this beauty which Bulfinch so carefully and seriously served, but it was none the less real for that. It makes even the austere simplicity of his Boston houses a precious satisfaction. When the style and the problem were familiar the beauty becomes, with Bulfinch, the more sure; yet even the labored effort of his Gothic church and the queer complexities which his lack of technical skill sometimes produced are witnesses of his constant struggle to achieve perfection with an uncomprehended medium. And when the medium was perfectly comprehended at last Bulfinch achieved definite greatness. The church at Lancaster, Massachusetts, is the climax. Not seeking originality as an end, it achieves intense personal originality in spite of itself. In every line of it, from the slim brick arches of the porch, or the plain solid railings of the gallery stair, to the restrained grace of the cupola and the richness of the white pulpit, the spirit of living beauty is incarnate, come down to dwell in a Massachusetts town. The worshiper has created his god.

One wonders what sort of man this was, actually, in daily life. And it is here that Mr. Place is disappointing. It is the one fault in a volume otherwise exceedingly valuable. From this careful, stimulating study of background, of public service, of architectural design, there comes no sense of a living character. A mass of contradictions around a continually elusive personality—this is how the story reads.

TALBOT FAULKNER HAMLIN

Asia

Mesopotamia: The Babylonian and Assyrian Civilization. By L. Delaporte. Alfred A. Knopf. $5.
The Aegean Civilization. By George Glotz. Alfred A. Knopf. $6.
The Peoples of Asia. By L. H. Dudley Buxton. Alfred A. Knopf. $5.

THE book named here in the third place is an excellent justification of the Kahn system of fellowships, for that system gave Mr. Buxton his first-hand acquaintance with Asia and enabled him to produce the best general book on the complex humanity of the continent which has yet appeared in any language. I disclaim all right to estimate either his thoroughness or his adequacy in the elaborate discussion of the races of Southeastern Asia, but I am satisfied that the peoples of Western Asia are well and soundly discussed. One is interested to see that he stands bravely by the Arabian origin of the Semites, but avoids a decision as to the origin or ancient home of the Sumerians, whom he would include in his special classification of Armenoid types—which I doubt very much. If there be any lack in the anthropological description and classification I should say it must be sought in the treatment of the Semites, for the discussion is both scattered and sketchy.

The other two volumes, translated from the French, originally appeared in the "Bibliothèque de Synthèse Historique" and in the series "L'Evolution de l'Humanité," of which the brilliant Henri Berr is editor. The French series is conceived upon a large scale, for no less than twenty-six of its volumes are assigned to antiquity. They are marvels of cheapness at twenty francs each, are well printed on a tough paper, and are adequately if not elegantly illustrated. The English series, edited by C. K. Ogden, with Harry E. Barnes as American consulting editor, are much handsomer books than their French originals, and the price has accordingly risen to five or six dollars a volume. The two which here come under notice are fortunate in their authors, since Gustave Glotz is one of the foremost Hellenists of our day and none of the distinguished company of French Orientalists is better fitted to discuss the tangled problem of Babylonian and Assyrian civilization than is M. Delaporte.

M. Glotz has written a big book on the splendid civilization which preceded the Greek. The basis for all his work is prevailingly archaeological, for he begins with Schliemann in 1875 at Troy, Mycenae, and Tiryns, and finds his climax in Knossos under Sir Arthur J. Evans from 1900 to 1905 and 1924. After a general introduction he divides his material into four books: Material Life, Social Life, Religious Life, Artistic and Intellectual Life. In these he finds space to picture the physical type; dress; arms and armor; the house and the place; the social system and government; agriculture; industry; trade; international relations; fetishism; the anthropomorphic divinities; places of worship; religious ceremonies; the cult of the dead; games; art; writing and language. It is, indeed, a comprehensive survey of all that is at present known of a civilization which begins more than 3,000 years before the Christian era. The story is exceedingly well told, with characteristic French clarity and warmth. To M. Glotz the people who made Crete so glorious in a period so remote become living human beings whose achievement must be celebrated as not merely equal but far superior to the best that the Orient had to offer. Here and there one may see evidence of exaggeration, of an unintentional effort to belittle some other civilization that the Aegean may come to greater honor. A very interesting sign of this is to be seen in the mention of the Phoenicians, whose achievement M. Berr in the foreword thinks much exaggerated; and M. Glotz supports him. M. Berr says that "Phoenician supremacy in the Mediterranean dates from about 1100 to 800," and M. Glotz disparages the race as alphabet-makers, saying boldly: "The Phoenicians have shown no inventive genius here any more than in other things." But, alas! for too much confidence, for in a chapter of Corrections and Additions M. Glotz must needs record Montet's discovery at Byblos of a tomb contemporary with Rameses II, with an epitaph of King Ahiram in Phoenician characters. This carries the Phoenician alphabet two hundred years earlier than either author would apparently have placed it. But it is a small matter in such a distinguished book.

M. Delaporte has also produced a book of high quality, but the subject is much too large for even so large a canvas. M. Delaporte surmounts the difficulties by scamping those portions which have received most attention from his predecessors. His introduction gives a sketch of the processes of excavation and decipherment which is too thin to be intelligible to any reader not previously informed. In the same way he has sketched the political history far too briefly to present any real picture. He has forty-four pages for Babylonian and twenty-seven for Assyrian history, and the reader will therefore still be compelled to turn, for this side of the matter, to King, Rogers, or Olmstead. But the space which he has thus saved is admirably and adequately used to describe institutions, beliefs, crafts, arts, letters, and sciences. Nor is there anywhere else a survey so excellent, a picture so vivid and so soundly based. The maps are poor and the illustrations ill produced. One must go for these to other monographs and be here content with a bibliography that is comprehensive, accurate, and extensive.

ROBERT W. ROGERS

India's Struggle

India in 1924-25. A Statement Prepared for Presentation to Parliament. By L. F. Rushbrook Williams, Director of Public Information, Government of India. New York: British Library of Information. 3/.

THIS statement treats of local administration, economic developments, social problems, political cruces—in short, everything that touches India materially and some things that concern her spiritually. It would not satisfy, and is not meant to satisfy, the specialist who wants to see statistics, sources; it usually restricts itself to generalities and conclusions. For the non-specialist it should prove adequate in its account of recent economic history and its description of administrative development. But when it comes to political dissension, particularly in the chapter called Parties and Politics, opinions may well differ, even on generalities. In such a controversial field the Government's spokesman is in the nature of things likely to view matters from the Government's point of view.

This portion of the book, in our opinion, is not trustworthy. We may take up a few points as illustrations. First, we cannot agree that the Hindu-Mohammedan outbreaks in 1924 and later are the result of Gandhi's emphatic preaching of the prime need for a spiritual regeneration of India. Such outbreaks have been common for the last thousand years. It is as unfair to blame them on Gandhi as it is to ascribe them to government intrigue. Gandhi preached and practiced religious toleration and, in 1921-22, for the first time in India's history, united the two warring communities. He is even now the most powerful voice calling for quiet upon those troubled waters. The political leaders of the two communities are in essential agreement, for they, like the British, realize that this strife is the one thing that makes easy the foreigner's grip; it is the rank and file that cannot see the value of compromise. Religion to them is more important than politics.

Again, Mr. Rushbrook Williams's disapproval of the Swarajist obstructionist tactics in the legislative bodies is not shared by the majority of Indian Nationalists, as events showed last August when all the elected Indian members of the Legislative Assembly united to defeat the Government. These tactics have placed the Government in the illogical position of enforcing measures that have been formally repudiated by the country's properly elected representatives, of perpetuating a system of government whose unpopularity cannot be denied. They may be injurious to the Indian constitution, but they are at the same time an effective political weapon.

Or again, he speaks of the Sikh situation, referring first to the "dramatic" events at Jaito in February, 1924. (These events culminated in the soldiery shooting down Sikh pilgrims —19 killed, 32 wounded, no casualties among the soldiers. We should have used a different adjective.) He tells us that "as the year proceeded . . . a sense of discouragement set in [among the Sikhs]." This discouragement, we might comment, was of such a sort that about every four weeks after the "dramatic events" at Jaito a new body of pilgrims, 500 strong, set out for the shrine, financed by the Sikh community, each body aware that it would be arrested when it neared Jaito and thrown into indefinite confinement. About eighteen months later the discouraged Sikhs found their question settled by a statute in the Punjab Legislative Council that granted all their religious demands, and they were many—although ignoring political matters—and last August the seventeenth pilgrimage was finally allowed to enter Jaito and perform its ceremonies. If this be the conduct of a small Indian community when suffering "a sense of discouragement," we gasp to think what the result will be if ever the Indians as a whole come to feel encouraged.

But let us not be misunderstood. The British are no disinterested party in India. Yet their exploitation of the country is far less ruthless than is frequently claimed. India has always been more than 90 per cent agricultural, and still is. The British occupation has affected the economic order of the land chiefly by destroying many of the ancient handicrafts, but these were bound to perish anyhow as soon as they came into conflict with any machine industry, British or other. The present issue in India is not a struggle between the Indian people and the British; it is a struggle between the Indian bourgeoisie and the British for the control of the country. Just a little less than 3 per cent of the population have the franchise, and neither the Nationalists nor the Government seems definitely to plan increasing the number. The struggle is important, but it is nothing like so fundamental as was that between the Russian proletariat and the Czar's government.

W. NORMAN BROWN

G. Stanley Hall

G. Stanley Hall. A Biography of Mind. By Lorine Pruette. D. Appleton and Company. $2.50.

MISS PRUETTE has performed a difficult task very skilfully. Dr. Hall not only provoked a weird variety of reactions from his contemporaries, professional and lay; he was a complex man and a productive scholar. This psychograph seeks to present a rounded and accurate picture of the man. He was not able fully to reveal himself even in his "Life and Confessions of a Psychologist." He inevitably swung, in that book, from himself to his ideas, and a more accurate title for it would have been, perhaps, "A History of the Ideas of G. Stanley Hall." To be sure the early chapters dealing with his boyhood are vivid and memorable, but I do not recall that he gave his intimate reactions to his disastrous marriages, to his troubles with Jonas Clark, the financial founder of Clark University, or to the decline of the university under W. W. Atwood. Miss Pruette manages to tell or suggest the whole story. Her book is an admirable piece of work.

Dr. Hall was a New Englander by ancestry, birth, and training. He was born in the forties of the last century of a deeply religious mother and a stern, exacting father. His higher education was obtained at Williams College, then under the control of Mark Hopkins. He studied for the ministry. After two periods of study in Europe, the first devoted chiefly to philosophy and the second to psychology, he founded the first psychological laboratory in the United States at Johns Hopkins. From there he was called to Worcester, where he undertook the role of intellectual founder of Clark. In spite of his disastrous relations with Jonas Clark and his domestic troubles he succeeded in making Clark internationally known in the field of psychology. His own labors were stupendous, and his able faculty were equally laborious. Almost to a man they were pioneers. Rarely has any intellectual worker so completely transcended his personal and administrative troubles as did Dr. Hall.

Behind these bare facts there was, naturally enough, an amazing man. Dr. Hall was caught up by the evolutionary optimism of his time. His great contribution to psychology was the genetic principle, which, however much it may be assailed, can never be ignored. But he was not a laboratory worker, for the whole bias of his mind was toward the problems of life. His psychology tended therefore to lead him into a wide variety of fields otherwise separated by the rampant specialization of the time. Perhaps his most highly regarded work is "Adolescence." His book on Jesus Christ summed up his explorations in the field of religion. He dealt with the problems of sex at a time when the taboos against a discussion of it were extremely active. It is significant that he was the first American academician to recognize Freud. Not only did he ardently seek to discover values but he earnestly strove to put his discoveries at the disposal of others. He wanted to improve the world. Both from his New England heritage of deep seriousness and from his ministerial training he got a hortatory turn of mind that frequently alienated his most ardent admirers. In spite of the fact that he was notably a pioneer in the field of sex, his views on the subject are now outmoded. It is characteristic of him that he placed the emphasis on the desirability of sublimation either into scholarship or into art.

What will undoubtedly sustain his fame for many years to come is his very great service as an adventurous iconoclastic pioneer. This quality connects him with what is finest in the New England tradition, with Emerson and Thoreau. Both his greatnesses and his defects are rooted in his New England background. Nevertheless what he gave to the world was peculiarly his own.

C. HARTLEY GRATTAN

Family History

Factors in American History. By A. F. Pollard. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

PROFESSOR POLLARD'S book is entitled to be judged by its purpose as well as by its contribution to a knowledge of American history, but the two standards are not the same and their application leads to somewhat different conclusions. Delivered in the first instance as lectures on the Sir George Watson Foundation for American History, Literature, and Institutions, the book aims primarily to inform and interest English readers in American history. The task is a considerable one, for the study of American history has practically no place in the curricula of English schools, and what has been attempted in recent years in the universities does not reach far. Whether the point of view which Professor Pollard expounds, however, or the method which he adopts will greatly stimulate the interest which he would like to see aroused is a matter regarding which English and American readers are possibly not of the same opinion.

"American history," Professor Pollard declares, "is as much a continuation of medieval English history as is the modern history of the mother country; since 1776 they have developed on independent but parallel lines. We can no more understand them in isolation than we can write a family history by following the fortunes of one of the sons alone." Professor Pollard is too sound a scholar to warrant a critic in saying lightly that he has used the term medieval in a loose sense, but the connection which he emphasizes nevertheless seems forced. Medieval England, at least in the usual scholarly acceptation of the term, had been left far behind before the permanent English settlement of America began, and it was a distinctly modern England whose institutions were, to some extent, transplanted to the New World. Almost equally forced seems the attempt to emphasize the "parallel lines" of development since 1776. Certain common traditions the two countries have carried on, of course, and time has brought a good many points of contact, some of them friendly, some of them acid, but the common principles upon which Professor Pollard dwells have too many exceptions and too many independent and rather unrelated lines of development to make the argument wholly convincing.

If the theory is open to question, so also is the method of expounding it. As is likely to be the case where interpretation is the primary aim, the book will be most useful to readers who already know pretty well the historical story in detail, but the data relied upon to illustrate the thesis are mainly political, and politics is very far from being the whole of American life. The result is a series of generalizations, many of them acute and some of them more than ordinarily suggestive, but not seldom of a kind from which American scholars would incline to draw back. One cannot but admire the friendly temper in which the book is conceived and the more agreeable style in which it is written, but it leaves in the end more an impression of cordial idealism on behalf of Anglo-American amity than of a profound discussion of the factors that have made American history what it is.

WILLIAM MACDONALD

Drama

Four Notes

THE GRAND STREET FOLLIES (Neighborhood Playhouse).

Not quite so good as last year but still funny. Mrs. Feitelbaum gives an account of "The Dybbuk," and some unnamed genius stages "Uncle Tom's Cabin" after the manner of the Russian "Carmen," with a chorus of black mammies on the platform.

THE MERRY WORLD REVIEW (Imperial Theater).

The Messrs. Shubert in conjunction with Albert de Courtville combine the English and American type of review in an effort to retain the best features of both. They are measurably successful and in the Ceinture de Chastité scene they introduce a topic, fertile in double-entendres, which has hitherto been neglected in America.

THE MAN FROM TORONTO (Selwyn Theater).

A farce comedy which is rather amusing in spite of the fact that it turns upon one of those wills which provide that some one will lose a lot of money if he does not marry some one else.

NO FOOLIN' (Globe Theater).

Not only glorifies the American girl but introduces Mr. Ziegfeld as a champion of purity who calls attention to the fact that there is not one of his performers who does not wear something. His modesty exceeds that of the Shuberts by at least three inches of gauze, but the exact significance of this in spiritual terms has not yet been determined. There is a gorgeous finale to the First Part, called "In the Luminous Ball."

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

THEATRE

THE GRAND STREET FOLLIES
4th Annual Revue of NEIGHBORHOOD
Playhouse, 466 Grand St. Dry dock 7516.
Evenings (Except Mon.) at 8:20
Matinees Saturdays.

THE THEATRE GUILD Presents
AT MRS. BEAM'S
A Comedy by C. K. MUNRO
with ESTELLE WINWOOD, JEAN CADELL, EARL LARIMORE, HELEN WESTLEY, HENRY TRAVERS AND OTHERS.
GUILD THEATRE, 52nd St., West of B'way. Evs. 8:30. Matinees THURS. and SAT., 2:30.

DEBATE

SESQUICENTENNIAL DEBATE
George Hiram Mann, Nat'l Security League
Jay Lovestone, Workers Party
RESOLVED: That the present form of government is not in the interest of the American Masses.
CENTRAL OPERA HOUSE, 67th St. & 3rd Ave., N. Y. C.
Friday, July 16, 8 P. M. Admission 35c.
Auspices of the Workers School

International Relations Section

Hauptmann Declines an Honor

GERHART HAUPTMANN, Germany's foremost poet, declined membership in the proposed German Academy of Poetry in the following letter, printed in the Berliner Tageblatt for May 27:

Agnetendorf, May 20, 1926

MY DEAR MR. MINISTER:

Returning after an extended journey I find a letter from the Ministry of Science, Art, and Education, in which I am invited to become a member of the newly founded section for poetry in the Prussian Academy of Arts. Fully and gratefully appreciating the great distinction and honor intended, it is doubly hard for me to do what nevertheless must be done, namely, to ask that I be permitted to decline membership in this s ction.

However much I may regard an academy of science, an academy of plastic arts and music as a necessity for the state (since these are fields which require cooperative work and include many state-supported schools), nevertheless I cannot convince myself that the state has any need of an academy of poetry. The more I think of it, the less I am convinced. There is no need for a board of poets to establish and distribute state help. Only a few cultured and well-disposed men of tact and taste are necessary.

The proposed section gives me little hope of aiding the broader and higher tasks of poetry and of giving it responsible guidance. There is no such thing as conscious leadership in the domain of poetry. Official leaders of poetry are a novelty which would properly excite opposition among free poets. As far as I am concerned I cannot claim for myself either an unconscious or a conscious position of leadership. If I, like other artists and writers, have made an impression on men as men, it is enough.

Thus you find me, Mr. Minister, on the side of those who even before my day have opposed the creation of an academy of poetry. I am certain that you will not expect me to do otherwise than frankly to admit this. Far be it from me, however, to criticize in any way the opposing opinion or the noble resolution of the Ministry. For myself and only for myself my conviction must be law.

With the sincerest feelings of respect,

GERHART HAUPTMANN

Private Bersot's Trousers

UNDER this caption the Paris correspondent of the Vienna Arbeiter-Zeitung tells how a French veterans' organization is fighting to redeem the honor of their fellows sacrificed in the grotesque tragedies of the war-time courts martial.

The French Union of Combatants and Cripples has adopted a sensational resolution. It intends to review, as described below, all criminal verdicts handed down by French courts martial during the World War which are objected to as unjust, either by the victims themselves or, in case of capital sentences, by their surviving kinsfolk. Out of its own membership (exceeding 100,000), the union will draw juries to hold open sessions, examine witnesses, invite expert opinions, and pass upon evidence. These popular courts, to be sure, will have no power to summon witnesses, but it is expected that the pressure of public opinion will serve, even in the case of general officers required to testify, in lieu of legal constraint. The entire action was suggested to the union partly by the legal efforts of the League for the Rights of Man to bring about a revision of the most scandalous injustices of the French courts martial during the World War, and partly by the immense popular acclaim of a book by R. G. Réau, recently published, entitled "Les Crimes des Conseils de Guerre" (Paris, 1926, Progrès Civique).

I understand that the first of these jury trials will shortly take place. It will deal with the affair of Private Bersot—a case so revolting and, at the same time, so characteristic of the routine of court-martial procedure as to deserve international notoriety.

In February, 1915, the Sixtieth (infantry) Regiment had its quarters in Fontenoy, near the firing-line. Bersot, a shop-assistant from Besançon, had been wearing for some time a pair of dirty "white" canvass trousers, riddled with holes. He importuned his sergeant for several weeks with requests for a new pair. To this repeated requisition the sergeant turned a deaf ear. Finally, on February 12, he handed the importunate private a pair of filthy, blood-bespattered trousers just stripped from the body of one of the killed. Bersot refused them and insisted upon a new pair. During the ensuing dispute his company chief, Lieutenant André, appeared. The sergeant reported the private, and the lieutenant called the attention of the recalcitrant to the fact that his refusal was equivalent to mutiny in the presence of the enemy. It should be noted that the company was not on the firing-line, and that there were no active hostilities at that time within the sector. André put Bersot under arrest and reported the incident to the commander of the regiment, Colonel Auroux, a martinet whose cruelty had made him an object of bitter hatred among the soldiery. Intense excitement seized the company when André's action became known. Five soldiers called on him at once, requesting him to alter the charge against Bersot. André brusquely refused to listen to them and put the two spokesmen of the deputation under arrest.

A few weeks earlier the regiment had been led to a badly prepared attack against the German positions. It lost 1,500 men in what the soldiers considered a wanton slaughter, and indignation against their colonel was outspoken and universal among the men. Enraged by the murmurs and evident hostility Colonel Auroux had been seeking a pretext for repressive measures. The Bersot affair gave him his chance. He immediately ordered Bersot and the two spokesmen of the soldiers' deputation to be court-martialed. On the same day, before the court convened, he ordered a firing-platoon to hold itself in readiness for execution.

It happened that there served in the regiment, as sergeant, a man well-known as a judge in private life. The colonel called the jurist before him. "Sergeant," he said, "my men are mutinous—there is need of a terrifying example. I mean to place these three privates against a wall and have them shot." After listening to the colonel's summary statement of the facts, the judge said the offense of the three men under arrest was trivial, and emphatically declared that there was no warrant for court-martial procedure. His chief insisted: "Bersot is guilty of disobedience in the presence of the enemy, the two others of a mutinous demonstration. I want the three shot, and you must find me law enough to warrant their execution." After a desperate verbal wrangle, the judge succeeded in dissuading him from the execution of the two remonstrants. "Very well," concluded Auroux, "I will let the remonstrants off with some minor punishment, but the capital charge against Bersot stands. Of course," he added "I'll preside at the court martial myself." The lawyer tried, earnestly but in vain, to make plain to his regimental chief the legal and moral impossibility of convoking and at the same time presiding over a court martial. Colonel Auroux paid no heed to legal advice. A few minutes after his interview with the sergeant he convoked the court, appointing all its members and permitting no evidence to be heard save that of the two complainants, viz., Bersot's sergeant and Lieutenant André. A few minutes more and judgment was rendered: death for Bersot, and six years of forced labor for the two remonstrants. Colonel Auroux commanded personally at the execution. The victim collapsing under a shower of bullets, died with the names of his wife and little daughter on his lips. Immediately after execution Colonel Auroux issued an order strictly forbidding oral or written mention of the affair or of Bersot's name—the correspondence of his subordinates was censored for weeks and all letters alluding to the Bersot affair destroyed. Auroux ordered Bersot's corpse interred outside of the soldiers' cemetery and forbade his men to visit the place, but he could not keep them from secretly erecting a stone and decorating the grave with flowers. After a lengthy interval, the curate of the regiment informed Mme Bersot of her husband's execution. "Our colonel," so the priest explained, "believed that he didn't have his troops firmly enough in hand. A return to iron discipline was deemed necessary, and the shooting of Bersot probably saved the lives of many others." The widow, refusing to acquiesce in this logic, set heaven and earth in motion to achieve two ends: rehabilitation of her dead husband and punishment of his murderer, Colonel Auroux. After a struggle lasting eight years, Mme Bersot scored a partial victory. The Supreme Court annulled the verdict of the court martial, freeing her dead husband from reproach. Two years later, in 1924, the mortal remains of Bersot were disinterred, transferred to Besançon, and there accorded a solemn public funeral. His widow did not succeed at the time in invoking justice against Auroux, a personal protege of Maginot, the French Minister of War in 1924. An interpellation in the Chamber of Deputies laid the scandal bare. Maginot, unterrified by public clamor, screened his friend behind formalities and, to affront the complaining members of the Chamber, made him Commander of the Legion of Honor! [Auroux had in the meantime attained to the rank of general.] The fall of the cabinet of which Maginot was a member destroyed the political defenses shielding his protege and left the field clear for further action against him. The Union of Combatants now proposes to begin its revision of thousands of court-martial cases with an indictment of General Auroux.

Pilsudski's Warning

AT a conference of the representatives of the various Polish parties, preceding the general election at which Professor Moscicki was chosen President of the republic, Marshal Pilsudski delivered the following critical remarks on Polish political conditions. They were printed in the Berliner Tageblatt for May 31, 1926.

The chief causes of the present distress and of the internal and external weakness of Poland are the robberies which have been committed without punishment. In Poland the interest of individuals and of parties has dominated all. There has been immunity for all sorts of malpractices and crimes. The reborn state did not experience a rebirth of its soul. When I returned from Magdeburg, believing in the regeneration of the nation, I did not wish to rule whip in hand. I gave the power into the hands of the legislative Sejm which I convoked. But the nation was not regenerated. Scoundrels and worthless wretches became dominant. Dishonesty and greed ruled. The number of disreputable elements in Poland increased enormously. Democratic institutions were abused. Democracy as such was placed in a bad light, which I, as a convinced democrat, regret particularly. Party interests were victorious over state interests. My life as chief of state was embittered by slander. The only reason I did not fall was that I was stronger than all of you. The second representative of the state was murdered. Those morally responsible for this murder escaped unpunished. Conditions have meanwhile come to such a pass that if I so wished I would not need to admit deputies and senators to the hall of the National Assembly. But I shall make another trial to see whether it is possible to rule in Poland without a whip. I shall exercise no pressure, but I warn the Sejm and the Senate, which are well hated by the people. I have given a guaranty that the election of a President shall be free and protected. I shall keep my word. But I warn you not to put up candidates on the basis of party membership. The candidate for the presidency must stand above parties. He must be able to represent the entire nation. I want you to know that in case the mob comes to power in Poland I shall not defend the Sejm and the Senate. No man can rule in Poland under the terror of scoundrels. I have declared war on the scoundrels, murderers, and robbers. I shall not succumb in this war. You may do as you please with my candidacy. It is of no importance to me whether I receive two, two hundred, or two thousand votes. Choose whom you will, but choose an impartial candidate who is worthy of this high office. If you act otherwise, the future looks dark for you. The army created for the citizenry a state capable of life. What have you made of this state? The Sejm must disband for a time in order that something new may be created. Think about my speech; consider it carefully. I assure you that I will not change.

Contributors to This Issue

HENDRIK VAN LOON has drawn his weekly cartoon for The Nation throughout a serious attack of scarlet fever from which he is now recovering.

STUART CHASE, author of "The Tragedy of Waste," is at present attached to the editorial staff of The Nation.

SILAS BENT has recently returned from Europe, where he studied the armament policies of the Great Powers.

PHILIP SNOWDEN was Chancellor of the Exchequer in the Labor Government of Ramsay MacDonald.

TALBOT FAULKNER HAMLIN is a New York architect and author of "The Enjoyment of Architecture."

ROBERT W. ROGERS, professor of Hebrew at Drew Theological Seminary and of Oriental literature at Princeton, is author of many volumes on ancient Oriental texts.

W. NORMAN BROWN, now professor of Sanskrit at the University of Pennsylvania, previously taught in Kashmir.

C. HARTLEY GRATTAN, a graduate of Clark University, is a contributor to current periodicals.

WILLIAM MACDONALD, formerly associate editor of The Nation, is author of "Three Centuries of American Democracy" and other historical studies.

In an Early Issue

Glimpses of Arthur Gleason

Three sketches of one of the most courageous liberals of his day.

by Helen Hayes Gleason

To be followed by a posthumous story

Land of the Free

by Arthur Gleason

ADULT CAMPS AND VACATION PLACES

CAMP TAMIMENT
NOW OPEN

FOREST PARK, PA. For Adults

Nature's Wonder Spot in the Blue Mountains of Pennsylvania twenty miles from Delaware Water Gap.

All outdoor Sports. Fourteen splendid tennis courts. Delightful bathing. Excellent Food. Dancing and entertainment in glorious hall on shore of lake. Beginning July 5, daily lecture by eminent speakers.

Moderate Rates Make Early Reservations

CAMP TAMIMENT FOREST PARK, PA.

N. Y. phone Stuy. 3094 Phone Stroudsburg 71

HILLCREST LODGE
Golf Tennis

SWIMMING AND DANCING

Situated in the Watchung Mountains. Most beautiful spot, blessed with all nature's gifts, overlooking hill and dale, field and meadow. Only 30 minutes from the heart of New York.

Excellent food. Rooms very comfortably furnished. Hot and cold running water in every room. Baths and showers.

Booklet and rates on application.

M. LEVITZ Plainfield, N. J.
R. F. D. No. 3 Phone, Millington 75 F. 4

Delaware Cliff Lodge

An adult camp for 50 guests in the Mountains of Northern New Jersey

All Land and Water Sports, Concerts, Dances, Discussions on Interesting Topics, under the Direction of Competent Athletic and Social Directors

Bessie Blumberg, Lodge Director

Write for our Illustrated Literature N. Y. Phone Rector 1421

FOR TELEGRAMS, ADDRESS

Delaware Cliff Lodge, Post Office, Bushkill, Pa.

CAMP MILAN for ADULTS
RHINEBECK, NEW YORK

A camp for young men and women of refinement
A beautiful lake, tennis, handball, etc.
$15 a week. Send for booklet A.

CAMP GREATER UTOPIA

A vacation ground for grown-ups

LACKAWAXEN, PENN.

Atop the Blue Mountains

All facilities for all sports
Diversified entertainment—Excellent Cuisine

Special offer. Take your vacation now and save money. Railroad fare free to patrons who come out for a two weeks' stay between June 25th and July 17th. Send for Booklet, 11 West 37th Street

WM. J. PERLMAN, Managing Director DR. WILL DURANT, Associate Director

THE LLOYD, Bellport, L. I.

On Great South Bay. Open June 23d
Cool, Comfortable, Charming.
Regular guests and week-end parties.

RIVERSIDE-on-Delaware,
Bushkill, Pa.

A RESORT combining all home comfort, good food and many delights of outdoor camp life. Jewish cuisine. Social activities under direction of Milton and Roxy. Booklet.

Trout Lake Hotel and Camp
(Near Lake George)

THIS place of natural beauty and splendor in the heart of the Adirondacks is now under the management of I. B. BAILIN, formerly editor of the Friend and Educational Director of the Workmen's Circle.

An abode for recreation and regeneration. All aquatic activities and sports; tennis-courts, music band, dancing, concerts, readings, camp fires, etc.

Excellent meals—High class American-Jewish cooking. All modern conveniences. Moderate prices. Fourth of July week-end—$5 per day.

Write for Booklet or reservation to

I. B. BAILIN

Director Trout Lake Hotel and Camp

Phone: Bolton Landing 60 F 21 Diamond Point, N. Y.

ROAD to FREEDOM CAMP
Croton-on-Hudson, N. Y.

Education Recreation
For Adults

CAMP FORUM

Weekly Schedule of lectures by prominent men and women in the Workers' Education movement. All sorts of outdoor sports.

Round trip fare $2.46

One hour's ride from Grand Central Station.

For further information write for Camp booklet.

Sunday morning July 18, A. J. Muste of Brookwood Labor College will speak on Workers' Education.

THE STUDENTS' CAMP

Oliverea, via Big Indian
Catskill Mountains, Ulster County, N. Y.

In a beautiful, secluded mountain hollow where you may spend the summer interestingly, healthfully and cheaply in the company of intelligent companions. Swimming, tennis, sports, hikes, lectures, campfire discussions. $7 per week for accommodations, bringing own blankets and linen. $20 per week for board and vegetarian meals. Send reservations to Walter Siegmeister.

BOOKS FOR VACATION READING

The Riddle of Society
A contribution to the understanding of those who do wrong.
By CHARLES PLATT $2.00

Common Sense and Its Cultivation
By DR. HANBURY HANKIN. Foreword by C. S. MYERS. $2.50

Precious Bane
By MARY WEBB.
"Refreshing . . . full of interest, meaty and executed with finished craftsmanship."
C. M. C. $2.00

The Silver Forest
By BEN AMES WILLIAMS
Absorbing mystery in the winter woods of Maine. Best detective story of the season. $2.00

E. P. DUTTON & CO., 681 5th Ave., New York

A MOSCOW DIARY A graphic human-interest story of the life of the people in Soviet Russia today, by ALMA PORTER. Cloth, $1.00 postpaid. Ask for book catalog.
CHARLES H. KERR & CO. 347 East Ohio Street, Chicago

accept nothing but

Non Depressant
non Habit Forming
In Convenient
Aluminum Boxes
At every drug store
3 Tablets 15c.
10 Tablets 40c.

Midol for HEADACHE

GENERAL DRUG CO., - 94 N Moore Street New York

REAL ESTATE

SIXTY acres of tumbling woodland with beautiful views, 100 year old Colonial house to be remodeled. Brook flows past the house. 51 miles from New York. 3 miles from railroad. Price $200 an acre.

MARGARET LANE
Croton-on-Hudson, N. Y. Croton 400

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXIII NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JULY 28, 1926 No. 3186

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS
EDITORIALS:
Competition—1926 Model
The Smell of Rubber
The King Can Do Wrong
When Bosses Fall Out
CARTOON By Hendrik van Loon
MAN-HUNTING ON THE SUBWAY By Paul Blanshard
OIL AND THE WHEELS OF JUSTICE By James Boudreau, Jr.
BRIDE By Thomas Beer
PUTTING AMERICA IN A HOLE: THE LESSON OF THE SOUTH By John Carter
I NEVER LIKED MISSIONARIES By Lewis S. Gannett
AIMEE SEMPLE McPHERSON By Dana Warren Bailey
IN THE DRIFTWAY By the Drifter
CORRESPONDENCE
BOOKS:
Music Brings Goofs By Edward Sapir
Marie Bashkirtseff. A Great Master By Joseph Wood Krutch
Beatrice Webb as Russian Visitor By W. S. Rossiter
Why Work? By Walter James Stewart
A True Epic By Clifton P. Sandmel
The Roots of the Modern Spirit By James Rorty
Toward Intellectual Freedom By William L. Laurence
Armenia and Africa By Ruth Shonle Cole
Roustan in English By Louis R. Gottschalk
Easy Going By Lewis Mumford
Entertaining Persiflage. By Eliseo Vivas
The Sportsman's Paradise By Allen Tate
Books in Brief
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Danish Trade Unionists Report on Russia By Martin Hansen

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors
LEWIS S. GANNETT
ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Literary Editor
MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

WHO CARES ABOUT TWENTY-ONE PEOPLE blown to pieces by the explosions at the Lake Denmark naval munitions depot? Certainly the Rotary Club of Dover, N. J., does not seem overly concerned. After the towns and countryside about Dover had been blasted to pieces by high explosives ignited by lightning Senator Edge demanded the removal of such explosives from any inhabited area. He was confronted with a telegram from the Rotary Club of Dover indorsed by the American Legion and the Kiwanis Club. It asked him to stop his efforts to remove the powder stores because it might injure Dover business! Prosperity plus explosions—"he profits most who serves best." But why be shocked by the philosophy of the Dover Rotary Club? Were not those shells which tore up twenty-one people intended to tear up many times twenty-one human beings in the next war?

POOR PRESIDENT COOLIDGE is having a strenuous vacation. A mere President might be allowed to lounge in peace in an Adirondack camp, but the candidate for renomination is forced to brave the man-eating mountain mosquitoes in order to live down that impolitic remark made a year ago about his inability to understand how grown men could spend all day hauling fish out of a brook. The piscatorial barrage of the Presidential press-agents has been impressive. Surely the remark is forgotten. The dear old public will henceforth enjoy its picture of an economical Izaak Walton enjoying his vacation in the wilderness. Did not Economy Cal again refuse to ride in a special car, in order to impress the people with the need for saving? Only a few correspondents blurted out that the economical common car was attached to a Presidential special train. So the camouflage goes on. Is there not one man among this journalistic crew with courage and wits to tell the truth? The President is slipping, and he knows it. Three months ago he induced his Attorney General's law partner, Mr. Stickney, to make the race for the Republican Senatorship from Vermont against Senator Dale, who had incurred Presidential disapproval. And now Mr. Stickney resigns—in Senator Dale's favor. What does it mean? Simply that even in his native State the President cannot carry a candidate to victory. Senator Cummins is right: Mr. Coolidge is likely to decide before 1928 that he does not want a renomination after all.

TARIFF LOBBYISTS were conspicuous in the Chicago convention which nominated Calvin Coolidge to the Presidency. Tariff lobbyists and beneficiaries were conspicuous in the debauchery of the Pennsylvania primaries. Now let us keep an eye on the Tariff Commission, packed by Mr. Coolidge with high protectionist handy men. Will the commission increase the rate on pig iron, to replenish the purses of the Pennsylvania corruptionists? The rate on aluminum is already high enough to reimburse Secretary Mellon in short order for his outgo on behalf of Senator Pepper's fruitless and costly campaign. But there are the farmers to placate if possible, in view of the Coolidge-Mellon-Pepper opposition to the Haugen bill. Will anything be done about the customs duty on sweet and sour milk, perhaps, to please the dairymen of Wisconsin before the September primary? Will the rate be increased on linseed oil, to fill the coffers of the small group of flax-seed crushers—including Mr. Mellon—and to bemuse the flax farmers in Nebraska and Kansas, the Dakotas, Iowa, and Nebraska? These subsidies come from the pockets of the voter, and every one who votes may well watch, and ponder the relation between the tariff and graft in our national politics.

ANDREW MELLON, millionaire Secretary of the United States Treasury, and J. Pierpont Morgan, head of the most powerful banking firm in history, have sailed together for "vacations" in Europe; Governor Strong of the American Federal Reserve Bank of New York and Montagu Norman, governor of the Bank of England, are conferring in France; the King of Belgium, serving as a smoke-screen for a commission of bankers, has been granted dictatorial decree powers with respect to finance in Belgium; while the French Chamber has refused similar powers to the Briand-Caillaux Government of that country, and it has accordingly fallen. These news items may appear unrelated; they are not. The franc is tumbling, and it is likely to stop tumbling only when France agrees, directly or indirectly, to accept control by the international financiers who are today the real rulers of the world. M. Caillaux asked Parliament to abdicate—to grant him full powers to do by decree whatever seemed to him wise. The Left refused, because it did not believe in dictatorship; the Right, because, while eager for dictatorship, it hated M. Caillaux. Now M. Herriot, leader of the moderate Left, will attempt to form a Cabinet. That he or anyone can long hold office with the present inchoate Parliament seems unlikely. For France must do one of two things—shoulder the burden of unprecedentedly heavy taxes, perhaps even of a capital levy, or obtain a loan by accepting the control of the international bankers. The succession of crises reveals the old forms of political democracy struggling to maintain themselves against the new financial super-Powers.

THE CHURCHES OF GREAT BRITAIN have thrown their weight to the miners' side of the coal strike. Backed by the Archbishop of Canterbury, the established and free churches have proposed that the miners return to work at the old wages and hours for four months with the help of a government subsidy, and that at the end of the four months they accept arbitration of the wage question. This would give time to launch a reorganization of the coal industry concurrently with a reduction of wages. The miners have accepted the proposal; the Government has refused. The refusal places the Government in an unpopular position since the continuation of the coal strike may cost the country much more than a four months' subsidy. The encouraging thing about the crisis is that the churches are not taking the refusal of the Government meekly; they have become aroused to their moral responsibility for the miners' suffering. They are seizing a magnificent opportunity to justify their own professions of social justice.

SOVIET RUSSIA SEEMS still to be an abnormal country: it has railways which make a profit. What is more, they are state-owned. The Moscow Finance Commissariat announces that despite the loss of 11,546 kilometers of the pre-war Russian railways to the Baltic states, new building has increased the total tracks in operation to 73,928—actually 3,529 more kilometers than before the war and revolution. More than 200 million passengers were carried in 1924-25, and the figure for the current year is estimated at 300 million. Wages, too, are rising; but it is difficult for an outsider to understand how railwaymen live, even if their monthly pay envelopes have swollen from an average of $16 in 1923-24 to $20 in March of this year. However, other news indicates that Russia is not so different after all. "Doug" and "Mary" have just visited the Soviet capital, and the movie-mad mobs there were as passionately enthusiastic as those of Madrid, London, or Los Angeles.

THE NEW RAILROAD LABOR ACT is justly hailed as a forward step in industrial adjustment because it accepts the workers' right to bargain collectively through representatives and organizations of their own choosing. If the law had been in existence three years ago the Pennsylvania and other railroads could never have destroyed the shopmen's union and installed a company union with a minority of employees. But President Coolidge has done much to discredit the operation of the new act by making the new Board of Mediation a dumping-place for deserving capitalists and defeated Republicans. With a host of industrial experts to pick from he chose as the two leading members of the Mediation Board former Congressman Samuel E. Winslow of Massachusetts, a manufacturer, banker, and corporation director, and Edwin P. Morrow, faithful Republican, ex-governor of Kentucky. This Mediation Board is important in railroad disputes because it appoints the odd member of any arbitration committee in case the company and the union cannot agree on a third party. Under the regulations the railroad representative can throw the choice into the hands of the Mediation Board by refusing to agree on a third member. So President Coolidge has stacked the cards against labor, and further discredited the theory that the "public" is a neutral third party in labor disputes.

FOR THE CRIME of carrying on a strike in 1924, forty-four members of the International Ladies' Garment Workers Union, thirty-eight of them women, were imprisoned last month in the Cook County jail in Chicago for periods varying from ten to sixty days. Many of the women have young children dependent on them; two have children less than a year old. One woman returned from a Colorado sanitarium to serve her sentence. The charge was contempt of court, in violating injunctions which in effect made it illegal for a striker or a strike sympathizer to be on the same street with a strike-breaker. Judge Denis E. Sullivan issued three injunctions of this nature, although there was no need for such drastic action. The report to the mayor of a citizens' committee thus describes the situation:

> The large majority of workers who were in the streets are women, certainly numbering under two hundred in the vicinity of Market and Jackson streets. To insure peace there were present in this same region over thirty uniformed police, thirty-six plain-clothes detectives from State's Attorney Crowe's office, and well over twenty-five private detectives. The following statements as to the behavior of the agents of the law apply with few exceptions.

There follows a list of charges against these agents of the law of "profane, abusive, and obscene language," of violent handling of strikers and passers-by, and of wholesale arrests. The defense of law and order was directed chiefly by the special officers hired by State's Attorney Crowe. Mr. Crowe came up for reelection during the strike. One of his chief claims to worthiness, as he stated in a form letter which he sent to employers in the city, was his activity in preserving order in the strike.

IN AN ERA of commercialized newspapers, when editorial policies are syndicated, it takes more than moderate courage to stand for the old and honorable tradition of independence which once animated the profession of journalism. Two brave editors have received the violent thanks of the powers they attacked. Sudden death was the reward of Donald R. Mellett, editor of the Canton, Ohio, Daily News. He had been carrying on a vigorous editorial fight against the laxity of the police in dealing with vice in the town. Shots out of the dark near the garage of his home put an end to his campaign. George R. Dale, editor of the Muncie, Indiana, Post-Democrat, has lost everything but his life in a four-year fight against the Ku Klux Klan, which has fastened itself on the government of Muncie and of Delaware County. Dale tells of being attacked four years ago by three masked Klansmen. In the battle he wrested a revolver from one of them and shot him; no investigation followed. Instead came a series of charges against Dale, for carrying arms, for liquor violations, for libel, for contempt of a Klan-ridden court. Legally squeezed dry of all his resources, he now awaits review by the United States Supreme Court of one of the cases of contempt. The State Supreme Court has declared that the truth of facts asserted in his editorial was no defense. It is less to be wondered at today that so many editors are tempted and fall than that men like Mellett and Dale stand and suffer for their principles.

THE VASSAR JOURNAL OF UNDERGRADUATE STUDIES affords new evidence of the tendency on the part of at least a section of the student body in American colleges to develop that capacity for independent effort which transforms the pupil into the scholar. The items included in the first number range all the way from the almost inevitable study of Bernard Shaw to an article on The Crystal Structure of Metallic Tellurium and Selenium, and though it would be too much to expect complete maturity throughout most of the articles do satisfy the requirements laid down by the editorial board to the effect that each must either make a contribution, "however modest," to scholarship, furnish for the specialist a synthesis from hitherto uncollated material, or set forth some new and interesting point of view. Such a journal is an admirable pedagogic device which might well be imitated by other colleges. It sets up an extra-classroom standard and that, as every teacher knows, is a necessity for the development of work ever approaching professional excellence.

BARON BENNO VON SIEBERT'S DEATH in Florence is worthy of more than passing notice in relation to the development of our present knowledge of the documents which have revolutionized the theory of war-guilt. As secretary of the Russian Embassy in London he made a copy of all the communications which passed between London and St. Petersburg between 1908 and 1914. A portion of these, published during the course of the World War, constituted the first considerable body of evidence in refutation of the Entente Epic. A large number of these documents were never published and remained in Siebert's possession until his death. Their future disposition is a matter of real importance to students of the war-guilt problem. One of the most interesting things in Siebert's career was his clash with Poincaré. In January, 1922, Poincaré declared the most compromising parts of the Izvolski-Sazonov correspondence to be a forgery. The Neutral Commission for the Investigation of War Guilt, with its headquarters in Sweden, invited Poincaré to submit his proofs of the forgery to be considered along with Siebert's evidence for their genuineness. Poincaré never replied to the invitation.

TWO WOMEN with characters that broke through the straitjackets of conventional living have just died. One was Mother Alphonsa Lathrop, daughter of Nathaniel Hawthorne. Dissatisfied with the intellectualism of the New England in which she grew up, she and her author-husband, George Parsons Lathrop, entered the Catholic church, and after his death in 1898 she joined the Dominican nuns. She gave herself to the work for incurable cancer patients which, beginning modestly in Cherry Street, New York City, leaves its landmark in the impressive home now building at Hawthorne, New York. Gertrude Bell was like Mother Alphonsa only in the sheer of her personality. Forty years ago she began her wanderings in Arabia and, often disguised as an Arab woman, penetrated where not even white men had been before. Like Colonel Lawrence she played a vivid part in the dark history of war-time intrigue in the Arabian peninsula, and her tea-room in Bagdad was reputed to be more truly the seat of power than the British High Commissioner's office. She leaves her life-mark in the new British empire in Irak—which desert heat and desert passion are likely to sweep away long before Mother Alphonsa's bricks begin to crumble.

IN COLONEL CHARLES A. WILLIAMS the United States Army lost a soldier who belied the theory that all army officers must be militarists. A quarter century ago, as governor of the Sulu archipelago in the Philippine tropics, he set the army an example which went unheeded. One Sunday a crazed Moro, sworn to attain heaven by killing Christians, slipped inside the walls of Jolo, his barong hidden in his girdle. Before he was stopped he had wounded a dozen soldiers and six American bullets had entered his body. The shots, heard in the Moro village outside the walls, started a rumor that the Americans were beginning a holy war. In a few minutes a thousand mad Moros, knives in hand, were yelling at the gates. Colonel Williams did not order the machine-guns on the walls to wipe them out. He bade his family goodby, disregarded the assurances of his staff that Moros understood only force, and, unarmed and accompanied only by an interpreter, opened the great barred gates and had them barred behind him. He told the rabid Moro mob the cause of the shots, invited the chiefs to come inside with him, and turned over the body to them for honorable burial. Life in Jolo continued peacefully. In those days Colonel Williams and his friends traveled freely about the island of Jolo. The later policy of force made it unsafe for Americans to travel outside the walled city. If only Wood and Pershing and the rest had been like Williams!

PESSIMISTS WILL BE RELIEVED to learn that we need not wait until the extinction of the sun to bring about the end of the world. The source of the energy poured off from that orb remains so much of a mystery that it is impossible to predict with any degree of exactitude just how long it will last, but if we accept the conclusions of an elaborate series of experiments performed by the late Professor Maquenne and recently made public our days are numbered as the result of another process of nature. Plant life, of course, depends upon the carbon dioxide in the air and, difficult as it may be for fresh-air fiends to believe, the amount of carbon dioxide is steadily diminishing. The supply which volcanoes, active in the world's youth, poured into the air is being gradually fixed by the plants, and that now supplied by the burning of coal is not sufficient to maintain the balance. When the available supply has been reduced to one-fifth its present volume all vegetation and along with it all animal life will perish—exterminated by the too great purity of the air. We might add, however, that the present generation need not alarm itself or even cease to make preparations for its immediate progeny. Professor Maquenne gives us two hundred and twenty trillion centuries yet to live.

Competition—1926 Model

MR. O. H. CHENEY, in a recent number of the Nation's Business, has given us a careful and withal a lively outline of the new twists and turns in the growth of competition. This outline deserves careful attention. Those who took Economics 4 in college will have some difficulty in recognizing their old friends. Competition, according to the textbooks, took place between the same planes in the industrial flow from natural resource to consumer. Coal mine competed with coal mine, railroad with railroad, soap manufacturer with soap manufacturer, grocery wholesaler with grocery wholesaler, retail shoe-store with retail shoe-store. It was a knock-down-and-drag-out affair, but at least you had the satisfaction of knowing whom you were fighting. It was that short-changer Smith in the next block. Nowadays the sky is full of new, hidden, and terrible thunderbolts. Hustling chain-stores, as impersonal as weighing-machines, home-to-home canvassers, mail-order campaigns, instalment sellers, trade-association drives, boomers, boosters, yodelers for this and that, resident buyers, "endless-chain" operators are upsetting consumer-buying habits, making consumers call for strange products, strangely named (mostly with words ending in "um") and carried on the spearpoint of national advertising, aye, even shifting population as the "Southland calls."

The steady excess of returns to capital over returns to labor of the past generation, and particularly since 1914, has resulted in a vast excess of industrial plant capacity over normal demand. The amazing growth in the technical arts has provided the machines and the means for turning out goods on the principle of mass production very much faster than purchasing power, as liberated under the going financial mechanism, can absorb them. The owners of this surplus equipment naturally hate to see it standing idle, losing its head off in depreciation and fixed charges. And so the psychological stage is set for what Mr. Cheney calls "distributive pressure," the frenzied convulsions of business men to find markets and outlets for their products. It is this pressure which has burst through the textbook description of normal competitive economics at a hundred points, turned the whole process upside down and inside out, and created the new competition.

Mr. Cheney divides the new competition into five main classes, as follows:

1. Intra-industrial competition. Manufacturers compete with wholesalers by selling direct to the retailer; they compete with the retailer by selling direct to the consumer. Retailers compete with wholesalers by organizing buying associations; wholesalers compete with retailers by organizing chain stores. Chain stores and wholesalers compete with manufacturers by starting their own manufacturing plants. In this uproar distributors may find themselves suddenly with excess capacity, thus creating a "merchandising vacuum," which results in a clamor for more goods at a quicker turnover. The stream turns and runs uphill. The pulling force to attract goods instanter leads the manufacturer back to his sources of raw materials and supplies. He wants to control them; he does control them; the vertical trust moves a step nearer.

2. Inter-commodity competition. You are sick of paying rent and want to make yourself sicker by building a house. The Associated Lumber Manufacturers move down on you, closely followed by the Face Brick Association, while the Pink Quartz Stone Fraternity lands in an airplane. Your roof is a bloody struggle between the embattled National Slate, Red Shingles, Sewer Pipe Tile, Sun-kissed Kopper, Sea-Green Zinc, and Tar associations. Who ever heard of a lumber dealer doing anything but lambaste another lumber dealer? Now they kiss each other and form a trade association with a ten-million-dollar publicity fund to make the American populace lumber-conscious. The cotton men fight the wool men, and the silk men fight both. The oil men advance upon the coal men, and the water-power men swat both. Trade associations were unthinkable under the old competition—except at an annual banquet where each dealer brought his own chemist—but today distributive pressure has become strong enough to heal the ancient feuds to the point at least of getting together and walloping the gang with an alternative commodity to sell.

3. Inter-industrial competition. This is the most recent of the new forces, and, in the opinion of Mr. Cheney, the most important. It is also the least understood. It is competition of an industry for as much as it can get of the national income. Purchasing power being limited, and there being far more plants than can be kept busy, it devolves upon each industry to grab all the purchasing power it can before the supply runs out. This is not lumber against bricks, but lumber against every other industry on the economic map. Make 'em lumber-conscious, shoe-conscious, straw-hat-conscious, white-tooth-conscious, bad-breath-conscious, silk-shirt-conscious, personality-perfume-conscious, four-door-conscious, davenport-conscious, anything-conscious—before the consumer's bank account becomes unconscious. If you cannot sell him on this year's wages, take a mortgage on next year's wages—and lo! the sky is black with instalment contracts. "The automobile boys put it over, why can't we?" The answer is, We do—to the tune of five billion dollars.

4. Inter-community competition. The plaintive yells of realtors, backed by local trade associations, to get people out of Yapptown into Papptown; the indignant answering yells of the Papptown men of vision; the brotherly exchange of pleasantries between, say, California and Florida.

5. International economic competition. If you cannot sell it at home, can't you dump it abroad? With a dozen nations equipped with excess plant capacity, this question leads to lively times; and to the subcellars of diplomacy. When a certain pitch of liveliness is reached, men prepare to make the world safe for democracy—or for whatever other slogan comes handy.

Mr. Cheney is big enough and wise enough to see the waste, folly, and possible social calamity which the new competition entails. He sees excess plant capacity as its root cause. But he does not see—or at least he does not say—that money in terms of use and want has broken down; a mere paper thing, a medium of exchange, is destroying us, and the most elementary common sense calls for a new orientation to neutralize the new competition. One suspects that a liberation of purchasing power is the key to that orientation, but one looks in vain for business leadership in that direction.

The Smell of Rubber

WHEN rubber burns it stinks. And when it gets into international politics it stinks. And the present hullabaloo about separating the Moros from the rest of the Philippines in the interest of the American rubber corporations stinks to high heaven.

Carmi Thompson, of the old "Ohio gang," is now in the Philippines surveying political and economic conditions there as "special representative" of President Coolidge. His official status is ambiguous. When, last spring, the Senate asked Secretary Mellon whether any funds were available to cover his expenses—a staff of forty "experts" is reported to be with him—Mr. Mellon replied that he knew of none. Is the economical Mr. Coolidge paying for the junket out of his own budget? If not, who is? Is the War Department financing this convenient cruise, which keeps a capricious politician out of Ohio for the preelection period, and, if so, on what basis?

Whoever pays Mr. Thompson's expenses the purpose of his mission is already plain. It is to save the Philippines for rubber. "I hope you gentlemen in your wisdom will find a way to open, primarily for the benefit of your people, the public lands in your rubber section," he told the Filipino Legislature. The Filipinos, we gather, are by oppressive legislation keeping the rubber lands undeveloped, and in the interest of the starving Ford-owners of the world their rubber must be developed.

The trouble is with Sections 23 and 34 of Act 2874 of the Philippine Legislature, which provide that not more than 1,024 hectares of the public lands shall be sold nor more than an equal amount leased to any single individual or corporation. This is the restriction which we are told is holding up the greatest rubber development in history. That may be, but 1,024 hectares are 2,530 acres, approximately four square miles, and it would seem that with four square miles purchased and another four square miles under a twenty-five-year renewable lease an ordinary rubber corporation should be able to do well enough. But the rubber corporations are not satisfied; they want land by the hundred or thousand square miles.

These restrictive clauses are not products of a Filipino brain. They have come down in the Filipino statutes from the days when William Howard Taft, now Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court, was Governor General and very nearly czar of the Philippines. They are part and parcel of the conservation era of American history. In that remote period two decades ago American statesmen did not believe in giving away the natural resources of a nation for a song; they believed in keeping them until such time as they could be developed by small settlers or by the nation for the benefit of the mass. The Filipinos absorbed the lesson while we were forgetting it; hence the present-day difficulties of the rubber magnates. Yet Mr. Thompson, it is not rash to predict, will recommend a change.

Naturally the Filipinos fear the development of huge rubber empires within their territory. Naturally they prefer small plantations. They know as well as the rubber companies what ghastly conditions of slavery have existed in the rubber areas of the Congo and Amazon forests. Decent Americans are with them in their determination not to permit such awful conditions to be repeated in the island of Mindanao. Huge feudal landholdings have no proper place in the twentieth century. But, alarmed by the persistent propaganda of the rubber interests, the Filipinos are beginning to waver. Some of them propose to remove the restriction on the size of landholdings if they are assured of their independence. The Nation hopes that no such bribe will be needed for the fulfilment of the American pledge of Philippine independence.

Representative Robert L. Bacon of New York proposes to save rubber by separating the rubber islands from the rest of the Philippines and retaining them under American supervision. Here again a few facts demolish a ton of specious argument. The island of Mindanao, where the richest rubber lands lie, is no such Moslem unit as Mr. Bacon indicates. Even apart from the separately administered Christian province of Misamis, it had, at the last census, 222,260 Christian inhabitants, 272,902 Moslems, and 126,908 pagans. In all the settled portions the Christian population has been steadily increasing of late years, and, except in a few regions where Americans seem almost deliberately to have fomented antagonism, relations between the Christians and Moslems have been good. Racially there is no difference between them; the religious differences will persist, but with the increasing use of English as a medium of communication the old difficulties disappear. Moro declarations of desire for American rule made since the arrival of General Wood in the islands may be taken with a grain of salt; the same chieftains made equally convincing protestations of yearning for independence when Harrison was governor, and Hajji Buto, the Moro senator who is so constantly quoted in anti-Filipino propaganda, regularly votes for the annual independence resolution in the Filipino Legislature, and did so again the other day in the presence of Carmi Thompson.

It would be an ineradicable disgrace to America if she permitted her Philippine policy to be determined by rubber. Carmi Thompson's mission will bear close watching.

The King May Do Wrong

NOT one of the sufferers from the ghastly New Jersey explosion of a Navy munitions depot can sue the Government for damages. Our Government is still like the kings of old; in legal theory it can do no wrong; it cannot be sued. The only remedy is by private bills in Congress. But a change is due, for on June 10 the House of Representatives, without a dissenting voice, passed a bill providing that the United States Government may be sued for injuries which its officers or employees negligently inflict, in the course of their official employment, on private individuals. Heretofore the innocent victims of official wrongs have been left without redress, except against an irresponsible minor official—a flagrant denial of justice. The fact that practically every country of continental Europe had long abandoned this unjust position and freely permitted the Government to be sued in tort, made little impression on our Government, and to this day Attorney General Sargent labors under the erroneous impression that the immunity of the Government from suit is common to all countries.

What finally moved the House of Representatives was not chiefly the manifest justice of the Government assuming responsibility, like any other corporate employer, for injuries inflicted by its agents, but the fact that the immunity from suit did not relieve the Government from trouble and financial burden. Instead of legal complaints took political form. The victim got his Congressman to introduce a private bill, which was duly referred to the Claims Committee, and there became the football of political bickering and political luck. The success of the claim depended upon the forcefulness or influence of its proponent and upon political and other considerations having perhaps only a slight relation to the merits of the complaint. A judicial investigation by the committee was manifestly impossible. Even less possible was it for the House or Senate to pass upon the merits of the case. Yet days are taken by Senate and House in each session for the consideration of these private bills, concerning which only a very few members can have any knowledge. The success of a tort claims bill depended upon many factors other than merit. Uniformity of adjudication was of course out of the question.

Under the bill which passed the House property damages negligently inflicted by agents of the Government would be redressible under a systematic form of investigation and adjudication. Small claims under $5,000 (probably to be reduced in conference to $3,000) would be determinable in the executive departments directly responsible for the injury; claims above that amount would go to the courts. Personal-injury claims would go to the Employees Compensation Commission which has a definite practice and organized machinery for dealing with such cases. The responsibility of the Government for personal injury or death is limited to $5,000, a limitation upon which the House insisted. This gave rise to a protest from Representative Celler of Brooklyn, on the ground that property was again being preferred over human life, but the limitation is explainable by the fear of exorbitant demands. The Senate had earlier in the session passed a bill limiting relief in any case to $3,000 and giving jurisdiction exclusively to the respective executive departments. The two bills have gone to conference and probably at the December session a definite bill will be reported out and passed which will at last bring our law into line with that of most civilized countries. The horrible events in New Jersey should make the need of such a bill plain to the blindest, and this relic of medieval days when the king was held infallible and irresponsible should be discarded forever.

When Boswells Fall Out

IT will be remembered that Boswell did not speak with great tenderness of those who invaded his field, and in a similar manner those who claim to have enjoyed the intimacy of Anatole France are now falling upon one another. The ingenious Brousson, whose book, so it is said, was held in the press because its subject inconsiderately rallied at a time when it was reasonably anticipated that he would be dead, got there first; but the others, in possession of marketable scraps, have no intention of allowing him to be carried into immortality on his master's coattails if they can help it.

Three other books have reached America and though none refers by name to the author of "Anatole France en Pantoufles" two leave no doubt as to the opinion of the writer upon the subject of that gentleman and his fellows. Lewis May, France's English translator, contents himself with the happy epithet "backstairs Boswell," but Michel Corday, having failed, apparently, to learn urbanity from "the Master," delivers himself as follows: "The spy, the scavenger, the emptier of cesspools, the sewerman perform their disagreeable office to earn their daily bread. But these people have not this excuse. They were earning their living before they began their foul work." And after canvassing the names of Judas, Tartufe, Nero, Messalina, and others he comes to the conclusion that "the perfect, the typical example of the blackguard did not exist until now." "Anatole France was this," says one; "Anatole France was that," shouts another; but unfortunately all are at pains to insist that though he was superficially affable to everyone there were few at whose assumptions of intimacy he did not laugh behind their backs, and so one is not without suspicion that he may be at this very moment joking with the illustrious shades about him at the nobodies who pretend to have known him so well.

And yet, though none of the others is so wittily malicious as Brousson or so disregardful of the proprieties as he, they are all constrained to draw a portrait not essentially unlike his, and hence one not likely to encourage the formation of too respectable a legend. When a great heretic gathers a wide following there is always a tendency to explain at least half of him away. Rabelais and Voltaire have been disinfected for popular consumption, and it might not have been difficult to do the same for France but for these authentic anecdotes about the man himself—to have said that his scornful pessimism was only a garment and his fervent carnality only a façon de parler.

Thanks to the Boswells in general and to Brousson in particular we know that France practiced what he preached. From the pages of each book of conversation or reminiscences, whatever its particular emphasis, he emerges as the Epicurean he professed to be, and as an ardently practicing amorist as well. Perhaps the author of "The Song of Solomon" was only, as Origen has persuaded the world to believe, using highly metaphorical language about the church, and perhaps, as some have seriously maintained, Omar Khayyam was a teetotaling Sufi who celebrated nothing more potent than the wine of the spirit; but the unregenerate will be safe, as long as the fame of Anatole France endures, in the possession of one hero whose devotion to the world, the flesh, and the devil was no mere metaphor.

He himself had no desire to be admired for anything other than what he was. He despised "The Crime of Sylvestre Bonnard," which enabled tender-minded people to like him, and to Nicolas Ségur he said: "The widespread clientele would not pursue me were it not for sundry misconceptions." Now, there are some people whom scandal does not become. To have spread the story of Wordsworth's illegitimate child would have been indiscreet, for it hardly fitted his professed character, but Anatole France had no desire to be renowned for virtues which he did not possess. He might not have relished the picture which Marcel Le Goff draws of him sitting in his Touraine retreat, too consistently an Epicurean to risk his safety by too outspoken opposition to the spirit of the war; perhaps, too, he might have squirmed a little at Brousson's exposure of certain petty human defects; but scandal in the ordinary sense could hardly touch him. "Think of it, my dear Master," said a friend, "old age isn't shown sufficient respect. We are treated as honorable and respectable old men: I'll be damned if I want to be honorable or respectable." "You may take my word for it," replied France, "that I am not delighted with the idea either," and his biographers seem likely to spare him this last indignity. It is just as well.

30000 B. C.
H. v. L.

Man-Hunting on the Subway

By PAUL BLANSHARD

SIXTY-TWO striking workers of the Interborough Rapid Transit Company of New York have been sued for $239,000 for violation of their "yellow-dog" contracts with the company which bind them not to join an independent labor union. The company has asked for a sweeping injunction which, if granted, would place under a ban all strike meetings, all strike hand-bills, all peaceful persuasion of workers by strikers, and it might even restrain newspapers from encouraging the strike. The company has threatened to sue the New York Graphic for its harmless cartoon in support of the strikers which The Nation reproduces on this page. It asks that the homes and savings of the strikers be seized as payment for the fares lost by the company during the opening weeks of the strike.

From the New York Evening Graphic, July 7, 1926

Remember!

So the Interborough has brought to New York the tactics of West Virginia. It is meeting with stubborn resistance; the strikers are not terrified by the legal assault. In the huge hall in the Bronx where their strike meetings are held they receive the bulky injunction threat with jeers; their cheerful Irish leader, Edward P. Lavin, waves it in the air and shouts to a great throng "This is a bluff, boys, a dirty, cheap bluff. It means we've got the company on the run." A roar of approval greets him from the floor. These men who run the trains are a buoyant gang, the kind of men who win wars. They are not experienced radicals like the needle-trades workers; in fact, they are more familiar with red cardinals than with red agitators. They are all insiders, many of them fighting their first labor battle led by their own local leaders. There is something pitiful and heroic in their isolation. The American Federation of Labor is not behind them; there is no fat union treasury for their relief. But they fight. Up on the platform the leader of the power-house men, who hasn't had time to shave in three days, waves his megaphone, and the chorus roars: "Hail, hail, the gang's all here."

The justice of the strikers' demands is conceded even by hostile newspapers. Motormen and switchmen are striking for 75 cents and $1 an hour in the most expensive city in the world. Motormen now get about $36 a week and switchmen considerably less. "The wonder," says the New York World, "is not that 700 struck but that 14,000 remained loyal." Many of the subway employees work ten hours a day seven days a week in the roar and heat of the crowd while their critics hurl epithets at them from the seashore. A guard receives $4.04 to $4.37 a day with no day off on pay. The platform men receive a maximum of $4.62 for a ten-hour day. Workers who are sick lose their wages; workers who need a vacation occasionally get one—without pay.

Why do skilled men tolerate such conditions? One reason is that the Interborough is relatively poor. Another is that the public of New York is indifferent; it is willing to ride on the backs of the Interborough workers until the workers themselves make an effective protest. But why have not these workers made an effective protest before? Chiefly because the Interborough has built a protecting wall against labor discontent, a company union that provides with its elaborate mechanism a most significant study in the technique of strike-breaking.

When President Hedley smashed the old A. F. of L. union of Interborough workers in 1916 at a cost of over two million dollars the company presented to its employees the ingeniously constructed "Brotherhood of Interborough Rapid Transit Company Employees" and compelled every worker who applied for a job to sign the famous "yellow-dog" contract:

> In conformity with the policy adopted by the Brotherhood and consented to by the Company, and as a condition of employment, I expressly agree that I will remain a member of the Brotherhood during the time that I am employed by the Company and am eligible to membership therein; that I am not and will not become identified in any manner with the Amalgamated Association of Street and Electric Railway Employees of America, or with any other association of street railway or other employees. . . .

The constitution of the Interborough Brotherhood contains all the industrial-democracy jokers that characterize the company-union movement. There are at least five jokers plainly discernible in the constitution and its methods of enforcement. (1) The employees have no free choice of their collective bargaining machinery. If 99 per cent of them become disgusted with the brotherhood and quit its meetings, the company may continue to deal with the remaining 1 per cent as representative. (2) All matters of "discipline and efficiency" rest with the company. What are matters of discipline and efficiency? Anyone experienced in the industrial struggle knows how simple it is to discharge labor leaders as "inefficient" unless the workers can force review by some impartial person of all discipline cases. (3) Mass action is prevented by splitting up the Interborough workers into locals without any general meetings. During the strike the policy has been to suspend all meetings; the company does not dare to allow its employees to gather together to face the strike issue. Those attempting to attend irregular meetings are discharged. (4) There is continual petty bribery of company-union officials by special favors from the firm: reduced hours with pay, pictures in the company's house organ, and the like. This is accompanied by constant spying among the men and reports to superiors against the vigorous anti-company leaders. One worker put it this way: "If any stranger comes along and asks you, 'How's conditions?' you've got to answer: 'Fine. Greatest place in the world to work.' And if you don't answer that way, who knows, you may be talking to a company spy, and when you get to your terminal that night the boss may stop you off and say, 'What are you doing, Harry? Ain't you satisfied? Guess you better look around for another opening if you don't like it here!'" (5) The company union has stripped the workers of their power. Under it they cannot strike and they cannot unite with any national body which can supply strike funds. Nominally, the company must arbitrate disputes with its employees but the employees have no weapon powerful enough to compel the company to carry out an award in good faith.

The company union as a strike-breaker serves two purposes. It provides deceptive pro-company publicity and it can be used as a legal springboard for injunctions. The Interborough strike is a battle between a small minority of the underpaid employees who dare to fight for better conditions, and the company. By the device of the company union President Hedley has been able to picture the strike as a fight within the labor world between a minority group of strikers and a majority of loyal workers. He accomplished the crowning audacity of refusing to arbitrate with the strikers because his company union wouldn't permit it. Of course the workers were not called together to vote on this question of arbitration.

In asking for an injunction with damages from the Interborough strikers President Hedley is coupling the two most hated weapons of the employing class, the company union and the "yellow-dog" contract. This combination makes the Interborough strike of national importance. If it is possible to rob men of their savings for joining a union in New York, what may not be done by this combination in Nevada or Los Angeles? The company's case is plausible. It says in effect: The majority of our employees have formed a labor organization of their own. The organization has decided to make itself exclusive; no workers can enter the employ of the company without signing a contract to accept its exclusive jurisdiction in industrial disputes. If employees resist the majority and declare a strike they are violating a sacred contract and must be restrained by injunctions and punished by damage suits.

The one weakness in the logic of the Interborough is the nature of the contract which workers are compelled to sign. The worker who signs it in order to get work is not a free agent no matter how many times ancient judges may say that he is. He is an economic dependent forced to submit to superior power just as a helpless pedestrian submits to the robber who points a gun at his heart. This commonsense interpretation of the "yellow-dog" contract may not win the support of the Supreme Court at the present time but it is the only interpretation that is workable in the industrial world. No company in the history of American industrial struggles has been able to collect damages from workers for striking, whether they signed pledges against striking or not. In the much-cited Danbury Hatters' case the strikers were punished not for striking against a contract but for secondary boycott of inter-State shipments of goods. We cannot buy workers as commodities while they are on the job and then hold them responsible for the conduct of industry as soon as they go on strike.

Oil and the Wheels of Justice

By JOHN BILLINGS, Jr.

OIL lubricates everything but the wheels of justice. Mixed with money and poured into the court machine, it can so gum the works that the only output is an increased public contempt for the administration of the law.

Twenty-five months ago indictments charging bribery and conspiracy were returned by a District of Columbia grand jury against former Secretary of the Interior Albert B. Fall, Harry F. Sinclair, and Edward L. Doheny. These criminal charges were a direct outgrowth of the disclosures made by a Senate committee investigating the leasing of naval oil reserves at Elk Hills, California, and Teapot Dome, Wyoming. A year later, when the Government seemed about to be cheated out of its prosecution of this ex-cabinet officer and the two multi-millionaire oil promoters, additional indictments for conspiracy were brought against the trio.

And during this two-year lapse of time not one of the defendants has been brought to trial before a jury. Not one word of evidence has been taken as to their guilt or innocence. They are, in effect, as free today as they were when they negotiated these secret leases behind sealed doors in the Interior Department. Their case represents a shocking example of the law's breakdown into hopeless delay—when wealth and powerful influences are brought directly to bear.

These last twenty-five months have been frittered away on one of the strangest mockeries of justice ever observed in the courts of the national capital. An endless series of technical appeals, demurrers, special pleas, and so forth, has served to muffle the real issues in these criminal cases. The whole purpose of the defense was plainly to stave off a jury trial until public interest waned, until important witnesses scattered or died, until something developed to obviate a direct court encounter on fundamental facts.

Ordinary men cannot bend the courts so forcibly to their will. Every-day criminal trials in the District of Columbia go forward with a reasonable degree of celerity. You never hear of a plain defendant squeezing such incredible "benefits" from the courts as a two-year delay before even so much as entering a pleading. But this oil case is "different." Sinclair and Doheny are rich and influential. Fall was a good Republican, and political factors are even now at work trying to shield him from the awful glare of a jury trial.

About Washington the oil scandals have been relegated to the limbo of forgotten political issues. Interest in their prosecution has petered out in the newspapers. The details have become blurred in the public mind, thus giving the defense lawyers a free opportunity to employ their Fabian tactics under cover of a colossal popular apathy.

There is in the District of Columbia a tricky law relating to appeals which will not be found in any other jurisdiction. This law, permitting an immediate appeal from an interlocutory order in the local Supreme Court to the Court of Appeals, afforded defense counsel a means of blocking prosecution indefinitely. Thus, as in the case of the second indictments, for instance, the lower court overruled a motion to quash and, instead of ordering the defendants to trial, permitted them to take this ruling to the higher court at once for review. Nine months were lost in such an irrelevant appeal, which in any other jurisdiction would simply have been noted in the record and considered in a final appeal after conviction.

This practice could have been continued until Doheny, Sinclair, and Fall, to say nothing of the judges and lawyers, were all in their graves had not Congress on the last day of the session changed the law, by prohibiting such appeals from interlocutory orders. This change did not come until Representative William R. Wood of Indiana, chairman of the Republican Congressional Campaign Committee, had exerted all his efforts to kill the legislation. Wood is closely associated with the lawyers who are defending Sinclair, Doheny, and Fall. He was able to block the bill temporarily, even though he admitted he had never read it. In the end Chairman Graham of the House Judiciary Committee whipped the measure through in the face of spluttering opposition.

Perhaps this new law will help. Perhaps, as defense counsel are now secretly boasting, it will give them another peg for further appeals and delays.

On June 30, 1924, Fall was indicted for accepting a bribe—the $100,000 in the little black bag—and Doheny was indicted for giving one. Fall and Sinclair and Fall and Doheny were likewise indicted for conspiracy to defraud the Government. The country, still sweating from the excitement of the Senate's oil investigation, braced itself for further thrills in the trials. Here is the court record of what actually happened:

July 7, 1924. Consolidating all four indictments, the defense filed pleas in abatement, contending that an unauthorized person in the grand-jury room had vitiated the documents.

August 12, 1924. Another plea in abatement, contending that Senator Walsh had made a prejudicial radio address while the grand jury was sitting. To these pleas the Government countered, doing its best to prevent the defense from tangling the issues of the cases on sheer technicalities.

January 23, 1925. Argument on these pleas before the local Supreme Court.

April 3, 1925. The Supreme Court quashed the indictments. Government counsel were forced to take an appeal to the Court of Appeals.

May 30, 1925. Fearful that these delays would cause the statute of limitations to run against the oil cases, the Government procured two new indictments, charging Fall and Sinclair and Fall and Doheny with conspiracy.

November 3, 1925. The defense filed demurrers to second set of indictments.

December 28, 1925. The Court of Appeals reversed the Supreme Court order quashing the indictment of Doheny for offering a bribe and sent it back as valid to the lower court. Government counsel dropped the original conspiracy indictments, deciding to press the subsequent set.

February 15, 1926. Defense demurrers to second conspiracy indictments were overruled by Supreme Court, but the judge allowed the defense, in an interlocutory order, to appeal this ruling to the Court of Appeals. This was done and argument on the appeal before the higher court is set for next October.

February 16, 1926. Defense filed a demurrer to Doheny indictment reinstated by the Court of Appeals on December 28, 1925.

On the record of this pernicious practice of dilatory appeals Congress has abolished the system, thus putting the criminal cases back to scratch in the Supreme Court for actual trial. Since the new law is retroactive defense counsel imagine they have been handed another opportunity for more delays, on the theory that a test of this enactment by higher courts is permissible. Senator Walsh and Atlee Pomerene, chief government oil counsel, are convinced that no such appeal can be taken until after the actual trial, as the Supreme Court of the United States has ruled that procedural legislation may be retroactive.

On the civil side the oil cases have gone more rapidly. The Elk Hills lease, which two lower courts voided at the Government's request, is now pending before the Supreme Court of the United States, with argument scheduled there for October. The Teapot Dome case, lost by the Government in the district court, has been argued on appeal before the Circuit Court of Appeals. These civil cases seem destined to be finished and forgotten before Fall, Doheny, and Sinclair are at last dragged into court and forced to stand trial for their deeds in connection with the oil leases.

Bride

By THOMAS HORNSBY FERRIL

After the turgid incidence and when
The last mad whispering had darkly blown
Away, letting the woods be real again,
He propped his elbow on a lichened stone.
"I've climbed that mountain many times alone,"
He said at length. She stared, then asked him how One felt at timberline. He answered "One Feels much as we do now," remembering snow
That must have cooled whatever long ago
Had cracked the rocks with terrible ecstasy.
"It's not so wild up there, you feel as though
Something were finished. You're at peace with sky
And earth, as we are now." She pointed where
The peak seemed highest, whispering "Take me there."

Putting America in a Hole—the Lesson of the Debts

By JOHN CARTER

WHEN Balfour, as British Secretary for Foreign Affairs, sent out his famous note of August, 1922, in which he laid down the principle that Great Britain would collect from Germany and her allies only enough to satisfy the demands of the United States, he was guilty of a gratuitous impertinence toward this country, but he set in motion a chain of events of which the parade of protesting French veterans in Paris and the Anglo-French debt agreement were the logical results.

The "Balfour principle" became the cardinal point in British war-debt diplomacy—in default of any effective protest by our State Department—and was reiterated on timely occasions to such purpose that the entire onus of the collection of war debts and reparations by Great Britain was shifted from Downing Street to Washington. As though this were not enough, the British Government secured our assent to the principle that Great Britain was entitled to collect from France and Italy in the same proportion that we collected our debts from these countries, thus making sure that we should receive all the blame for any stringency in the British terms. They got us both ways.

The trap has finally been sprung. When the dust cleared away it found us without a friend in Western Europe and with Great Britain acclaimed as "gentlemanly" by the Parisian press. We are in a hole and we may as well admit it, for although we are sufficiently remote from Europe to dispense with the good-will of any continental Power, yet international friendships are not to be despised and international enmities are not lightly to be incurred.

Let us presume that the object of British diplomacy in thus isolating the United States contains no threat. Probably its only object is to deprive us of possible European support in our numerous disputes—oil, rubber, open door, seizure of cargoes during the war—with the British Empire, with the secondary design of putting Great Britain in the position of the middleman, or tertius gaudens, in all dealings between America and Europe. Such a position is exceedingly comfortable for the British and is not especially ominous for us. We can let it pass.

The French, on the other hand, have played true to form. Hypnotized by ingrowing megalomania, they have permitted the passionate reluctance of the continental debtor to pay any obligation and the unwelcome reflection that the position of victor in a European war "ain't what it used to be" to obscure the very real benefits which France has received from this country and could still obtain were better counsels to prevail at the Quai d'Orsay. With a naive and reckless mood of self-pity dominant, the powers in France have permitted—if not encouraged—the development of a persistent anti-American propaganda to affect the volatile mentality of the political Frenchman. While Ambassador Bérenger at Washington, with the full support of his Government, negotiated a debt agreement with the United States, the same Government permitted the active cultivation of a spirit of hostility to the agreement which it was negotiating. And when the agreement was out of the hands of the United States Government and before Congress France turned abruptly, held the veterans' parade, signed the agreement with England, and thumbed its nose at us.

However, there is one factor which both Great Britain and France have left out of their computations, and this factor—Russia—is one which might be used by the United States to reverse positions with a startling facility. For both France and Great Britain have, in their anti-American antics, exposed their policies to grave inconsistencies.

Let us first consider the matter of the Balfour principle. Great Britain owes this country $4,600,000,000. To serve this debt, Great Britain has funded the French obligations of $3,500,000,000 and the Italian borrowings of $2,500,000,000—a total of $6,000,000,000. In addition Great Britain receives a $50,000,000 annuity from Germany under the Dawes Plan. To be sure, the Italian debt agreement contained a proviso for the proportional remission of payments in excess of those necessary to pay America, but the British debt system is further supported by the sum of $3,000,000,000 owed her by her Dominions, as part of the work of financing the war. This is not touched by the Balfour principle. And then there is the trifling sum of $4,000,000,000 lent to Russia by Great Britain during the war.

It is upon this Russian debt that the British policy breaks down. As her payments to America are already covered by her collections from France, Germany, and Italy, how does Downing Street reconcile its policy of fierce dunning of the Soviet with Balfour's pronunciamento? To collect from the Russians would expose Great Britain to the unanswerable charge of equivocation; it would make the Balfour note a lie. To cancel the Russian debt, on the other hand, would be patently unfair to France, Italy, and Germany, for Great Britain would thus gain Russian friendship at the direct expense of the French, Italian, and German taxpayers and by a deliberate policy of deceit. The only escape from the dilemma is to revise all existing British debt agreements in relation to the Russian debt, and in this case the current agreements are stultified from the start.

The second inconsistency in the European debt policy is the French attitude toward the Czarist debts, a total of 6,500,000,000 gold francs lent to the Imperial Russian Government as part and parcel of the far-reaching French military measures against Germany before and during the war.

The argument of French public opinion toward the American debt policy has been, in effect, as follows: "We fought your battles for you for three years before you entered the war. We saved you—and civilization—from Prussianism. We lost 1,500,000 dead to your 100,000, and suffered 3,500,000 casualties to your 200,000. We have emerged from the war victorious but vastly disorganized. If we put our dead against your dollars, you owe us far more than we can ever owe to you. The money you advanced us was contributed to the common cause, and was entered as a debt merely as a form of accountancy. Lafayette and Rochambeau, Washington and Franklin, Liberté! Egalité! Fraternité! And so on."

Now, Russia fought France's battle from the first. More than that, Russia undeniably saved France from defeat in 1914 and again in 1916. And Russia lost in the process 2,700,000 dead to France's 1,500,000, and 7,500,000 wounded and missing to France's 3,500,000. In fact, Russia's human losses were almost precisely equal to those of Great Britain, France, and Italy put together. Again, Russia emerged from the war, not victorious but defeated. France in 1919 was the strongest nation on the Continent for the first time in a century; it found Russia dismembered, disorganized, her services to the Entente and to civilization forgotten, and her weakness an excuse for a series of the most mischievous and wanton interventions yet recorded of European diplomacy.

But do the French statesmen admit a gleam of tenderness and hope to their former Muscovite partner? Does the French public feel the outrageousness of demanding payment from Russia?

M. de Monzie, head of the French delegation which negotiated last winter with the Russians for recognition of the Czarist debts, succinctly expressed the attitude of the Quai D'Orsay in the following words: "From the purely French standpoint we will not forsake the mass of investors of small means who were the benevolent clients of that Russia of which the Union of Soviet Republics is the legal successor, and whom we are bound in honor to protect."

It is easy enough to point out the inconsistencies of French and British debt diplomacy in the light of the Russian loans, but it is a different matter when it comes to devising a method for our own Government to take advantage of European inconsistencies as the Europeans have taken advantage of the policy of our Government—in considering each loan as a separate transaction.

The clear course of action for our State Department is to persist in its present policy of regarding each loan as a distinct operation. We have reaped all the disadvantages of this policy; now is the time to reap the benefits. We lent the Kerensky Government—or its agents in America—the relatively small sum of $250,000,000. Rakovsky is quoted as saying that in return for de jure recognition of Russia, his Government will promptly acknowledge this debt. To this, however, must be added the $100,000,000-odd investment of American capital in Russia which was sequestered by the Communist revolution.

On the debit side, then, Russia has, as regards this country, a total of about $350,000,000. On the credit side, she can insist on American liability for the damage wrought by American troops in the Archangel and Siberian interventions. America can well afford to admit this principle, first, because, as a matter of plain morality, our troops had absolutely no business invading the territory of a friendly country, and secondly, because the number of American troops involved in these adventures was relatively small and the ascertainable damage they wrought was correspondingly inconsiderable.

Let America, then, only insist on Russia's liability for the loan to Kerensky—as she has consistently done—and submit to a mixed commission the matter of Russia's liability for sequestered American property and American liability for military damage to Russian civilians. Each side would have too much to gain to permit the sessions of the commission to reach the impasse which blocked our attempt to adjust the similar controversy with Mexico. Once a general agreement were arrived at, it would place Great Britain and France in the following position:

Against the $4,000,000,000 British loans and the $1,000,000,000 claims of British subjects, Russia could set the major part of the damage done in the Archangel affair and the immense sums due to Russia for the British operations in the Caucasus and Siberia after the war. These two claims would more than wipe out any possibility of British collection. However, even if Great Britain uses the Russian debt to cancel any part of this liability, in all justice to her other Allies—as stipulated by the Balfour principle—she must reckon the potential income from her canceled Russian loans in evaluating the total collected to pay America. In other words, Russian recognition of this debt, weighed against British liability, cannot honorably be excluded from the operations of the Balfour idea: England cannot use this Czarist loan to square her private debts at the expense of her Allies. Similarly, France would be compelled to acknowledge her liability for the Denikin and Wrangel adventures in South Russia, which would more than offset the Czarist debts. Of course, both Great Britain and France would vigorously contest these points, and their desperate efforts to compel Russia to pay would not only expose the moral weakness of their present position but would estrange them from the greatest Power of the Eurasian continent and would cement a diplomatic friendship between the United States and Russia.

In point of fact, it is worth remembering that the United States, despite its economic quarrels with the Soviet system, has consistently defended the interests of Russia since the war. America refused to indorse, at Paris, the Rumanian grab of Bessarabia, "sanctioned" by a conference at which Russia was not represented. Again, at the Washington Conference America arrogated to herself the role of trustee for Russia's interests in the Pacific and the Far East, and refused to sanction any settlement at Russia's expense. American diplomatic pressure drew the Japanese out of Siberia, and during the Russian famine in 1921 the energetic intervention of the American Relief Administration helped save Russia from catastrophe. The scrupulously cultivated friendship of the Russian people could be ours for the gesture of arranging a fair accounting of the claims between the two governments.

To be sure, one of the chief objects of European diplomacy, and of its god-child, propaganda, has been to prevent Russian-American friendship. European governments can recognize Russia, and not abate their morality as capitalist Powers, but upon the American nation has somehow been foisted the role of the capitalist state par excellence. True, we do live under the forms of capitalism, and Russia does live under the forms of communism, but there is a good deal of communism in our capitalism and a good deal of capitalism in Russia's communism. As late as December, 1923, President Coolidge, as evidenced by his message to Congress, did not seem to feel that the barriers between the two systems were insurmountable. Neither did M. Chicherin and only the eagle eye of Charles Evans Hughes detected insincerity in the latter's acceptance of the Presidential overtures.

At the moment there is an American election on hand, and the Administration will certainly do nothing to provide campaign material for its opponents. But once the election is over, the way will be open for a renewal of the endeavor to put Russian-American relations on a practical basis and, incidentally, to allow Great Britain and France to take a little lesson in diplomacy from the despised statesmen of the United States of America.

I Never Liked Missionaries . . .

By LEWIS S. GANNETT

YOU see a blank high wall breaking the monotony of the swarming close-built Chinese street; you enter a gate, and suddenly find yourself in a miniature Main Street. There are the square-set homely houses, the ample porches, the trees and green lawns, the comfortable space and leisureliness of Any Town in the U. S. A. There are romping white children in relatively clean, neatly darned clothes; the familiar smells of American food float out [illegible] kitchen windows. It is the missionary compound. Large and small, there must be a thousand of them scattered through the cities and villages of China. They are the cent[illegible] the greatest foreign propaganda scheme in history: neither George Creel nor the Bolsheviks ever, in numbers, in money spent, or in system and method, approached [illegible].

There are some 8,000 missionaries in China, and of these more than half are Americans. An extraordinary missionary atlas entitled "The Christian Occupation of China," which in a series of graphic charts portrays the invasion of this alien group, reports that whereas in 1907 37 per cent of the foreign missionaries in China were American and 52 per cent British, by 1922 the proportions had been precisely reversed. This Americanizing tendency is increasing, because America is now spending ten million dollars annually on mission work in China, and no other country can afford a tithe of that sum. Even the Catholic missions are passing from French to American control. Increasingly, the missionary invasion of China is an American campaign, conducted by Americans, with American methods of statistical efficiency, gymnasium camou[illegible] mass-advertising propaganda, and Rotary Club enthusiasm. Some two and a half million Chinese now call themselves Christians; more than 200,000 children daily attend the 7,000 Christian missionary schools, while 2,000 young men and women are in Christian colleges; and the 330 Christian hospitals with their 18,000 beds form the bulk o[illegible] decent hospital facilities of China.

Now, I have never liked missionaries. My Unitarian-Quaker upbringing predisposed me against the militant conquest of souls, and I grew up increasingly skeptical of all those things of which a Christian missionary should feel most sure. It seemed to me that all religions were attempts from various angles to scale a mountain which reaches beyond the capacity of the human mind and that they fill in the unknown and unknowable with more or less satisfactory legends; that the function of the missionaries was to supplant native superstitions with unnatural alien superstitions, paving the way for the denationalization of their victims. Certainly I have never felt that more vividly than when I watched an enthusiastic Minnesotan teaching patient Chinese boys to sing a hymn—which they could not possibly understand—about the "blood of the lamb"; or when I sat through a colorless church service in Chinese in a bare little barn of an American mission church stupidly planted in a colorful Oriental city.

But I return from China almost converted. . . .

What are the missionaries there for? The radicals of China say they are making the way easy for the imperialist-conquerors; the Russians regard them as propagandists for capitalism; the foreign business men say that the missionaries are just stirring up trouble, putting fool ideas into Chinese heads; the old-fashioned circuit-riding missionary says they are there to preach the word of Jesus Christ; and the younger generation talk in terms of sanitation, modern schools, improved agriculture, and social work.

In their way all are right. China has missionaries of every description, from the devout Inland Mission workers who used to wear queues and still go about in Chinese costume, living on the rice diet of their congregations, the passionate fundamentalists who preach Christianity exactly as they learned it in tight little American villages, foreign patriots who identify their religion with their nationality, to medical workers who have forgotten creed in healing, teachers who are so absorbed in China that they remember America only when they have to ask for funds, community leaders who belong to the race of Jane Addams and Lillian Wald, and thinkers who have climbed to heights beyond the walls of any single religion. They are all there, and on the whole I think they are rather more liberal-minded than the people who support them at home.

The red-hot days of 1925, following the foreign shootings of May and June, taught the missionaries things about themselves that they had never known, forced movements that had been long in germination to bloom early. New buds appeared upon the branches which the gardeners at home had never suspected were there. Every anti-foreign outbreak seems to work changes in the missionary garden. "Rice Christians" who join the churches for what they can get out of it drop away; and the missionaries learn in blinding flashes what parts of their work have sunk into Chinese hearts and what have not. Some of them suddenly realize how far they have moved since they left home, how much more they care for China than for any form or creed.

Historically, of course, the radicals are right. The stain of blood and lawlessness lies on the missions in China. The first American missionaries went to China as the illegal guests of a trading firm; and missionaries helped draft, after the First Opium War, the treaty that established extraterritoriality and gave mission work its treaty basis. Nor did those early apostles heed the treaty terms; long before the Second Opium War forced new concessions from China they made their dangerous way into forbidden cities. As recently as 1897 the death of two missionaries was used as an excuse for the great international grab game in which Germany took Tsingtao, Russia Port Arthur, Great Britain Wei-hai-wei and the Kowloon new territory, and France Kwang-chow-wan. Even today American and other foreign gunboats penetrate a thousand miles and more into the interior of China upon the excuse of "protecting missionaries." However many the missionaries who have come to regret this association of Christianity with the foreign gunboat, it is natural that angry young nationalists should call the Christian organizations and their officers the "hawks and hounds of the imperialists"!

Nor are the Russians so far wrong. Inevitably the missionaries are apostles of the economic system from which they spring. Whether they are conscious of it or not, they are advance agents of the business men from whom they buy. As Mr. John E. Baker, who is in fact a sort of Galahad among business men, put it:

> The missionary home in the interior is a demonstration of Western life with the comforts and all the means the Westerner has used to give himself comfort. Were the merchant deliberately to make a great advertising campaign for the purpose of putting up a demonstration of Western materials in the interior for sales purposes, he could not put up any better display than the missionary has done gratis.

Naturally the simple coolie identifies the religion of the foreigner with his higher standard of living, and both with the system of production whence it arises. Too often the missionary makes the same mistake.

He is under fire, however, from both sides. The narrow-minded little business communities of China detest the missionary as much as does a Bolshevik; indeed they class missionary and Bolshevik together. For the new nationalism is a product of the schools, and many of the Christian educational leaders have fanned the flames of discontent. Christian students have been shot down along with non-Christians in almost every one of the bloody clashes of native and foreigner that dot the calendar of 1925 and 1926. Chinese Christian leaders have sought to prove that they were no whit less patriotic than those who had not been contaminated by foreign religions, and many of the Western Christians in China have openly voiced their sympathy with the patriotic movement. Christian schools have celebrated the national days of mourning and have officially participated in the huge patriotic demonstrations. An increasing group of missionaries has boldly entered the forbidden sphere of politics and insisted that the spirit of Christianity requires abolition of the "unequal treaties."

In the missionary body itself the debate has been hot and heavy. "Let us mind our own business and leave political affairs to those who are trained diplomats and capable of dealing with such matters," wrote a missionary veteran, Dr. Main of Hangchow, in a circular letter to his friends last Christmas. "These matters do not concern us as missionaries." But, he continued, "If we are loyal subjects we should be grateful for what our Government does for us and ought not to sell our birthright simply to curry favor. . . . If our Government really wants to help China she should insist on extraterritoriality until China has a government that can guarantee law and order." Dr. Main is Scotch, but many Americans share his confusion. They say to the pro-Chinese "Drop politics; we are here to preach Christ," and they themselves continue to preach the gospel of foreign intervention.

How the bulk of lonely missionaries who carry on their work far from any possible gunboat protection feel I have no means of knowing. It is possible that they still think in the old ruts, as the treaty-port newspapers insist. But I doubt it. The missionary press itself reveals a profound ferment, a passion to justify faith by works. These men and women have seen their own converts and Chinese colleagues watching them with doubt and distrust in their eyes. That Message to the Missionaries in China signed by the Chinese staff of Soochow University a year ago was typical:

> We have read some statements made by groups of missionaries in expressing their attitude toward [the Shanghai shootings]. We appreciate their statement in regard to the spirit of justice, nationality, and fraternity which should transcend national and racial boundaries; their words of sympathy. . . . Time and again we have heard such expressions of high-sounding principles, but we have now come to the point where we find ourselves unable to have faith in words which are not validated by corresponding deeds. Furthermore, we desire to know whether or not such statements represent the consensus of opinion of all the missionaries in China.

I have read scores of resolutions and hundreds of letters from missionaries all over China, and while there is many a voice to say, "Business enterprises would suffer most from abolition and we are dependent upon business men for a very large part of the means with which we carry on our work," a commoner opinion is that "More is to be gained by letting it be known that we are preaching our gospel with no dependence upon gunboats or laws which give us special favors."

Dependence upon gunboats and treaties is only one symptom of the alien arrogance of the old missionaries. They believed it their duty to impose Christianity, with all its Western forms, on China. They never stopped to question whether, man for man, we Western Christians were superior to the Chinese. The Christian schools began as Western schools, taught by Westerners, largely as bait for converts. But increasingly they have focused on education as an end in itself rather than upon conversion, and the junior schools have been going under Chinese control; in the last year of ferment the colleges too have had to look for advice and leadership to their Chinese faculties.

The change has brought some unlooked-for results. Two years ago daily chapel attendance was compulsory at virtually every Christian school in China; so were courses in religion. Today nearly half the higher schools have made both voluntary, and another year will see a change in the majority. The Government requires registered schools to eliminate compulsory religious instruction, to have a Chinese president or vice-president, and a Chinese majority on the board of control, and to declare that the propagation of religion is not its purpose. The Chinese—faculty and student, Christian and non-Christian—want registration, which opens the road to government jobs for the graduates; and the foreign teachers, sometimes reluctantly, are following their lead. "It would be un-Christian for a school in China not to do willingly what the Government would enforce if it could," says the president of a Peking college. And what modern government would permit a corps of aliens, teaching largely in a foreign language, propagating a foreign religion, to dominate its school system? Some missionaries are looking forward to a day when they will not be permitted to give even voluntary courses in religion. "But we can make our education Christian by the spirit in which we conduct it even if we are forbidden to give any direct Christian teaching," said President Burton. Schools like Lingnan University at Canton (where courses in religion are voluntary) are doing that.

Slowly and impressively China gathers into herself the men and women who work there and stamps them with its own ancient civilization. I once argued for hours with an old missionary vainly trying to find some virtue in the Christian teaching for which he could produce no parallel from the Chinese classics. Missionaries who study Chinese thought acquire something of its tolerant eclecticism. The Chinese have never fought religious wars and cannot understand our emphasis on doctrines, our conviction that religions must be mutually exclusive. Our little sects mean nothing to them; if they accept Christianity they but add it to minds already deeply molded by Confucian, Taoist, and Buddhist teaching.

The old type of missionary who refused to show distrust in God by being vaccinated (the smallpox rate among missionaries in China is one hundred times that in the United States, and the typhoid rate is thirty-three times that of the American army) is fading into the hinterland. The new type is an emissary of athletic sports, of hygiene, of schools, of mechanics—needed in China, although incorrigibly alien. Even he, I suspect, will find his role declining; as in Japan, the number of foreign missionaries is likely to fall, and the Christian church in China, if it continues at all, may represent a new Chinese Christianity, as much modified by Oriental habits as what we call Christianity has been modified, in two thousand years, by our Western history. The permanent service of the missionaries will, I believe, be less in the religious field than as a bridge between two civilizations that had lost contact with each other. In the early days the missionaries forced contacts where they were not wanted; they can, and I think will, somewhat lessen the frictions of tomorrow. Bringing science to the East as a gift of God rather than as an efficient aid to lower production costs, the missionaries may soften the harsh process of adaptation to the industrial West, and ease the break-up of the ancient family system which is an inevitable part of that inevitable process. Romantic lovers of the past will deplore that necessity; but history marches roughshod over romance. And so, with scant faith in their gospel and no belief in the permanence of what they value most, I yet return from China half converted to missionaries.

[This is the fourth of Lewis Gannett's articles on China. The fifth, China: The World's Proletariat, will appear in The Nation for August 11.]

Aimee Semple McPherson

By DAVID WARREN RYDER

THE mysterious disappearance of Aimee Semple McPherson, successful evangelist, and her subsequent reappearance with a tale of having been kidnapped and held for ransom are occupying the energies of two grand juries in Los Angeles. On May 18 Mrs. McPherson and her secretary were at Venice, a beach suburb of Los Angeles, for an afternoon dip in the surf. After the two had been on the beach for some time the secretary went to a nearby hotel to telephone. When she left evangelist McPherson was swimming close to shore. When she returned after a fifteen-minute absence the evangelist was nowhere to be seen. For more than a month she was missing. The belief that she had drowned had taken concrete form in a memorial fund of $25,000 raised by her parishioners of the Angelus Temple, when an anonymous letter was given to the authorities by her mother asserting that she was alive and demanding $500,000 ransom for her safe return. On June 24 the evangelist herself appeared in Agua Prieta, just across the Mexican border, exhausted, as she said, after walking twenty miles across the desert from the hut where she had been held by her kidnappers, and from which she had escaped in their absence. Her story is a good one, but the skeptical point out that the evangelist was not more than ordinarily sunburned and that her clothes had suffered surprisingly little from the experience. There is evidence, besides, in the hands of the federal grand jury indicating that the letter announcing that Mrs. McPherson was safe had been received by her mother the day before the raising of the memorial fund was begun.

These details and the inevitable rumors that gather about the secret hearings of a grand jury have created a sharp division between the true believers and the non-believers of Los Angeles. So aroused are the former to the defense of their leader that a body of them one day descended upon and destroyed a side-show which purported to tell in photographs the true story of the case. For in the short space of six years in the city of Los Angeles Aimee Semple McPherson has gathered a huge and ardent following. At the same time, and far more remarkably, she has built up for herself and her two or three close associates one of the soundest and most prosperous business establishments in the land. Nominally it is not, of course, a commercial concern. Officially it is dedicated to Jehovah, but it is none the less a vast business project; a religious factory where religion has been manufactured in huge quantities and then sold, both wholesale and retail, at a handsome profit. It is a tribute to the discernment of the woman that she proclaimed her "Bridal Call" and founded her "International Institute of Foursquare Evangelism" in the city of Los Angeles, where conditions of climate and the mental sea-level of the majority of inhabitants have combined to create a veritable Canaan for the religio-commercial entrepreneur.

This modern Joan of Arc (single-handedly she has assailed the citadels of evolution, infidelity, and sin) was born in humble surroundings in Canada. Her father was a farmer, her mother had been a Salvation Army worker, who, according to press accounts, continued her religious interests so that Aimee was "brought up in an atmosphere which accounts for her career." At the age of seventeen Aimee was converted by Robert Semple, boilermaker by trade and traveling evangelist by avocation, and soon afterward married him and went with him on a mission to China. There a daughter was born to them, and there Semple fell ill of a fever and died. His widow and the child made their way back to America, where, after a time, Mrs. Semple married Harold McPherson, an employee of a New England wholesale grocery store. They had one child, a son. Subsequently, after a number of separations occasioned by her intermittent soul-saving activities, they were divorced; McPherson going back to the grocery business and his wife taking up evangelism in dead earnest.

Very early in her career she had evidences that she was under the protection of some superhuman agency. On the ship returning from China she was the recipient from unknown sources first of a purse full of money, then of a much-needed steamer shawl, then of various other valuable articles; and never thereafter did she want long for anything. She had but to register a silent wish, and from sources revealed and unrevealed came not only what she had desired but other useful things as well.

Success seems to have attended evangelist McPherson's efforts from the start. Wherever she went, and she traveled into the East, the South, and the Middle West, she saved souls in large numbers, and her prowess spread. Soon she began to heal as well as to save. The blind, the lame, and the halt came to be touched by her and go away whole. From cities and towns all over the land came calls to her to come and hold healing services. She does not say so directly, but it is evident from all the surrounding facts that the money rolled in. By this time she had established a publication called the Bridal Call Foursquare, through whose columns, whenever she needed extra money, she sent out appeals for financial aid. Never, apparently, did such appeals go unanswered. Anxiety over money matters was always dissipated. On this point I quote the evangelist herself, as follows: "Several times when we were wondering how to meet expenses the money came by mail from some child of God to whom He had telephoned."

Demands for her services increased until she had to employ help—a manager of tours. She sent for her mother, Mrs. Kennedy, who brought organization and system. The business of soul-saving, healing, etc., was put on a sound, profitable basis, where it has since remained, with continuous publicity and advertising to establish and maintain good-will and keep things moving. As the result of this, Aimee Semple McPherson (she was using her full name now) became a national institution, making plans for a triumphant tour. "The Lord," she states, "had been speaking to me for some time about a transcontinental gospel auto tour."

The tour led finally to Los Angeles, and ended. There the famous evangelist found her promised land. At her first meetings the people came in throngs, and before she had been there a week the largest halls to be obtained were far too small and she had to go into boxing arenas and parks, where police reserves were necessary to handle the crowds. It required no direct communication from on high to convince her that here she should pitch her tent and remain. Only she was not so plebeian as to pitch a tent. She drove about the town until she found a piece of vacant land suitable for a magnificent tabernacle, and this she bought. As far as I have been able to discover, neither Mrs. McPherson's autobiography nor her other writings describe exactly the source of the money with which she purchased the site and began construction work. There is some reference to collections, and she issued printed literature asking for help; but nowhere can I find any statement of how much money was collected or what the tabernacle and its site cost. Judging, however, from the size of the place and its appearance, and relying upon newspaper reports, I should say that the plant as it stands represents an investment of at least two hundred and fifty thousand dollars; a promotion feat truly miraculous when it is considered that it was accomplished in a little more than a year. Indeed, evangelist McPherson's money-raising abilities are phenomenal. Requiring a specific sum for some special purpose, say $25,000, she stands in the pulpit and announces this need as blandly as if the sum was a mere trifle; always making it plain, however, that it is for the greater glory of God. Then she says: "To begin with, I'll accept a thousand dollars each from just ten people. Who wants to be among those ten?" Usually there are fifteen or twenty hands thrust up, and then there ensues much good-natured colloquy as to which of the ten were first. Finally this is determined satisfactorily, whereupon the evangelist announces: "Well, now that we've made such a good start and got ten thousand dollars, I'll let twenty of God's children give me five hundred each." Instantly, as before, many more hands than the required number are raised, and again, after discussion as to who owned the twenty hands that went up first, the favored twenty are rewarded by a "God bless you, Brother Blank," "God bless you, Sister Jones," and so on. Then, to make the remaining five thousand democratic, the evangelist says with her sweetest smile: "God has given us twenty thousand dollars, and all we need is five thousand more. So I'm going to let a hundred of you dear children give me fifty dollars apiece"; and instantly two or three hundred endeavor to be among the favored one hundred.

Nor is the method just described the evangelist's only resource. Sometimes she has relied solely on the printed word. I am fortunate enough to possess, among other literature from and about her, several copies of her publication, the Bridal Call Foursquare. In one issue of this interesting organ I read:

> William Jennings Bryan, valiant warrior of God—defender of the faith of our fathers, has been called home to a well-earned rest. The sword has dropped from his hand, but ten thousands of hands are outstretched, grasping the sword of the Spirit and pressing onward into the thick of battle. . . .
>
> Today the Angelus Temple membership, the Bridal Call family and Foursquare friends the world around are on the front line. Hands are upheld, bearing aloft the Banner of the Cross, and when a few days ago the word came down the ranks—"Over the Top"—without a break in the lines, up they went, and over the $100,000 mark; gaining the first rampart in the completion of The International Institute of Foursquare Evangelism.
>
> In this great School of Evangelism, God willing, there shall be raised up William J. Bryans, Abraham Lincolns, Warren G. Hardings, and Aimee Semple McPhersons, who shall carry the insignia of the Cross and the Crown up to the very doors of the national capital, into its legislations, and among the busy marts of men. . . .
>
> The first rampart has been gained and conquered. Now we are facing the second. The safety of the world is at stake! . . .
>
> No, you don't have to come to Los Angeles to join these ranks. The Foursquare Army is international and interdenominational. Pray that the Lord Jesus Christ will show you the way into the front line today. Ask Him, "What wouldst Thou have me do, Lord?" Then as He blesses you give that His children may be saved unto Himself, and trained for His service. . . .
>
> Use This Form for Your Subscription
>
> Dear Sister McPherson: To help enshrine the Bible in the hearts of the people, to help save our nation from the crime wave, infidelity, and sin, and to prepare the world for the coming of the King, I hereby joyfully inclose my offering for the Building Fund of the Evangelistic and Missionary Training Seminary.

Just how many thousands of dollars came in response to this magnetic appeal, I am not advised; it appears, however, from published accounts, that the whole religious plant stands today fully paid for in the names of Aimee Semple McPherson and her mother, Mrs. Kennedy.

In the Driftway

THE parsons of Philadelphia, the Drifter reads, have refused their blessing to the Sesquicentennial because it is open on Sundays. The Drifter thinks that weekdays are drab enough anyway, and would not have Sundays made more so; but from what he has heard of the Sesquicentennial—which seems to be a rather dull attempt to boost real-estate values in the swamps of South Philadelphia—he is not sure that it will help enliven the Sabbath in Mr. Vare's pure city. However, the parsons seem to have had no doubts; they thought the Sesqui a joy and a delight, and were therefore against it on Sundays. Sundays should be kept unpleasant. It is a horrid state of mind.

* * * * *

ALL these troubles—the Lord's Day Alliance, the Anti-Saloon League, the anti-evolution laws, and the rest—are really women's fault. The Drifter has always suspected the women, but he was a little timid about expressing himself until he found that Elizabeth Cady Stanton, that grand old warrior for the rights of women, was with him. Thirty-odd years ago she wrote an essay on The Effect of Woman Suffrage on Questions of Morals and Religion. Women, she admitted, would at first through ignorance abuse their power. Woman's religious bigotry was sure for a time to threaten the secular nature of our government. She proceeded to cite cases:

> To push what they consider a moral measure they have sometimes acted in violation of law. In the early temperance crusade in Ohio they walked into the drinking saloons, smashed the bottles right and left, emptied the liquor into the street, and then with hymns and prayers endeavored to impress their victims with the sacredness of their proceedings.

This was the year of the Chicago World's Exposition, and Mrs. Stanton wrote:

> Led by the Temperance Association 100,000 persons, chiefly women, petitioned Congress to make no appropriation to the exposition unless the managers pledged themselves to close it on Sunday, the only day in the week the masses could enjoy it. What an outrage it would have been to close that magnificent spectacle and drive the multitudes back into the crowded streets of the city! Yet this was the verdict of 100,000 petitioners, chiefly women.

Mrs. Stanton concluded:

> There is no doubt that in their present religious bondage the political influence of women would be against the secular nature of our government, so carefully guarded by the Fathers. They would, if possible, restore the Puritan Sabbath and sumptuary laws, and have the name of God and the Christian religion recognized in the national Constitution, this granting privilege to one section over another involving no end of religious persecutions.

* * * * *

AS a male the Drifter is delighted to find this feminine support to his thesis. We have woman suffrage; and the evils Mrs. Stanton predicted have fallen upon us like a cloud of scorpions. "Post hoc, ergo propter hoc. Quod erat demonstrandum." Only, once in a while a feminine hesitation creeps into the Drifter's mind. After all, the hooded bigots of the Ku Klux Klan are male too.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Mary Austin on Alcohol

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The Mary Austin article in your current issue [illegible] me as being something really big; I would like to see her [illegible] worked out at greater length, arriving at the conclusion that [illegible] individual becomes civilized only when he has [illegible] mind for his liquor cellar and learns how to bring himself happiness through the brewing of mental intoxicants.

Topeka, Kansas, June 21 W. G. CLUGSTON

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In simple fairness to their breathless public The Nation and Miss Austin should contrive an article supplementary to Amorousness and Alcohol explaining what the original means. It is a joy forever to notice that Miss Austin, previously celebrate for her laments on the progressive corruption of the American language by East Side foreigners, has now joined the medicine men. Her Aeolian multiloquence is, I take it, an example of what happens to the American Rhythm when it goes on a jag.

Louisville, Kentucky, June 24 H. M. ROSENTHAL

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Mary Austin assumes, without proof, that amorousness diminishes with alcohol. But American amorousness has not diminished with prohibition. On the contrary, its manifestations have increased. Space forbids enumeration of proofs, but I refer you to the press, the courts, police matrons, Judge Lindsey; to rescue homes, hotel-keepers, apartment-house owners, dance halls. The prohibition "raiding parson," arrested yesterday for "petting" with a married lady of his church, was presumably not stimulated by alcohol.

Human nature always and everywhere has demanded occasional relaxation with some sort of "spree" or "orgy." Psychology calls it liberation of the subconscious. Hence our forefathers invented periodical holidays which fanatics perverted into sabbaths. Whether we like it or not, social drinking was a distraction from amorousness; it drew men together for masculine conversation, discussion, and pastimes, made or kept them manlike, while providing the temporary "escape from reality" which the tragedies of life demand. Prohibition, by reducing the ways of escape or relaxation for that general type of male that finds no relief in the religious jag, virtually forces him into a greater variety of feminine contacts than before; and the erotic current, dammed back into its primitive channel, flows forth with more powerful head. Self-control, never sufficient to stop but only to divert the libido, is weaker than ever now. Hence we have the increased amorousness, mostly illicit, of our blessed Volstead days.

San Diego, California, June 30 EDWARD H. WHELAN

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Amorousness and Alcohol sounds a far cry and it's all the more difficult to feel in accord with Mary Austin inasmuch as there's little to indicate that biology is on the side of any form of prohibition. The effect of alcohol is to stunt sex-desire. Any one, saturated with corn-juice for a protracted period, loses the sex-appetite. But alcohol also stupefies the mind and weakens resistance; hence played so large a role in illicit amorousness and consequent trafficking. As a matter of fact, I do not believe any one is yet in a position to state definitely in what manner alcohol affects the begetting of children. The large probability is that the sex-libido is not thwarted nor frustrated by anything we mortals can do.

STEPHEN D. B. HYLLEBOURNE

Blue Island, Illinois, June 24

Man Trapped

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In a letter in your issue of July 14—a letter which I was astonished to find my good friend The Nation publishing without comment—one Austin Bothwell says definitely that in my novel "Mantrap" I mention the Royal Mounted of Canada but do not mention the provincial police. "The only policeman in 'Mantrap' is romantically a scarlet rider," he says, and he most generously explains for us the provincial force.

Would it be bad taste to say bluntly that this Bothwell is a liar? If so, I will delicately observe that he is not distinguished for accuracy.

Among the few characters of the book are two provincial policemen, one of whom, Curly Evans, is a principal character. And he is spoken of as a provincial policeman, using those words, on pages 105, 166, 200, and possibly elsewhere. The other provincial policeman in the book is the theme of the scene on pages 49 to 52 inclusive.

As to the peacefulness of the Indians—of course they are peaceful, of course they no longer go to war. But that would not prevent them from burning a store in protest if they were so long denied credit that they were starving. The incident is fictional and does not pretend to be anything else, and it could happen equally in peaceful Concord, Massachusetts. To say that Mr. Bothwell's beloved Crees alone among mankind could never be roused to resentment is scarcely a compliment to them.

I expect to be lied about in Liberty, the column of Mr. Isenbergs and the scurrilous of evangelists, and I should never think of answering them. But when our Sabbath religious paper The Nation admits to its columns such a letter as that of Bothwell, I close my Bible with a quick nervous snap, and speak thus in mild and mellifluous protest.

Pequot, Minnesota, July 12 Sinclair Lewis

Laissez-faire

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In his spirited review of "The Rise of Modern Industry," by J. L. and Barbara Hammond, Stuart Chase declares that the first factory acts "broke the sacred nonsense of laissez-faire." Slighting references like this to the ideal of equal freedom are not infrequent in the pages of The Nation. Are they justified?

The term laissez-faire is difficult to render briefly in English. It was adopted by the French economists, who ardently desired to destroy a social system based on privilege and replace it by just laws under which oppression would be impossible. Gournay, the friend of Turgot, took as his motto: Laissez-faire, laissez-passer, defined by Léon Say as "Free labor, free trade, and free industry."

To confuse this ideal of freedom with the industrial tyranny in England is to misrepresent its spirit and intent. The factory system developed terrible abuses which Parliament attempted to check by curtailing the freedom of the employers, but it might have done away with their arbitrary power by repealing the legal privileges upon which wage slavery is founded. All the factory laws enacted since 1833, all the attempts to regulate the hours of work and to limit the employment of women and children have left us with the problem unsolved. State interference creates new evils in attempting to correct old ones. In Mr. Chase's own words, "The physical degradation abates a little, but the spiritual degradation of the machine grows more remorseless with the years."

The "capitalist" has been made the scapegoat in order, it would seem, to shield the landlord. This becomes clear when we seek to discover why the laboring classes accepted such hard conditions. Manifestly, because they could turn to no alternative employment. Julia Patton says in her study of the English village that before the inclosure of the commons "the farm laborer had enough land about his cottage to supply the immediate needs of his family, and the right of pasturage for as many beasts as he could feed during the winter." The results of dispossession were "a class of independent, self-supporting laborers pauperized, driven out of their homes, and made either spiritless or defiant; . . . an antagonism between a capitalistic employing class and a proletariat; . . . a serious national problem bequeathed to succeeding generations."

Robbed of their rights in the land, the peasants were driven by hunger to the factory gates, there to set up among themselves a cutthroat competition that left them no power of bargaining. The employers, however cold-blooded their attitude, took an active part in the production of wealth. But the proceeds could not be shared by the producers until tribute was paid to the landlord, who contributed nothing to the enterprise. Land monopoly is at the root of industrial servitude, but the landlord enjoys some sort of color protection that makes him invisible to the eyes of socialists.

Regulation of industry by the state leads inevitably to a condition of servitude. No matter how wise the paternal government, its wards are not free men and women. A "living wage," sanitary workshops, model cottages, and old-age pensions are poor substitutes for the free play of individual capabilities in a world whose inhabitants are assured of equality of opportunity. The advocates of laissez-faire, abolitionists who look upon land monopoly as the modern equivalent of the slave system, cannot be justly accused of sanctioning the evils of industrial life. They offer a means, not of mitigating them but of ending them once for all by the immediate repeal of every legal privilege.

Seattle, Washington, June 25 Frank W. Garrison

The Unimportance of Railways

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In his article in The Nation on the General Strike W. N. Ewer dilates upon the completeness of the railway tie-up. He ignores altogether the obvious fact that a railway strike in England nowadays counts for little save inconvenience; so long as the strikers cannot control the highways and stop the streams of motor traffic a railway stoppage is of no vital import. It is a well-known fact that the railways in England are not prospering due to the tremendous development of motor traffic on the highways.

Also, Mr. Ewer entirely ignores (as did your other correspondent) the fact that there was an absence of public support to the strikers so well-nigh complete in all parts of Great Britain that it was cause for common comment. What defeated the strike first, last, and all the time was the attitude of the people.

Brooklyn, New York, July 5 Wm. Taylor

Let Well Enough Alone

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir:

I shall not read The Nation more!
I know you will not care!
Your conflicting righteousness
It leaves me to despair.

Think not that I joke or quiz!
For on the square and on the level
I love my country as it is
With Coolidge and the devil.

Charles Edward Stowe

Santa Barbara, California, June 1

Books

Music Brings Griefs

By EDWARD SAPIR

Music brings with pause and tone
Griefs more poignant than our own,
Yet have her tears a starlike grace
Forever set in Music's face.
She weeps but willing tears that seem
Enchanted in the eyelids' dream
And fall not to a heaving breast,
Unlovely, turbulent, distressed.
Music wears her grief with joy,
Holding her pain a merest toy
And dancing with unruffled hair
On the dancing-floor of her despair.

Marie Bashkirtseff, Artist Manqué

Marie Bashkirtseff. The Journal of a Young Artist. 1860-1884. Translated by Mary J. Serrano. New and Revised Edition. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.

TO reread the diary of Marie Bashkirtseff is to become aware of the fact that there are fashions in souls. To a generation eager to take at their face value the raptures and despairs of a facilely romantic nature she seemed an astounding phenomenon, but in this age which has its own spiritual fashions she seems almost as faded as the pictures which she and her contemporaries painted. A little before she came to the end of her page the sense of impending death, ceasing to be a romantic fancy and become a desperate certitude, deepened her tone, but death is the only reality in all the journal of which we can be quite sure. Of places or of persons other than herself she tells us nothing that is not utterly commonplace, and she dramatized herself too constantly ever to have achieved that self-knowledge which she fancied she desired. Doubtless her diary, written with the avowed purpose of assuring her fame in the event that her painting should not be remembered, is nowhere deliberately disingenuous, but if she does not deceive others she deceived herself.

Born of wealthy parents and dragged at an early age from city to city over the face of Europe, extravagantly praised for everything she did, and accustomed from her earliest memory to believe that she was destined for great things, Marie was a typical spoiled child. At the age of twelve, when the published portion of her diary begins, she was already cultivating her sensibilities and noting with pride the tears which fell as she wrote. At the same age she was uttering passionate prayers to God that her vanities might be gratified, and she remained to the day of her death less proud in any noble sense than merely vain. "I must be either the Duchess of H—— or become famous on the stage" she wrote, and this childish thirst for a distinction of some kind, no matter what, is the key to her character.

A snob who would be satisfied with nothing less than greatness in both the world of fashion and the world of art, she could not endure the thought that any circle should fail to respect her. Incapable of love, she constantly dreamed of inspiring a desperate passion in some resplendent person; she devoted a preposterous amount of time to her toilet; and she postured in her diary, constantly trying to feel some remarkable feeling or think some remarkable thought. And yet we have, throughout, not emotions struggling for expression but words whipping up an emotion to meet them. She admired whatever it was correct to admire and she doubtless believed in the distinction of her own perceptions, but when she wishes to be poetic she seldom gets further than an "Oh, Rome! Oh, Naples!" and her criticism of art never [illegible] remark, apropos of Bastien-Lepage, "This is not art, but Nature herself." Tuberculosis, apparently [illegible] suspected, gave her that hectic eagerness which has been remarked in others with the same affliction, and she had read a good many romantic novels, including those of Ouida (whom she admired), but if the influences of disease and cheap fiction were taken away not a great deal would remain. The pictures which she managed to paint were only mildly distinguished performances in an insipid tradition and her diary contains no observations which are in themselves memorable.

Doubtless an egotism such as hers has often served as the driving force behind artistic achievement, but it does not in itself constitute genius. Her ambition never really focused itself, never really went to work upon any specific thing. The desire to be famous never translated itself, as it sometimes does, into a desire to perform a great work, but remained a purely personal vanity. She never forgot herself in her art, never dreamed of a picture whose chief function was not to confer greatness upon her, and by that fact she is damned. She remained an artist manqué because she was never really interested in art.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Beatrice Webb as Beatrice Potter

My Apprenticeship. By Beatrice Webb. Longmans, Green and Company. $6.

THE ancestry of Beatrice Webb was a highly representative compound. Her father was Richard Potter, typically English from the west country, for many years chairman of the Canadian Grand Trunk, one of the earliest of those "capitalists at large" who have since come to rule the world. Liberal in spirit, he was conservative in politics, happy and energetic, and idolized by his nine daughters, of whom Beatrice was the eighth. According to his friend Herbert Spencer, whose theories and reasoning he good-humoredly despised, Richard Potter was the most lovable of human beings. His wife was a scholar and a gentlewoman, who learned a dozen languages for fun. Wanting sons, she could make little of her daughters. They were original and self-willed; they refused to be educated, but none the less fulfilled the family destiny by making a series of splendid marriages.

Always deeply introspective, Beatrice Potter kept a journal from childhood, and from her seventeenth year with remarkable fulness and regularity. The passages here quoted reveal this remarkable girl, encouraged by the best of fathers, reading where she pleased, and thinking in perfect freedom; and yet, at the time of her confirmation in the Anglican church, entering into a spiritual life wherein a deep skepticism contended with a vein of mysticism which survived all her most searching experiences. We see her in the early twenties playing uneasily and critically on the edge of London society, seeking painfully, through occasional gloom and constant frustration, for a guiding principle and purpose, for a creed and a craft. We see her tempted for a while by the political scene—loathing Gladstone, and being attracted by Joseph Chamberlain, seeing in the latter a destroying enemy of the Victorian Liberalism with which she never knew a moment's sympathy. We see her, as she is nearing thirty, freed from family obligation, feeling after the new calling of social investigator, coming at the precisely right moment under the tutelage of Charles Booth, then starting upon his classic survey of the "Life and Labor of the People of London," the book in which all modern surveys have their source. We see her mastering the Booth method, and applying it in the tenements and sweatshops of East London, and later among the cooperative societies of the North of England.

It was the search for an alternative to capitalism which carried Beatrice Potter into the study of the cooperative movement, that characteristic product of the English working classes. After toiling through masses of its deadly records, she found her way to a Lancashire cotton town, and, without revealing her identity, made friends with some of her own kinsfolk who had remained in the ancestral region. In letters to her father she drew charming pictures of the strong and simple life of the factory operatives and cooperators, noting in particular their preoccupation with Bible religion and the steady influence of nonconformist church life in the mechanism and habits of local self-government.

The history of consumers' cooperation was a virgin field, and to this investigator, as it happened, the lack of historical training proved to be a providential circumstance. It drove her to seek the aid of an authority, and a friendly finger pointed to Sidney Webb, then the encyclopedic director of the youthful Fabian Society. They met, and she appealed for help. It was forthcoming with the immediacy, the order, and the copiousness which a generation of students and public workers have learned to think of as the triple mark of Sidney Webb. Pamphlets and memoranda, the author of "My Apprenticeship" sedately implies, were a prelude to Rossetti and Keats and flowing afternoons in Epping Forest—notwithstanding that, according to an emphatic early statement in the record, the receptive member of this wonderful partnership was "poetry-blind."

Mrs. Webb quotes H. W. Nevinson as saying of her brilliant young womanhood, "a rather hard and learned woman, with a clear and analytic mind," concerned with the condition of "an undefined and unimaginable class" rather than with the individual case. This is the familiar case against the Webbs. Does Mrs. Webb admit it? Not only so; she accepts and triumphantly answers it: "To me a million sick have always seemed actually more worthy of self-sacrificing devotion than the 'child sick in a fever' preferred by Mrs. Browning's Aurora Leigh." That, surely, for the modern citizen, is a faithful saying and worthy of all acceptation. S. K. RATCLIFFE

Why Work?

Incentives in the New Industrial Order. By J. A. Hobson. Thomas Seltzer. $1.75.

Free Thought in the Social Sciences. By J. A. Hobson. The Macmillan Company. $4.

WHAT a remarkable record of productive scholarship Hobson has to his credit! Extending over a period of forty years and embodied in more than a score of substantial volumes, not to speak of innumerable reviews and newspaper articles, his work reveals throughout a mind keen to detect the defects, to puncture the fallacies of current doctrinaire explanations, but as eager to modify his own previous positions if the evidence no longer supports them. In his two latest books we have perhaps not his most distinctive work, but certainly the ripened fruit of his scholarship and thought on as important and intriguing subjects as any he has previously treated.

More perhaps than any other contemporary economist, Hobson effectively uses the newer psychology as an auxiliary. If an effective, it is also a dangerous weapon, so long as the battle of the psychologists continues. In employing an apparatus of instincts after McDougall, he lays himself open to the shafts of the behaviorist school.

The suggestive little volume on "Incentives in the New Industrial Order" portrays the collapse of the old order, already shaken to its foundations before the war, and in the last decade really crumbling before our eyes.

> Autocracy has failed in industry, as it has failed in politics. The democratic institutions which have displaced it in the latter sphere have plenty of faults. But nobody seriously regards it as practicable to return to the autocratic state. Absolute government did work in industry, it may continue to work in some countries, and in some industries here. But it has broken down in the larger departments of great capitalism, and must be replaced by methods better adjusted to the psychology of the new situation.

Mr. Hobson believes that in new and yet unstabilized industries, where risk is great and the requirement for large creative imagination imperative, the incentives of large profits must be preserved; here the competitive system may be expected to continue. But those basic and essential industries which are proposed for nationalization have already attained a sufficiently stable and routine character to dispense with the high measure of initiative and enterprise which is so indispensable for success in the newer and less developed type. Furthermore, "a great deal of this initiative and enterprise has no rightful place in socialized industry, being directed either to the achievement of profitable victories over trade competitors or the establishment of a monopolistic power to tax consumers or to the performance of successful coups in the financial sphere." But certainly some creative and progressive qualities must always be required even in public services, however stable, and these he believes will be secured from men "who combine them with a keen public spirit and a high regard for such distinction as the public services can be made to afford." May not, indeed, as R. H. Tawney has suggested, a different value scheme emerge in the new regime which will adequately supply the effective motives for industry? If it be said that this means a change in human nature, the answer is that human nature is a most changeable phenomenon and has always responded to the system of institutions with which it is confronted. Certainly the medieval man reacted to different incentives and revealed different motives than the man of today. The unchangeable character of human nature is one of the fictions which modern psychology is dissolving.

In "Free Thought in the Social Sciences" Mr. Hobson discusses particularly the trammels to which the social sciences are subjected from their intimate connection with concrete interests. A disinterested pursuit of knowledge is possible only in such abstract areas of investigation as mathematics, where the active tide of human affairs is not felt. A purely objective approach to social phenomena is impossible. In describing the rise of political economy, in tracing the development of the neo-classical school, in effectively criticizing the theory of marginalism, the author clearly shows how interest has at every turn prevented the dry light of science from shining undimmed. And the same perverting influence of interest is quite as noticeable in the more recent systems of welfare and proletarian economics. In the field of politics also there are identical obstacles to a disinterested study of the facts. "If such great minds as those of Plato and Aristotle could not disentangle themselves from current Greek sentiment toward barbarians, slaves, women, how could it be expected that modern political teachers, from Machiavelli, Hobbes, and Locke to Rousseau and Hegel, Mill, Spencer, and Bryce, should escape the emotional entanglements of their time and country in the pursuance of their 'science'?"

Is, then, the hope for an effective and disinterested social science futile? Characteristically Mr. Hobson looks to psychology to provide the weapon with which successful resistance may be made to the inimical forces of special interest. An understanding of the nature and method of these forces, which psychology is already providing us, must liberate new powers on the side of "idle curiosity" and reveal the means of "keeping clean the intellectual instruments." By elevating to its just place the instinct of "idle curiosity"; by emancipating the social sciences from the service of the fighting, the self-assertive, the acquisitive instincts, a juster balance, a truer harmony may be attained in the life and conduct of society. In the long run truth must prevail because it is more pleasing than falsehood.

To many this must appear a futile hope. But psychology possesses one great advantage in its definite foundation in the objective facts of biology. When the clouds of war have cleared away, it ought to be able to supply the inductive and disinterested approach to social problems which hitherto has been lacking. In the meantime we can at least envisage those problems more clearly in psychological terms than in the outworn and empty categories of economic law.

WALTER JAMES SHEPARD

A True Epic

The Worm Ouroboros. By E. R. Eddison. A. and C. Boni. $3.

"THE Worm Ouroboros" represents a curious survival in the antique. Mr. Eddison has dipped his hand in many a treasury. The Iliad, the Odyssey, the Ramayana, the Norse sagas (Burnt Njal, especially), Chaucer, Malory, Thomas Browne, medieval bestiaries and lapidaries, Anglo-Saxon charms, Elizabethan chap-books, the romances of the Middle Ages: all seem to have been laid under contribution. A rigorously conceived epic, the interest lies purely in the narrative. As Mr. Cabell notes in his preface, there is no hint of allegory, hardly even a suspicion of humor. The classical exigencies of the epic—that it shall involve a battle between two great powers, that our attention shall be particularly directed to the feats of one hero, that this hero shall emerge victor after a series of adventures mounting in complexity, that there shall be divine intrusion at one point at least of the story, and that the viewpoint of the author, if at all intimated, shall be conveyed by exaggeration rather than irony—all of these requirements are complied with. To give his narrative the appearance of pure romance, Mr. Eddison has nonchalantly indicated the scene of the action as the planet Mercury and has invented names utterly thrilling in their remoteness—Lord Juss, Queen Prezmyra, Brandoch Daha, Gorice the Twelfth, the mountain Koshtra Pivrarcha, and the city of Melikaphkaz!

Much of the style is unabashedly synthetic, but a chapter like that recounting the marvelous ascent of Koshtra Pivrarcha has a poetic boldness and masculinity that finds its meet parallels in Blake and Ossian. There is nothing of Mr. Cabell's pre-Raphaelitism: Mr. Eddison's affinities are with Snorri Storlusson and the Northern skalds. The narrative is prettily complicated and as prettily resolved, and though James Stephens's characterization of it as a masterpiece of English literature sounds like a Celtic exaggeration there can be little doubt that such fierce energy, such sheer story-telling ability is of extreme rarity. There are arid stretches; the copiousness of the style has an occasional smothering effect; the book is rather faite in the French sense than created in the English one; but how much may we not forgive a man of such primitive generosity that in this day, when analytical subtlety seems king, he dares to dower us with 450 pages of what "is neither allegory nor fable but a Story to be read for its own sake"?

CLIFTON P. FADIMAN

The Roots of the Modern State

The Political Consequences of the Reformation. By H. H. Murray. Little, Brown and Company. $4.

THE period of the Reformation is a seminal period in the history of the modern nation-state. It marked the final eclipse of the medieval quest for unity. It witnessed the definitive end of universal dominion under pope and emperor. The nation-state alone then emerged as the ultimate social bond. To a Frenchman, a Spaniard, or an Englishman, the pope and emperor became merely foreigners. Assuredly this development is reflected in the political speculation of the period. In political thought the period began with the audacities of Machiavelli, and it almost ended with that livre de circumstance, the "République" of Bodin. The former dealt with political art, the latter with political science. Yet both theory and fact, art and science, pointed to the rise of national particularism.

Mr. Murray's book on the political theory of the Reformation is hence of interest. In a brief introduction Mr. Murray analyzes the intellectual ferment of the period preceding the Reformation. He then frowns upon Machiavelli, but recognizes his historic significance. He shows how Luther crowned the state with divine sanction and how he was ultimately instrumental in making men more solicitous about the security of their country than about the safety of their souls. Calvin's importance, he finds, rests not on his theory but on its practical application by his disciples. He regards Bodin and his "République" highly, for Bodin apprehended the practical convenience of an omni-competent state in a world riven by the strife of sectaries. He traces the anti-monarchical theories of the Protestant and Catholic writers, but he questions the sincerity of the latter because they were less democrats than Catholics. He concludes with a review of such British writers as Sir Thomas More, George Buchanan, and Richard Hooker.

Mr. Murray's approach to his problem is that of the historian rather than that of the political philosopher. The historian emphasizes casual sequence, the philosopher stresses values. Our author is concerned mainly with the historical continuity of a particular idea, with the influence of one writer upon another, and with the impact of a historic fact upon a political thought. Luther's predecessors and Calvin's successors are carefully analyzed. But the problems of a world where the main concern was with the relationship of a supernatural religion to a secular state are not applied to a world where loyalty to the state has in itself become a religion.

LEWIS ROCKOW

Toward Intellectual Emancipation

The Limitations of Victory. By Alfred Fabre-Luce. Translated by Constance Vesey. Alfred A. Knopf. $4.

M. FABRE-LUCE'S book will retain its importance after most books on the origins of the war have become hopelessly out of date. It is rather an essay on the abortive peace than a treatise on the origins of the war, but the larger part of the volume is taken up by a discussion of the crisis which led to the catastrophe. M. Fabre-Luce, who published an earlier essay on the crisis of the alliances (La Crise des Alliances), has come to the conclusion that the ills which have afflicted Europe since the armistice are in large part traceable to moral causes. The peace was born with a curse upon it.

Any sane person will admit now that the peace treaties were largely a product of the abnormal war psychology. The idea of attempting to shoulder one belligerent with sole responsibility for a world cataclysm seems to us as ridiculous as some of the peace terms were absurd. M. Fabre-Luce is convinced that there can be no real peace until the problem of war origins is examined and aired, until the average intelligent person, enlightened, has revised his notions and reformed his judgment. His book is intended as a "work of intellectual emancipation" and there is a highly interesting introductory chapter in which the methods of war propaganda are outlined and the story of the evolution of historical opinion on the problem is recapitulated.

Two phrases which stick in the memory serve well as summary of M. Fabre-Luce's conclusions: "Germany and Austria made the gestures which rendered the war possible. The Triple Entente made those which rendered it certain"; "The only excuse for the Central Empires is that they gave peace some chances; the mistake the Entente made was in not taking advantage of them." The author by no means exonerates the Central Powers. In his opinion they set the pace and so impelled to the crisis that mark of precipitation and haste which was in part at least responsible for the fatal outcome.

The dispassionate tone, the genuine scholarship, the breadth of view, and the keenness of insight displayed in this volume are truly remarkable. Considering the youth of the author one marvels at the sureness with which he introduces factors of a psychological nature. He can see that though the acts of a statesman may have been mistaken, though they may be damaging evidence of lack of statesmanship itself, though, in fact, they may have been instrumental in precipitating the conflict, yet they need not necessarily imply criminal intent. On the major issues his conclusions, reached by an independent line of approach and by original research in the source material, are substantially in agreement with those of the leading writers of the revisionist school. Reduced to the lowest common denominator, the war was the result of the unfortunate concatenation of circumstances in the Near East, with the resultant revival of the Austro-Russian antagonism, the revivification and "Balkanization" of the two alliance groups, the undue haste of Austria and Germany after the assassination of the Archduke, creating an atmosphere of feverish alarm and anxiety, and, finally, the Russian mobilization, which made the maintenance of peace impossible. One comes away from a perusal of the book with a renewed feeling that, in the last count, the history of German foreign policy after Bismark's fall is the history of a series of blunders. She had little to gain and much to lose by war, while with France and Russia the converse was true. So far as we can see at the present the ill-will was on the side of the allies of 1893. The German blunders proved fatal because France and Russia were ready to take advantage of them.

WILLIAM L. LANGER

Armenia and Africa

The Mythology of All Races. Volume VII: Armenian. By Mardiros H. Ananikian; African. By Alice Werner. Boston: Marshall Jones Company. $8.

THE mythology of the world is an obstreperous thing to edit. The policy of this thirteen-volume series has been to allow each compiler and commentator a free hand with his material, whatever his special idea of the function of folklore studies. In this latest volume the two surveys of Armenian and African mythology have nothing but the name in common. The one itemizes the characters of the Armenian pantheon as they are described in old religious texts, commenting on Semitic and Iranian origins. The plots in which they figure, Aramazd and Anahit, Ba'al Shamin and Nane, only occasionally and casually come in for comment. But this is precisely where the interest of the student of folklore lies. Every people has made over for itself the widely disseminated material of mythology and fitted it to the local pantheon.

The present discussion of African mythology is written by an outstanding authority on the Bantu languages who has herself gathered folklore in Africa in the native tongue. It is running commentary with illustrative synopses of tales, and it covers fairly well the types of traditional material that are current in Africa. For the explorer into strange patterns and curious by-ways the stories will be their own justification and the comment mostly gratuitous. Unfortunately, our English publishers have never provided a series such as the German "Märchen der Weltliteratur," where the stories are given unmutilated and the editors' duties have been only to select the most telling or the most illuminating among the available variants. It is a wise limitation; nobody who has yet tried it has improved upon the naive charm of the native story-tellers, and even free renderings of interpreters do not give the delight of text translations such as those in Rattray's "Hausa Folklore."

For the student of world mythology Professor Werner's comments are a strain on credulity. It is her article of faith that African mythology, except for insignificant exceptions, is indigenous and uninfluenced by European elements. If that is so, the output of the human mind is circumscribed in trivial boundaries; must it throw off among the Hottentot the reynard the fox tale of the lion's illness, even to the jackal's prescription that the king be wrapped in the warm skin of his enemy, the hyena? Or accumulative tales with the familiar water-fire-wood-dog-cat-mouse sequences of our childhood? Even the human tales of Africa, however alien the cultural details, are built upon the familiar motives of the False Bride and Frau Holle and Rumpelstilzchen, and the great proportion of tales are as familiar as the one of the loss of the magic spoon—which we knew as the tablecloth—followed by the loss of the magic cudgel that soundly beats the thieves. It is not in such uniformity that the human mind works uninfluenced from without. We have only to explore the American continents and the South Seas to determine the degree of difference.

At whatever period in history, African folklore was deep-dyed in Indian-European elements. It may be that it is a part of a great myth-area that comprises India, Europe, and Africa, and that it is only in consequence of that old term, "the Dark Continent," that we are blind to age-long infiltrations. Or it may be that five centuries of Portuguese-Spanish influence have supplanted an older mythology which has left its traces chiefly in some stories of creation and of the origin of death. Very likely it is the latter. Certainly the student of folklore can no longer set down to the inevitable action of the human brain such a vast accumulation of similarity in trivial plot-detail as unites the tales of Africa and Europe.

Once recognized, does this relationship not rather add to than detract from the curious charm of this African folk-art? Tales that we have thought trivial or wearisome in our collections are here seen with fresh eyes by men to whom story-telling is an exciting profession. They are turned to new and racy point, hit off with curious or barbaric detail. They have not deteriorated in the transplantation.

RUTH BENEDICT

Roustan in English

The Pioneers of the French Revolution. By M. Roustan. Translated by Frederic Whyte. With an Introduction by Harold J. Laski. Little, Brown and Company. $4.

TO a student of the Ancient Regime who has been reared in the school of Aulard, Sée, Becker, Dunning, and a host of other contemporary writers on the eighteenth century it comes somewhat as a surprise that there should ever have existed a doubt that Voltaire, Rousseau, Montesquieu, the Encyclopedists, and the other philosophes of the Aufklärung were the Fathers of the French Revolution. However, after reading Mr. Laski's introduction to the present volume and the author's own preface, one recalls vaguely that Rocquain did maintain that the esprit révolutionnaire sprang into being long before the outbreak of the revolution and that Faguet did say of the eighteenth century that it was "singularly pale between the age that preceded it and that which followed it." There was good reason, then, why Roustan, twenty years ago, should have taken up the cudgels on behalf of the Age of Enlightenment and written his "Les Philosophes et la Société Française au XVIII^{e} Siècle" to establish not only the superiority of the eighteenth century over the seventeenth but also the direct descent of the revolution from the philosophes.

If, however, the only merit of M. Roustan's work is that he proves his theses, it is tilting with windmills to translate it into English in the present year of grace, when no outstanding student of the eighteenth century questions the legitimacy of the parentage of Voltaire and his confrères. The justification of this belated translation lies in the fact that the book not only presents a most thoroughly informed survey of the society of the Ancient Regime as examined through the eyes of the men of letters of the period but also presents that survey in a limpid and eloquent style that alone assures it a place in the literature of history. While the author has used the memoirs and the political writings of the philosophes almost exclusively as his sources of information, his conclusions are not [illegible] different from the findings of more recent scholars who, like Marion and Sée, have laboriously ground[illegible] provincial archives, and institutional statistics, and today stand in need of no essential revision. Several questions that even at this late date are in dispute find plausible answers in the present volume: why, for example, the philosophes conceded to Louis XV his title of Bien Aimé despite all the suffering he brought upon his people; how Mme du Barry aided the cause of enlightenment by her active opposition no less than Mme de Pompadour by her active support; how the nobility both of the sword and of the robe aligned themselves almost unwillingly on the side of the Encyclopedists; why the financier of the eighteenth century was a more pleasant and intelligent fellow than his colleague of the preceding century; how the ideas of the philosophes spread among the poorest classes of society even though they were illiterate and submerged.

One's only sense of irritation is over the liberties the translator has taken. He has freely omitted passages, not alone for the purpose of condensation but sometimes in the cause of expurgation. He has also added numerous footnotes without taking the trouble to indicate which are his and which the author's—a process especially confusing when he makes errors such as giving the dates of the younger Mirabeau when it is clearly the elder Mirabeau that the text means. Still the translator and the editor deserve praise and thanks. This —the first of a series of books on social and political thought in Europe from the Middle Ages to the present time to be edited by Mr. Laski—is an eminently happy beginning.

LOUIS R. GOTTSCHALK

Easy Going

Flight. By Walter White. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

ANY number of difficulties beset the path of Mr. White's heroine, but the flight is theirs, not hers. The novelist depicts the life of a sensitive child of Creole blood transplanted from New Orleans to an uncongenial environment in the black belt of Atlanta, and traces her subsequent career in Philadelphia and New York. But at each turn of the narrative where one looks for a definite crisis in the antagonisms from which the story is built up the clash is averted. As Mimi Daquin advances her problems melt like snowflakes on a coat sleeve, and —like snowflakes—one quickly forgets their pattern and almost doubts that they existed.

Mimi has the faculty of averting every crisis simply by brushing past it to meet a new one. When she is betrayed she espouses feminism instead of the man and chooses the role of unmarried mother. When her child becomes a problem she places him in a home—without mentioning his race—and he is quite out of the story after that, except as a motif. When the gossip of her own people follows her, she escapes it by affiliating with the white race. And when business success and a brilliant marriage ensue with almost clocklike smoothness, she hearkens to the call of her own blood once more. Whereupon she simply walks out of the house—a "song in her heart as she happily strode through the dawn, the rays of the morning sun dancing lightly upon the more brilliant gold of her hair"—closing her eyes (with the author's connivance) upon a whole new set of problems resting on her doorstep. This, while it does not alter the significance or the sincerity of the novel, somewhat mars a sense of its reality. Woven into the texture of the story is a study of the development of Negro life in contact with American urban civilization, and here the work of the novelist is notably vivid and comprehensive.

LISLE BELL

Entertaining Persiflage

The Secret Group. Being the Second Volume of the Posthumous Works of Julio Arceval. Edited by Salvador de Madariaga. London: Martin Hopkinson and Company, Ltd. 10/6.

MR. DE MADARIAGA'S conception is quite ambitious, but his execution, one must reluctantly confess, is rather humble. Here were the possibilities of a truly great satire on modern civilization—or on civilization in general. Imagine [illegible] of the future—somewhere in America and [illegible] for the rise of a civilization said to have [illegible] on the continent which a persistent tradition calls Europe. What picture of our culture will they construct from what they find? The result, reported by Doctoress Bela to a notable gathering of Ebonite scholars and their husbands, is extremely diverting. The solid arguments which the doctoress forwards to prove that Oxford was really the author of the poems hitherto attributed to Chaucer and Milton and Shakespeare and Kipling, and not, as some Ebonite scholars are inclined to believe, a person or firm responsible for their collection, is a mild satire on our efforts to reconstruct the past from insufficient data. But amusing as all these fanciful details are by themselves, they are incapable of making a book. The important thing is not what the Ebonites think of us but what Mr. De Madariaga thinks of them and of us.

From this angle Mr. De Madariaga's book leaves a great deal to be desired. He sees civilization as a futile, amusing, often boring expenditure of human effort. He sees history as a repetitious tale told by an idler. No matter how it manifests itself, it is always the same old story. Human nature being unchangeable, progress is really the substitution of one social mannerism for another. Civilizations do not really differ essentially; what characterizes them is their style. Here we have a pessimistic attitude big enough to serve as the basis of a philosophy, and therefore solid enough to serve as the skeleton for a satire. So that the reader must reproach Mr. De Madariaga for his lost opportunities. Enmeshed in a great many clever fancies of minor importance, he has failed to carry out the idea dramatically in all its possible significance. The incidents in which he has chosen to give it artistic life are inconsequential and the follies he has chosen to satirize are trivial. Intent on them, he has not seen the tragic comedy of civilization as a whole.

On the other hand, he cannot be accused of dulness. Those who are acquainted with his books of criticism know that he possesses a mind remarkable for the fine integration of scholarship and fancy, culture and urbanity which it has attained. These qualities he now displays at their best in his new medium. And he has buttressed them gracefully with a homely wisdom expressed in parables and proverbs the salt and reasonableness of which recall his immortal countryman Sancho Panza. Had he been writing fairy tales one would have no quarrel with him whatsoever.

ELISEO VIVAS

The Spirituality of Roughnecks

The Torrents of Spring. By Ernest Hemingway. Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.50.

ERNEST HEMINGWAY says he wrote this novel in ten days, and there is no reason for believing that Mr. Hemingway, besides being the best contemporary writer of eighteenth-century prose, is also a liar. The novel is short. But it would have done him or anybody else much credit had its author labored with its perfect style (perfect within honorable limitations) for ten months. "The Torrents of Spring" differs in important features from Mr. Hemingway's first American volume, published last summer: its difference from "In Our Time" spring from a basically different intention. "In Our Time" is naturalistic fiction done for purely creative ends. "The Torrents of Spring" grew out of a motive a little this side of that; its motive is satire and, if one may produce an undemonstrable but wholly convincing bit of internal evidence, its object is Sherwood Anderson's "Dark Laughter."

"Pamela" is still worth reading; "Joseph Andrews" is better worth reading. "Dark Laughter" is a good novel, but, like "Pamela," it contains emotion in excess of the facts, and "The Torrents of Spring" is better worth reading. Lacking, as Fielding did in "Joseph Andrews," a motive originally creative, Mr. Hemingway has nevertheless written a novel which is on its own account, irrespective of momentary aim, a small masterpiece of American fiction.

Mr. Hemingway's consistently limited performance is not generally due to missed intention. He knows what he wishes to do; he usually does it. His intention is fundamentally opposed to any other naturalism of the age. He gets his effects not by complete documentation but by the avoidance of explanatory statement; he keeps his explicit knowledge of the characters exactly equal to the reader's knowledge. Neither do the characters ever rationalize or generalize their successive predicaments. His naturalism is a modified naturalism, and its principles have become more and more unfamiliar since the influence of Zola caught up with the more difficult method of "Bouvard et Pecuchet" and obscured it; while Zola has actually instructed the American novel since Frank Norris, Flaubert has been simply admired. Mr. Hemingway, apparently careless about the choice of material, exercises the greatest zeal in isolating its significant aspects; his selective naturalism achieves its effects through indirect irony, the irony of suppressed comment. Few of his characters are fools; all of them are Bouvards and Pecuchets in that their conduct is so arranged as to rouse the reader's sense of value to the appropriate judgment of it, while they are themselves immersed in a "pure present" and lack the power of generalizing it at all. "In Our Time" proved Hemingway to be a master of this irony. It is an irony preeminently fitted for sustained satire of the sort conspicuous in Defoe and Swift, and Hemingway's success with it in "The Torrents of Spring" is a triumph, but not a surprise.

The material of the story is slight and insignificant in outline; a summary would be impertinent here. But Scripps O'Neil, Mrs. Scripps, Yogi Johnson, the big Indian and the little Indian, "Brown's Beanery the Best by Test," the drinking club of the educated Indians whence Yogi hears the "dark Negro laughter" of the ebony bartender after he is kicked out for being not an Indian but a Swede—these characters and places focus the best genial satire of the "spirituality" of roughnecks, the most deftly tempered ribaldry, and the most economically realized humor of disproportion that this reviewer has read in American prose.

ALLEN TATE

Books in Brief

The Theories of Instinct: A Study in the History of Psychology. By E. C. Wilm. Yale University Press. $2.50.

The plan of writing the history of the leading concepts in psychology is a good one, and Mr. Wilm has done about all that could be done to tell the story of how thinkers of other days and other ways thought about instinct. He realizes that until modern, even recent, days the topic was a subordinate one, finding treatment as it reinforced or could be assimilated with philosophical doctrines that held the center of the stage. The omnivorous interests of the Greeks included tangential considerations. Was the cosmos a blind or a designed construction? Instinct as an accomplishment of ends without conscious appreciation of means (or with it) was a favorite means of reinforcing cosmic philosophies, bent in diverse moods upon reconciling religion and science. It is only in the doctrines of Reimarus, an early sixteenth-century philosopher, that there appears a definite recognition of what the problem signifies in its own right. Other phases born of a growing psychological insight had to appear and disappear before the modern approach, for which the doctrine of evolution was indispensable, could assert its sway. The philosophical implications remain. The pessimistic interpretations of Schopenhauer and Hartmann, no less than the creative intelligence of Bergson, are rooted in views of the functions of instinct; and the same close association with the authentically natural and unconscious appears in the Freudian position. The distinctively recent interest is in tracing the play of urges, acting after the pattern of instincts and thus derived, upon the motives that keep the human world alive and so variously busy. It is upon the historical development that Mr. Wilm concentrates his convenient and critically executed history.

Education in Soviet Russia. By Scott Nearing. International Publishers. $1.50.

For once Mr. Nearing pleads no cause. But he is obviously impressed with what he describes as one of the most vital educational experiments the world has ever known. This brief treatise upon the unique and conscientious attempt at mass education by the Soviet Government is written from the standpoint of the educator rather than the economist, and deals solely with the complex school system. As yet, Russia is a vast educational laboratory. The Russians themselves are aware of its tentative nature. They welcome criticism. Mr. Nearing finds a pitiful paucity of equipment and teachers, yet at the same time an indomitable eagerness, both on the part of the workers and the educators, for a free unified education, a wholesale dissemination of "socialized culture." The prevalent belief seems to be that such ends can be achieved only through a system or plan which awakens in the student a consciousness of himself as a functioning social unit. The Dalton Plan was abandoned in favor of group study maintained in close liaison with industrial and community life, and most of the academic programs are devised and carried out by student organizations under the jurisdiction of the Pioneer or Young Communist groups. Mr. Nearing's report is thoughtful and cautious, and makes no pretense at conclusiveness.

Hunting and Adventure in the Arctic. By Fridtjof Nansen. Duffield and Company. $4.

Anything Nansen may write is bound to have value and to be interesting. The present volume relates the story of his first entrance into the icy regions where later he accomplished so much basic work. Besides the running tale of what happened to him and the good ship Viking, Nansen naturally impresses every page with a profound knowledge gained afterwards; consequently the book is far more important than at first glance would appear.

THEATER

THE GRAND STREET FOLLIES
4th Annual Revue of NEIGHBORHOOD
Playhouse, 466 Grand St. Drydock 7516.
Evenings (Except Mon.) at 8:30.
Matinees Saturdays.

THE THEATRE GUILD Presents
AT MRS. BEAM'S
A Comedy by C. K. MUNRO
with ESTELLE WINWOOD, JEAN CADELL, EARL LARIMORE, HELEN WESTLEY, HENRY TRAVERS AND OTHERS.
GUILD THEATRE, 52nd St., West of B'way. Evs. 8:30. Matinees THURS. and SAT., 2:30.

International Relations Section

Danish Trade Unionists Report on Russia

By MARIUS HANSOME

FOR some years students and itinerant delegations from Russia visited Denmark to study the technique of Danish agricultural and cooperative activities. Meanwhile Danish industry and commerce have been tardy in reestablishing connections with their Eastern neighbor. Danish labor, too, in common with the majority of Western European labor groups, has been wary of the Bolshevik regime. Last fall, however, at the invitation of M. Tomsky, president of the Central Executive of the Russian Federation of Trade Unions, seventeen representatives of fifteen Danish labor unions visited Russia, to study conditions and observe what results had been obtained for the working class.

Of the seventeen members of the delegation eleven were Social Democrats, three were Communists, while three were unaffiliated politically. Frederik Nygaard, poet and author, represented the intellectuals in the Studentersamfund. The findings of the delegation have been brought together in a volume, "What We Saw in Soviet Russia," which was published in Copenhagen early in 1926.

"We who went to Russia as Social Democrats," said Chr. Bruun, delegate from the Molders' Union, in an interview published shortly after his return, "have not been converted to 100 per cent Communism. Though we are agreeably surprised at the amazing accomplishments in the cultural and industrial activities of Soviet Russia, yet many features strike a person from a freer democratic country a bit discordantly."

He deplored particularly the restraints on civil liberties, press, and speech, the almost fanatical deification of Lenin, and armed detachments of soldiers at factory gates. Russia gives tender consideration to women in confinement, allowing full pay for a period of eight weeks. However, it is not uncommon to see women perform the hardest and coarsest work, such as bricklaying and blacksmithing. Why this seeming paradox surprised the Danes, it is hard to say, unless, as highly skilled tradesmen and city dwellers, they do not know the life of many Danish peasant women. Bruun continues:

> We are of one mind in this particular, that a bourgeois reaction in Russia must be prevented at all costs. We do not wish to weaken the cause of labor everywhere. On this matter Western European labor must be determined. And we Social Democrats of the delegation are in agreement further that labor throughout the world must rally to the cause of unity and solidarity; we must present a solid international front against capitalism and reaction, whose designs are the same in all lands.

The delegation went from Leningrad to the Caspian Sea, through the Caucasus to the Black Sea, into the Ukraine and to the large industrial centers, and, finally, via Moscow back to Helsingfors. Since space forbids an adequate summary of the entire survey, it may be interesting to quote sections of the report on such points as the Russian unions and strikes, their political activity, and the special meeting to discuss international trade-union unity.

Unions and Strikes

Russian heavy industries are directed by the state and the method of solving disputes is by mutual agreement and arbitration between the workers and the Government.

Conflicts arise only where the industrial life has been interrupted by imperialistic or civil wars on the one hand and bureaucratic misunderstanding on the other. In both instances these conflicts can be solved peacefully when Labor understands the economic situation, and the Government together with the unions usually terminates any abnormal condition without resort to strikes.

Improved working conditions as a result of the rebuilding of industry have led to a marked decrease in the number of strikes, the statistics from 1922 to 1925 showing a decrease from 3.8 per cent to 0.3 per cent calculated on the basis of the entire union membership.

> The Russian unions regard a strike that leads to the interference with production as a less acceptable remedy for the solution of conflicts under the soviet system. . . . Strikes are usually of extremely short duration—the average loss of time during the past three years has been only twenty-seven days.

Arbitration was established as the normal method of settling industrial disputes by the All-Russian Trade Union Congress, which in 1924 agreed that

> All unions shall avail themselves of arbitration as the normal method of solving industrial disputes. Arbitration insures full protection of the workers' interests and the forward movement of industry.

The percentage of decisions for and against labor as well as the compromise decisions reached in the arbitration courts is indicated in the following table for 1923-1924:

	To workers' interest per cent	Compromise per cent	Against workers per cent
1923	45.4	39.6	15.
1924	36.8	52.4	10.8

Unions and Political Activity

The unions participate in the entire political life of the USSR. Many union leaders are members of foreign delegations, Tomsky in London, Sapronov in Geneva, etc. Unions also look after the welfare of the soldiers and sailors. They take a vigorous part in campaigns, and especially in cultural work. The latter is done through the clubs, of which USSR numbers 3,417 with a membership of 900,251 (601,412 men and 255,118 women). These clubs have divisions for sport, drama, choral singing, science, reading-rooms, etc. Of libraries (reading-rooms) there are 6,803 with 8,414,040 volumes and 1,175,714 borrowers. Every month 2,380,011 books are lent. The clubs also serve as schools, especially for illiterates. . . . Of this type of school there are 4,240 with 131,181 pupils, of whom 106,771 are adults. There are 4,500 divisions for physical culture with a membership of 350,000.

The union educational work deals not only with general culture but especially with union problems. The Central Executive conducts a school and library where more than one hundred active members are prepared for positions of leadership in the movement. Similar schools on a smaller scale are distributed throughout industrial cities. Propaganda among the masses is carried on in the clubs. There are between five and six thousand of such union circles.

That widespread ignorance exists among the general populace of Russia concerning conditions in other countries was delightfully illustrated in an address of welcome to the Danish delegation delivered by a woman in one of the provincial cities. She said: "During the Czar's regime none of us in the country villages could either read or write. Since the revolution many of the peasants can do both." Then pointing her finger directly at the well-set-up, educated labor leaders of Denmark, representing a highly literate and disciplined working class she remarked: "Now, when you go home, prepared to make a revolution in Denmark, then your peasants will also surely learn to read and write."

The labor federations conduct a powerful press.

Number of Union Newspapers in 1927

Dailies	5
Twice a week	10
Thrice a week	6
Weeklies	14
Biweeklies	3

Magazines and Periodicals

Semi-monthlies	29
Monthlies	52
Others	7

In addition the various central executives of the unions issue numerous books and pamphlets dealing with the theoretical, practical, and historical phases of the trade-union movement.

Conference on Unity

In Moscow the Danish and Norwegian delegations met and it was agreed that a joint meeting with the Russian leaders should be held to discuss the question of the united front.

A stenographic record of this meeting is included in the report, but since the single address of M. Losovsky, the chief speaker, covers twenty-four pages of six-point type, we must limit this description to a bare outline.

Alfred Madsen, chairman of the Norwegian delegation, introduced Comrade Losovsky, general secretary of the Red Trade Union International. "The working class of the world is divided according to political, religious, national, and racial characteristics—an uneven spotted picture, and to bring unity into this picture is a colossal task," began Losovsky. He gave the following as reasons for existing divisions:

1. Bourgeois influence over the labor movement, e.g., the Hirsch-Dunckers.
2. The difference in class level within the working class, e.g., the aristocracy of the skilled and the plebeian unskilled.
3. The bourgeois political effort to secure a trade-union voting body (what the Germans call Stimmvieh) as a basis of its party.
4. Coalition of a part of the labor movement with the bourgeoisie.
5. Collaboration of certain labor groups with bourgeois international institutions, such as the League of Nations, International Labor Bureau, etc.
6. Violation of the principle of democracy within the trade unions toward virile minorities, e.g., exclusion from the A. F. of L. congress of a Communist for introducing a resolution on the recognition of Soviet Russia.

As hindrances to unity he cited the following points:

1. Rejection of democratic methods in the meeting of [illegible] due to the inability of the leaders to adapt themselves to new ideas, new strategy, and to an acquired fear of the masses.
2. The belief of several of the leaders of the Amsterdam International in their inherent infallibility and life tenure of office, even to the point of making their position hereditary and self-perpetuating.
3. The feeling of superiority of Europeans toward non-Europeans—especially the Orientals; a superiority which reflects Europe's one-time financial and economic hegemony.
4. Unresponsive leadership; many leaders are mere excrescences on the body of labor. They are given to formalism, precedents, paragraphs, historical resolutions, instead of feeling the living processes, the growth of new facts.
5. The insidious development of bureaucratic centralism in place of democratic centralism.
6. All forms of collaboration with the bourgeoisie.
7. The failure of labor representatives in the League of Nations to protest against the wars in Morocco and Syria.

In summing up, Losovsky attempted to answer the question whether trade-union unity is possible as long as the political movement is divided.

It is possible only when the unions create an atmosphere in which there is frank and free discussion, while simultaneously submitting to discipline in the fight against capitalism. Can we create political unity by the liquidation of the conflict between reformism and communism? I do not think so. For these two theories are mutually exclusive. But we can create an organization in which the workers' interest can be defended against the common enemy. The Norwegian Labor Party points the way to such an organization. In the trade-union field we can point to the agreement between the English Trade Union Congress and the Red Trade Union International. I believe we should call an international congress with proportional representation from all lands for the purpose of discussing unity. In the event that the majority vote for the Second International then the minority must abide by the decision, with the privilege of agitation within the organization, and vice versa. We are ready for such a congress. Can it be done? Yes, if we so will. If we do not accept at unity soon, the bourgeoisie will celebrate its victory over our graves.

Unity is not a problem in Russia. We have unity. We are smelted and forged and we hope to see the same united front in all other lands.

Discussion

Alfred Madsen of the Norwegian delegation said:

I concur fully with Comrade Losovsky in the reasons he assigns for the split and the hindrances to unity. . . .

I believe that trade-union unity is possible without political unity. I do not believe that a social-democratic ideology can be brought into consonance with communism. I shall not dispute why the split came; what is of greater importance is the way to unity, and on this point Comrade Losovsky was a trifle weak. Unity lies along the lines of the work of the English-Russian Committee with whose decision the congress of the Norwegian Federation of Labor agreed unanimously.

Erick Jacobsen offered a resolution for the Danish delegation:

The Danish delegation adheres to all efforts in behalf of gathering the workers of the world in a common international through the summoning of a world congress, there to lay down such lines and rules as will be efficacious in the creation of a united front.

We are in agreement with the expressed principles of the English-Russian Committee. Our president of the Danish Federation of Labor, C. F. Madsen, voted for the English proposal to call a world congress at the last executive meeting of the Amsterdam International.

Our delegation is of the opinion, further, that new developments have created an understanding of the necessity of trade-union unity and that no real hindrances exist to a congress of the workers of the world convened to plan the war for proletarian emancipation and the taking over by labor of the productive industries of all lands.

In answer to the question what Russia would do in the event that the Amsterdam International refused to negotiate with the Russian unions Losovsky said:

> Then we shall go ahead with our work until we reach our goal. There are many organizations outside of the Amsterdam International. Welding the working class together takes time. We must have patience and endurance. Even temporarily unsatisfactory results must not leave us pessimistic. That would be unfortunate for the labor movement. The problem is not to convert the conservative leaders of labor but to infect the masses with a desire for unity; when we get the masses with us it would be desirable to have the leaders come along; if the latter will not come with us, then the weak ones must go.

THE DELEGATION'S JOINT STATEMENT OF ITS IMPRESSIONS

After acknowledgement of the opportunities given the Danish delegation a unanimous statement proceeds:

> The delegation has observed Russian industrial life widely, both in the large and smaller centers, above the earth and in its bowels, and we have received the definite impression that Russian industry in both its technical and its productive aspects is progressing vigorously, and with the intensive work that is being performed everywhere Russia will within a reasonable time be able to improve its economic life and heal the sores which revolution and famine have inflicted.
>
> We heartily commend your educational work in the industries and in agriculture. We can only express wonder at the splendid improvement in your housing situation. It is gratifying to see the rising curve of cultural interest among the adults and we hope that you will continue your plans for elementary education.
>
> We have been deeply impressed with the social welfare agencies, such as public eating places, vacation homes for workers, children's homes, convalescent homes and sanitariums—all of which materially aid the workers in bringing up their children, in achieving a bit of much-needed freedom, and above all provide the needed care and hygiene essential to periodic recuperation from exhausting and enervating toil and sickness. It also removes that capitalist cancer—the feeling of insecurity.
>
> Viewed against the background of the Russian workers' social and cultural status under the Czars' and private capitalists' yoke, we are compelled to admit that stupendous progress has been made. May this progress continue in the same direction. We bespeak our sincerest respect for the heroism, sacrifices, sufferings of the Russian workers, who have endured terribly in order to reach the present result. . . .
>
> We hope for your progressively peaceful reconstruction. We voice our earnest desire, and offer our services in accordance with our means, for the calling of a world congress where the Russian with the rest of the workers of the world may meet to effect a trade-union united front and thus push the fight against imperialism and international capitalism to a victory for the world of labor.
>
> Long live international workers' unity!

RECOMMENDED FOR SUMMER READING

Number One
Follow this Series

Reasons Why . . .
The Story of Philosophy
"one of the best of the best-sellers"

IMMANUEL KANT
"Kant thought out everything carefully before acting, and therefore remained a bachelor all his life."
—From page 288 of

THE STORY OF PHILOSOPHY
by Will Durant

"Ask your book-seller to show you this 580-page book . . . giving the lives and opinions of the great philosophers from Socrates to Santayana . . . in a way so sound, so human, so brilliant, so exciting . . . [the replies are ours but the adjectives belong to Van Loon, Rascoe, Dewey, Brean, Macy, etc., etc.] that it has become the best-selling non-fiction book in America . . . the superlatives are Brentano's, Macy's, and other representative book-stores. $5.00 everywhere.

Simon and Schuster
Publishers of Books
37 West 57th Street
New York City

Books from all publishers, books for all readers
Delivered promptly to any address
E. P. DUTTON & CO., 681 Fifth Ave., N.Y.

Summer Time!

Camps, hotels, summer homes, boarding houses,
—and those who seek such accommodations
Those who have an apartment they wish to rent
Those who want to rent an apartment

we recommend placing an advertisement in the classified section of The Nation, as the best means of bringing the right [illegible] together. Rates on request. Address [illegible] of The Nation.

When writing to advertisers, please mention The Nation.

Contributors to This Issue

PAUL BLANSHARD, at present attached to the staff of The Nation, is field secretary of the League for Industrial Democracy.

JOHN BILLINGS, JR., is in the Washington bureau of the Brooklyn Daily Eagle.

JOHN CARTER is on the staff of the New York Times.

LEWIS S. GANNETT, associate editor of The Nation, recently returned from six months in the Orient, spent chiefly in China.

DAVID WARREN RYDER is editor of the San Francisco Review, a literary monthly.

EDWARD SAPIR is associate professor of anthropology at the University of Chicago.

S. K. RATCLIFFE is a British journalist and lecturer.

WALTER JAMES SHEPARD is on the staff of the Robert Brookings Graduate School of Economics in Washington, D. C.

CLIFTON P. FADIMAN is a contributor to The Nation and other periodicals.

LEWIS ROCKOW is author of "Contemporary Political Thought in England."

WILLIAM L. LANGER is assistant professor of European history at Clark University.

RUTH BENEDICT is in the department of anthropology at Columbia University.

LOUIS R. GOTTSCHALK is professor of history at the University of Louisville.

LISLE BELL is one of the younger literary critics.

ELISEO VIVAS was the author of the Unknown Critic, which appeared in The Nation for December 10, 1924.

ALLEN TATE is a poet and essayist living in New York.

Foreign Affairs

The English monthly journal, Foreign Affairs, was founded by the late E. D. Morel. Its present Editor is H. M. Swanwick.

It strives to give an objective account of international affairs, but this does not mean that it has not a point of view. It is progressive, democratic, internationalist. It is the cheapest and best-informed journal dealing exclusively with international affairs. Price yearly by post, $1.22, from 34 Victoria Street, London, S. W. 1.

SUMMER COURSES IN JEWISH SOCIAL WORK

THE TRAINING SCHOOL FOR JEWISH SOCIAL WORK offers summer institutes for Social Workers in addition to its regular course of fifteen months' graduate study in preparation for Jewish social work.

The following courses will be given during the second term of the Summer Session which will begin August 16, 1926

Social and Religious Institutions of the Jews..M. M. Kaplan
Modern Jewish History.....I. B. Berkson
The Field of Jewish Social Service in the U. S...M. J. Karpf
Adiminstration of Jewish Family Case Work Agencies.....M. J. Karpf
Administration of Jewish Federations.....M. B. Hexter
Post War Problems of the Jews.....I. B. Berkson

THE FALL QUARTER WILL BEGIN OCTOBER 5, 1926

For a description of the Courses of Study write for the General Announcement

THE TRAINING SCHOOL FOR JEWISH SOCIAL WORK

(Initiated by the National Conference of Jewish Social Service)

210 West 91st Street, New York City

accept nothing but

Non Depressant
non Habit Forming
In Convenient
Aluminum Boxes
At every drug store

3 Tablets 15c
10 Tablets 40c

Midol for HEADACHE

GENERAL DRUG CO., - 94 N. Moore Street, New York

A MOSCOW DIARY A graphic human-interest story of the life of the people in Soviet Russia today, by Anna Porter. Cloth $1.00 postpaid. Ask for book catalog.
CHARLES H. KERR & CO. 347 East Ohio Street, Chicago

REAL HARRIS HOME SPUNS Direct from the Makers at Manufacturer's Price
Suit Lengths Cut to Order. Price $2.00 per Yard. Postage Paid
NEWALL, 159 Stornoway, Scotland. Write for patterns stating shades desired

REAL ESTATE

SIXTY acres of tumbling woodland with beautiful views, 100 year old Colonial house to be remodeled. Brook flows past the house. 51 miles from New York. 3 miles from railroad. Price $200 an acre.

MARGARET LANE
Croton-on-Hudson, N. Y. Croton 400

When writing to advertisers, please mention The Nation

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXIII NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 4, 1926 No. 3187

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS
EDITORIALS:
Those Debts
The Problem of Crime Remains
Next Winter in the Theater
Mexico vs. the Roman Church
CARTOON By Hendrik van Loon
PRICE-FIXING FOR THE FARMER By Harold Soulé
GLIMPSES OF ARTHUR GLEASON. By Helen Hayes Gleason AMERICA SHOULD CANCEL THE WAR DEBTS By Philip Snowden
A WOMAN WITHOUT A COUNTRY By Mary R. Dye
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter
CORRESPONDENCE
BOOKS:
For a Thief Lynched. By John Wilkinson Garrard
Poe's Diaries. By Joseph Wood Krutch
Our American Empire. By Scott Nearing
Romantic Spain. By William Roscoe Ridgeway
A Poetic Fabric. By Joseph Auslander
Negro Eloquence. By Alain Locke
Books in Brief
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
The Shrinking Globe

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor: FREDA KIRCHWEY

Literary Editor: MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: 55 So. Dearborn Street. British Agency for Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

REMEMBERING THE LONGEVITY which Bernard Shaw granted to the most nearly ideal people who ever sat upon the stage, the he- and she-ancients of "Back to Methuselah," we suppose that he considers himself at seventy as very little more than an infant. The human world is so unwise, he then insisted, because it lives so short a while. Give a man several hundred years of trial and error, and he may possibly evolve a sensible method of conducting the affairs of himself and his fellows on the earth. Doubtless Mr. Shaw would like to learn that centuries still stretch before him, and we must confess that no piece of news would please us more. Threescore and ten years are not enough for such as he—whether boy or man we shall not presume to decide. There still are those who denounce him as an international bad boy at the same time that they are worried over one who seems too wise for this world. We can only wish that such boys would be boys forever, or, failing that, could pass on into a green old age among people who not only tolerated but worshiped wisdom.

THE CASE OF SUSIE BOYD proves that Richmond, Virginia, at least, stands for justice to the Negro. Susie forged twenty-two small checks, amounting to $183. Arrested on three indictments, she pleaded guilty, and, without jury or even counsel, was sentenced by Judge W. Kirk Mathews to ten years on each charge, amounting to thirty years in prison. Thereupon a crop of protests sprang up—not, as might be expected, from the Negro community. The white press of Richmond took a firm and dignified stand in editorials against the extreme sentence, and printed columns of letters of protest, some from Negroes but most from whites. The News-Leader in an editorial pointed out that on the same day when Susie was sentenced to thirty years for a forgery of $183 a white woman received a two-year suspended sentence for shoplifting goods to the value of $13,000. The Times-Dispatch asked the court's leave to join as an amicus curiae in a plea for a reopening of the case, which was made by H. W. Oppenheimer, a white lawyer who volunteered his services in Susie's defense. Finally, on the ground that Susie was mentally subnormal and did not understand her right to a counsel and a jury, Judge Mathews reopened the case and reduced the sentence from thirty years to six. The News-Leader commends Judge Mathews for his courage in openly admitting and correcting a serious mistake. To this praise we gladly add our own hearty commendation of the News-Leader, the Times-Dispatch, and the citizens of Richmond. They made real the old theory that all are equal before the law.

ILLINOIS REPUBLICANS do not spend money as [illegible] as Mr. Mellon's friends in Pennsylvania, but they spend plenty. Each of the two Senatorial candidates admits spending about a quarter of a million dollars, which in the ancient days of Newberry, five or six years ago, would have shocked the country. One traction magnate presented the successful Republican candidate with $125,000, and then reinsured himself by offering $15,000 to the successful Democrat. He was a good guesser. As in Pennsylvania, most of the transactions were in cash, which facilitates the covering-up process when the investigators come around. The cheerful aspect of the Chicago situation is that there appears to be something of a civic revolt against this orgy. Illinois is not quite as contentedly corrupt as Pennsylvania.

TEXAS IS STILL a lone star. She insists upon bursting into the news in her own way. She did not stage a national "monkey trial"; but she quietly told the textbook publishers just how to eliminate evolution from the copies sold in Texas (and they did it); and she has a roaring fundamentalist parson who can quietly murder a political enemy in the church study, then post a small bail, and continue preaching to still larger audiences. And she has "Ma" Ferguson, the first woman Governor in these United States. Even in the manner of her defeat "Ma" maintained the Texas tradition. She promised to resign if she did not lead her opponent, Attorney General Dan Moody, by 25,000 votes in the primary, and the Attorney General matched her by agreeing to resign his office if he did not lead. Texas was evidently tired of being governed by "Jim" Ferguson through his wife, and gave Moody a clear majority. It is a singular fact that while there have been good women in our Congress, as in the German Reichstag, the House of Commons, and the Scandinavian legislatures, not one woman has yet achieved real distinction as a legislator or executive. Is it because women are too intelligent to devote themselves to politics? Or mere accident? And will Judge Florence Allen defeat Atlee Pomerene for the Democratic nomination for United States Senator from Ohio, and break the spell? We hope so.

THE STRIKING EMPLOYEES of the Interborough Rapid Transit Company had their first taste of violence at the hands of twenty-five detectives of New York's Industrial Squad who were waiting for them outside Manhattan Casino, the strikers' meeting-place, where they had been holding a meeting. The one striker who was arrested is lying in the hospital with broken ribs and a possible fractured skull. Responsibility for the incident has not been fixed, but the company's officials are known to have kept the police informed of the activities of the strikers, and on that evening had reported that the audience in the Casino was listening to "inflammatory speeches." Not to be outdone the police of Passaic have a bigger and better brawl to their credit. Four hundred fur workers of New York, recently victorious in their own strike, went in trucks and buses to Ukrainian Hall in Passaic for a meeting with several thousand textile strikers in support of the relief plans of the United Front Committee. The police first objected to the fur workers' placards, then declared the string of conveyances a parade and attempted to send the fur workers back to New York without the buses which had brought them. Fighting followed, with six arrests. The orgy of police violence which has characterized recent strikes in ostensibly civilized areas must have persuaded many persons even outside the ranks of the strikers that the police can generally be found on the side not of "law and order" but of the employers.

THE GALAXY OF EX-PREMIERS in the new French Cabinet is impressive—and depressing. Here is Poincaré himself, one of the makers of the Russian alliance before the war, and author of the Ruhr invasion which heaped high the debt of France. Here is Briand, the chameleon, ten times Premier, who has espoused every policy on the compass of French politics. Here are Barthou, author of the three-year military-service law; the amiable Leygues; and Painlevé, who waged the war on Abd-el-Krim; here, curiously, is Herriot, the genial leader of the radical Left, who ousted the Briand-Caillaux combination, failed to win the Chamber for himself, and now accepts a humble position as Minister of Public Instruction with men whom he has all his life fought. Here, too, are Louis Marin, who still fights the Germans in his every speech; André Tardieu, with his past of colonial scandal; and Albert Sarraut, a nominal radical who has always succeeded in working with Poincaré. It is a Cabinet of great names—many of them names familiar long before the war. If all these men can work together they must command a majority in the Chamber. But can they work together on a program of economies that must mean demanding drastic taxes from their rich friends and eliminating the political jobs with which they have satisfied their poor supporters?

GREGORY ZINOVIEV has been ousted from the Political Bureau of the Russian Communist Party, the real governing body of Soviet Russia—ousted because, defeated at the party congress, he refused to accept party discipline and secretly organized a sort of counter-revolution within the Bolshevik organization. Thus the mills of revolution grind their grist. For it was Zinoviev who two years ago perfected the machinery which removed Trotzky from his natural position in the inner temple of Bolshevism. Friends of Soviet Russia will rejoice at the fall of this stormy petrel. Zinoviev had a talent for being a revolutionary at the wrong moment. He was against the Soviet Revolution when it occurred, and won his chief fame as leader of the Third International in predicting and promoting revolutions all over Europe when the psychological conditions were not ripe for revolution. He bears a large share of personal responsibility for the bloody and useless "March Action" in Germany in 1921, and for the silly personal dissensions which turned what might have been working-class Communist parties in a dozen countries into mere bands of religious sectaries. The next move will be to remove him from his control of the Third International; when that happens reunion of the labor movements in Europe will be appreciably nearer.

IN FELIX DJERZINSKY, dead of heart disease at 49, Soviet Russia loses one of its legendary heroes. As chairman of the military revolutionary committee, with trusted men in every regiment, he organized the military coup that ousted Kerensky in 1917; and then, as head of the Cheka, he turned his genius to the destruction of counter-revolutionary forces. He believed in Terror as a political instrument, and when in power applied the ghastly lesson he had learned in the prisons of the Czar. It was his job to crush opposition in days when human life seemed trivial. Perhaps only a fraction of the terrible stories told of his administration of the Cheka were true; but he would have scorned to deny the human cost of maintaining Soviet rule in those bloody days. Criticism meant little to him if he succeeded. And he did succeed. He crushed monarchist, anarchist, socialist conspiracies with impartial cruelty. Then, the revolution safeguarded, he reorganized the railroads, and later utilized his extraordinary administrative capacity in the development of Russia's national industries. Something in him of the ruthless efficiency of the "hard-boiled" American business man made the Hoover men of the American Relief Administration admire him more than Lenin. If American criticism of an inefficient railroad official proved true, the man disappeared next day. He preached and practiced the sacrificial discipline of the Russian Communist Party. A mere bourgeois, caught stealing, went to jail; a party member, for the same offense, might die. Son of a Polish noble, classmate of Pilsudski at Vilna, Djerzinsky gave his life for Russia's experiment in communism. He combined the qualities which make Lenin and Henry Ford the twin heroes of the new Russia.

OREGON HAS A PRESIDENT of the State university who has had banking experience and a pleasant smile. A few weeks ago we noted the enthusiasm of the university regents over those qualities, but suggested that Dr. Hall might have other qualities as well. We were, alas, right. Dr. Hall has dared to state in a public speech that national prohibition was not a success, and to add that he was opposed to it in principle. Immediately the Oregon Anti-Saloon League and the Portland Ministerial Association passed resolutions tantamount to demanding his resignation, the Portland Oregonian devoted an editorial column to deploring his utterances, and the regents issued a series of apologetic statements devoutly hoping that he had been misquoted. As the Anti-Saloon League said, such expressions of minority opinion "are contrary to the settled policy of Oregon." College presidents, it appears, are entitled to smile and to cash checks, but not to suggest that anything should ever be changed.

Those Debts

THERE are lies, damned lies, and statistics. Secretary Mellon prefers statistics. In the confused welter of kitchenwife name-calling in which the British and American treasuries, ably supported by the newspapers, have been indulging, this emerges clear: Secretary Mellon has told Europe one thing; he has told America another thing; and he has bolstered his contradictory statements with equally staggering arrays of billion-dollar statistics. If from this blatherskiting episode the American people learn to regard Mr. Mellon and his figures with a profound distrust we shall gain something.

Mr. Mellon wants to settle the inter-Allied debts so that the private bankers can do a rousing business "reconstructing" Europe. In order to achieve that high end he does not scruple to twist his figures to suit his audience. On January 4, speaking to the American people through Congress, he said that no funding of the debts should be made which did not repay the principal; and on May 20, to carry his point, he told Congress that the present value of the proposed French payments was $2,734,000,000, of the Belgian settlement $302,000,000, of the Italian settlement $782,000,000. But on July 14, wishing to impress Europeans with our generosity, he revised his figures and produced a figure for the French of $1,681,000,000, for the Belgian of $192,000,000, for the Italian of $426,000,000. Somehow or other, in less than two months, he lost track of something more than a billion and a half dollars. Which is a great deal of money, even for a Secretary of the American Treasury.

The secret, of course, lies in his playful juggling with the interest rate. If you discount the present value of future payments at 5 per cent, you get one result; if you discount at 2½ per cent, you get a very different result. And our Secretary of the Treasury in his public utterances has juggled the figures to gain his point in a manner which can only be described as dishonest.

He fibbed and figured, to be sure, in an earnest endeavor to persuade the American people to be reasonable about a matter on which they are unreasonable. His principle for settlement was sound—that of "capacity to pay." Any sensible creditor treats with a delinquent debtor on such a basis. To shout at an impoverished debtor that he must pay dollars when he has only cents in his pockets is to make oneself ridiculous. And that, after all, was something like the manner of our Congress in insisting that the debts be collected in full. That insistence, to be sure, was a natural enough product of the national disillusionment with the Treaty of Versailles. The American people were still full of the crusading spirit with which they had been led into the war when that conference opened; when it closed their ideals were dead, and since then they have demanded of those who killed them whatever pounds of flesh the bonds demand. Their statesmen have seldom been conscious of the significance of that mood of disillusionment; but it is the fire behind the isolationism of the masses.

But Mr. Mellon did not attempt to argue the question of Europe's capacity to pay; he simply produced false figures to prove that his settlements were really settlements in full. And Congress accordingly approved the Belgian and Italian settlements—not because it understood and liked them but because Mr. Mellon had deliberately and successfully made it misunderstand them. It was a little startled when the compact scaling the Italian debt was ratified to discover that the bankers had meanwhile negotiated a 7 per cent loan with Italy on the basis of her revived credit. Italy was unable to pay the taxpayers of the United States who, in the end, pay these inter-Allied debts—but she was rich enough to pay good interest to American bond-buyers. One suspects that even some of Mr. Mellon's calculations of capacity to pay may be, let us say, edited to suit the needs of the hour. And the net result of this false figuring is likely to be to drive the American people into a still more recalcitrant state of mind toward all these debt settlements.

Meanwhile we are subjected to a heavy barrage from both sides of the English Channel. Winston Churchill says that Mr. Mellon's figures are false, and Mr. Mellon's understudy replies that the British figures are false. Whether the British payments cover food or munitions bought during the war does not seem to The Nation to matter much. All the advances were made, directly or indirectly, to help on the war; and when the Europeans signed bonds they did so expecting to repay. They have acknowledged their obligations, and their responsible statesmen (we do not rate Winston Churchill as such) argue only as to the amount which they can repay without jeopardizing their economic structure. It is a pity that argument on that point cannot be taken out of the hands of politicians and referred to a genuine committee of experts, without the suspicion that the experts will merely arrange terms on which new and profitable private loans can be substituted for these troublesome inter-government loans. There was a time when a far-sighted government in Washington might have used the debts as an instrument to hasten a world-wide policy of reconciliation; but there was no such vision in the capital, and no policy of reconciliation. Under Poincaré France had its spree in the Ruhr; today she is belatedly paying the cost of it, and blaming America.

Europe, we believe, has never faced the facts of America's position. Even Mr. Snowden, in his wise article in this issue of The Nation, does not seem to realize that the "intolerable burden" which he would have us lift from the backs of the British workers must be carried somehow. If European taxpayers do not meet the interest on the Liberty bonds (which raised the money lent to Europe) American taxpayers must. Few Americans want to see Europe squeezed, but before they make the sacrifice, they want to be sure of results.

The American debt has little to do with the crisis of the franc. France has been living by borrowing, and has borrowed money to pay the interest on her previous borrowings. On her debt to the United States—barring some small post-armistice purchases—she has not been paying at all; that debt has affected the present crisis only by keeping her from borrowing more money in the American market. In 1919 French revenues amounted to only 15 per cent of French expenditures; in 1920 to 27 per cent; in 1921 to 40 per cent; in 1922 to 50 per cent; in 1923 to 56 per cent; in 1924 to 66 per cent; and in 1925 and 1926 the expenditures still overtop the income. The deficits have been in large part concealed, and met by borrowings and by inflations. Until the recent crisis no French Finance Minister dared admit publicly that the franc could never be brought back to its pre-war par but must be stabilized at perhaps an eighth of its former value. There lies the cause of the French crisis, not in the American debt settlement; but it is small wonder that the boulevard crowd, seeing the dollar and pound quotations go up as the franc goes down, vent their excited irritation at the next rude and stupid American tourist whom they meet.

The trouble in France is that politicians have not dared tell the people the truth, and that accordingly things have drifted from bad to worse. And Secretary Mellon, deceiving the American Congress, has only made it more difficult for America to contribute its mite toward a solution.

The Problem of Crime Remains

THE war against crime is taking its usual course. The old guard dies but it never surrenders. The old methods have failed; therefore let us try more of the old methods. It is wisdom of this sort that inspired most of the crime bills that have come from half a dozen State legislatures during the past few months. This is not to condemn them utterly; some of them have merit and only a few are positively mischievous. What is deplorable is that they should be taken seriously as measures of crime repression and thus accepted by the community as a solution of the problem. The public mind has been aroused by the recent propaganda against crime and is demanding that effective measures shall be devised to deal with the evil. What it is getting is a few score laws aiming to treat more drastically the symptoms of the disease. There is available today an extensive and growing body of knowledge of the causes of delinquency. Scores of devoted students, from Miriam Van Waters in Los Angeles to William Healy in Boston, are devising a promising technique for the study and the treatment of the individual delinquent. Hundreds of private social agencies are working at the development of effective preventive and curative measures. The psychiatric branch of the medical profession is prepared to submit a legislative program for dealing conclusively with the large class of mental cases in our criminal population. Of all these efforts which aim at the heart of the problem our amateur reformers of the crime commissions know nothing and care less.

But there is another angle to the effort which the crime bills of the current season represent. Many of them, it is true, are the futile gestures of panic-stricken reformers, striking out blindly at the criminal by increasing penalties and by seeking to restrict or even, in many cases, to abolish the salutary devices of probation and parole. But along with these there appear measures whereby the legal profession aims to give new efficiency to the administration of criminal justice. To the lawyer crime is a matter of justice, and justice is a matter of law and judicial procedure. He is justly proud of the law and jealous of its dignity. The administration of the criminal law does not deserve half the hard knocks it has been getting of late—it is by far the best part of our system of municipal administration—but it is bad enough, much too dilatory and technical, too easily manipulated by the unscrupulous criminal lawyer, too frequently degenerating into play-acting.

These things put the honest lawyer's teeth on edge. So he sets himself, through legislation, to stop the loopholes through which experienced criminals make their escape—too easy bail for professional crooks, interminable delays in bringing offenders to trial, unlimited appeals on technical grounds—and to restore to the judicial office some of the power which used to go with its dignity—more control over counsel and a greater share in the task of enlightening the jury. Such matters have been dealt with in the bills under consideration, and we can only hope that the new laws will be so administered as to accomplish the desired results. We may also hope that the new impulse to study the workings of the present system will be productive of more comprehensive and far-reaching improvements in the near future. The American genius for organization and management should, in the course of another generation, furnish us with an administration of criminal justice comparable with that which England has achieved in recent years. That will be a brave achievement, but let us not be deceived as to its aims or results. It does not deal with the problem of crime. That still remains the task of the student of delinquency.

Next Winter in the Theater

FROM the standpoint of the average theatergoer the New York stage is probably the most interesting in the world. It has developed no novelty as provocative as several of the experiments recently conducted in Russia; its interest is due largely to a group of producers who have formulated no very definite program; yet it caters to a dozen different audiences with considerable success. Each year it has its score of plays addressed to the comparatively small group interested in the serious drama and its hundreds addressed to every other sort and condition of man. The American who hears its supremacy challenged can at least take his usual refuge in an emphasis upon size. No other country in the world ever produced so many or such different plays, or produced them so lavishly.

If one may judge from the announcements so far made for the coming season, next winter will produce an even more abundant crop of plays than usual. Three or four theaters now under construction will open, and the names of more than a hundred new pieces have already been made public. There is no dearth of things which promise well for those interested in the serious drama: Shakespeare will be represented by "Much Ado About Nothing" (Theater Guild), "Twelfth Night" (Civic Repertory Theater), and a plain-clothes "Taming of the Shrew" (Horace Liveright), as well as by various revivals by both Hampden and Mantell. From Ibsen we are promised "Pillars of Society" and two of his plays seen here last year, all done by Miss Le Gallienne. From other foreign dramatists of some distinction we are to have works not yet seen here by Andreyev, Sem Benelli, Ansky, and Sacha Guitry, as well as an adaptation of Dryden's "All for Love" (Horace Liveright), and another Gilbert and Sullivan opera (Winthrop Ames). Five popular pieces of literature—"An American Tragedy" (Horace Liveright), "Jurgen" (Norman Bel Geddes), "Gentlemen Prefer Blondes" (Edgar Selwyn), "Teeftallow"

(Messrs. Shubert), "The Constant Nymph" (G[illegible]), "Hatrack" (Jones and Green), and perhaps "The Private Life of Helen of Troy"—will be dramatized. Best of all, a number of the most interesting American dramatists will have one or more new pieces. Laurence Stallings will contribute the score of a jazz opera, "Deep River," which Arthur Hopkins will produce, and, perhaps, "When in Rome," a play not yet completed; Eugene O'Neill will have three new works, of which only "Marco's Millions" and "Lazarus Laughed" have yet been named; while Clare Kummer, George Kaufman, Marc Connelly, George Childs Carpenter, Arthur Richman, and Edwin Justus Mayer will all have new plays. Moreover, each of the non-commercial producing groups promises an interesting program. The Neighborhood Playhouse will offer a new expressionistic drama called "Pinwheel" and a revival of "The Little Clay Cart." The Actor's Theater will present, among other things, "Viva Mexico," by Michael Gold of the New Masses, and the Provincetown Playhouse promises "The Seven Against Thebes." As for the Theater Guild, it has refused so far to commit itself definitely, but it has suggested many interesting possibilities, including Werfel's "Juarez and Maximilian" and, if it is completed in time, a new play by Shaw to be called "Saint Thurso."

Theatrical announcements are notoriously unreliable, and some of the productions here listed may never be heard of again; but there will remain a sufficient number to make the heart of any theatergoing New Yorker thump.

Mexico vs. The Roman Church

MEXICO is in open war with the Roman Catholic church. It is a war which recalls Bismarck's Kulturkampf and the violent anti-clericalism of pre-war France. Virtually every country where an established church has been associated with a feudal state goes through such paroxysms—even far-off Mongolia in ridding itself of lama rule. Mexico has tried before to throw off the yoke of the church. Her constitution of 1857 was pronouncedly anti-clerical, the decrees of 1859 more so, that of 1917 most so of all. But the laws have gone unenforced. Calles's decree of July 3, which has inspired the virtual excommunication of Mexico by the Pope, is essentially in execution of the old laws. As summarized by the Foreign Policy Association, it provides:

1. No foreigner may exercise the religious profession in Mexico.
2. Education must be given in official schools and be secular. No religious corporation or minister of any creed may establish or direct schools of primary instruction.
3. Religious orders, convents, and monasteries will be dissolved.
4. Any minister who incites the public to refuse to acknowledge public institutions or to obey the laws will be severely punished.
5. No publication, either religious or merely showing marked tendencies in favor of religion, may comment on national political affairs.
6. No organization may be formed whose title has any word or any indication that it is connected with religious ideas.
7. Political meetings may not be held in churches.
8. All religious acts must be held within the walls of a church.
9. No religious order of any creed may possess or administer property or capital.
10. The churches are the property of the nation. Other ecclesiastical properties, such as bishops' palaces, houses, seminaries, asylums, colleges, convents, and all buildings constructed for religious purposes, pass into the possession of the nation, the use to which they are to be put to be determined by the Government.
11. Heavy penalties may be imposed upon ministerial or other authorities who fail to enforce the above provisions.

Pope Pius asks the Catholic world to unite on August 1, the festival of St. Peter-in-Chains, in prayer for the cessation of Mexican persecution of Catholics. The Pope apparently has also approved the extraordinary pastoral letter signed by the thirty-seven bishops of Mexico announcing suspension of all religious services requiring the participation of priests from July 31, the date on which the Calles edict takes effect, and enjoining the population to refuse to cooperate in its enforcement. A boycott of lay schools is enjoined; a sort of non-cooperation movement, refusing to attend "mundane amusements," is suggested; and excommunication of those interfering with the church is suggested.

Judge Alfred J. Talley of New York publicly demands that the American Government cease recognition of Mexico and "prevent" the denial of the rights of Catholics. With the protesting bishops The Nation has a measure of sympathy; with Judge Talley it has none. It is not the business of the Washington Government to tell Mexico what its laws should be; Judge Talley would be the first to resent any suggestion that foreigners should dictate our laws, and he ought to know better than to suggest that we dictate to others. If Mexico were as large and as strong as France in the days of her violent anti-clerical laws Judge Talley would not dare suggest such interference. What he wants us to do is to bully Mexico.

Yet, sympathizing with Mexico's determination to end church control, we must regret her methods. We can understand Mexico's opposition to a foreign priesthood virtually controlling her system of education and encouraging the ignorant masses to disobey her land laws, and her determination to nationalize vast properties of the church which are essentially a relic of a feudal past. But with the Mexican Government's attempt to suppress criticism of its own attitude we have no sympathy whatever. Clause 13 of the new decree, ruling that publications "either religious or merely showing marked tendencies in favor of religions and religious creeds through titles or propaganda, may not comment on national political affairs or inform readers of acts of the authorities of the country or on particulars related directly to the functioning of public institutions" is sheer tyranny. It is one thing to secularize the state; it is another thing to attempt to suppress discussion of the wisdom of secularization. We do not sympathize with the Catholic church in its attempt to retain its essentially medieval position in Mexico, but the Mexican Government must realize that its best friends abroad have been liberals. Liberals oppose bullying of one government by another; they also oppose bullying of one section of the population by any government.

The Cal of the Wilds

Price-Fixing for the Farmer

By HENRIK SHIPSTEAD

HOW can the farmer collect his board bill from a boarder who refuses to pay? How can he compel a better price for his product and so be assured of a fair return and a steady income? He has come to the conclusion that in order to accomplish this he must take a leaf out of the book of the railroads, the manufacturers, the big bankers, who each have their price-fixing bureaucracy established by law. The farmer, finding that it has worked well for industry, finance, and transportation, has come to Congress asking for the same treatment. There seems to be no objection to price-fixing except when it is for the benefit of the farmer.

When Congress passed the transportation act creating a government commission to fix railroad rates, that was a price-fixing law. When Congress gave the Federal Reserve Bank power to raise and lower the rediscount rate and so to a large extent to control the price of credit by control of the interest rates, that was a price-fixing program benefiting the large bankers of the country who compose the class A directors of the Federal Reserve System. The high-protective tariff is in itself a price-fixing law, because it gives the manufacturers of the country the opportunity to fix their prices higher than they could do without the protection of a tariff wall. Practically every State of the United States has enacted laws creating bureaus or commissions whose duty, usually made mandatory under the law, is to fix the prices of necessities, as, for instance, telephone service, telegraph service, gas and electric lights, and street-railway service. All of those corporations enjoy the blessings and protections of price-fixing laws enacted by the various States.

Not a court in the land but lays it down as a basic principle that business must enjoy for its goods or service a market price that will yield a fair return on the capital over and above production and operating costs, taxes, interest, rentals, and overhead. Anything less than a fair return the court regards as confiscation of property in violation of constitutional guaranties. "Fair return on capital investment and operating cost" is an American principle, fixed in our legislative and judicial system. An executive ruling or legislative act which authorizes or imposes less than a fair return on gas, electric light, steam or electric transportation, a bank loan, water-power rental, house rental, or a manufactured article is declared in violation of the Fifth and Fourteenth amendments to the Constitution protecting life, liberty, and property.

But the farmer is left out in the cold.

Some people are beginning to recognize that anything less than a fair return to our greatest industry is not only a national injustice but an invitation to economic downfall. Millers, packers, and the manufacturers of a thousand staple food and textile products can not prosper without a dependable supply of raw materials at a stabilized price from the 6,000,000 producing farms. When the farms fail because of the lack of a fair return on labor and invested capital, when 1,000,000 farmers and farm hands desert the farms in a single season, all food and textile-producing industries are placed in jeopardy. The first manufacturing industry of this country, the flour-milling industry, the source of the nation's bread, has been reduced, by uncertain farm conditions and by the spasmodic ups and downs of grain speculation and grain prices, to a condition where for five years it has run at less than 50 per cent, and much of the time at only 40 per cent of the normal milling capacity. The millers are going down with the farmers. They are sunken derelicts abandoned in the struggle against commercial forces in a country boasting the greatest home market on the globe.

We can all remember when the stocks of the leading grain-and-agricultural-products-carrying roads, such as the Great Northern, the Northern Pacific, the Northwestern, the "Soo Line," and the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul were quoted on the stock exchange from $100 to $150 a share. Their securities were the soundest gilt-edged investments on the market. Today they are quoted at from $10 to $50 or $75 a share. The Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul, which traverses one of the finest agricultural regions of the globe, has $230,000,000 of stock certificates quoted at $9 and $15 a share, and has not paid a dividend in six years. The rates of these roads have increased 75 per cent, and they stand at that figure now, higher than in their palmy days. But the tonnage of farm products carried by them dropped from 156,000,000 tons in 1918 and 155,000,000 in 1919 to 146,700,000 in 1923. The average for the four years 1920-1924 was 6,000,000 tons under 1919. Twenty-five years ago, in 1901, farm products gave the railroads a greater revenue tonnage than manufactures by 4,000,000 tons. During 1914, 1915, and 1916 farm products and manufactures gave them about the same volume of revenue tonnage as manufactures. In 1923, after the Fordney-McCumber tariff, manufactures gave the railroads a tonnage 110,000,000 greater than the products of the farms.

We know from reports secured from farms in every section of the United States in 1923, that a farm with $17,500 invested capital gets an average gross return from sales of only $2,240; that after deducting a cash outlay of $1,350 for expenses, the net earning is $750; that after payment of interest and sundry charges, the return to capital on this $17,500 farm is $415, or 2.3 per cent; that the net return to the farm operator is $154, and that if the family labor is paid for at hired-labor rates, there is a net loss of $71 a year on the year's operation (Agricultural Year-Book, 1924, pages 1131-1132.) We know that it cost in 1923 $21 an acre to raise wheat valued at $16.64, and $1.24 to raise a bushel worth 99 cents. We know that it cost 52 cents to raise a bushel of oats worth 49 cents; that a hoe or rake costing the farmer $1 has a declared export value for shipment abroad of 44 cents; that in 1924 the average farm income was $736, or half that of a railroad laborer; that in 1924-1925 over 1,000 banks failed in the agricultural States; that the value of farm property since 1920 has shrunk about one-third, or $25,000,000,000—rather more than the total of our national debt; and that the purchase power of the farm dollar, measured by the manufactured articles it buys, has shrunk about one-third since 1913 and is today fluctuating, like foreign exchange, somewhere about 60 or 70 cents. So we face an emergency, and we must act.

I have at all times been opposed to government by commission, to centralization of power in Washington, to control of industry, and to special legislation giving special favors to industry and transportation. It is a bad policy, but it has become our established policy and we must do one of two things: We must either repeal all this special price-fixing legislation, or carry it out to its ultimate conclusion and give every industry the same treatment. When special privilege is extended to everyone it ceases to be privilege. I do not believe in bureaucracies; neither do I believe in prairie fires. But when the prairie fire of bureaucracy is sweeping down to destroy agricultural life, then in desperation I am willing to set a backfire by establishing another bureaucracy, and I look upon this kind of legislation as a backfire against the bureaucracy that is fast overwhelming us.

Glimpses of Arthur Gleason

By HELEN HAYES GLEASON

[The death of Arthur Gleason on December 30, 1923, removed one who by his personality, his writing, and his direct cooperation was among the most honest and effective supporters of the liberal movement in his time. The excerpts which follow are from a manuscript by his wife, and are reproduced here not only as a picture of a one-time Associate Editor of The Nation but as glimpses of an extraordinarily vivid and idealistic character.]

I

ALL manner and condition of folk found their way to us, all classes, all professions, all colors. All found him just as he was, without a trace of pride, humor even when it hurt, sympathetic, modest, a friend who never gave friendship lightly. In that respect he was like the English, many of whose characteristics he so much admired. To each he gave the same attention, always a touch of deference, a real humility that recognized underneath the worldly symbol the mystery of an unquenchable inner spark. He gave the same unfailing courtesy to the friend and colored helper that he gave his wife. He wrote:

> This home is dedicated to good-will. It grew out of love. The two heads of the household were called together by a power higher than they. To its decree they are obedient. Every tone of the voice, every thought of their being, is subdued to that service. They desire to be worthy of their high calling, as ministers of that grace. They know their peace will go unbroken only for a little time. And often they suspect that the time will be more short even than their anxious hope. They cannot permit so much as one hour of that brief unity to be touched by scorn or malice. The world's judgments have lost their sting inside this door. Those who come seeking to continue the harmony which these two have won are ever welcome. The rich are welcome, so they come simply. The poor are welcome, for they have already learned friendliness through buffeting. Youth is welcome, for it brings the joy which these two would learn. Age is welcome, for it will teach them tenderness.

Animals had personalities and were treated with dignity. Among canines there were distinct branches; there were "rovers" and "barkers" and "twinklers" and "lions" and "milk dogs." A certain kind of feline was known as a "wuss." Our own tiger cat, named Lamb Chop, was spoken of as "The Chop." And a mere wisp of a rusty Persian kitten, picked up on the streets of Brighton, England, at once assumed the proportions of a Cinnamon Bear and was called "The Bear." He could not resist the sound of a rapidly moving pencil across paper. Times without number I have seen him leave a comfortable place, jump to the large table where my husband was writing, and curl up deliberately on the offending manuscript. With great gentleness my husband would pull out the sheet from under the little beast, move over slightly, continue to write. Very shortly the Bear would follow, again settling in a ball on the unfinished sentence. I have seen them work around the whole table that way, the Bear quite sure he was loved and wanted, the man expressing only gentleness, speaking no word.

Three children attached themselves to us in Maine. They came for one swim a day at least, spending many hours putting us through stunts like "spanking the baby" from a boulder that hung over the water. For their amusement one day A. G. lit and smoked two cigars at the same time. But one "Scout" had seen a man light and smoke ten cigars at once, so that was no good. He never went to the village without buying some little treat for the children. And for each one, before we left, he planned and carried through a picnic party; that was so the youngest would feel as important and as much desired as the oldest. At all possible opportunities he found children and won their friendship. With them he discussed their interests and problems as seriously, with the same sense of equality, as he would discuss the production of coal with a miner or the joys of Saintsbury's "Prose Rhythm" with an English professor.

As he made staunch friendships with these little folk whom he understood, sharing their naivete and frankness, he made equally staunch enemies because of this same frankness and honesty. As he met the challenges of his young friends, to "spank the baby" from a boulder or to flip or try to flip off backward from a float, without fear or hesitation, just so he met the challenges of life from friend or enemy. No consideration of salary or public opinion for a moment made him equivocate. When a job slid into ease or methods developed which were not acceptable to that "fine and accurate conscience," as twice happened in war-service, for instance, he would resign, returning the money received under the new order.

From 1914 to 1922 he saved a total of $1,000. At the time he wished to invest it France seemed to be needing all her friends, so he put his thousand in her, though it was suggested that another security might be wiser. France looked shaky, but he believed in her power to recover; he believed still more in her finer spiritual powers and had to express it. During the first high-pressure days of the war when people were frantically drawing out their gold I remember him making a deposit in an English bank. He had to do these things. Hysteria could not touch him. Instinctively he drew away from the crowd to do his own thinking. His mind sought balance, his spirit freedom and honesty. Some time after he was torpedoed (January, 1918) the State Department (U. S.) asked for an affidavit concerning his claim against the German Government for losses incurred. The loss had been real; all the clothes and luggage he had in the world went down and a complete typewritten manuscript of a book on the American army—it counted up into the pounds sterling. He thought it over carefully and decided not to enter a claim against the German Government. The old regime had fallen, a new and better mold was struggling to birth; it needed help, not further crushing. In the long future, payment would come out of women and children. They must suffer the cost of the war and he could not add a shadow of weight to their burdens.

* * * * *

The deepest desire of his nature was to be free. Each change in his life was animated by that impulse for freedom. When groups closed in about him he instinctively worked his way to the outside of the circle. He chafed under committee meetings and councils of war and organizations. He disliked his name on letterheads, he shrank from holding office.

Though long years ago he identified himself with the Socialist Party and often voted a straight Socialist ticket, not because he subscribed fully to their plans but more nearly to their main principle than to another party, he never took an active interest in any of their locals so far as I know. His sympathies were with suffering humanity, the weak, the aged, the homely and obscure. Whenever it was possible to serve these he did so by gift of money or time; generally he could ill afford to do it. He felt "a certain grief in things as they are, in man as he has come to be, as he certainly is, over and above those griefs of circumstance which are in a measure removable—an inexplicable shortcoming, or misadventure, on the part of nature itself—." I was appalled to find the burdens he was carrying when we started out together. A gifted boy was being helped through college; another with doctor's bills; another with an education; another suffering with tuberculosis was lifted for the last few weeks, at least, into comfort and beauty, "no expense to be spared."

But to be tied in with clubs or organizations was to be caught. To give the best in himself he had to give it in his own way. He could bore into a subject, master it by sheer will and brain, identify himself with it and get the point of view. He could do something with both sides of a question, swinging pendulum fashion to each extreme, finally striking a balance with well-weighted and keen judgments. Artist type that he was, he wished rather to dip here and there, like a bird in flight, tasting this and that flavor, feeling the vibration of life with his uncanny sensitiveness, then retire for quiet reflection and absorption and writing.

His was not the gift nor inner expression to speak at labor or educational conventions, though he believed deeply in such efforts and greatly honored those whose lives were given to them. But in endeavoring to give an honest picture of my husband I want more than anything to present the side of him that made all these worthy, social-work expressions possible; the side I believed in most, the part of him that pushed through as truly as the tiny pulse of cold spring water finds its way to the surface in spite of heavy black rotting leaves, the impulse to write, to follow the path of freedom, to live with beauty—the beauty of simplicity, of truth, of suffering. It was a fight to give the artist and writer a chance, believing he could best serve causes through that medium, if only let alone. In "Marius, the Epicurean," this paragraph is underlined with his characteristic heavy black pencil mark: "How little I myself really need, when people leave me alone, with the intellectual powers at work serenely."

* * * * *

Most of the so-called conventions of life had very little meaning to him, like living "correctly" and anniversaries; family gatherings, especially, made him suffer. Sunday was a day to be dropped from the calendar, if possible. A good speaker with an idea might hold him, but he preferred a lazy morning indoors, or out, picking up lunch when and wherever, a show in the afternoon, and open-house supper at home. He chose Sunday to be free from the week's turmoil. He chose Sunday to be free forever. That day has become a symbol of freedom, tragic and vivid.

Early in life he had learned the lesson of concentration and so could apply himself to a grilling task for long hours, smoking a pipe continuously. He used pencils, like matches, one after another as they snapped off under the speed of his mind at work. It took ten or fifteen, freshly sharpened, to get him through a morning's writing, and that was his habit of mind and method when doing creative work, too, always with fierce intensity. But the artist balked at regularity; the singer went sad and silent under compulsion. Waywardness and whimsicality walked side by side with the trained mind. When we were first married he told me how much he longed to be free from all family connections. Since a small boy he had carried a sense of responsibility. It shocked me then. I came to see that this thing in him was the most priceless gift he had. It led him always after the gleam. Only when he failed to answer this impulse was he thwarted. It is possible to cage a wild bird, not his song; some there are whose passion it is to take pictures, focusing carefully on the passing cavalcade, but they lose the flow of motion while they fiddle with mechanism. To capture his free spirit was to tether the rainbow. It curved toward the light, full of charm and color, did its work, vanished, returned, mounting ever eagerly and fearlessly.

* * * * *

I can see him now, the late afternoon of 5th October, 1912, the day we were married; the formality was uninteresting enough and as brief as possible, but on that day, a Saturday when we had just returned from the usual vaudeville, arrived Saintsbury's "Prose Rhythm." A few minutes before my uncle came to read the service, the lover of freedom sat where he had dropped, with the book still in his hands, absorbed. Dress changed and hands washed, I stopped at his door to see if he was ready. And he was—ready to share the mystery of beauty, to share everything that delighted him. We read it together till the door bell scattered rhythm and I took my Uncle Toby one side, again to beg him to make it brief.

* * * * *

As 1914 dawned the urge for a real change came upon him. The long winter bound to connections with an office—like a mirror, he was, to pick up the fret of human suffering—and the sense of being caught-in were more than the artist could endure. For two years he had been struggling to break from a "regular job." In January, 1912, he wrote:

> If I can make it go in a small way (free lancing), I shall be pleased indeed at escaping the thraldom and the sadness of office routine and the overworked obscure persons who work in bondage, and for whom one sees no way out. . . . The Mounted Police, like the Texas Rangers, have long beckoned to me. Meanwhile I cling to New York with a senile clutch. It was ill luck to miss you. I would have come far to get your story while it was still young on your lips. I hope you will never settle, that you will always wander and catch the fleeting magic of things in your two beautiful arts of picture-making and word-painting.

Then a regular job through the later part of 1912, with this reaction: "On July 3 I am returning to the free-lance game. I have an assignment of two editorials a week from Collier's. I breathe freely again."

[To be continued]

America Should Cancel the War Debts

By PHILIP SNOWDEN

THERE is one important aspect of the inter-Allied debts question which has received very little attention. The controversy between the interested governments has mattered mainly round the capacity of the respective debtor nations to pay.

When the United States insisted upon the funding of the British debt it became incumbent upon Great Britain to try to collect accounts owing to her by her Continental debtors. But this insistence by Great Britain upon receiving from the Continent in debt payments and reparations a total sum equal to, but not exceeding, the sum we have to pay to America has not altered the view of Great Britain that the best policy would have been an all-round cancelation of inter-Allied debts.

The attitude of the United States to the debt question both at the Paris Conference and subsequently, has made that wise policy impossible for the present. But both economic and moral considerations must eventually force the adoption of that course.

American opinion is by no means unanimous about the wisdom of compelling her European debtors to repay the loans advanced during the war, for what was virtually a common enterprise. But, for the time being, political considerations prevent that opinion from expressing itself very vocally.

One excuse offered by America for insisting upon the funding of the European debts is that the Continental countries have made no real effort to reestablish their economic and financial prosperity, and that any help America might give in the form of remitting payments would simply provide more money to be spent upon provocative armaments and preparations for another war. This American view of European unsettlement was recently bluntly expressed by Mr. Houghton, the American Ambassador in London, and there can be no doubt that it is the opinion widely held in the United States, and is in a large measure responsible for the determination of that great country to hold aloof, as far as possible, from participation in European affairs until the Continental countries show more willingness to settle down to peaceful lives.

To the extent that that view of Europe is responsible for the unwillingness of America to join in the cancelation of the war debts, Great Britain's heavy annual payments to America are part of the burden she is bearing for the policy of militarism, imperialism, and political intrigues of her former Continental allies. If America's debtors desire to prove that America is wrong in holding this view, and if they wish to take away from her that excuse for not agreeing to the cancelation of the war debts, they can do so by changing their policies, reducing their armaments, and entering whole-heartedly into a united effort to make the spirit of Locarno dominate European affairs.

But even if the unsettled condition of Europe were the real reason for America's attitude to the question of war debts, it is doubtful if it is a wise course for her to follow. She came into the war at a late period because she realized it was to her interest to do so. She took a very influential part in imposing the peace treaties upon the enemy, and then washed her hands of the whole business, and left a decimated Europe to struggle with the impossibilities and injustices of those treaties. Since that time her main interest in Europe has been to collect debts from her war allies, whom she helped to impoverish by assenting to the violation of the peace conditions previously laid down by President Wilson.

America cannot permanently maintain an attitude of detachment from the rest of the world with advantage to herself. She is the most nearly self-contained country in the world. She is rich and powerful. But more and more she will become dependent upon world conditions for the maintenance of her prosperity.

It is not a wise policy for the United States to keep the other countries of the world poor. It is not to her real interest to drain the wealth of Europe. Apart from her claim that "destiny has made her the guardian of world economic and social progress" it is to her material interest that she should help, out of her great abundance, to make the rest of the world strong and prosperous.

America should never forget that she owes everything to Europe. Europe has given to her her language, her literature, her science, and her population. Although she entered the war "seeking no material gain, no territory, and no indemnities," she has, by her funding arrangements with her late war allies, managed to impose upon them undertakings to pay her an annual sum, which at the maximum will amount to about £80,000,000 a year!

Great Britain's share of this tribute to America will impose, for the next sixty years, if the agreement is maintained, an intolerable burden on the British workers. It will require 76,000,000 days of labor each year by British workmen, for the next sixty years, to produce the means to pay America. Great Britain, a poor country by comparison with America, has set an example which the United States might follow with credit to herself. Great Britain has undertaken to shoulder the £2,000,000,000 of debt due from her late allies, if America will forego her claims upon Britain of half that amount.

America's capacity to cancel is enormously greater. Her national income is expanding at the rate of £2,000,000,000 a year, equal to half the total national income of Great Britain. She will pay off her internal war debt in twenty-five years. America has a great opportunity to be magnanimous: and magnanimity will be twice blessed—it will bless her and the world at large.

England, at great risk to herself, has reestablished the gold standard. It is important for America that this should be stabilized and that other countries should get back to it. The cancelation of the European debts to America would materially assist that end. It would save America from the otherwise inevitable inflation. If America insists upon the payment by Europe of £80,000,000 a year on account of these debts, there is bound to be such a disturbance of her economic life as will cost her far more than she receives from this source.

The best side of the American nation cannot feel comfortable in the thought that the tribute she is levying upon her late allies is keeping the workers in those countries for the next sixty years on short rations. It would be more in harmony with the altruistic sentiment which swept over the American continent ten years ago for her now to say that, out of her great abundance, she will make this further contribution to the restoration of the economic prosperity of the world.

A Woman Without a Country

By MARY K. DAS

I AM an American-born woman. My ancestors came from England to America in the year 1700. By the existing double standard of the American Government, I am not only rendered alien, but a stateless alien. My husband, a Hindu, was a naturalized American citizen when I married him. He had secured his certificate of naturalization from a United States District Court in 1914, having previously resided in the United States for eight years. The United States State Department three times gave him passports with which he traveled all over the world. He still holds his American naturalization certificate, but today he is told by the State Department that he was never an American citizen, because "the judges, who during the last quarter of a century or more naturalized Hindus to American citizenship, by due process of law, did not know the meaning of the United States naturalization laws, and so these judges from all parts of the United States acted illegally." This interpretation is based upon a recent decision rendered by a United States Supreme Court judge who is himself a naturalized citizen, who held that "high-caste Hindus are not white persons according to the commonly accepted meaning of the term, and thus are ineligible to American citizenship." Before we were married my husband went to several lawyers and asked if I stood the least chance of losing my citizenship in marrying him. These legal experts, one a former adviser to the State Department, told him that this could never happen, because the United States could not and would never apply a Supreme Court decision retroactively.

Last year when I asked the State Department for a passport to go to Europe my request was refused on the ground that I was "no longer an American citizen, having lost my American citizenship by [my] marriage with an alien ineligible to citizenship." This I disclaimed, and still disclaim, for at the time of my marriage and up to the present day my husband is in possession of his naturalization papers. But by fiat of the State Department my husband and I are stateless.

The amazing stand taken by the United States authorities is "that Hindus who are deprived of their American citizenship revert to their former British status." Is this stand due to total ignorance of the British law? The British law says that any British subject who renounces British nationality willingly, by naturalization into any other country, cannot revert to British citizenship automatically, in case the said subject wishes to do so; but must be naturalized according to British law, after living at least five years in some British territory. Now, it is apparent that without a passport an alien cannot enter British territory for the purpose of taking up residence; and there is no record of British authorities offering safe conduct to an Indian who has become an American citizen and then been deprived of American citizenship, to go to British territory, under promise of renaturalization in the course of time. Requests to the British Government to enter British territory, made by Indians who have lost their American citizenship, have either been refused or no notice has been taken of them. So when the American Government arbitrarily takes from us (American women and Hindus naturalized as American citizens) our American citizenship and protection, violating the scraps of paper given us in the form of naturalization certificates, it takes from us our safety and our standing in any community no matter where we may take refuge.

According to the Cable Act, an American woman marrying an alien ineligible to citizenship loses her American citizenship. An American man may marry a Japanese, Chinese, Hindu—any woman he pleases. To do so does not lose him his citizenship. But an American woman is penalized when she exercises this right granted the American man. She may marry a Negro from Africa and not lose her American citizenship, but if she marries a Hindu, Chinese, or Japanese, however high his reputation as a scholar, she loses her American citizenship. I feel that an American woman should not be penalized for marrying the person she loves. Marriage is not a matter of convenience; it has a spiritual bearing and none has the right to dictate the inner life of an individual.

The National Woman's Party has sought to remedy the situation by amending the Cable Act, but the House Immigration Committee refused to report out the bill. Some Representatives and Senators, members of the Immigration Committees of the two houses of Congress, hold that the ideal of Americanism should keep any American woman from marrying any foreigner, particularly an Asiatic. One Senator said that he would do all he could to defeat any amendment to the Cable Act which would give the right of American citizenship to any American woman marrying any foreigner. The American patriots who think that such provincialism is Americanism would do well to remember what Theodore Roosevelt said on an allied topic:

> Our nation fronts on the Pacific, just as it fronts on the Atlantic. We hope to play a constantly growing part in the great ocean of the Orient. We wish, as we ought to wish, for a great commercial development in our dealings > with Asia; and it is out of the question that we should permanently have such development unless we freely and gladly extend to other nations the same measure of justice and good treatment as we expect to receive in return. . . . I ask fair treatment for the Japanese, as I would ask fair treatment for Germans, Englishmen, Frenchmen, Russians, or Italians.

I am not pleading today for the right of Asiatics to become American citizens. But I hold that the attitude of the United States Government toward Hindus who were naturalized before the adverse Supreme Court decision is worse than the alleged attitude of Soviet Russia or the Mexican Government, against which the United States State Department so bitterly complains, in enacting retroactive laws depriving Americans of their vested rights. The State Department, declaring that Hindus who were naturalized by United States judges according to due process of law, to whom naturalization certificates were given upon the authority of the United States Government, are no longer American citizens, is violating a solemn contract. Has the American Government fallen to such a state of degradation that to it the civil rights of its citizens have less value than property rights?

In the Driftway

THE noon sun was hot on the Corne d'Or, but the Drifter had ordered the awning taken off his caique, and it was his own fault if he sweltered among the embroidered cushions. His boatman might be even hotter, bending over the flask-handled, fork-bladed oars, but he still beamed on the Drifter and talked Turkish to him. They passed the fleet of fishing boats, anchored close together with their masts crowded like pins on a cushion. From the right bank came the notes of a song that sounded suspiciously like "Jesus Wants Me for a Sunbeam"; in front of a large cross-topped building a column of girls was parading melodiously. The Drifter reflected that tolerance can be overdone. Yet the forest of minarets on the Stamboul side was still intact after generations of missionary songs. Perhaps tolerance is good strategy after all.

* * * * *

"LANGUAGE first originated in the use of gesture by primitive man; it is now used by children and idiots and in foreign countries, as in ordering a meal in Paris." The Drifter remembered his favorite definition, the effort of three months' study of psychology on the brain of a college student, as he sought to explain to his boatman that he would like to go ashore and eat lunch. He pointed to his mouth, he pointed to the shore, he talked English with a questioning inflection. He has a theory that any two humans, given time, can evolve a common language. Once he heard a fellow-American, abandoning words in despair, do complicated business with an Italian chauffeur by nothing but a series of eloquent grunts. This time too the boatman understood. He selected a little cafe with a balcony over the water and put the Drifter ashore.

* * * * *

COFFEE has the same name in all languages, and it is the national drink of Turkey. But the Drifter was hungry. In vain he asked for food in all the languages in which he is able to ask for food; in vain he appealed to the narghile-smokers industriously puffing at their long tubes, while a yard or so away their fire burned and their caldron bubbled. Better to interrupt a man at his prayers, his bath, his love-making than at his narghile. The Drifter tested his theory thoroughly and gestured like a very primitive man indeed. The more he pointed to his mouth the more coffee he was given. Nothing seemed farther from the Turkish mind at half past twelve o'clock than food. But Constantinople is an international city and the streets are full of amateur interpreters. Before long the proprietor led a boy to the Drifter's table. "Y a-t-il de quoi manger?" asked the Drifter hopefully. The boy shook his head. "Etwas zu essen?" No better. It was the boy's turn. "Russky?" he suggested. The Drifter pondered and at last found three words: "Ya chochu yest—I want to eat!" The boy smiled and explained. The proprietor was surprised but equal to the occasion. He led the Drifter, with many a bow, to the kitchen of his house next door, and let him select the materials for his own salad. If the Drifter had insisted he might even have mixed it.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Officially Pure

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It will interest Nation readers to know that the librarian of the Congressional Library is doing his or her part for the cause of purity. Havelock Ellis's "Studies in the Psychology of Sex" cannot be taken out of the library. "Books of that kind aren't circulated indiscriminately," the lady at the desk, age 25, told me.

Washington, D. C., July 14 JOHN T. MOUTOUX

Saving Germany for Chewing Gum

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The latest development in the Americanization of Europe prompts me to make the following remarks: America "saved" Germany for democracy. Then you sent General Dawes and Mr. Young to save German industry from bankruptcy and the German workingman from a fair wage. Your latest missionary is Mr. Wrigley. He is out to save German teeth and German digestion. And German newspapers, street cars, subways, back fences, and store windows are full of the well-known "Spearmint" signs. Verily, the Americanization of Europe proceeds apace. With the help of a few more Dawes plans for other countries and a few more shiploads of chewing gum, you will soon have Europe safely in your vest pocket.

Berlin, Germany, July 5 LIESBETH WENDER

Oliver Cromwell on Prohibition

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: While we are having the truth about Puritanism and prohibition of alcoholic beverages, is it not to the point to rake out these sentences from one of Oliver Cromwell's letters?

> Your pretended fear lest Error should step in, is like the man who would keep all the wine out the country lest men should be drunk. It will be found an unjust and unwise policy to deprive a man of his natural liberty upon the supposition he may abuse it. When he doth abuse it, judge

The curious, and the dubious, will find this passage in the letter written by Cromwell to the Governor of Edinburgh on September 12, 1650.

Berkeley, California, July 14 R. H. LEHMAN

Books

For a Thief Lynched

By JOHN WALDHORN GASSNER

They shot you as they shoot a wolf near a pen,
Fearing for their feathery food; and called it justice
Because it was they who shot you, not you who shot them;
And they hoisted the empty body on a hickory tree, to rot,
For a warning that henceforth the chickens were theirs.
But yours became the ravens and the crows, the larks and the thrushes,
And over you trickled mother-of-pearl rain from emerald leaves
And tumid cicada found solitude for songs in your hair!

Fra Elbertus

Elbert Hubbard of East Aurora. By Felix Shay. Wm. H. Wise Company. $3.50.

THE career of Elbert Hubbard would furnish a not unsuitable subject for scholarly investigation and no Kulturgeschichte of modern America can be complete without him. He, apparently, first made articulate the doctrine of "service" and first defended the "art" of advertising. He is the spiritual father of all the copy which begins with an anecdote about Socrates and ends with the adjuration to insist upon the only genuine article in soapless shaving cream. He, in a word, taught the merchant swank; and it would be interesting to have traced with scientific exactitude his influence in molding the whole esoteric philosophy of business.

The present volume, written by an associate and disciple, undertakes no such task. It is weak in specific facts or figures and its chronology is far from definite; but from the chatty, journalistic pages there emerges a picture of the man who stumbled upon a set of ideas more apt than he knew for the needs of the moment and was himself molded by the forces which he let loose.

At the age of thirty-five Hubbard, having accumulated a moderate fortune in the soap business, set out in search of an education. Disappointed in Harvard he went to England, where he met with William Morris, whose sumptuous editions appealed immediately to his superficial aesthetic sense. Returning to America a cross between the English aesthete and the homely philosopher, he founded his magazine, the Philistine, and it had an immediate success. To thousands of half-educated people it became a concrete symbol of the mysterious realm of art and intellect. Its strange paper and bold typography gave it the requisite touch of the esoteric, and it could lie upon the library table as a tangible evidence that its possessor was not indifferent to culture. Moreover it could, unlike the standard sets which most of its subscribers had previously bought, actually be read, for Hubbard shared the limitations of those for whom he wrote sufficiently to know what they could stand. He had a genius for selecting or rephrasing aphoristic sentences from the works of the great and he was a master of that semi-literary jauntiness so vastly impressive to the unlettered. Moreover, for all his oddness, he was fundamentally safe. Art, rightly understood, was not a seductive siren but merely an ornament to the useful life, and philosophy, properly interpreted, enforced the practical virtues. He might quote the tramp Whitman or the anarchist Thoreau, but he encouraged no one to follow them into idleness or discontent. "Get Out or Get in Line" was the title of one of his booklets, and this dominant sentiment was far more congenial to the spirit of America than any of the others which he had to retail.

When finally his fame was sufficient to enable him to found the famous shops at East Aurora he based the appeal of the new institution upon the same foundations which had been so successful in the magazine. Here once more was art made tangible in sumptuous books or in bits of bric-a-brac which could be carried away and placed upon the mantelpiece, but no one was seduced away from practical affairs. Instead, the famous brotherhood was surrounded with something of the hocus-pocus of the secret lodge, and the pilgrims were invited to come for a few days, be baptized in the new faith, and to go away, not outwardly changed, but flooded with a new grace.

An excellent showman, Hubbard knew the importance of playing the part. His long hair and his flowing tie made him look the prophet as his disciples imagined the prophet ought to look, but here again he frightened nobody because he did not suggest that anyone else should do likewise. Even among the members of his permanent staff he was the only eccentric and it was his function to fulfil vicariously all the unconventional aspirations of his disciples. After a week in his presence they could return to their homes and their businesses in the comfortable assurance that the service of art was being carried forward and that they need do no more than send in their subscriptions. His cult had the perennial charm of all the salvation religions which stress the importance of faith and do not insist too much upon works.

In the beginning there does not appear to have been anything to give either unity or direction to the odd melange of ideas and enthusiasms which he drew from a wide variety of sources. He was nothing if not receptive, so that if he praised Ibsen he spoke in even higher terms of Walt Mason, and it is doubtful if he had ever himself attempted to unify the scraps of attitudes which he had adopted from the most diverse thinkers, real and near. But the spirit of the age gave him the direction which he could not find for himself. In the number of the Philistine for March, 1899, there appeared unobtrusively the article called A Message to Garcia in the course of which occurs the sentence "It is not book learning young men need, but a stiffening of the vertebrae which will cause them to be loyal to trust, to act promptly, concentrate their energies, do the thing—'Carry a message to Garcia.'" A few days later an official of the New York Central Railroad asked for 100,000 reprints and since that time millions of copies have been issued. Business recognized in Hubbard the man who could give the necessary air of learning, suavity, and polish to its propaganda, and he accepted the task. The disciple of Thoreau and Morris, the long-haired admirer of deckled edges and hammered brass, became the Voice of American Business. In the mood of the old Hubbard he had—apparently—invented the saying about the mousetrap and attributed it to Emerson, but it was the new spirit which led him to remark apropos of the controversy which arose over the question of authorship: "That mousetrap guff isn't true anyway. The world will never make a path to your door unless you advertise."

Though Hubbard was doubtless always a little vague as to his aims, he had originally been interested in excellence not puffery. But when he discovered that culture, after its immemorial way, refused to hum he turned to something which would. The influence of that side of him which was interested in literature has dwindled until nothing remains except his note-books, which are now being sold as a royal road to culture for those who cannot endure even the fifteen minutes a day which Dr. Eliot recommends, but in thousands of little booklets setting forth "The Romance of the Silk Trade" or "A Message from the President to his Fellow Workers" his spirit goes marching on. If he did not succeed in making business artistic he at least made it arty.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Our American Empire

American Foreign Investments. By Robert W. Dunn. The Viking Press. $5.

Dollar Diplomacy. By Scott Nearing and Joseph Freeman. B. W. Huebsch and the Viking Press. $2.50.

THESE two books furnish an excellent basis for an understanding of the precise nature of our foreign investments and of their effect upon our foreign policy. Mr. Dunn's volume, primarily designed for the research student, is a compendium of information about the quantity and nature of our investments abroad, while that by Nearing and Freeman concerns itself in the main with the political consequences which have flowed from this export of capital.

In 1914 European investments in the United States amounted to over two billions more than our holdings abroad. By the end of 1924, however, the American investments in the United States had been almost wiped out, while the volume of capital which American nationals held in foreign countries was nine billions, and at present it is probably nearly eleven billions. Approximately a quarter of the total is invested in Canada and an equal proportion in Europe, while 40 per cent is in Latin America. To these sums should be added the twelve billion dollars of foreign obligations which are held by our government. The change is revolutionary.

The chief value of Mr. Dunn's book is, however, not as much for the compilation of these general statistics, which is already adequately done by the Department of Commerce, but in the admirably detailed listing of the various American investments in virtually every country. This furnishes an invaluable checklist by which American investments can in the future be identified. The volume is still further enhanced by the publication of many of the contracts providing for loans to and concessions in Caribbean countries.

Nearing and Freeman's companion study of the influence which these investments have exercised upon our foreign policy is the most thoroughly documented general analysis that has as yet been published. While admitting that our investments in Canada have not led to any attempts to extend our political control there, they interpret our policy in China, the Near East, and Latin America as dominated by the desire to protect our business interests and to enhance their profits. John Hay's declaration of the open-door policy in China is thus shown essentially to have been an attempt to prevent the foreign nations from barring out American traders from their respective spheres of influence. The later backing by our Government of the various attempts of Harriman, Kuhn-Loeb, and others to secure an interest in or control over the Manchurian railways is fully described, as is also the varied history of the Consortium, with its final negotiation in 1920 of an agreement similar to that which Wilson had refused to approve seven years before. The American demand for an open-door policy in the Near East similarly is shown to have been at least in part actuated by the desire to secure openings in Mesopotamia for the Chester, Standard Oil, and Sinclair interests. Evidence is marshaled to indicate that the fundamental reason why we opposed Huerta and supported Carranza was because the former was granting concessions to the English oil interests headed by Lord Coudray, while the latter had agreed to support the claims of the American concessionnaires.

Perhaps the most interesting chapter of all discusses the American occupation of Haiti in 1915, of Santo Domingo in 1916, and of our maintenance of marines in Nicaragua from 1912 to 1925. The occupation of the first two countries was clearly a violation of international law and furnished a startling contradiction to the principle of the autonomy of the Pan-American nations which Woodrow Wilson was then so vigorously proclaiming.

Taken as a whole, the book is as accurate in its statement of facts as such a study, based as it is on published documents, can be. It errs in some places by overstressing the economic motive, while in others it does not sufficiently emphasize the real economic forces. Thus, Wilson's refusal to recognize Huerta was undoubtedly largely based on his abhorrence of the latter's murder of Madero. That Wilson was not the tool of the American oil interests is known by all those who were close to him and who were aware of the determined resistance which he offered to the repeated attempts to stampede him into a military occupation of Mexico. Our imperialism in the Caribbean has moreover been compounded of many elements. A naive belief in national expansion, a desire to protect the approaches to the Panama Canal, and an acceptance of the doctrine that we must police countries where changes of government are made by bullets rather than by ballots, have all contributed their part to lead us on.

On the other hand, there is far more to the story of the Hawaiian revolution than the authors tell, while the profits which the French Panama Canal Company, and those American banking interests which had probably bought shares in it, made from the Panama revolution and from the taking over of the soon-to-expire concession are, in a similar fashion, not mentioned. The extraordinary story of the National Railway of Haiti is barely touched upon, while the reasons for the change of front on the part of Senators Lodge and Fall in 1921 when they secured the ratification of the Colombian treaty are not described, although published in the Congressional Record.

Such books as these inevitably lead one to wonder what should be done with a country that refuses to meet its foreign obligations. Intervention by the creditor country itself is clearly unjust. Either no intervention at all should be permitted or temporary control over the country's finances should be assumed by some such international body as the League of Nations or a genuine Pan-American association. Only in such a way as this can the otherwise inevitable abuses be prevented, but to accomplish this we must abandon our present interpretation of the Monroe Doctrine whereby we virtually declare that the will of the United States is to be the law of the Western Hemisphere.

PAUL H. DOUGLAS

Romantic Spain

The Rise of the Spanish Empire in the Old World and in the New. Volume III: The Emperor. By Roger Bigelow Merriman. The Macmillan Company. $5.50.

Spain: A Short History of Its Politics, Literature, and Art from Earliest Times to the Present. By Henry Dwight Sedgwick. Little, Brown and Company. $3.50.

THESE attractive volumes show that the American interest in Spanish history and literature which blossomed in the days of Prescott and Ticknor has not died. The books under review are of decidedly different types: one is a detailed survey of an era which is important in both European and American history; the other is an impressionistic account suitable for beginners in the study of Spanish civilization.

Mr. Sedgwick's book is neither a chronological sketch of political events nor a well-proportioned summary of Spanish economic and social history. It is rather a series of more or less charming essays on select topics, with special attention to history, literature, and art. It is more reliable and useful for the later Middle Ages and the Renaissance than for either the Moslem or the Modern period. The author has drunk inspiration from a varied number of sources, and, with the possible exception of Ballestero's "Historia de España," has consulted the standard secondary treatises on Spanish history and literature. Inquisitive scholars will encounter in the appendix a tantalizing list of authorities for statements made in the text. Those portions of the book concerning the Catholic Sovereigns Charles V and Philip II are useful and suggestive. As the historical narrative proceeds, the interspersed chapters on painting and sculpture furnish agreeable digressions. In the chapters concerning the influence of French and Italians on Spanish architecture students of the fine arts may occasionally discover a fresh interpretation. Neophytes in Spanish literature will find useful chapters on Cervantes and Lope de Vega. But those who would quickly obtain a bird's-eye view of Spanish history will still read Chapman, and those who would consult an authoritative account of Spanish literature will still consult Fitzmaurice-Kelly.

Mr. Merriman's contribution to the literature of a most important epoch of Spanish history is the third of a series of four volumes which he planned some sixteen years ago. Of this ambitious series the two volumes which appeared in 1918 were appropriately dedicated to William Hickling Prescott. Although the volume on "The Emperor" is in part based on secondary accounts, the work has been done with such thoroughness that Hispanic scholars will read the bibliographical notes and many of the footnotes with interest. To the reviewer the absence of a systematic bibliography is a cause for regret.

Perhaps an occasional reader will vainly look for a glimpse of those mountain peaks which are supposed to adorn the history as well as the landscape of the Iberian Peninsula. The volume here reviewed, which covers the period 1516-1556, is composed of two books, Spain in the Old World and Spain in the New World. In the first we are given the personality of Charles, his policies in the Iberian Peninsula, his foreign policy, diplomacy, and wars, and his withdrawal from the political stage. For a fuller account of Charles and of certain phases of his European activity the English reader will still turn to Armstrong's biography. In the second book we are again told the fascinating story of Magellan's circumnavigation of the globe, of the achievements of the conquistadores in Mexico and Peru, of the daring exploits of Spanish explorers, and of the origins of the Spanish colonial system. Though the narrative has been pieced out by new evidence at many points, yet it seems a contribution to knowledge less on the American than on the strictly European side. In dealing with the Old World some manuscript collections have been personally examined and utilized; but in dealing with the New World such valuable works as Prince's "Bosquejo de la Literatura Peruana Colonial," Weisse's "Las Civilizaciones Primitivas del Perú," Medina's "La Araucana," and Riva Palacio's "México á Través de los Siglos" are not even mentioned in the erudite footnotes. In his earlier volumes Mr. Merriman paid relatively slight attention to the rise of the Spanish Empire in the New World. In the present volume little more than one-third of his space is devoted to Spain's achievements in the Indies and to the administration of her American dependencies. The series to which it belongs will thus remain an account of Spain in the Old World with generous attention to her expansion in the New rather than a balanced narrative of her activities in both hemispheres.

WILLIAM SPENCE ROBERTSON

A Poetic Palate

A History of English Literature. By Emile Legouis and Louis Cazamian. Two volumes. Volume I: The Middle Ages and the Renascence (650-1660). By Emile Legouis. Translated from the French by Helen Douglas Irvine. The Macmillan Company. $3.75.

IT is delightful and refreshing to review the history of our literature through the slightly detached but very discerning and friendly eyes of M. Legouis. M. Legouis has the characteristic virtues of the French critic—a just and delicate taste, a refined perception of aesthetic nuances, a sense of order and proportion, and a talent for lucid and pointed expression. When these gifts are combined with a faithful and thorough scholarship, the result is a very superior kind of history. Since his design is merely to introduce French students to the riches of a literature which is new to them, M. Legouis does not seek interest in novel points of view. What guides him in his survey is a sense of those qualities in English poetry and prose which are likely to affect most agreeably the aesthetic palate of a Frenchman. The steadiness with which the test of beauty is applied, whatever else there may be in a work to merit attention, is the distinguishing and agreeable feature of this book.

Some persons may discern the workings of national prejudice in the opening section. M. Legouis is apparently not very fond of Anglo-Saxon literature, though he tries to do justice to it. He maintains that the literature written in England before the Conquest is not really an integral part of English literature, arguing quite soundly that the true unity of a literature is constituted by the persistence of a language which remains fairly intelligible from one age to another and by the continuous active influence of the works which are literary landmarks. The absoluteness of the literary breach between Chaucer and King Alfred is beyond dispute. Nevertheless a score of years ago a challenge such as this would have roused the Teutonic fervor of our scholars to no mean pitch of indignation. And in how many will not the bile still rise at the characterization of "Beowulf" as "a poem which has come out of a cold cell in a Northumbrian cloister and breathes the air of the tomb"! Perhaps M. Legouis exaggerates the gloom of Anglo-Saxon poetry. But what would you? He is a Frenchman who loves warmth and sunshine and he likes to think, as others have thought before him, that sweetness and light came into England from across the Channel in the wake of Norman William and his joyous minstrel Taillefer. He is indeed never so happy as when he discovers that grace and genialty, that love of life and of light which speak to him the language of his own race and soil. He has a feeling of deep sympathy with Chaucer, "the lineal descendant of the French trouvères," and a genuine affection for the humaneness of such purely English natures as Dekker and Izaak Walton.

It is good, too, to have certain aspects of English literature appraised by one who does not belong to a Bible-worshiping nation and is untouched by the Puritan tradition. M. Legouis does not underestimate the influence of the Bible in strengthening the moral sense of the English and in imparting an imaginative and poetic coloring to their speech, but perhaps only a Frenchman, certainly no Englishman, would have trusted himself to say that the assiduous reading of the Bible might be in a measure responsible for "the troubled and confused eloquence, interrupted by usages violently subversive of logic, of which many English writers have been guilty," that the poetry has been won at the expense of intellectual clarity. The immunity from Puritanic prejudice is even more striking in the discussion of Spenser, "the admirable painter and enchanting musician who posed as a professor of morals." With a deliciously suave mockery M. Legouis brushes aside all those elaborate pretensions to an ethical system which recent American scholarship has been so earnest to elucidate. The English, he says, "were beginning to take a national pride in their seriousness, as a quality which distinguished them from the Southern peoples whom they considered more frivolous and dissolute than themselves. Spenser was the more inclined to this attitude because he wished to emulate Ariosto and counted on superior virtue to enable him to surpass 'Orlando Furioso.'" Indifferent to the moralist in Spenser, he yet rises to the full grandeur of Milton's moral earnestness and treats his thought with as clear a feeling of its greatness as his art. Anything truly classic finds an adequate response in the critical judgment of M. Legouis—a judgment which sets a high price on Massinger but is rather cold to writers like Donne, and too sensitive to the faults of the "conceited" style to take much pleasure in the lyric poets of the seventeenth century.

M. Legouis is most individual when writing on the great figures. His treatment of the lesser writers is competent and, in view of the limits of his space, remarkably concrete. His skilful summarizing of the substance of books and his gift of precise generalization should gain favor for his work as a manual. It is therefore to be regretted that the bibliographical footnotes in the English translation have been so badly handled. The references to editions are quite haphazard, often omitting the latest and most authoritative, and the names of German and American scholars are repeatedly distorted. Grain and Wülker, for instance, are almost unrecognizably disguised as Green and Wilkes.

JACOB ZEITLIN

Negro Eloquence

Negro Orators and Their Orations. By Carter G. W[illegible] Washington, D. C. The Associated Publishers. $5.25.

THIS compilation of orations and addresses by Negro leaders, from as early a date as the first pamphlet broadside against slavery in 17[illegible] by a Negro who wisely chose a pseudonym—to race leaders recently dead or still living, is a brave and on the whole quite successful attempt to make oratory interpret social and historical issues. Ordinarily oratory is an unreliable weather-vane of social opinion, but for most of the period covered by this particular study the issues were so vitally serious in the mind of the Negro as to give an unusual sobriety and seriousness even to his oratorical pointings. Careful historical comment upon the issues under discussion has given the collection unsual interpretative value. The volume becomes, therefore, a somewhat unique source-book for the history of the various social and political problems of the Negro.

Comparatively little eulogistic and occasional oratory has been included, and though there are many selections which are not brilliant examples of oratorical style and form, few of the selections fail to qualify as important social documents. And when figures as significant as Garrison, Wendell Phillips, Sumner, Frederick Douglass, and Booker Washington are eulogized by contemporaries and coworkers, there is more than transitory value to what was said. Perhaps the most illuminating and valuable sections are those dealing with the early protests, which are surprising in their advanced tone and competent character, with the Negro anti-slavery orators, and with the speeches of the Negro Senators and Representatives during the period of congressional representation. But the outstanding virtue of the book is, after all, that it is comprehensive—that it gives a vivid and yet reliable panoramic view both of representative Negro thought and of the whole Negro question.

ALAIN LOCKE

Books in Brief

Mr. Shaw and "The Maid." By J. M. Robertson. London: Richard Cobden-Sanderson. 5/.

The preface to "St. Joan" is subjected to some mordant and illuminating criticism.

A Study of the Oceans. By James Johnstone. Longmans, Green and Company. $3.75.

An introduction both to the science of oceanography and to the history of that science.

The Life of Racine. By Mary Duclaux (A. Mary F. Robinson). Harper and Brothers. $4.

A valuable because inviting account of one of the great poets of the world—one whom hitherto we have known with too little intimacy.

The Oxford Book of English Prose. Chosen and Edited by Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch. Oxford University Press. $3.75.

An interesting but inferior companion to the same editor's famous "Oxford Book of English Verse." All that was possible has perhaps been done, but success was impossible in a world where there is so much good prose and where chapters, not pages, are the smallest judgeable units.

The Awakening of China. By James H. Dolsen. Daily Worker Publishing Company. $1.

A Communist study of China full of minor errors, exaggerations, and distortions, yet revealing an understanding of economic forces which might have made many better-documented works more useful.

The Great God Brown; The Fountain; The Moon of the Caribees; and Six Other Plays of the Sea. By Eugene O'Neill. Boni and Liveright. $2.50.

This volume brings up to date the handsome collected edition of Mr. O'Neill's plays, now complete in five volumes.

The English Madrigal. By Edmund H. Fellowes. The World's Manuals. Oxford University Press. $1.40.

Mr. Fellowes, well known for numerous works on Tudor music, here condenses his knowledge for a most interesting series of books.

Inside the Moscow Art Theater. By Oliver M. Sayler. Brentano's. $4.

This elaborately illustrated book deals informingly with the history and purposes of the Moscow Art Theater. It is more particularly devoted to the Musical Studio, and was prepared in connection with the recent visit of Nemirovitch-Dantchenko to this country.

Essays in Biography: 1680-1726. By Bonamy Dobrée. Oxford University Press. $5.

Vanbrugh, Etherege, and Addison furnish the subjects for these essays, which are written in a manner more nearly that of the modern school of biographers than is usually found in studies of those literary personages who have been regarded as the exclusive possession of the schools. The essay on Addison, "the first Victorian," offers a brilliant reinterpretation.

Black Haiti. By Blair Niles. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $3.50.

A conscientiously sympathetic travel book, containing sprightly historic material in anecdotal form, which, however, does not rise to its descriptive and interpretative opportunities in picturing a unique land. The romance, gorgeous color, fragrance, and picturesque charm which are intensively and peculiarly Haiti's are inadequately conveyed. The classic about Haiti remains to be written.

A Merchant of Dreams. By Abbie Graham. The Woman's Press. $2.

A rather amateurish life of Grace Dodge. Miss Dodge was a remarkable example of the philanthropic woman who, profiting enormously through our present organization of society, yet feels the responsibility of wealth and gives largely not only of her means but of herself.

THEATER

THE GRAND STREET FOLLIES
4th Annual Revue of NEIGHBORHOOD
Playhouse, 466 Grand St. Drydock 7516.
Evenings (Except Mon.) at 8:30.
Matinees Saturdays.

THE THEATRE GUILD Presents
AT MRS. BEAM'S
A Comedy by C. K. MUNRO
with ESTELLE WINWOOD, JEAN CADELL, EARL LARIMORE, HELEN WESTLEY, HENRY TRAVERS AND OTHERS.
GUILD THEATRE, 52nd St., West of B'way. Evs. 8:30. Matinees THURS. and SAT., 2:30.

International Relations Section

The Shrinking Globe

THE International Air Conference, held at Paris during the past winter, resulted in the removal of restrictions which had not only limited German aviation to its own frontiers but had also barred other nations from crossing those boundaries. The demolition of these barriers caused the sprouting all over Europe of plans for air-lines, the vastness and the probability of which are suggested in the following article from the Berliner Tageblatt of June 18:

On January 15, 1918, the first regular air-line was opened in Germany, the Berlin-Hanover-Cologne line. But this was only a military experiment. With the exception of the air mail, which was established on the Eastern front as early as 1917, this line, which lasted only three months, was the beginning of German air traffic. Out of that grew a whole network of air communication, although development was hampered until recently by the fetters which the Treaty of Versailles had welded. . . . The new arrangements permit Germany to compete on a friendly basis with other nations in the air. These new agreements were no gift; the arrow which was aimed at Germany proved a boomerang. All disabilities which were placed upon German aircraft applied also to the craft of other nations crossing German territory. But it was impossible permanently to avoid German territory. The French attempted to negotiate the section Strasbourg-Prague despite the fact that they had to cross Southern Germany, but they lost their enthusiasm when every plane that was forced to land was confiscated. The situation itself finally compelled a sensible arrangement. Now the great international lines which have to cross Germany have become possible. . . .

The stage-coach brought cities together, the railroad whole countries, but aircraft unites continents. The world is shrinking; the means of communication among nations, economic and intellectual, have doubled. Daily fifteen air connections are made in Berlin. How these facilitate travel may be seen from the following table in which the fastest trains and aircraft are compared:

From Berlin to	Fastest train	Airplane
Amsterdam	10 hrs.	5 hrs. 50 min.
Basle	11 "	7 " 45 "
Breslau	5 "	2 " 30 "
Cologne	8 "	4 " 15 "
Danzig	10 "	3 " 15 "
Dortmund	7 "	3 " 35 "
Dresden	3 "	1 " 15 "
Essen	7 "	4 " 50 "
Frankfurt a. M.	8 "	4 " 45 "
Hamburg	3 " 30 min.	2 " "
Kiel	6 "	3 " 15 "
Königsberg	10 "	5 " 10 "
London	20 "	10 " "
Munich	9 "	4 " 35 "
Paris	19 "	8 " 15 "
Prague	7 "	3 " 5 "
Stuttgart	12 "	4 " 15 "

That is, on the average, half the time required by the fastest trains. Last year the companies now united as the Deutsche Luft-Hansa flew 4,034,979 kilometers (about 2,400,000 miles) and carried 48,184 passengers. Mail and freight traffic has also achieved considerable volume. The area covered by the Luft-Hansa today reaches 17,000 kilometers, over which 110 airplanes fly. . . .

A means of transportation like aircraft is in the long run not economically feasible if it is limited by national frontiers. Air-lines cannot stop at the boundaries. This has hitherto been the greatest hindrance to German air development. The stretches to Essen and Cologne had no connection with France, Dresden no connection with Prague, Gleiwitz none with Poland, Vienna and Innsbruck none with Italy. With England there was a connection, but it was temporary. On the other hand, lines to Holland, Denmark, Sweden, the Soviet Union, Lithuania, Switzerland, and of course Austria were in operation. Since the close of the London conference the connection with London has been regularized, that with France, Belgium, and Czecho-Slovakia established. Air service to Paris, Brussels, Ostend, and Prague is now a reality. We have agreed with France that a French line may cross German territory to Prague. In return we are permitted to carry a German line over southern France to Spain, an undertaking in which trial flights will shortly be made by German super-machines. Here is a beginning of that which only the future will be able to realize. To order this future, perhaps a very near future, properly, it is necessary to envisage the situation in enormous world space. What we have hitherto been observing was essentially Mid-Europe, the territory between London and Moscow, Stockholm and Zürich. A real picture of future development may be gained only by a survey of the continents of Europe, Asia, and Africa. In that perspective the main line of today will be but a branch line.

Today the longest line that crosses Germany is the line London-Moscow. It is evident that the Russians are planning to extend this line through Siberia to Vladivostok, with a branch line to Peking. The way to that is pointed by the Trans-Siberian Railroad, with the difference that the air-line to Peking would probably cut across Mongolia. The connection from Vladivostok to Tokio is near at hand. The second great transcontinental line also starts with the London-Berlin stretch. It is the beginning of the line England-India. This line England must carry across Germany. That was one of the chief reasons why the English demanded the freeing of German aircraft. The line which the English intend to develop in the next two years will follow the route Berlin-Constantinople-Angora-Aleppo-Bagdad-South Persia-Karachi-Calcutta. Hydroplanes will connect Calcutta with Rangoon and Singapore. From Singapore the line will fork, one line crossing the Malay Islands to North Australia-Sydney-Melbourne, the other going from Singapore to Hongkong, with extensions to Peking and Japan. Here the lines that divide at Berlin meet again. From Aleppo a branch line will go to Palestine and Egypt. Thus England has covered its chief territories, with the exception of those in America and Africa. With this line another is closely related: the African North-South line. The English flier Cobham made the stretch from Alexandria to Cape Town last year in ninety flying hours. Considering the importance which England places on its East African colonies this was a great event. London will probably also be connected with Cairo by a line crossing France.

Thus far the English plans. France has already developed several international lines. Its airplanes fly from Antibes over Corsica to Tunis, from Strasbourg through Prague, Budapest, Belgrade, Bucharest, and Constantinople to Angora; from Toulouse via Marseilles, Barcelona, Alicante, Malaga, Tangier, and Rabat to Casablanca; and from Alicante via Oran, Fez, and Rabat to Casablanca. From Casablanca this line is extended via Agadir, Cape Juby, Port Etienne, and St. Louis to Dakar, south of the mouth of the Senegal. Political considerations have in this case determined the east-west course. Political considerations determine the further plans: the stretch Paris-Marseilles-Genoa-Rome-Brindisi-Athens-Crete-Syria, with a probable branch line from Crete to Egypt. Another plan is for a Marseilles-Corsica-Sardinia-Sicily-Cairo line. Holland, too, intends to establish a connection with her colonies, and Belgium with the Congo.

The German plans have been indicated. The connection with Poland and Italy will be established sooner or later. Of these the Italian line is the more important. The trans-Alpine lines will probably go from Zürich to Milan, from Munich to Venice, and from Vienna to Trieste. At Berlin these trans-Alpine lines connect with Scandinavia and the East.

An Italian program has recently been published. It includes of course the trans-Alpine lines from Milan to Lausanne, Zürich to Constance, Innsbruck to Munich, and Trieste to Vienna. Another east-west line goes from Tangier via Barcelona, Genoa, Rome, and Naples to Brindisi and thence via Valona and Saloniki to Constantinople. From Milan likewise a line goes to Brindisi, which is continued to Crete (Candia), Cyrenaica, and Egypt. A great line is that from Italy to Tripoli and Tunis, with branch lines from Tripoli to Ben-Ghasi and Derna. The Italian program is very extensive. Whether it can be realized soon remains to be seen.

Such are the air-lines which will unite the countries of the Old World and Australia. Two questions become urgent: What about connection with America? What about airships? Both questions are interrelated. A German airship has crossed the Atlantic from Spain to the United States. For this voyage airships seem to be the proper means. But a German Dornier-Wal hydroplane has also crossed the Atlantic from Spain to Pernambuco, under the command of the Spanish flier Franco, in thirty-five hours. Both accomplishments are individual feats, on which as yet no air-lines can be built. To be sure, we hope that some day the German line to Spain can be continued to South America. But despite the flight of the Z. R. III, the use of dirigibles for regular transportation is still problematical. This needs emphasis, especially in Germany. As matters stand today the airplane has a great advantage over the airship. Plans for airship lines, however, are under consideration. England contemplates several great lines, one from London down the west coast of Africa to Cape Town; another via Egypt to India, with a continuation to Australia and Eastern Asia; a third to Canada. Trial flights are planned for these stretches, but these are mere plans.

Air travel is still a child in swaddling clothes. It is not yet free from the influence of the seasons and the weather; the problem of night flying is not solved. Much remains to be done, not only in the development of the various lines but also in technique of aviation. But when we consider how short a time has passed since men first went up from the ground in heavier-than-air craft and what development has been achieved in those short twenty years, many things which seem wild and daring dreams are not at all fantastic.

Contributors to This Issue

HENRIK SHIPSTEAD is United States Senator from Minnesota, the only representative of the Farmer-Labor Party in the Senate.

HELEN HAYES GLEASON is Mrs. Arthur Gleason.

PHILIP SNOWDEN was Chancellor of the Exchequer in the Labor Government of England.

MARY K. DAS is the wife of Taraknath Das.

JOHN WALDHORN GASSNER is a contributor to literary reviews.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH is Associate Editor of The Nation and the author of "Edgar Allan Poe: A Study in Genius."

PAUL H. DOUGLAS is professor of industrial relations at the University of Chicago.

WILLIAM SPENCE ROBERTSON is professor of history at the University of Illinois.

JACOB ZEITLIN is associate professor of English at the University of Illinois.

ALAIN LOCKE edited "The New Negro."

SUMMER COURSES IN JEWISH SOCIAL WORK

THE TRAINING SCHOOL FOR JEWISH SOCIAL WORK offers summer institutes for Social Workers in addition to its regular course of fifteen months' graduate study in preparation for Jewish social work.

The following courses will be given during the second term of the Summer Session which will begin August 16, 1926:

Social and Religious Institutions of the Jews..M. M. Kaplan
Modern Jewish History.....I. B. Berkson
The Field of Jewish Social Service in the U. S...M. J. Karpf
Adiminstration of Jewish Family Case Work Agencies.....M. J. Karpf
Administration of Jewish Federations.....M. B. Hexter
Post War Problems of the Jews.....I. B. Berkson

THE FALL QUARTER WILL BEGIN OCTOBER 5, 1926

For a description of the Course of Study write for the General Announcement

THE TRAINING SCHOOL FOR JEWISH SOCIAL WORK
(Initiated by the National Conference of Jewish Social Service)
210 West 91st Street, New York City

Summer Time!

Camps, hotels, summer homes, boarding houses, —and those who seek such accommodations we recommend placing an advertisement in the classified section of The Nation, as the best means of bringing the right person and the right place together. Rates on request. Address Dept. C, care of The Nation.

accept nothing but
Non Depressant
non Habit Forming
In Convenient
Aluminum Boxes
At every drug store
3 Tablets 15c
10 Tablets 40c
Midol
for HEADACHE
GENERAL DRUG CO., - 94 N. Moore Street, New York

When writing to advertisers, please mention The Nation

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXIII NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 11, 1926 No. 3188

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS
EDITORIALS:
Putting Mexico in Her Place
The Unwilling Censor
Classic Simplicity
Lenin Zangwill
CARTOON By Hendrik van Loon
MY ADOPTED MOTHER By Herman W. Nevinson
CHINA, THE WORLD'S PROLETARIAT By [illegible]
COMMUNISM IN MARRIAGE: HUMAN NATURE AND SOCIALISM
ONEIDA COMMUNITY By [illegible]
AMERICA'S CROP OF HATE By [illegible]
IN THE DRIFTWAY By the Drifter
CORRESPONDENCE
BOOKS:
Poems. By Laura Riding Gottschalk
A Debt of Democracy By William MacDonald
A Master of the Assemblies By Joseph Wood Krutch
The Great Prince Napoleon By Harry Elmer Barnes
Oil Under the Water By Louis S. Gannett
Toward a Synthesis By Ernest Boyd
What Not to Do with Corporals By Lewis Gannett
The Canary Islanders By Melville J. Herskovits
Books in Brief
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
The Propaganda War on China
The French Assembly in Session By Nemesio M. Yabes

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor:

FREDA KIRCHWEY MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: No. 28 South Dearborn Street. British Agency for subscriptions and Advertising: Miss Constance M. Cross, 13, Wardour Street, London W. C. 1, England

A YOUNG MAN applied to a medical school for admission. He was well prepared, but he filled out the application blank too accurately. He stated that he was an agnostic, and received this answer:

> DEAR SIR: I have been requested to advise you that the Committee on Admissions has examined your credentials and recommends that you be not admitted because no one can be an acceptable doctor who does not believe in God.
>
> Sincerely yours,
> VERONICA DOOLEY, Registrar.

It was Loyola College of Medicine, part of a Catholic university, which refused to teach an agnostic to cure disease. Its attitude throws light on the ardent desire of the Mexicans to rid themselves of Catholic control of their schools.

THE REMARKABLE and most disgraceful fact about the Republican Senatorial primaries in Illinois is the amount contributed in behalf of public-utility interests. Since our brief comment on the subject last week, the investigating committee has brought to light contributions totaling almost $1,000,000, and there is probably more to be accounted for. Although this sum is only a third of what was used in Pennsylvania, the sinister fact stands out that a fourth of the amount was public-utility money, most of which went into the successful campaign of Frank L. Smith, who was and still is chairman of the Illinois Commerce Commission, with wide regulatory powers over gas, electricity, and street railways. Of the $241,234 of public-utility contributions four-fifths was put up by Samuel Insull, who controls the Commonwealth Edison Company and other similar companies. Mr. Insull gave $125,000 to the Smith campaign direct and $33,734 indirectly for anti-World Court propaganda. Ira A. Copley and Clement Studebaker, prominent in the public-utilities field, gave $25,000 and $20,000 respectively to the Smith war chest. In view of the enthusiastic support of Mr. Smith by the utility interests it would doubtless be a good thing for Illinois to have him plucked from the chairmanship of its Commerce Commission, but it would be a danger to the people of the United States to accomplish this by sending him to Washington as a Senator.

IT WOULD BE HARD to find a more convincing illustration of the futility of that vague liberalism which crystallized about Theodore Roosevelt in the early years of this century than the career of Senator Albert B. Cummins of Iowa, who died on July 30, at the age of seventy-six years. Senator Cummins's life was the picturesque and varied romance of self-building that was typical of most Americans of his era. Brought up by his father as a carpenter, he later drifted accidentally into surveying and became a successful builder of railroads. He threw this work over to study law and then went into politics. When he was sent to the United States Senate eighteen years ago he was regarded as a progressive if not a radical. He fought his party, the Republican, for tariff reduction, and although not formally affiliated with Mr. Roosevelt's Progressives he declared in 1912 that he would not vote for President Taft. Then came a gradual hardening of his liberal arteries. In 1919 he was one of the authors of the Esch-Cummins act, a decidedly pro-railroad measure, and his last year in the Senate found him a thick-and-thin supporter of Coolidge and Coolidgeism.

AMERICA'S PROPOSAL to carry further the limitation of naval construction agreed to by Great Britain and Japan at the Washington conference called by President Harding has come to naught, according to a dispatch from Geneva to the New York World. Japan informally accepted our invitation for a conference to extend the 5—5—3 agreement, but Great Britain, says the World correspondent, has refused. A number of reasons are assigned, including the reported reluctance of the British Admiralty to reduce its cruiser strength in the face of the extensive submarine program of France and Italy, but Senator Borah puts his finger on an indirect but probable cause of Great Britain's fear when he recalls our own refusal to recognize Russia, and the general failure to receive that nation into the fold of international comity. Senator Borah reminds us that some time ago Great Britain was declared to be unwilling further to curtail her navy until other countries reduced their land forces. "There will be no land disarmament," Mr. Borah observes, "so long as Russia, with an army of some 700,000, is treated as an outcast among nations. The Russian problem must be settled before European armies are reduced."

PUBLIC LIBRARY

THE FARCE of the reservations laid down by us as a condition to entering the World Court should become increasingly evident with the announcement that after six months' time only three of the forty-two nations adhering to the tribunal have accepted our proposals. The three nations that have accepted our reservations are [illegible], Greece, and Liberia. Fourteen countries, including Great Britain, Japan, Italy, and Belgium, have not even acknowledged receipt of the State Department's communication; nineteen have returned simple acknowledgments; six have stated that they are reserving decision. The State Department regards this situation as "perfectly normal." So do we if by that is meant natural or inevitable. It has seemed to us ever since the Senate passed its extraordinary reservations that it was highly improbable that they would be accepted by the members of the World Court or, if they were, that we would make an effective use of the international tribunal. Doubtless the reservations were swallowed by some genuine but not too acute friends of the World Court in the Senate, but a great number of our legislators must have voted for the limitations with a ghoulish satisfaction that thereby they were ditching the measure while ostensibly "standing by the President." The actual decision on our reservations will presumably take place at the international conference called to consider them in Geneva in September, but our refusal to send delegates to this meeting seems to preclude the possibility of progress there through compromise.

IT WILL NOT BE THE FAULT of the "Citizens' Committee of Passaic, Clifton, Garfield, and Wallington" if the textile strike in that section is settled. The hopeful intervention of Senator Borah, the more friendly attitude of the American Federation of Labor, the expressed willingness of Weisbord (the strike leader who has been attacked because he is a Communist) to step out in favor of a committee of outside sympathizers which has been given power to negotiate terms—these steps may eventually lead to peace. But the so-called Citizens' Committee does its utmost to prolong and intensify the war. The other day the newspapers printed a story released by the committee purporting to give "incontestable documentary evidence that the strike of the woolen textile workers . . . is engineered from the headquarters in Chicago of the Communist Party of America." The evidence consisted of a letter from the National Pioneer Department of the Young Workers' League to the Pioneer Department of District Two—which seems to include several Eastern States. The letter outlines a rather pretentious plan for utilizing the events of the Passaic strike for Communist propaganda in the district. It urges discussion among young people of the lessons of the strike, the formation of relief committees among workers' children of all shades of radicalism, and other similar activity in and out of Passaic. There is not a hint in the entire document that the author has or is trying to exercise any influence over the strike leade s or the conduct of the strike. In fact it concludes rather plaintively:

> In spite of the fact that we have asked several times we have not yet received any definite information as to the situation in Passaic. We still don't know how many child-workers there are, how many are involved in the strike, how close they are to us, how many strikers' children there are, etc. We don't even know whether we have a Pioneer organization in Passaic although we assume we have. Please send us a detailed report on all these matters.

THIS IS THE DOCUMENT which offers the "incontestable evidence" of Communist control of the strike. It is described by the Citizens' Committee as a "Letter to Weisbord"—which is patently false. The Citizens' Committee headlines the letter thus: "Communist Party Chiefs Directing Passaic Strike from Chicago Office," and the facsimile letter is said to be "from the headquarters of the Communist Party of America to Passaic strike leaders." Is it asking too much of the New York Times or the New York World, which pride themselves on accuracy in news, that they investigate a news release like this before printing it? It would have been easy to find out from the local office of the Workers' Party what the Pioneer Department of the Young Workers League was up to, and what its connection was with the Passaic strike. It would have been easier still to scrutinize the "evidence," which was kindly provided by the Citizens' Committee, and then, in the interests of honesty, to throw it all in the waste basket.

ALBERTA, CANADA, is largely populated by farmers. This being true one would expect to find the province in the hands of a government made up of bankers, lawyers, grain dealers, and professional politicians. Strangely, this is not the case; Alberta is run by farmers. In 1921 the United Farmers of Alberta went into politics, and when the smoke of the provincial election battle of that year cleared away it was found that the farmers had captured thirty-eight of the sixty seats in the provincial legislature. On June 28, 1926, another election was held and the U. F. A. won forty-four seats, which, with the six seats won by Labor, left the old parties smaller and weaker even than before. The United Farmers of Alberta is not a political party. It is an industrial organization with a paid-up membership. It went into politics as a class-conscious union; it has held its ranks and kept its character through five years of power and reelected itself with a triumphant majority. "Class government" is freely denounced by persons of all parties—even such as support Mr. Pepper for the United States Senate. It is interesting to note some of the results of class government in Alberta. In five years the farmers' Government cleaned up a legacy of debts left by the old Liberal Government, wiped out an annual deficit of $2,000,000, and balanced the budget. At the same time it has improved government service and eliminated much obvious corruption. The farmers of Alberta believe that their government has succeeded for one reason—that it represents a solid, well-organized class, instead of the usual hodge-podge of conflicting interests and apathies represented in the ordinary political party.

A "WHITE-COLLAR STRIKE" is a rare bird, and a successful white-collar strike is even more remarkable. Organization in the professions has almost invariably broken against stone walls of prejudice or indifference in the workers themselves. But on June 30 the engineers in Chicago's department of engineering walked out, and twenty-four hours later returned with a 30 per cent increase in wages. The prospect of suspension of civic improvements, which were costing $10,000,000, convinced the city councilmen that the minimum wage of the engineers should be increased from $160 to $230 a month and the maximum from $708 to $900. The union, which is a member of the American Federation of Labor, is now 800 strong. During the past month organization of the technical men employed by New York City has gone vigorously forward. Two hundred and fifty engineers voted to join the union; a referendum is planned among a thousand more. The white-collar worker is learning the strength of unity.

WE HOPE that the cotton manufacturers may draw some useful lessons from the men's clothing industry. Once the men's clothing industry was the black sheep of American business. It had the twelve-hour day and sweatshop wages. It spent much of its energy in union-smashing lockouts. The industry was corrupted by sharp business practices. Then gradually both capital and labor learned the lesson of organization. Finally the day came when a national clothing manufacturers' association and a national union, the Amalgamated Clothing Workers, established reasonable conditions for the whole industry. The employers united against any manufacturer who refused to cooperate in maintaining the standards of the industry. The workers have doubled their wages, and won the eight-hour day and union protection, while the manufacturers are making more money than they made in the days of chaotic competition, and economies in technical processes have saved the consumer from exploitation. That is the kind of organization which the cotton industry needs.

THE NEWS that the cotton manufacturers of the country are forming a gigantic combine to control output may arouse some apprehension in the minds of those who know the power of industrial combination to squeeze the consumer. But if there is one industry in the United States that has paid a penalty for disorganization it is the cotton industry. Overdevelopment, miscalculation of markets, and competition have left empty villages in the North and appalling poverty in the South. Women workers in Southern mills average less than $12.50 a week; a Georgia professor discovered a woman working in an Athens textile mill last year for $3.50 a week for an eleven-hour day. In spite of these low wages and favorable tariff there is no guaranty of steady work even in the South. Scores of mills are working half-time, nearly all have curtailed production, many are losing money. Judged by every standard of human and material efficiency the cotton-manufacturing industry is a disgrace to American business. It pays lower wages, has longer hours, and probably hires more workers than any other factory trade in the United States.

THE PRAYERS OF MEXICAN CATHOLICS for miraculous intervention against Article 130 of the Constitution did not go unanswered. In San Luis a group which had gathered before the closed church heard footsteps and the sound of a bell within. Women declared that they could see the image of the Holy Virgin walking up and down the nave of the church, moaning and lamenting her captivity. The excited crowd sought to break down the doors and liberate their patron. A police inspector arrived, obtained the attention of the crowd, and then courteously addressed himself to the image. If the Virgin, he said, would be good enough to come out into the streets of the city, he would himself accompany her on her nocturnal walks. "The image," says the Rumbus Nuevos, "did not take advantage of the offer." Some unbelievers insisted that Franciscans had entered the church by a secret door, but this was not confirmed; in any case, the empty church thereafter remained silent. Another miracle, in San Pedro, received ruder treatment. A family announced that an image of the Heart of Jesus, kept under a glass case in a niche in their home, was weeping. The community flocked to see the miracle, which they interpreted as a symbol of divine sorrow at the persecution of the church. But the agnostic mayor looked more closely, and found that bits of wax and a strong lamp behind the image cooperated to produce the tears. Thereupon the owners of the image were imprisoned. Earnest Catholics must deplore such humanly arranged divine interventions, which add complexities to an already complex situation.

"DANGEROUS THOUGHTS" flitting through the minds of Japanese university students are again disturbing the authorities. Mr. Okada, the Minister of Education, recently called together the heads of the Tokio colleges and recommended suppression of student organizations for the study of perilous subjects like sociology and socialism. The Tokio Kokumin says that at a supposedly secret conference held in the Ministry the Vice Minister declared that the secret police had discovered 1,500 students who were thinking dangerously and had put their names upon a student black-list at the Police Department. Meanwhile the Kobe customs officials announced with horror that they had confiscated a consignment of books, including a life of Lenin, sent from Moscow to students at Waseda University. The immediate results of these deliberations were not encouraging. Students in fifteen higher schools have joined in a League for the Defense of Freedom, and the net result has undoubtedly been to advertise the fascinating perils which the Minister wanted to suppress. Japan offers curious contrasts between the absurd medievalism of Mr. Okada and the fresh adventuresomeness of these students; but there can be little question of the direction in which she is traveling. The Kobe Chronicle reminds us that it was only three-quarters of a century ago that Yoshida Shoin had his head cut off for suggesting that a few young men should study foreign ideas in order to know how to combat foreign influences; and the spirit of "Present Day Japan," just issued by the Asahi, a newspaper with a larger circulation than any American daily can boast, is evidence of the growing liberalism of young Japan.

BY WAY OF DIVERSION from matters of finance the French Chamber of Deputies recently found time to pass a measure declaring the sale of "pacifiers" for babies illegal. The momentous decision was recorded by a vote of 370 to 153 after an able address by Dr. Pinard, a member of the Chamber and sponsor of the measure, who vividly depicted the dangers facing the rising generation unless the use of these diabolic devices was summarily suppressed. A chemist who attempted to defend the despised "pacifier," on the ground that babies without this diversion might be inclined to resort to buttons or similar "bootleg pacifiers," received scant encouragement for his pains. This is a prohibition age.

Putting Mexico in Her Place

THOSE weeping women, those long lines of last-minute communicants, the edicts and excommunications, the huge popular demonstrations for and against the Government—the whole vast picture reflected in the cabled dispatches from Mexico—are only new scenes in a centuries-old drama, and there is hardly an action or a phrase that could not be matched from the history of disestablishment in other countries. The secular authority of the church dies hard; church and state have never been separated without a struggle, nor church control of the life and thought of a nation thrown off without violence and bitterness.

Mexico's history is particularly rich of the bigotry of the church. It is a curious and often-forgotten fact that Mexico owes her independent existence to her reactionary church. The rich and powerful bishops who controlled Mexico a century ago crushed in blood the popular uprisings led by the parish priests Hidalgo and Morelos from 1810 to 1815; but when Spain herself turned liberal and adopted a potentially anti-clerical constitution they feared for their own dominating position and in 1820 sponsored a new independence movement which of course succeeded. Mexico's first revolution was a revolution to save the established church and the large estates, in opposition to religious toleration. Forty years later, when, under the Indian patriot Juarez, this bishop-born republic became liberal and anti-clerical, the ecclesiastics turned again to monarchy. After the downfall of the butcher Miramon they supported the sickly regime of the Emperor Maximilian. The Juarez constitution of 1857 remained on the statute-books—indeed in 1872 its anti-clerical clauses were intensified—but it was never enforced. Through successive regimes the church maintained its control, defying these mere scraps of paper. Sporadic outbursts of hostility to its domination never got beyond the law-making stage until the advent of President Calles.

The Roman Catholic church in Mexico has not built up a strong native priesthood; it has not used its opportunity as almost sole custodian of the education of the people. Rather, it has guarded its property and fought those who sought to alter its position, repeating the bitter history of the battles of church and state in other countries. Even in Spain, "most Catholic of countries," this war has waged in our own day. The church fought, in 1910, a decree ordering collection of taxes from religious bodies carrying on commercial and industrial enterprises! And when the Government sought to establish "liberty of conscience" for those of other than the Catholic faith the cry of persecution of the church rent the air. Seventy-two Spanish archbishops and bishops united in a protest to the Government—a tactic singularly like that adopted in Mexico today.

The current Catholic pleas for "liberty of conscience," indeed, must make an historian smile. It is less than a century since Gregory XVI issued an encyclical denouncing "the absurd and erroneous maxim, or rather insanity, that liberty of conscience should be procured and guaranteed to every one." "With this," he added, "is connected the liberty of publishing any writing of any kind. This is a deadly and execrable liberty for which we cannot feel sufficient horror." The Syllabus of 1864 and the encyclical Pascendi gregis of 1905 repeated the pontifical sneers at "liberty of conscience." The Catholic church has seldom inculcated tolerance; and if the Mexican Government shows intolerance toward it today it is in no small measure responsible for its own troubles.

We would not defend intolerance; we do not defend in every detail the present policy of the Mexican Government; but we believe it important that Mexico's policy be set against its historical background. This is no isolated outburst of Ku Klux Klanism; it is a belated chapter in the national history of our neighbor-republic. The United States is fortunate that from its beginning as a nation church and state have been separated; it has had so many sects that it has scarcely felt the threat of domination by one organized body filled with the passion of religious faith. Even without an established church it has seen enough of religious bigotry to make Americans pause before attempting to judge Mexico.

No people is safe in the hands of an established church owing primary allegiance to a foreign potentate, and no truly modern country endures foreign control of its religious life. Even Spain has struggled to free itself from control by the Church of Rome. Italy's conflict was so bitter that to this day the Pope refuses to cross the Tiber and step upon Italian soil. France went to the verge of revolution twenty years ago in her battle to free herself of the incubus of the church. Twenty-two years ago, prohibiting members of the religious orders from teaching, she closed 24,000 schools, and without that act she might never have attained her great public-school system of today. Aristide Briand, ten times her Prime Minister, first made his name known beyond St. Etienne when he brought in a report recommending abrogation of the Concordat and disestablishment of the church. In France, too, the church yielded nothing willingly. The law provided that the bishops might remain in their palaces for two years, and that the presbyteries and seminaries might continue five years, but the church, demanding all, conceded nothing, and intransigently refused the half loaf offered her. She has long since regretted her folly. She did not, in the case of France, make such an effort to create and use international hostility as a weapon as she has made against Mexico, but the difference is to be traced to Mexico's lesser size and weakness.

Thus far the Mexican struggle has proceeded peacefully. The church seems already to regret its haste in ordering religious services suspended; perhaps it recognizes how remote such a measure is from the spirit of Jesus. The members of the Confederation of Labor have marched, fifteen thousand strong, through the streets and past the churches of the capital, pledging their support to the Government; and no untoward incident occurred. Wild rumors of riots and killings, as well as of supernatural interventions, have flown about; but the threatened boycott of business seems to have been ineffective, and the passion of the people seems to have been stirred less than the headlines indicated. It may be too much to hope that the Catholic church in Mexico will show the world that it is possible for an established church to resign itself gracefully to a purely religious function; but strange things happen in Mexico.

The Unwilling Censor

THE unhappiest of men is, or ought to be, [illegible] because he is a friend of literature, feels forced [illegible] time to time to play the role of censor. [illegible] of himself as occupying this position, and the public may never be aware that he has joined this profession which, after all, it does not consciously consider objectionable; but the fact remains that against his will he has allied himself with the Comstocks and the Sumners through the mere process of consenting to exercise their function. He is the man, in short, who consents to testify before a court his belief that a given book is not indecent, lewd, dis[illegible]ing, pornographic, and the rest, but is "art." His friend has written the book, or he knows the publisher, or he perhaps is no more than one who seizes any opportunity to defend the printed word from the hungry hands of moralists. So he steps up before the judge and swears that the author in question had the purest—that is, the n[illegible]ous"—of intentions; or he allows his name to be published among those of other men who call the shrinking author blameless.

The embarrassing implication here is that the [illegible] has spoken for the book might have spoken again[illegible] might conceivably cherish the opinion that it is possible for a book to be censorable. A wholly enlightened person will never provoke this suspicion. He will realize that to be a censor who always absolves is after all to be a censor, is to lend support to the institution of censorship; and if he is possessed of a meticulous conscience he will recognize the dishonesty of an attitude which forces him invariably to vote no on a question to which in theory it should be possible to give the answer yes. Such was the predicament of certain citizens who allowed themselves last winter to serve as members of the play jury in New York. They voted to let certain plays live, which was a good thing; but it would have been a better thing in the long run to refuse to vote at all. The citizens referred to, as it happens, did not believe in suppression. The implication, however, was that they did, for they had given countenance to the supposition that there are two ways of answering the question whether a given piece of writing should be removed from the public eye.

What of him who is convinced that the answer must always be no? He will prefer to discuss those books which he has not yet read, those plays he has not yet seen. He will wait for a chance to say: "I have never heard of Rudolpho Lascivio and I have not so much as opened 'The Loves of Messalina'; I naturally cannot decide whether it has merit or no; but I am wholly of the opinion that those people who can or wish to read it should be allowed to read the book." Then, perhaps, he will do what he can to discourage the making of more laws against books for any reason capable of occurring to a legislator's mind; beyond that he will not proceed. He will sigh with relief over his freedom henceforth from the responsibility of passing upon either the art or the morality of authors. Time, he knows, has a way of settling those problems, and settling them very well.

News now comes that copies of a novel written by an American and published in Paris have been confiscated by United States customs officials. A few review copies, sent separately and in advance of [illegible] arrived prior to [illegible] in America, and one of these was addressed to The Nation. We wish that we had neglected to read our copy of "What Happens," by John Herrmann, before the confiscation took place, and before it became possible that we should be asked whether we thought the story harmful. We should so much have preferred to be able to say that of course it was, since all books are; or that if it was harmful, then the world must make up its mind to consider itself [illegible]—and perhaps later on feel better about it. Many good books that we know, books written by Socrates, the followers of Jesus, Rabelais, John Bunyan, Voltaire, and Bernard Shaw, have been considered harmful, and we are glad to remember that because of this fact people were frightened into reading them. Many bad books that we know have been considered harmful, and it is agreeable to know that most of them already are forgotten. Some of them are still remembered; but we do not grow unhappy over that circumstance either.

"What Happens" is not a very good book, and for that reason perhaps is the best sort of book to defend against censors and customs officials. We cannot pretend that it is great and pure art, though incidentally we should call it art. It is one of several works, published in Paris under the name of The Contact Editions, which have had hard sledding in America, whence all of the authors—Gertrude Stein among them—hail. The story is of a commonplace American high-school boy who falls in love, has experience of women, sells seeds and pearl necklaces, lies and steals upon occasion, and in general exhibits about the same strength of character that failed to distinguish the hero of Theodore Dreiser's recent masterpiece. The author is frank; the material is true; the moral is that human nature, particularly perhaps in America, is weak. "What Happens" is not a bad book. But if it were the worst book we had ever chanced upon we should defend its right to come into the country.

Ulysses Singing

IN the half a dozen years since we pointed out that the unsung life of wandering Negroes in America offered one of the richest fields for picaresque fiction in the world, more and more material has come forward to make good the claim. The latest item is the story of Left Wing Gordon, briefly told by Howard W. Odum and Guy B. Johnson in "Negro Workaday Songs," published by the University of North Carolina Press.

If Wing has not yet fallen a victim to any of the mishaps which lie in wait for men of his perilous career, he is no doubt still drifting, in his early thirties, over the continent which he has traveled as others travel counties. Missouri seems to have bred him. "You see, boss, I started travelin' when I wus 'leven years ol' an' now I'll be thirty this comin' August 26. I didn't have no father an' mother, so I jes' started somewheres. I'd work fer folks, an' they wouldn't treat me right, so I moved on. An', Lawd, cap'n, I ain't stopped yet." Indeed, the next day, when further inquiries were made about him in the construction camp where he had been found, a fellow-laborer said that Wing had "done gone to Philadelphia."

But in a brief meeting he had given an account of himself which it would be difficult to match. His name was really John Wesley Gordon, but the loss of his right arm at eighteen had furnished him with a racier title. That loss, however, had apparently no more checked his Odyssey than if he had belonged to the fortunate orders of existence which grow new arms and legs at need. From Missouri he swung in amazing circles through thirty-eight States, always in the underworld of the unskilled laborer, as free as a migratory bird. "Didn't do nothin' in Texas, had a little money to spend," he said. And so was he a person of leisure in Wyoming and Arizona and Massachusetts. He worked on the roads in Florida and South Carolina. He worked on boats in Louisiana, Missouri, and Mississippi; at steel plants in Alabama, New York, and Pennsylvania; in mines in Iowa and West Virginia; in harvest fields in Kansas and South Dakota; on the railroad in Wisconsin and North Dakota; at a hotel in Arkansas; at odd jobs in Illinois, Ohio, Virginia; at a packing house in Nebraska; at a Ford factory in Michigan; at "a maloominium plant" in Tennessee; at unspecified occupations in the District of Columbia, Maryland, New Jersey, Connecticut, Rhode Island. During the war he was in a government camp in California. In Georgia, reputed for its hostility to his wayfaring kind, he was "comin' in a hurry, never fooled 'round there much." And once he wandered far into the North to work in a Montreal broom factory.

He did not yield much general information, but he was full of details. For instance, there were the heroines of his innumerable songs.

> I had some mighty fine women. Fust one was Abbie Jones, 'bout —— Ioway Street. Nex' was in M——, Missouri, Jennie Baker, Susan Baker's daughter Nex' one St. Louis, lady called Bulah Cotton, Pete Cotton's daughter. Nex' one was in Eas' St. Louis, her name Sylvia Brown. Nex' I had in Poplar Bluff, one dat took my money an' went off. Nex' Laura, she's in Memphis, Tennessee, she's 'nother took my money and gone. Jes' lay down, went to sleep, jes' took money and gone. Wake up sometimes broke an' hongry, they jes' naturally take my money. Nex' woman was at Columbia, S. C., 'bout las' regular one I had, Mamie Willard, mother an' father dead. Sweethearts I can git plenty of if I got money. If I ain't got none I'se sometimes lonesome, but not always, 'cause sometimes dey feel sorry fer you an' treat you mighty fine anyway.

Such a theme did stir Wing to generalization. "Can't count 'em, take me day after tomorrow to count 'em. Find fifteen or twenty in different cities. New Orleans best place to find most fastest, mo' freer women—person find gang of 'em in minute."

If this is not true picaresque material, nothing is. Here is a hero who ransacks the world, on the simple quests of food and love. Space and time do not bind him. His desires and deeds are always simple, and yet always varied by fresh circumstances. And to the qualities of the picaro he adds the qualities of the strolling minstrel. Wing, after working all day, could sing all night, improvising, combining familiar words with new, packing his own experiences into the form of some "blues" air which he had picked up, using a musical arrangement of his own to give variety to a traditional tale. He had traveled farther than Ulysses, and he came singing.

His blues die away on the air. What chronicler will take up his story, or the story of some adventurer like him, and weave it into the tougher fabric of a narrative prose worthy of him?

Israel Zangwill

THE world beat Israel Zangwill at his own game. It answered paradox with paradox; it honored the ordinary man of action in a great artist. Thus during his lifetime this cynical sentimentalist, this idealistic iconoclast always found the spotlight of public interest trained on his talent and his ephemeral work rather than on his genius and his enduring works. And at his death the newspaper obituaries, quite characteristically, emphasized his fleeting controversies on Zionism, America, and what-not while they ignored his lasting contributions to literature.

It may be said that Zangwill himself did most to distract attention from his art to his arguments, but this will not be altogether true. With that peculiar unanimity which characterizes English critical opinion the dogma was accepted from the first that Zangwill was a brilliant interloper in the field of English letters to be dealt with justly whenever he appeared on the scene but to be severely let alone between publications. Nor could the genuine enthusiasm aroused by such individual works as the play "Plaster Saints" and the novel "Jinny, the Carrier" sway critics and cataloguers from this doctrine. Partly because his earliest significant work was on Jewish themes, partly because his social activities linked his name so closely with his race Zangwill's writing was not merged in the current of contemporary English literature. Yet it is impossible to deny that he wrote in the English tradition, for "Plaster Saints" and "Jinny," lighter pieces like "The Bachelor's Club," and even the numerous volumes on Jewish subjects reflect a dominant Anglicism of temper and expression.

This the Jews recognized. For them he was ever a great English author who considered sympathetically, if somewhat dogmatically, their problems, their activities, and their ideals. They were grateful for his interest but they seldom appreciated his advice—until too late. His custom of wrapping the pearl of wisdom in the tinfoil of epigram antagonized this literal-minded people. They suspected the sincerity of one who could joke about matters of great seriousness and import, and they failed to see the justice of his comments for the jest.

Zangwill was fully aware of the extent to which his manner injured the substance of his appeals to reason, but he would not change his style. It was a sacrifice he was not prepared to make for any ideal. His case was a practical illustration of Johnson's far-fetched quip about Shakespeare: A quibble was to him the fatal Cleopatra for which he lost the world and was content to lose it. Without doubt it was this trivial weakness that deprived him of the acknowledged leadership in Jewry and—far greater loss—deprived the Jewish people of his leadership. Thus did the writer injure the man, even as the man had injured the author.

Zangwill had much to give to any movement. Capable of enthusiasm and sentimental attachment to an ideal, he nevertheless was not blind to weaknesses in the program for its accomplishment. He saw things early as well as clearly. He not only attacked opponents boldly; he faced facts courageously. In this world so thickly strewn with shams and evils his tendency to lay about him militantly and recklessly did less harm than might have been expected. These virtues, of course, die with the individual; Zangwill's qualities as a writer will not perish so easily.

In Mexico

"After my child, someone struck me, Lord!"
"And our Lord turned His other cheek?"
"No. He got angry and went away."

My Adopted Mother

By HENRY W. NEVINSON

OTHER people adopt a child, but I have adopted a mother, and her name is Ireland. I know very well how risky such an action is. My own countrymen have for many years regarded me with suspicion on account of it, and no one is more distrusted in Ireland than the Englishman who adopts her cause. My friend Erskine Childers was a mournful instance of that, for in spite of his brilliant mind and devoted sincerity, he was distrusted, or only half trusted, by all Irish parties long before the Free Staters shot him in the prison yard. But I cannot help it. There is something in my nature (perhaps it is the old Celtic name of "Nevin") that makes me look upon Ireland as the most beautiful country in the world and the Irish people as the most akin to myself. And so I cross to Ireland whenever I possibly can, and every time I feel that I am going home.

For the last fifteen years or so my visits have usually been disturbed and often risky. For I was there during the Home Rule troubles, the Carson's Covenant, the formation of the Ulster Volunteers and the Irish Volunteers, the mutiny at the Curragh, the shooting in Bachelor's Walk just before the Great War, the sequels of Easter Week, the attempt of the English Government to enforce conscription, the abominations of the Black-and-Tans, the bitter civil war when the Four Courts was burned, and the prolonged troubles since. But in the visit from which I have just returned I found a hopeful spirit of security and peace. I was not once shot at nor did I see anyone else in danger from violence. That in itself is a vast improvement.

Most people prefer security, as gentlemen prefer blondes. But, of course, there are exceptions, and I think the exceptions to both rules are most common in Ireland. The best type of Irish woman has black hair and gray eyes, and there are large numbers of Irish boys and girls who regard security as tedious. For many years they have lived the life of the films—carrying revolvers, rushing over rivers and mountains on perilous errands, hiding in moorland cottages, climbing over the roofs of cities, lying in ambush for "the enemy," cycling with food and ammunition for "the boys." It was a kind of life well suited to the Irish nature, and hundreds enjoyed it to the full. Especially the young women enjoyed it, and all the romantic traditions and rebellious literature of their country inspired them to believe that no other life was much worth living. No wonder they still yearn for the glamor of adventure and refuse to be comforted by the common light of peace and useful labor.

So the danger still persists, though I think it is dying fast. Adventure and tradition are the two perils that threaten the Free State, and give some appearance of power to the Republican youths and maidens. The power would be greater if they had not yielded to the Irish passion for division into parties ever smaller and smaller. In Dublin I was present at a great meeting in the old Rotunda beside the Maternity Hospital, where I have seen so many hurricane assemblies gather and disperse in storm. How the round building escaped Easter Week I cannot tell, but there it still stands, and in it was crowded a mass of the Dublin people, chiefly the young, all clamoring to depose their late hero, Mr. De Valera, and to appoint in his place Mr. Art O'Connor as President of the Irish Republic. Old Count Plunkett, who gave one son to execution and another to imprisonment in Easter Week, was in the chair, and Mary MacSwiney was on the platform as the real moving spirit of the new rebellion. A few youths in cloth caps, but wearing a kind of uniform under their coats, and revolvers sticking obviously from their pockets, assumed a martial and dangerous air, but there was nothing more dangerous in the meeting than the customary abuse of England, coupled with brand-new abuse of De Valera, so lately the hero of similar occasions.

The conflict arose over the oath of allegiance to the King as representing the British Commonwealth of Nations. De Valera is willing to take it in order that his party should be represented in the Dail and Senate. But Mary MacSwiney is obdurate. She would leave no sign of connection with hated England. Ireland's separation must be absolute and eternal. In her mind, "England's cruel red" is still the symbol of tyranny, though the red has long given place to khaki, and there is not a single English soldier remaining in the Free State.

The Anglo-Irish Treaty of the winter of 1921-1922 was to me one of the two happiest events of my life. It ended the struggle of seven centuries between my own country and the country of my adoption. I had never hoped to see such a blessed end, nor had Parnell, Redmond, and the other great leaders of Ireland ever thought it possible. It won for Ireland incalculably more than they had ever asked. But to Miss MacSwiney it was nothing. So long as a vestige of English tyranny remained, it was nothing. Well, the eloquent lady has suffered grievously. I shall not forget the day when I marched through London with the procession that escorted her brother Terence's body to the station or that other day in Cork when I marched as representative of the universities behind his coffin up to the great church in Cork and far out to the patriots' cemetery. One cannot argue with a woman who has suffered so much. She has now appointed Mr. Art O'Connor President of her Irish Republic, and he seems a fairly quiet and peaceable sort of person, with far less power of speech than hers, but still considerable power. How far he enjoys his new position I cannot say.

The Republican Party claims for itself the title of "Sinn Fein" to the exclusion of the Free Staters. That is rather hard, for I remember when the phrase was invented about thirty years ago by Arthur Griffith, who will always be remembered as the real founder of the Free State. The words mean "ourselves," and they signified his insistence upon a policy of self-help for Ireland, as distinguished from the old policies of looking for every advantage from the British Government. It was like the "Italia fara per se" of the Italian independence movement seventy years ago. It destroyed the old home-rule movement of the end of last century. It led to Easter Week, out of which the Free State really sprang. But now the Republicans have monopolized the words, and the Free Staters must acquiesce in the theft. What is far more serious to an Irishman, they have to acquiesce in being regarded as the party of universal contentment, uninspired by tradition and unillumined by romance.

It is quite true. The Free Staters are resolved to give their distressful country at all events an interval of peace. They would even add prosperity. The chief job of Senate and Dail is to clean up the mess of the last ten years. And a hard job it is proving to be! Compensation for the enormous damage inflicted upon country houses and the bridges, upon roads and railways, by the Republicans during the civil war landed the new state into a large national debt, which is being paid off with extraordinary rapidity. I believe at one time it rose to something between £35,000,000 and £40,000,000, but now the Finance Minister tells me it is only about £13,000,000 plus £5,000,000 due to England as the share in the old English debt—the share being reduced to this small amount as balance against the damage done by the Black-and-Tans (now always known as "the Tans"). Such debt as remains is being paid off, some think too rapidly, by maintaining the taxation at the high figure imposed in England during the Great War. As the same authority tells me there are not more than one hundred people in all the Free State with incomes over £5,000 a year, it is evident that there is not much to be gained by supertax or death duties. The Government dares not impose a high income tax in any case, because the farmers, like all farmers, strongly object to paying out hard cash and would raise a revolution rather. So the chief revenue is raised by indirect taxation upon tobacco, wines, spirits, and imports, and the farmers swear at the prices, but pay. Like most of us, they swear and pay.

In regard to finance, it appears to me that nationalism is just about to commit a serious error. The Free State Government has agreed to manufacture a new and separate coinage. I suppose there are people who object to seeing the King's head upon our silver coinage (no gold is now used in either country), and so they have insisted upon having an Irish coinage, as they have Irish postage stamps. Even if the values can be maintained identical (which is very doubtful) this will be an intolerable nuisance to every foreigner visiting Ireland, to every Irishman going to England, and to every Irishman crossing the Ulster frontier either way. Every traveler knows what a plague the variation in Continental coinages becomes as he passes from one country to another, and now, without the smallest necessity except the call of separatism, the Irish Government is about to increase the plague, and render communication between England and their country even more troublesome than it is, and the customs at Dun Leary (Kingstown) and Holyhead give trouble enough. Besides, as much as 98 per cent of the Free State's trade is still done with hated England, and the difference in coinage will make further trouble, becoming unbearable if the standard of value goes up and down.

The dangerous question of the frontier between the Free State and the Six Counties (still sometimes called "Ulster") has fortunately been, not indeed settled but shelved on a condition of status quo. The two most pressing problems now before the Dail are housing and unemployment. There is a lot of building being done around Dublin, especially on the north side and toward Howth, and the new houses are decent little models, usually of the bungalow type, very neat and clean, but too expensive for the Dublin poor. They are rapidly filled by small clerks and officials, but the poor are left in the appalling slums, to which indeed they cling. Outside Moscow, I have nowhere seen slums so filthy and degrading. They might be show-places of squalor. But the people are long accustomed to them; they like living in the center of life; and what can you do when so many thousands are unemployed?

Out of a population of about 400,000 in Dublin 10,000 are now unemployed. Out of a total of about 3,500,000 in the whole of the Free State about 60,000 are unemployed, and in "Ulster" the proportion is still higher. For our victory over the Germans, whose ships have passed to us, has almost ruined the great shipyards of Belfast, and England has now become so poor that we cannot afford linen sheets and tablecloths, but must put up with cotton. Thus the two main industries of Belfast are checked. In the Free State live many thousand youths who have been "on the run" for years during the "troubles," have never learned any trade, or indeed worked at anything in particular. The wise and prudent cry "Emigrate! Emigrate!" but where are they to emigrate to? The whole world is getting horribly full, and your country, which would have been their refuge in old days, refuses to receive anyone above the "quota." A few weeks ago I was out among the rocky islands of the west coast, where the strange and almost foreign population has lived starving for generations on potato patches. The one thought of all the young was to get to America, or at least to Canada, but with every year the blissful change becomes more difficult.

In Dublin I saw crowds of the unemployed marching about in military order, but with no warlike intention. And I saw crowds of them addressed by Jim Larkin, who seems hardly to have changed since I knew him in London thirteen years ago. He has followers, but hardly enough to split the Labor Party, which is led in the Dail by Mr. Tom Johnson, an Englishman by birth and temperament, a shrewd, cautious, and honorable politician, always working for the working class. But on those two vital questions —want of houses and want of work—his Labor Party can effect little.

There is very little Socialism in the country. A community of small farm-owners is never Socialistic, even in Russia. Yet the Free State has embarked upon the largest venture in State Socialism I have ever seen. I mean the great scheme for converting the Shannon waters in a vast electric force to diffuse lighting, heating, and the motive power for manufacture. The work is being carried out by a great German firm of engineers, but few German workmen are employed. Irishmen are crowding to Limerick in the hope of being taken on at the average or standard rate of 32 shillings and sixpence a week. The wage is not high, but it represents the Irish worker's demand. The scheme is to be in working order in about three years, and what the result will be one cannot say. No one, certainly not the promoters, wishes Ireland to be converted into a manufacturing country, but it is hoped that small industries will spring up in the villages to which the power will be supplied. Whether the Six Counties will petition for a share is not known, but in that case the desired unity cannot long be delayed.

One remaining difficulty, and a very serious one, is education. Nearly the whole of education is now in Catholic hands, and the division between the Christian churches is not growing less acute. I will not argue the theological point, but one disadvantage the "Protestants" (a name obsolete in England) feel deeply. The Nationalist Government has determined to make Ireland bilingual. The Irish language has to be taught in all schools, and no government appointment is given to any candidate not possessing the knowledge of that very difficult tongue. In the western islands I found the whole population talking Irish among themselves, and the children in the schools could speak nothing else. But in other parts the tongue has been so long obsolete (chiefly owing to the Penal Laws of the eighteenth century) that it has to be studied as a foreign language, and it is doubtful how far a real Irish-speaker could understand the result of such study. It has, in fact, become an artificial language, and one may doubt whether it is worth the immense pains now taken to revive this mere semblance of the ancient tongue. Naturally, the teachers complain that they have to spend all their holiadys in trying to cram it up, and in the schools it has driven out drawing, physical drill, and French. In Wales the Welsh language has been preserved by the people themselves, and nearly all are bilingual. But I am not sure whether even nationality can make it worth while to preserve an almost extinct tongue at so great a sacrifice as Irish demands. For it is a language that the Irish themselves never use in common conversation, except only in those remote districts, and it is entirely useless across the seas. The Protestants acquiesce in the law, but feel it as a heavy burden.

China: The World's Proletariat

By LEWIS S. GANNETT

IN China the economic and nationalist struggles are inextricably intertwined. For China has the greatest cheap-labor supply on earth. It is good labor, too—and European capital, which at first merely bought native products cheap, has for two or three decades been attempting to install Western factories with Western methods to make Western products with the labor of China. When New England passed anti-child-labor laws it exported its low child-size machines to China as well as to our own South, and the little girls of China are today competing with the children of our South Atlantic States. And in China this whole industrial system, whether the immediate employer be a Chinese or a foreigner, is rightly regarded as a Western importation.

The daily life of the lower classes—poster from a Chinese mill

The mills have sprouted like mushrooms along the coast and rivers of China. The first cotton mill came to China in 1890; there were 14 in 1906, with 400,000 spindles; 42, with 1,154,000 spindles, in 1916; 83, with 2,666,000 spindles, in 1923; and there is no reason to suppose that the number will not continue to double every six or seven years. China still imports the blue cotton cloth which has become the national uniform of her masses. A fantastic statistician once figured that China's annual consumption of cotton cloth would pave a roadway sixty feet wide to the moon. And the workers in these mills live in a manner that would shame a self-respecting pig.

All about the industrial outskirts of the great Western city which is the pride of the foreigners in Shanghai one may see the disreputable sheds, built of bamboo, mud, lime, and straw. Six or eight people live in one-room floorless huts, through whose flimsy roofs the rain leaks in a storm; whose walls, falling or riddled with holes, afford no privacy. There is no drainage, no lavatories; garbage-heaps and cesspools—or rather cess-puddles—surround the houses. A little rain often floods the whole neighborhood, and the ragged babies wade about coated with mud and filth. In smaller cities, where the concentration is not so great or so sudden, conditions are somewhat decenter. But while a few enlightened Chinese talk of decentralization, the factory owners continue to build their prisons in the overcrowded centers where they can be sure of coal and raw materials—Tientsin, Tsingtao, Shanghai, Hangchow, Wusih, Hankow, and the rest.

Wages are desperately low. They can best be understood when translated into goods. A Shanghai cotton-mill worker would have to work two weeks to buy a hat; longer to buy a pair of leather shoes. A pair of sheets would cost a month's wages, an overcoat three months' toil; a daily paper one-tenth of the daily income; a ton of coal four months' earnings. Of course these industrial workers do not use coal, wear hats or shoes or overcoats, or buy newspapers—they live on a lower level. And yet these wages seem high to Chinese of the coolie type; there is no dearth of labor. It flocks in from the country, constantly replenishing the worn-out supply, for the working life of a Chinese mill-hand is generously estimated at from two to eight years.

In the cotton mills and silk filatures (where silk is reeled from cocoons which bob up and down in basins of boiling water) the vast majority of the workers are women and children. Men complain that they are discriminated against in Shanghai, which is true, largely because they are more likely to form labor unions and strike. The Shanghai Child Labor Commission found in 1923-24 that of 154,000 workers in the mills it studied more than 86,000 were women and more than 22,000 were children under 12. (It is worth while noting that in the Japanese-owned mills of Shanghai only 5.5 per cent of the workers were children under 12, and in the Chinese only 13 per cent; while the British mills had nearly 18 per cent children and the French and Italian 46 per cent. The few American mills had a slightly lower percentage than the Chinese.) In the silk filatures of South China nearly all the workers are women and girls. Often the children are brought in from the country by a contractor, who follows disaster like vultures and pays starving parents about a dollar a month for a contract which amounts to slavery; the girls live for years in his compound, eating his food, or in the factories, eating factory rice, working sometimes fifteen or sixteen hours a day, and often sleeping on the floor beneath their machines.

It is the common excuse of the mill-owner that the mothers do not want to leave their children unguarded at home, and doubtless that is sometimes true. Walking through these dimly lit mill-rooms one sees baskets containing children, sleeping or awake, between the whirring, clacking machines. Sometimes a tot of two or three sits cheerfully playing with cotton waste in the aisles through which the foreman guides the visitor. Girls a little older help their mothers tend the rows of spindles, and the deftness of five-year-old fingers is amazing. But when I asked ages of children smaller than my seven-year-old son, the foreman always replied monotonously "twelve." Except in the Japanese mills little attempt is made to keep the children out of the mills; there a rigid standard of height is set, and maintained.

Native-owned mills are likely to be dirtier and more dangerous than foreign-owned. The machinery is seldom protected, the ventilation is atrocious, the crowding terrific. But even a foreigner can sense the more human atmosphere. In the Naigaiwata mills (Japanese-owned) of Shanghai, where the great 1925 strike began, wages are fair, hours relatively short (only 10½!), and all sorts of modern welfare-devices have been installed. But the girls stopped talking and kept their eyes rigidly on their machines when the foreman appeared and the foreign visitors passed by. In a far dingier Chinese mill the girls showed no fear of the foreman, and pointed and giggled at the ridiculously garbed aliens who marched through the aisles. One of the demands of the strikers last summer was that foremen should no longer be armed, and the demand was typical of the spirit of the efficient, clean, militaristic Japanese mill.

There are vast profits to be made in these early stages of Chinese industrialization. But I doubt if the white men are to have as large a share in it as they expected. There are fewer British cotton mills in China today than there were three years ago, and there are no American cotton mills. Even the Japanese, who so proudly identify themselves in China with the imperialist West, are feeling the pinch of native competition that is driving the British to the wall. The great Naigaiwata mills have been on a kind of intermittent strike for nearly two years now—and it is a safe guess that the strikes are fomented and financed rather by Chinese competitors than by the commonly blamed Russians.

The Chinese employer straddles the class issue. He does not yet identify himself with the employing class of the world. In the last year he has openly encouraged the working class to fight for him the national battle against his foreign competitors. Last year the Shanghai strike was directed and subsidized by the Chinese Chamber of Commerce; the Canton boycott of Hongkong has been largely financed by Chinese business men in other parts of China and by the prosperous Chinese community of Singapore in the Straits Settlements. And not unprofitably. In South China the native Nanyang Brothers now have a monopoly of the vast cigarette business, and the British-American Tobacco Co., which outstrips them in the North, has lost hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of trade. I shall not soon forget the enthusiasm with which a rich Chinese banker described the Naigaiwata strikes, and continued: "We have waked up. We see now how the foreigners have run China, and we are planning to change things. For instance, the British have a monopoly of Yangtze River shipping. Well, we may not be as efficient mariners as they, but I think we can find ways of making it very hard for them to do business at all."

If the employer has no clear-cut sense of class interest, the worker too is confused. Class consciousness in the Western sense is only beginning to exist in the treaty ports; but race consciousness takes its place. In foreign households even the domestic servants—the most isolated and individualistic of industrial groups—struck in Shanghai and Canton in 1925; and if the strike was enforced in many instances by terroristic methods it is still significant that it could be enforced at all among the scattered individuals of the group. I doubt if the domestic servants of Chinese families can be organized for decades to come, but any kind of strike can be enforced against foreigners.

The labor-union movement in China is less than a decade old—inevitably it is younger than the factory movement, although precedents can be found in the history of the guilds. Shanghai organized feeble unions in 1916; not until 1919 were labor unions active in Canton; and the first notably successful industrial strike, that of the Hongkong mechanics, occurred in 1920. The epic peak of the movement is again in Hongkong, in the amazing seamen's strike of 1922. Twenty-three thousand Chinese seamen struck, and a few days later more than a hundred thousand other workers joined them. Hongkong was paralyzed; the lordly white men had to do their own coolie work. The police forbade meetings, closed the union headquarters, deported leaders. But the strike held. After forty days the seamen won the wage increase they demanded and recognition of their union—and the police had to restore the union signs which they had torn from the union building before the workers would return. That was a year of strikes—in the Pingshiang coal mines and the Hanyang steel mills, among the Peking school-teachers, the weavers of Changsha, the wheelbarrow-coolies of a northern city (they wanted their hours reduced from fourteen to twelve), the ricksha coolies of Soochow, in the Canton silk filatures and matshed factories—all over China. Six months saw thirty-one strikes in Shanghai alone, involving cotton mills, silk mills, the municipal electricity plant and water works, the telephone company, native and foreign tobacco companies, a hospital, the comb-makers, joss-paper workers, cargo coolies, sampan-men, laundrymen, cabinet-makers, and boat-builders. There was a trade boom that year and most of the strikes were quickly won. Enthusiasts saw Chinese labor taking its place with the great organized movements of the West.

China bears the burdens of the world—a poster from a Peking wall

But none of these unions had permanent organizations which would withstand a period of depression. When industries are booming in China new workers flock in from the villages; in bad times they return to their cabbage-fields. Except in Shanghai and perhaps in some of the cotton-fields there is hardly anywhere a permanent working class. In 1923 Wu Pei-fu smashed the union on the Peking-Hankow Railway, and beheaded the leaders, for which act he was heartily praised by the foreign press. A silk workers' strike in Shanghai was vigorously repressed. In Canton a radical government encouraged the unions; elsewhere the local militarists, more or less allied with foreign as well as native business men, smashed the unions with a ruthlessness hardly known even in America.

Underneath a strange thing was happening. The unions became the instruments of the new national consciousness. They were vaguely allied with the radical Kuomintang Party of the South. Sun Yat-sen had more and more leaned on them as his most trustworthy supporters. Of course the Russians, wherever they saw an opening, helped swell the rising protest. Naturally, too, the militarists of the old regime and the foreigners opposed them. The great outburst of anti-foreign feeling in 1925, that amazing uprising of a nation, significantly began with a strike in the Japanese mills of Tsingtao and the shots which sparked the flame were fired by British police on strike sympathizers in Shanghai. Chang Tso-lin, who has always been supported by the Japanese, closed the offices of the Shanghai General Labor Union that summer, and a few months later, when the foreign courts of the International Settlement handed over the chairman of the union, Liu Hwa, to agents of Sun Chuan-fong, who is more or less supported by the Anglo-American group in Shanghai, Liu Hwa disappeared and was believed to have been slain at night. The militarists naturally and unconsciously align themselves with foreign capital, and the old compradore type of Chinese merchant works with them. But the young alert business men, precisely those who have had their training under foreign conditions, are likely to join the workers, so intense is their nationalism. None of China's militarists is likely to be strong enough to oust the foreigners by force, even if he wanted to; but in the unions is a power which can destroy the economic roots of the foreigner's position.

[This is the fifth of Lewis Gannett's articles on China. The sixth, Bolshevism in China?, will appear in The Nation for August 25.]

Communism in Marriage

Human Relationships at the Oneida Community

By C. C. CHURCH

SHOULD any of our young intelligentsia, sated with satires on domesticity and marriage, seek an order of society in which these plagues were unknown, they would probably not turn to old-fashioned New England. Yet such a social order, the Oneida Community, was established and carried on for thirty years by a group of canny Vermonters claiming no less a virtue than perfection itself.

The men and women who undertook this experiment were members of a heretical religious sect who styled themselves Perfectionists. Their heresy consisted in a denial of the Calvinist doctrine that man is by nature depraved, and the assertion that if given opportunity by his environment he can be not only good but perfect. Had these aspiring dissenters not been, as Bernard Shaw says, "mightily shepherded" by one of their number, John Humphrey Noyes, they would probably have gone the markless way of small sects, amid a clamor of hair-splitting. Noyes gathered from Vermont and central New York a compact group of about three hundred Perfectionists. His purpose was a "raid or sortie from the Kingdom of Heaven into the unregenerate world," in order to show that world how perfection can be attained. It may have startled heaven a trifle when, early in its career, this celestial party established, near Oneida, New York, a modern factory for the manufacture of steel traps. Another practical step was the construction of a well-equipped "Mansion," sufficient for the comfortable housing of the entire group. In this substantial setting the society wove for itself a web of laws and institutions whose three cardinal elements were economic communism, complex marriage, and mutual criticism.

The economic basis of this society was planned as imposingly as were the phalanxes of the utopian Fourier. It embodied most of the features of classic speculative communism—cooperative housing, a simple but agreeable standard of living, a short work-day, attractive occupations, common participation in the output of pooled industry, and a large measure of personal liberty within the orderly scheme. Most conspicuous among its results were, perhaps, the freedom from worry that it conferred on the society's members and the abolition of that spirit of pecuniary emulation which in competitive modern societies drives rich and poor alike into neurasthenia and the sanitarium. To describe the success of these communists would probably bring forth charges against me as an agent of the Russian Government. But in a day—the day of Robert Owen—when scores of communisms were flitting to destruction, this one, the most radical of them all, flourished. There were doubtless several factors involved in this Oneida prosperity. Noyes believed that the socialization of the sexes through complex marriage, making impossible, as it did, family ambition and aggressiveness and stimulating group solidarity, was important among these factors. It is, incidentally, noteworthy that when the Oneida Community was forced to withdraw from complex marriage communism in goods soon ended.

Complex marriage was the term applied by the members of the Oneida Community to their sexual order. No suitable one-sentence definition of this order can be given. After denying the orthodox-church doctrine which so closely identifies sex with sin, the Perfectionists urged that sex may be an enhancing and ennobling factor in human experience. In this belief they had considerable support among the liberals of their own day. But they went farther than these, and among themselves neither required nor encouraged monogamous exclusiveness. For instead of being an assemblage of families, the Oneida Community of the Perfectionists was a unified fraternity, demanding the loyalty and cooperation that in the outer world properly go to the family.

Within this fraternity human relationships could rightly be more spontaneous than in an individualistic society. It is claimed that the phrase free love was here first used as applying to the attitudes between the sexes in the community. (When outsiders appropriated this term for irresponsible and promiscuous behavior, the Oneida Community felt constrained to repudiate it.) Sexual unions when not for parenthood were subject only to the requirements that they be mutually desired, without embarrassing circumstances, hygienic and temperate, and in accord with the group's ideals of considerate fellowship. Such relationships were not surreptitious and might, in meetings for mutual criticism, be tested for true conformity to requirements. In the Oneida atmosphere, sympathies between the sexes tended to be broad and social, rather than romantically fixed on individuals. Noyes had a maxim, "The normal man loves the normal woman," which meant that in a cosexual fraternity the attitudes of the sexes toward each other partake of a generic quality—the two groups feel married to each other.

This sexual order required or promoted certain other innovations. The Oneida Community was the first organized society intentionally to incorporate in its customs, and in its sex education, methods for controlling the results of sexual communion. It was the first society to distinguish sexual unions as propagative and social, and to show that, by applying eugenic regulations only to unions for parenthood, a community may endeavor to advance its racial welfare without greatly thwarting the instincts and desires of any of its members. Noyes and several associates worked out a pioneer system of eugenics called stirpiculture. A committee versed in this passed on the eligibility of persons wishing to become parents. A woman of doubtful qualifications might be allowed one child, but be refused a further contribution to the next generation. A comprehensive program for positive race improvement was finally devised and instituted. This stands alone in history as an elaborate eugenic experiment.

It is instructive to note some of the more important implications of complex marriage. Women were fully emancipated economically. None had to depend for well-being on one man's uncertain fortunes or love. The mother need not worry lest her children, in the event of her death, be beaten by a merciless stepmother, for in the community nursery she saw these children already receiving solicitous care and knew that this was not contingent on her existence. The young woman did not have to make an irrevocable choice between admirers. Accepting a dysgenic lover did not imply that a woman had chosen dysgenic fatherhood for her children. Sordid, divorce prostitution, and illegitimacy could not touch the life of no one. In the Perfectionist order the "moral" evils had no place.

The more spontaneous relationships within the Oneida fraternity did not lead to excesses, as the vulgar might imagine, but, on the contrary, promoted freedom from morbid sex interest, violent passion, and extreme sentimentality. Finally, an item worth unusual notice is the impetus given by complex marriage to merely cordial, social contacts between the sexes. In society at large cordialities amenities between men and women are inhibited by a thousand conventional considerations. Over the slightest friendliness grins the bogy of scandal. In the Oneida Community the sexes met casually and freely without fear or danger.

Jealousy blighted but little the cheerful, comradely life of the Oneida Mansion. Noyes was one of the first American thinkers to point out that jealousy is fundamentally an owner's—or aspiring owner's—attitude, rather than the attitude of a lover. Marriage is proprietary. It arose when the caveman, swayed by a strong taste for ownership, beat woman, hampered by recurrent pregnancies, into chattelship. When progress improved woman's lot, she, as proud wife or fiancee, caught the idea of making her owner a chattel. In this cultural situation, one of very long standing, jealousy and love have become intricately entangled. Because proprietary monogamy has shaped our laws, love in which jealousy is absent occurs generally in outlaw relationships. For better or worse the Oneida Community turned the tables and outlawed jealousy as unnatural and non-fraternal.

The spirit in this society was, of course, akin to the one which develops in groups at times of crisis—in religious revivals or revolutions, when social impulses become vigorous and conventional restrictions are under suspicion. But the Oneida Community was a persistent, self-conscious system, delicately constituted and thoroughly institutionalized. It no more fostered careless license than did the laws of Draco. Yet it did allow a large measure of personal spontaneity and sex mutuality.

The final expression of complex marriage was the community nursery, which demonstrated that a properly constituted small society can be a good parent to its children. The zeal of the Oneida Community for its children was intense and intelligent. To the community nursery came children voluntarily and eugenically born, in numbers adequate to replenish the passing generation. In it women possessed of unusual aptitudes for the rearing of the young were given responsible work, thereby releasing for other functions such of their sisters as would have found onerous or baffling the details of motherhood. From this communal counterpart to the domestic hearthside went forth young people of exceptionally sound character and good capacity.

Complex marriage and economic communism were by no means the only props to kindliness and unselfishness in the Perfectionist world. Humans may be endowed with a propensity to perfection, as the founders of the Oneida Community contended, but the environment that induces this propensity to flower must be an uncommonly favorable one. The third essential of the Perfectionist order, mutual criticism, was especially devised to stimulate good behavior through the open discussion, in small groups, of personal motives and conduct with reference to the society's standards. The peace and solidarity of ordinary fraternal and face-to-face groups are ever threatened by backbiting and enmity. In the Oneida Community impulses to such behavior were nipped in the bud by being talked out in the meetings for mutual criticism. There was a special technique for procedure in these meetings. Outsiders, it is true, thought the criticisms offset some of the attractive features of the society; but the communists themselves were convinced of the merits and, indeed, the agreeable experiences afforded by this mode of collective psychoanalysis.

For many years the communists believed their social pattern would be widely copied. Noyes was sanguine enough to recommend to the churches that their congregations organize into cooperating Perfectionist units. Younger disciples, such as Allan Estlake, observed that the Oneida community was a miniature of unflinching socialism, and forecast the evolution of society toward this model. In the meantime, the model won both friends and foes. The immediate neighbors of the community were, almost without exception, friendly—won doubtless by the honesty and civility of its members. Liberals often regarded it with a hopeful curiosity. But there were others, especially church leaders, who pictured this utopian laboratory in terms of a tomahawk hurled at the taproot of civilization.

The assailants were aided by the very fact of the community's worldly triumphs. The Perfectionists had started as a group of artisans and farmers, had prospered abundantly, and were becoming a staff of production engineers and salesmen. To act thus as an efficient unit in the world of industry and business was the price of economic survival—witness the tragedies of those many less radical communisms that withdrew into agrarian seclusion. But the bright Oneida career meant much mingling with outer society and consequent temptations to worldliness. Then, after forty years of service, old leaders began to pass. At this critical moment, the New York State Legislature pronounced the sortie from heaven illegal. So the unregenerate world won, and without the aid of Klan, tarpot, or bayonet.

It was in August, 1879, that the Oneida Community was forced to abandon complex marriage. An attempt to sustain the society in its other aspects soon failed. The dissolution was taken more resignedly than might be expected. Many of the younger communists had become convinced that the community was epochs ahead of its time, and must eventually be overwhelmed by respectability. In 1881 the members of the dissolved community formed the Oneida Community Limited, a business corporation since widely known for its silverware. This enterprise has even eclipsed the prosperity of the Perfectionists' venture. Notably, it has shown that if parents can prove the merits of socialism, their children can as effectively prove the merits of capitalism. The communists' "Mansion" (now a social club), an active benevolent association, and respectful attitudes toward the old community are sustained by the present-day Oneida group, and constitute the tangible survivals of America's most brilliant social experiment.

America's Crop of Hate

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

London, July 24

LET no one be deceived by the reported demonstrations against American tourists in Paris. They are sporadic and local, and not yet serious—probably provoked in many cases by over-stimulated and bad-mannered Americans. But no observer can truthfully report that the situation, either in England or France, is satisfactory for those Americans who ardently desire that their country shall not only live in amity with the leading European nations but shall have their good-will and regard as well.

Here in England there is an increased dislike of us—particularly among the privileged Tory classes, but also among many plain people who come in contact with the rowdy American tourists who appear whenever one of the great liners discharges its cargo at Southampton or Plymouth. That this feeling against America is growing is admitted by people who are working earnestly for the maintenance of friendly relations between the two countries. They hope that it is a passing phase. They speak of it being part of a summer "stunt" of some of the sensational newspapers. Americans who live here say that there is a recrudescence of this debt propaganda every summer when the American tourist season is at its height. It is idle, of course, to say that the whole thing is due to the debt settlement, but on the other hand, it cannot be denied that the recent English settlement with France, and Mr. Mellon's most unfortunate letter on the subject, with its unsupportable statements, has fanned the flames, leading not only to Churchill's and Snowden's speeches in Parliament but to the effective Foreign Office answer published yesterday morning. That the British Government should feel it necessary thus to reply to a statement by an American official, not officially addressed to it, is in itself an indication of the gravity of the issue.

The debt settlement bulks large. Ill-mannered tourists, rich Americans who buy up precious old English pictures and show places, and even take down houses to move them bodily to America; the old critical attitude of the two nations toward each other—these all contribute to the ill-will; but the simple truth is that America is reaping the whirlwind which she sowed when she entered the war, and not only in England but all through Europe. A shrewd observer remarked the other day that the best friends America had in Europe today were the Germans, which, he added, "is not saying much." It was of course idle to expect that all those noble sentiments uttered during the war about eternal chains of friendship binding us to our Allies, and the imperishable memory of the blood of our youth poured out on the same battlefields, should last. They were often founded on absolute misconceptions and on war lies. In an emotional state bordering on insanity we endowed our Allies with nobilities which they did not possess. The coming of peace made inevitable a let-down. We all got back to earth, and discovered that we were human and frail and still had our own faults instead of being so many archangels going to the rescue of liberty. The bad peace, the frightful economic sufferings, the new jealousies, and the crushing weight of the debt have all added to the disillusionment. Each nation declares that it won the war; but nothing infuriates all the others so much as to have the United States, through its leading men, insist that we did so. Every time a Senator or a Congressman or a Cabinet official or a general says that, he rubs salt in the wounds.

No military alliance for war purposes ever breeds a lasting friendship. The Crimean War was heralded as meaning union of France and England, in brotherly good-will for ever, but as soon as it was over England and France began to arm against each other just as they had in all the previous centuries. The French alliance with us in the Revolution did not prevent our coming to blows with them in a little war before the end of the century. That fact the orators forgot to mention in 1917-1918. The more the Great War recedes into the past the more will all our sins in it return to plague us, and by us I mean every participant, on whichever side. The more the American people study the war, the more they will find it was not what they thought it was, either in purpose or execution. The more the squabble over debts continues, the darker will be the glasses through which Americans will view their former Allies, and the more the European nations will call Uncle Sam Uncle Shylock.

All this is bad enough for the future peace of the world, but it becomes worse if we realize that our debt policy plus our tariff policy and our position as money-lenders to the world are gradually forming a European alliance against America. The European nations are frightened by our tremendous financial power; they cannot borrow money elsewhere, but they are trying to find means to defend themselves against our pressure to make them pay their debts, and our refusal, by means of our high tariff, to let them pay with goods. Take a country like Belgium. It is placing itself in the hands of the American money-lenders because it must, not because it wants to. And Wall Street finds itself compelled to lend money to Belgium or refuse aid to a stricken nation which it alone can save from bankruptcy. I am told that M. Caillaux, when he came on his flying visit to London, said that France and England were both controlled by great groups of financiers, the only distinction being that the industrialists ruled one country and the big financiers the other. But above and behind the industrial-financial groups in both countries stands the American money-power which, by force of circumstances, is beginning to dominate the world—within a year it may be writing that Dawes Plan for France which Mr. Snowden, the ex-Chancellor of the Exchequer, has just declared inevitable. I acquit the American money-power of deliberately planning to achieve a dominating position in Europe. It too is, I believe, merely reaping its share of the whirlwind. Unfortunately I cannot credit its members with enough brains to see that this was just another of the inevitable results of America's entrance into the war. It would be amazing, perhaps, if we should live to see a European Customs Union against America, but it is not impossible.

Well, what can America do under the circumstances? Indubitably, The Nation's policy of urging the cancelation of the debts that we shall never be able to collect and accepting funding arrangements based on capacity to pay is the correct one. I am not, of course, optimistic enough to believe that we should receive many, if any, thanks from those whom we released from indebtedness. We have so bungled the whole matter, especially in our manner of making the settlements, that almost irreparable harm has been done, but there is time yet for a brave deed, especially if that means the removal of a festering sore.

Why not, I hear someone say, enter the League? It is not necessary to rehearse here all the arguments against that move, but it is worth while recording one's belief again that the entry of America into the League of Nations would not mean a revival of the comradeships of the war, or anything approaching them. From the very beginning, we should have to decide whether we would be pro-British or pro-French in the League, for the rivalry between those two Powers is the story of the League. We should then have to decide further whether we would be pro-Pole or pro-German or pro-Italian or pro-Spanish or pro-Rumanian and Slovakian. Europe is a continent seething with hatreds and jealousy. It is impossible to be here and believe that the situation is not just as bad as it was two and a half years ago. Many think it worse, if only because of the rise of Mussolini. Why, in Heaven's name, should any American wish to tie us up intimately to such a situation? The monstrous conceit which makes some people think that we could, by joining the League, compose these differences by our influence and example is only equaled by the gullibility of those who still think that the war accomplished something for the safeguarding of democracy and liberty and the ending of war.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter cannot resist a book which promises to tell the "inside story" or the "secret history" of anything. Quite recently he came upon a volume, "The Inside Secrets of Photoplay Writing," which has provided him with heart-warming refreshment. The book "was not written by a tyro, whose knowledge of photodramaturgy has been gained from the outside." It was done by "a successful moving-picture author" with the purpose of enabling "the embryonic photodramatist to find the road that leads to success." The author boasts of a schooling that ended with the eighth grade, and adds:

> Personally, I use an Underwood portable, as I am out of town at least half the year. I have also found the Corona worth while. In fact, at the time my photoplay "Empty Arms" was released, it was nationally broadcast that I had written it on a Corona. A bright advertising man conceived the idea of placing a life-size cut-out of me in that firm's popular window on Forty-second Street, and the chances are that it and the exploitation matter accompanying it were viewed by over two hundred thousand persons during the month it was on display.

* * * * *

UNQUESTIONABLY we are face to face with an immortal. What are the "inside secrets" which he reveals? The Drifter will cite some examples.

> The average fan—and I have studied him carefully at close range—craves action ... in his own unmatchable expression, pep. He doesn't give a hoot in Hades for poetry or symbolism—on the screen, though in the privacy of his own domicile he may glory in the possession of exquisitely bound volumes of Keats, Shelley, or Chaucer. He has ordered corned-beef and cabbage and he doesn't want quail and mushrooms. If he does, he knows where he can find them. . . .
>
> Don't attempt to "uplift" the poor, downtrodden screen to a higher plane of culture and refinement. You are not in the game, I take it, for your health. If you are seeking gold like the rest of us, you won't get it by digging in the wrong hill.

Sound advice for such as are heavy with "motographic brain-children"! But the real secret of success is this:

For the sake of attractiveness I suggest that you have your story bound instead of folding it twice as one does with material intended for magazine publication. Personally, I have each script bound in vellum of Italian red, with the title and my name lettered in gold on the cover. This enhances the attractiveness of my manuscripts and costs me but a dollar and twenty-five cents.

At last it is clear to the Drifter why he has failed so miserably in occasional photodramaturgic efforts of his own. Italian red vellum binding and name in gold—that is clearly the open sesame. If this be insufficient heartening, heed the final counsel of wisdom:

God made brains and typewriters to be used. Use them properly—and the winning of success will cease being a vague, nebulous hope and become a vibrant, gold-attended reality.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

The Ayes Have It

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: How often have we heard our Socialist friends triumphantly exclaim: "Haven't we got the post office?' Judging from the experience of the New Masses, the answer appears to be in the affirmative.

Canton, Pennsylvania, July 20 JOHN BASIL BARNHILL

A Hard Dilemma

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Let me pose to you a problem in civics [illegible]. It rose out of a diligent reading of your admirably lively articles on campaign contributions.

I am a citizen, let us say, of the State of Coma. I believe fervently in a high tariff. I am a conscientious and determined Wet. I am vigorously opposed to the League of Nations. By a vast expenditure of money a fellow-citizen of mine gets nominated for the United States Senate on a platform which precisely fits my views. Without the expenditure of any money at all another fellow-citizen of mine gets nominated for United States Senator on a platform in favor of a low tariff, in favor of the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Law, and in favor of the League of Nations. What am I to do?

Shall I vote for the rich wretch who will vote my way in the Senate or shall I vote for the impecunious hero who, from my standpoint, when he gets into the Senate, will do his best to ruin the country?

I promise not to vote till I hear from you.

Washington, D. C., July 22 WILLIAM HARD

Arizona's River

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I notice in your issue of July 14 an article, For Sale—48,000,000 Horses, referring to hydroelectrical development of some of our streams. You state that Senate Bill 3331, if carried by the Senate, will appropriate $125,000,000 for the dam, an all-American canal, and a power house which would yield 3.6 billion kilowatt hours at only 3 mills per kilowatt, paying for the whole project in twenty-five years. This is Boulder Canyon.

From Glen Canyon dam site to Bridge Canyon there are seventeen dam sites in Arizona capable of producing some 6,000,000 horse-power. Boulder Canyon dam, being advocated by certain vested interests, is one of the lowest dam sites on the river, being five hundred feet lower than the Salt River Valley. A dam at that site will be of no value to the great commonwealth of Arizona.

We view with deep concern the development of low-head, large-flow power projects on the lower regions of the Colorado River. If allowed to proceed such plans will establish rights to stream flow which will greatly hamper the fullest economical development of the Colorado River.

The reason I am calling your attention to this is that The Nation has always been a liberal and far-seeing paper. For three years the State of Arizona has been fighting the most desperate battle in her history to protect and preserve to our people our heritage in the Colorado River.

Phoenix, Arizona, July 14 GEORGE W. P. HUNT, Governor of Arizona

Oregon—Staunchly Conservative

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: You allow your joy at Coolidge's discomfiture to become a little over-buoyant, in the matter of the recent Oregon election. It is true that Stanfield, a staunch administration man, lost; but another one won. Steiwer was supported throughout, and long prior to, his campaign by the influential Portland Oregonian, as true a friend of Republican conservatism as exists in the country. I believe it was rather the fear that Stanfield had antagonized the bone-drys of the State by his recent escapade, and could not be elected in November, that induced the Oregonian to lend its aggressive support to another man. In short, the election could not in any sense be termed a reversal for Republicanism. There was not even a candidate running whose victory could have suggested an even mild rebuke to the Administration—save possibly that of the inevitable "wet."

Emblazon the names of seven States on your banner of triumph, but the name of Oregon must be buried firmly in mud—the pride of the Associated Press.

Portland, Oregon, July 16 D. P. A.

Petlura

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The assassination of Petlura by Sholem Schwartzbard in a Paris cafe not long ago adds another to the number of pogromists of the war and after-war period who have been brought to justice since the armistice in 1918. Talaat, Enver, Djemal, who jointly ordered the wholesale Armenian massacres and deportations, have all disappeared from the scene, Talaat by the hand of an avenging Armenian, Djemal and Enver in the confused civil wars and insurrections of Turkestan and Afghanistan.

Among the perpetrators of Jews whose crimes have become infamous since the Russian Revolution Petlura's and Denikin's top the list. At least a quarter of a million Jews lost their lives in the Ukraine during the years 1918-19-20-21. Exactly how many victims must be attributed to these two leaders would be difficult to determine; but the number is large. Officially, Petlura nearly always preserved a Jewish-friendly attitude; he had several Jews in his cabinet and at one time even a Commissariat for Jewish Affairs. Denikin, on the other hand, and more particularly his officers were openly anti-Semitic. In practice, the results for the Jews of Petlura's policies were not of Jews fell victim to the fury of Petlura's fanatic, ignorant, half-starved, and ragamuffin peasant-bands. At Proskurov and Jitomir alone more than a thousand are said to have been massacred. Yet Petlura's downfall can by no means be attributed to the excesses perpetrated by his armies. He was most popular when the pogroms were at their height. And only his alliance with the Poles in 1920 ended his popularity. Till that time, even though he had flirted on occasion with all factions, and had even made an alliance with the Germans during their occupation of the Ukraine, he had figured as a sort of hero of romance, a new Stenka Razin. His identification with the traditional enemy, the Pole, brought about his final ruin.

It would have been far preferable for justice to be accomplished by some regular and legal agency of government, but, unfortunately, that does not seem to exist for such cases as this. The Entente, as part of the preliminary Versailles Treaty, demanded punishment of the "war criminals," prominent among whom were Talaat, Enver, and Djemal. For several years these three paraded about Europe and Asia, intriguing and plotting, unscathed, until private vendetta and civil war accomplished a job the Entente quite plainly did not want to tackle. Petlura did not figure on the famous Entente list; the Entente in those days was raising pogromists of its own—Denikin enjoyed the open support, in all his infamies, of the British Government, and implied American support through the presence of the American Red Cross. Denikin will probably find that premiums on his life policies at Lloyd's have doubled and trebled since Petlura's accident.

New York, July 15 HENRY G. ALSBERG

Profits—Service?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Owen D. Young in a recent speech suggested that the government, instead of investigating corporations showing large profits, should direct its attention to those which are unprofitable.

He said: "I know of no way concerns can make profits unless they render service, and, conversely, if they do not make profits they cannot render service. Why is it that a concern which does not render service enough to make profits is permitted to use our labor, of which we have none too great a supply, or our capital, which is always difficult to get, for an unprofitable use to society?"

Denver, Colorado, July 24 CLARA AINSWORTH

Where American Marines Hold Power

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The Haitian situation has become unbearable and public indignation is running high. No one can understand why "President" Borno was allowed to draw from the public treasury thousands of dollars for a trip of pleasure or secret diplomacy. When he went aboard the Panama on June 6 a crowd of about 7,000 men, women, and children shouted at him, insulting and stoning him.

The old policy of brute force continues. M. Alcius Charmant, a lawyer of Jacmel, 71 years old, was illegally arrested and sent to prison, under the false charge that he was fostering an uprising along the Haitian and Dominican border. The truth is that he is a personal enemy of M. Borno and an energetic president of the Regional Committee of the Union Patriotique of Jacmel.

M. Charmant is the owner of a hundred and fifty carreaux of land along the south side of the border, near the Anses-à-Pitre. The Government claimed this land and took possession of it. But M. Charmant brought action against the state and a decree of the Supreme Court ordered the Government to give back to M. Charmant his land. But M. Borno and General [illegible] After two years of useless requests, M. Charmant decided to sell these hundred and fifty carreaux to an American company. He went to Santo Domingo a month ago to see the American lawyers. From Santo Domingo he proceeded with the buying party to his land. In crossing the border, two days later, he was arrested and sent to Jacmel, under the false charge of fostering a revolt.

Yesterday Charles Moravia, former Haitian Minister to Washington, a poet and a writer, editor of the Temps, was arrested and sent to jail, for an article criticizing the policy of M. Borno and President Coolidge toward Haiti. Joseph Jolibois, editor of the Courrier Haitien, has refused to surrender to the police and taken to the woods.

I do not think that the people will bear ten years more of despotism and I fear terrible events.

Port au Prince, June 18 PERCEVAL THOBY

The Old Concord Tradition

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your paragraph on Concord, Massachusetts, was all to the good. Nothing written here must detract in the least from the praise and honor due Mr. Dexter. It is well to know, however, that the Unitarian minister, the Rev. Mr. Auer, was openly in favor of the meetings of the Fellowship of Youth for Peace being held in Concord and in his church, but his parish committee refused permission. Notwithstanding this rebuff Mr. Auer presided in the Episcopal Parish House at one of the meetings of the fellowship, greeted the conference, and introduced his friend Professor Skinner of Tufts College. Mr. Auer and Mrs. Auer were egged, even stoned, for that.

Believers in a fair hearing for all shades of opinion, lovers of Emerson and Thoreau, of peace and concord, rejoice at the leadership of these two ministers. If all ministers of good-will, whether in or outside the churches, had always taken similar stand for fair play and open-mindedness, the present deplorable condition of the churches would be different and we should all be facing a very different world from that which now confronts us.

Concord, Mass., July 30 CHARLES L. DE NORMANDIE

Contributors to This Issue

HENDRIK W. VAN LOON'S latest book is "Tolerance."

HENRY W. NEVINSON is an English journalist, the author of "Changes and Chances" and "More Changes, More Chances."

LEWIS S. GANNETT, associate editor of The Nation, recently returned from six months in the Orient, spent chiefly in China.

C. C. CHURCH is a sociologist who has made an extended investigation of the Oneida Community.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, editor of The Nation, is at present in Europe.

WILLIAM MACDONALD, formerly associate editor of The Nation, is the author of "Three Centuries of American Democracy" and other historical studies.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH is dramatic critic of The Nation and the author of "Edgar Allan Poe: A Study in Genius."

HARRY ELMER BARNES is the author of "History and Social Intelligence."

ERNEST SUTHERLAND BATES was formerly professor of philosophy at the University of Oregon.

LORINE PRUETTE is the author of "Women and Leisure."

MELVILLE J. HERSKOVITS is an anthropologist engaged in an extended study of variability under racial crossing.

NAZMIE H. ANABTAWY is an instructor at Yale.

Books

Poems

By LAURA RIDING GOTTSCHALK

For One Who Will Believe

It is!
And all is all you see.
You must never turn the leaf over,
You must never hew the tree.
Faith is the modesty of self-approval.

It was.
The preference of certainty is past.
But the assured season will take confidence,
Return a rose as lovely as the last,
Find in the new retinue
A faint pride reminiscent of you.

For All Our Sakes

For all our sakes we seem
Each of another place.
For all our sakes we have
Each his unnatural face
And behind eyes pretend
Never to understand
Behind eyes.

And seeming each another
And of another place, to spare
All from all, makes each more same,
Makes each one no one, nowhere,
Makes separate blindness
To see estrangement, for kindness
For all our sakes.

A Dose of Democracy

A History of the United States Since the Civil War. By Ellis Paxson Oberholtzer. Volume III: 1872-1878. The Macmillan Company. $4.

ANYONE who can read Mr. Oberholtzer's third volume and still retain a love for American democracy as a national ideal must be either intellectually and morally astigmatic or else possessed of the faith that can move mountains. The five or six years with which the volume deals, ancient history to the present generation but vividly remembered by many men now living, were a period of political and social degradation unrelieved save by one or two pale efforts at reform and here or there a strong voice calling in the wilderness. Worse, perhaps, was the natural consequence of what had gone before. The muddy streams of political partisanship and unscrupulous private and public corruption, and worst of all the moral attitudes in which the Civil War and Republican reconstruction had given rise mingled, before the war itself was well behind, in a grand witches' brew of national delusion. The people included. They, it was fondly thought, were governing themselves. It was the veriest nonsense, but there was little in the attitude of the electorate to suggest that the people were fit to govern even if they had had a chance. For a time, at least, the kind of government that Lincoln had hoped might prevail from the earth broke down in the United States, and in its place were enthroned the gang and the ring, the boss and the henchman, the gambling sharps of Wall Street and the petty pilferers of navy yards, distilleries, and Indian agencies, with a President who never should have been chosen riding serenely at the head of the grand parade.

Mr. Oberholtzer, equipping his pages with citations of chapter and verse for every crucial statement, and marshaling his facts without pity for place or name, begins the dismal story with the Liberal Republican movement, and follows it remorselessly to the enthronement of Hayes and the "rout of the carpet-baggers." The Liberal Republican revolt, pathetic enough as an attempt to stay a tide that could not be turned, appears almost farcical when one recalls the grotesque and impossible Greeley, and makes one wonder, not that it failed but rather that the fetish of "reform within the party" should ever afterward have had a devotee. The regular Republicans, as it turned out, judged the movement correctly and went on with their scandals. Garfield's adjustable ethics enabled him to defend the salary grab because his colleagues in Congress wanted it, and then to decline his own increased emolument as a step toward grasping the main chance. The panic of 1873, with its startling revelations of financial and political crookedness, did nothing to purge the party of its evil mind; there was no repentance at the White House or on Capitol Hill when the whiskey ring and the Credit Mobilier were exposed; the looting of the Indian service went on unchecked; naval administration was a stench, and the shallow and pretentious Blaine and the sparingly gifted John Sherman succeeded to the statesmanship once honored by Seward, Chase, and Fish.

The election of Hayes was, in a measure, a return to political decency, although it is hard to see that, under the circumstances, either Hayes or Tilden was legally entitled to the office of President. What really happened was that the Republicans had their way with the presidency, and thereby averted what many undoubtedly regarded as a danger that an Administration friendly to an unreconstructed South would be installed at Washington, but the most that can be said for them is that they behaved in the matter with a greater outward show of decency than they had exhibited in the days of Andrew Johnson. The overthrow of the carpet-bag governments in the South, commendable as it was in Hayes, worked no [illegible] in the Republican Party, and years were yet to pass before the waving of the bloody shirt ceased to do honorable duty as political argument. The fact, of course, was that the Republican Party was unintelligent as well as corrupt, and that the Democrats, burdened with the hangovers of war and reconstruction, had little that was better to offer. The Granger movement among the farmers, for example, pointed to deep-seated evils in the economic system as well as incapacity in federal legislation, but the effect of the movement in remedying the one or bettering the other was slight, while the Indian wars in the West, inevitable as they were in view of all the conditions, revealed a perverse failure on the part of government to deal with one of the fundamental problems of civilization.

Mr. Oberholtzer finds the best of the few bright spots in a period whose political [illegible] are dismally forlorn. It was a [illegible] in its crudity and boastfulness, its worship of dollars and power, its satisfaction and delight in extravagance, dissipation, vice, grandiose architecture, and gaudy hotels and "palace" railway coaches. The slow turning of the tide, however, was to be perceived in the establishment of the elective system at Harvard, the founding of Johns Hopkins and Cornell, and the gradual recognition of worthier work in art. The Centennial Exposition at Philadelphia, tawdry beyond compare in its "unsightly warehouses with decorations from the flag makers and the planing mills," stirred the artistic feeling of the nation through its exhibition of foreign products, manufactures, and art objects. The daily newspaper press, too, of which Mr. Oberholtzer gives a particularly full account, was developing into a powerful though uncertain force, and the great editorial work of Godkin was making itself felt wherever there was an open mind.

Mr. Oberholtzer on the whole is sparing of comment, save when on occasion he allows himself a detached, and usually an unawed, personal characterization. To readers who have hitherto relied upon Rhodes for their knowledge of the period, the present volume will open many new lines of information and suggestion. The only doubt that arises is whether, with the third of his five volumes extending only to 1878, Mr. Oberholtzer will succeed in producing the same kind of history of the United States since the Civil War that he apparently had in mind when he began.

WILLIAM MACDONALD

A Master of the Accessible

Conversations with Anatole France. By Nicolas Segur. Authorized Translation with an Introduction by J. Lewis May. Dodd, Mead and Company. $2.50.

Anatole France at Home. By Marcel Le Goff. Translated by Laura Riding Gottschalk. The Adelphi Company. $2.50.

OF these two books the first is written extremely well and the second rather badly, but both contain a number of anecdotes sufficiently characteristic of their subject. Yet neither can be said to add very much to our knowledge of the man, and the reason is less any fault in the reporters than the fact that Anatole France himself defined his mind with almost perfect completeness. His ideas were neither very complicated in themselves nor given to any modifying growth; his garden was early ripe and he himself had paced over every foot of it again and again, leaving no corners unexplored. Unlike those whose multiplicity compels them to leave many things half said and whose conversation is full of unexpected things, he had rounded out every one of the relatively few topics which concerned him and every circle was complete. He talked, if one may judge from published reports, with the same ease with which his writings flow, and he was inexhaustibly fertile in developing his chosen topics; but he never strayed far from familiar themes and his familiar conclusions. No one was ever more delightful, no one ever less varied. To read him is to be sure of coming upon many true things incomparably said, but it is never, as with some writers it is, to embark upon a spiritual adventure. His world was finished and settled.

In this fact is to be found the source of both France's greatness and his limitations. No writer whose mind is in a constant state of becoming can produce works as perfect as his, but on the other hand no works so perfect can be other than, in a sense, closed and done, no sooner written than already a part of that past which the present values as a treasure but from which it gets but little impetus toward the work which it must do. It is in this sense as truly as in any other that France is a classic. If he gave to the best of his works a perfection of form it was in part because he rigidly excluded from them all those aspects of contemporary thought which are rebellious to such form. While others struggled to take some account of the complexities of modern science or the voluminous data of contemporary economics and were led, perforce, into a style as lacking in grace and simplicity as the materials with which they were compelled to deal, he was content to concern himself with nothing which could not be shaped into swelling sentences. His art he learned from the eighteenth-century masters, and he seldom disturbed their pattern by the introduction of anything which they had not used. Since the time of Pascal, since the time of Voltaire even, science has revealed many things which may at least be interpreted to support and amplify the nihilistic philosophy which he held, but his arguments and his illustrations are drawn almost invariably from sources which have been the common property of skeptics for centuries. Biology and psychology in their modern developments are a closed book to him. Unlike the "moderns," he turns from sources which have turned against him, he says farewell the spirit of the age by leaving even in imagination the library for the laboratory. The "Satyricon" and the "Thaïs" of his youth contain the full arsenal of his weapons, and the same one which he wields is uncontaminated by any of the grotesqueries which biology and psychoanalysis have introduced. Voltaire, who would be as bewildered by Jean Cocteau as by Einstein, could read France without being aware that a century and a half had passed, for the world in which France lived is a world still essentially as simple as the world of his eighteenth-century masters—a world dominated by "reason" rather than by accumulated statistics or the results of innumerable experiments.

And if one turns from his sources to his implications it is equally true that he was, in a similar way, detached from his age. Not only his skepticism but his humanitarianism and his democracy were of an old-fashioned type. If he believed in "the people" his belief was, like that of Voltaire, based upon abstract considerations instead of being, like the belief of Bernard Shaw, somehow related to the voluminous compilations of Beatrice Webb—not one page of which France could ever have brought himself to read. And if he thought that he sympathized with the communists it was not because he, with his classic disdain of all enthusiasm, had the slightest comprehension of the ultra-modern religion of Moscow. The epicurean calm of his sumptuous study was remote by the distance of centuries from all the hurly-burly of economic doctrine which he left as serenely alone as he left the intricacies of science. All that he felt the need to know had been written down in an age less concerned with detail than the one in which he found himself, and he deliberately preferred the broad outlines of a simpler generation. Hence it is that while he has all the beauty of a classic he nevertheless seems to many of his more eager contemporaries in France as irritatingly remote from their age as Lucretius himself.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

The Crown Prince as Archivist

Ich Suche die Wahrheit. Von Wilhelm, Kronprinz. Stuttgart: Cotta'sche Buchhandlung Nachfolger. 8 marks.

DURING the World War we became so habituated to reproductions of the German Crown Prince as a rabbit-faced imbecile with an IQ of 20 that few Americans were capable of imagining him as possessed of the slightest cerebration or literacy. He was deemed competent only for guinea-pig amorosities with opera stars safely behind the lines, after having ruthlessly ordered the flower of the German youth to engage in mass-suicide before the fortresses of Verdun. It was with great astonishment, then, that we were forced to discover in his memoirs perhaps the most attractive and plausible apology which emerged from the German official class after the war.

The present work is an effort to clear Germany of the indictment in Article 231 of the Treaty of Versailles, alleging her to have been solely responsible for the World War and the damages caused by it. Incidentally, it is directed against the official French apology contained in Bourgeois and Pagès's work on war guilt.

Once more it may be safely maintained that the Crown Prince has produced the best book of its kind executed by any member of the royal family or the official force of pre-war Germany. It is fully as objective and dispassionate as the works of Grey or Poincaré and infinitely more calm than those of Asquith or Viviani. No other official apology can in any way compare with it for evidence of scholarship and a mastery of a vast mass of relevant documents. While we cannot know how much of the work is that of the Crown Prince himself and how much was done for him by the willing hands of trained historical experts, the book is truly astonishing with respect to its obvious mastery of the literature of war guilt. Not even the books of such technical scholars as Montgelas or Renouvin are able to demonstrate greater acquaintance with the latest collections of documents and the most indispensable monographs.

The facts available in these indisputable documents make it easy for Wilhelm to pulverize the conventional indictment of Germany contained in Bourgeois and Pagès. He proves the preposterous nature of the allegation that Germany willed war from the beginning of the 1914 crisis and pushed an unwilling Austria into the conflict. He also makes out a fairly convincing case for his thesis that Germany, far from desiring a European war in 1914, actually feared its outbreak. Thus far we can follow the Crown Prince with but few reservations. When, however, he attempts to prove that from 1870 to 1914 Germany was invariably desirous of peace and struggled vainly against envious neighbors, his arguments become less plausible and his documentation less irrefragable. Yet his contention is closer to the facts than the conviction, still all but universally entertained in Entente countries, that Germany was the unique wolf in a fold otherwise inhabited by the most meek and charming ewe lambs.

HARRY ELMER BARNES

Oil Under the Water

Oil Imperialism. By Louis Fischer. International Publishers. $2.

THIS is the story of how the big, bad oil companies, in great big, thundering voices, said "Boo!" to the poor little Soviet Republic, expecting it to wither at the blast, and how the poor little Soviet Republic answered in its thin, piping way: "We will, sirs, if you'll pay us enough." And of how in the end the bold, bad oil companies paid plenty. It is a true story, too, and a continuing story, current instalments of which can be read almost any week in the Petroleum Times and the Oil News.

Contemporary history need not have all the drama removed in the writing. I have on my shelves a great, dull book on the Genoa Conference of 1922 by a Mr. Saxon Mills, with a glowing introduction by the Right Honorable David Lloyd George. In all its four hundred pages it does not mention oil, and accordingly it tells less of the meaning of Genoa than Louis Fischer compresses into thirty colorful pages. For Genoa, like St. Remo, was an oil conference, though the officialized correspondents who reported it did not seem to know what oil smelled like; and one can almost say that most recent history has revolved about petroleum. Mr. Fischer's title is a bit broad for his subject, which is Russian and Persian oil, but, after all, they probably form more than half of the known oil resources of the world. And his story of Russian oil includes the explanation of that strange, wild expedition of British troops across the Caspian Sea in 1918; of the failure of Genoa; of the American-Japanese rivalry in the North Pacific, in which the United States, refusing officially to recognize the existence of Soviet Russia, nevertheless defended Soviet Russia's interest in the hope of keeping Japan from Saghalin's oil; of that ludicrous drama in which the Anglo-Persian Oil Co. (51 per cent owned by His Britannic Majesty's Government), the Standard Oil (adored by the Washington State Department), and Harry Sinclair played cards for Persia's favors—and all lost: and of many other minor dramas. And the end of the story is that the oil companies, hoping (except Sinclair) some day to revaluate the prerevolutionary titles that they had bought up cheap, all overreached themselves, and got exactly nowhere.

The great wise supermen of this super-business do not always know as much as they think they do. At Genoa the Soviet Government was willing and eager to persuade one of the oil giants to work its wells for it—but they, hoping to get everything for nothing, balked. They formed a beautiful International Committee of Oil Companies in Russia to defend together the sacred rights of private property, as understood in Russia before the revolution, but one by one they yielded to temptation and dickered with the naughty Soviets for their several individual advantages. As usual, the high priests of private property set their own private profits above other people's private property. Meanwhile Russia, forced by their greed, set out to develop her oil wells herself, and discovered, to her and their surprise, that she could do very well indeed at it. Last year she bought $3,000,000 worth of oil machinery from the United States, spent $46,000,000 on restoration, and paid for it out of the profits on her socialist experiment. Already she sells a quarter as much oil in England as the American companies do; she has her own selling agencies in Germany, Lithuania, Latvia, and Esthonia; and recently the Vacuum Oil, a subsidiary of the lordly Standard Oil, condescended to buy 70,000 tons of her oil—at her price. The attempt to boycott Russian oil, like the attempt to boycott Russia, has failed.

If you wish to understand the oleaginous subchannels of modern diplomacy—British, French, Russian, Japanese, and American—read "Oil Imperialism." Mr. Fischer has traced the course of diplomatic streams that were never intended to be mapped for the public. If too often, pleased by his discoveries, he notes with superabundant detail events which inevitably lose their significance in the time-consuming process of book publication—well, that is a lesser fault than the blindness of the official contemporary historians.

LEWIS S. GANNETT

Toward a Synthesis

Psychology and Education. By Robert Morris Ogden. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.75.

THIS is a markedly important book from several points of view. It offers the first clearly intelligible exposition in English of the new Gestalt psychology, it is pregnant with philosophical suggestion, and it fulfils the author's ambition to give "to the study of education a psychological background which commends itself as an orderly and systematic development of scientific principles derived from factual observations." The Gestalt psychology of Koffka, Koehler, and Ogden carries us a long step beyond the crude behaviorism of Watson and his followers. It is a study of human behavior as an active realization of patterns instead of as a passive accretion of chained reflexes. It finds that reflexes themselves are highly specialized partial responses which have been differentiated within an earlier total response. Furthermore, reflexes are not mechanical but dynamic and variable. "It is difficult," writes Professor Ogden, "to find a single instance of reflexive activity which is not in some measure self-regulatory." A fortiori, this is still more true of behavior as a whole. "The inherent features of behavior regulate and perfect their own pattern." Professor Ogden summons among other witnesses the wasp, the earth-worm, the amoeba, and, of course, Koehler's famous apes and chickens. Throughout his study he is guided by the idea of the self-realizing rhythmic pattern, form, or gestalt. With its assistance he is able to explain the perplexing phenomena of memory more adequately than was possible on the current association theory. In prerational stages, aesthetic feeling—the sense of rhythm, balance, proportion—is the internal criterion of successful or obstructed behavior. With the attainment of the power of abstraction new and artificial patterns are constructed, and behavior becomes largely a matter of the use of tools, of which words and numbers are the most important.

The educational implications of the new psychology are nothing short of revolutionary. If the child's evaluation of his own behavior is in terms of aesthetic feeling, then it is obvious that early education should be primarily aesthetic. What this would mean will be suggested by one of Professor Ogden's remarks: "Instead of struggling to teach oral and written composition by the arid means of grammar, syntax, and rhetoric, we might, if we but knew how, cultivate the rhythms of speech as they appear spontaneously in childhood." Apply this all along the line and elementary and secondary education would be remade, subjects that are now regarded as "frills" would become basic, and new methods would be introduced everywhere. And with an adequate elementary education, higher education would inevitably be transformed to meet it.

The philosophical implications of Professor Ogden's book are almost equally important. The Gestalt psychology reaches out to what one might call the Gestalt physics of Professor Whitehead, and both are not distantly related to the revived Aristotelianism of the recent neo-scholastic movement in philosophy. With a rational psychology and a rational physics a rational philosophy would naturally follow. Professor Ogden's book is a notable contribution toward the new philosophic synthesis which is every day being more clearly foreshadowed.

ERNEST SUTHERLAND BATES

What Not to Do with Criminals

The Repression of Crime. By Harry Elmer Barnes. George H. Doran Company. $2.50.

IN this volume Mr. Barnes draws upon his past experiences as historian to the Prison Inquiry Commission of New Jersey and to the Pennsylvania Commission to Investigate Penal Systems. He believes that the history of criminal procedure and penal practice constitutes one of the few phases of the study of the past which may be directly useful to the reformer, for the historian should be able, by indicating those practices which have signally failed in the past, to guard society against repeating its mistakes. He cites the present demand for increased severity in dealing with criminals as an indication of the lack of historical knowledge on the part of those making such demands.

The author, definitely committed to the psychiatric approach to problems of criminal behavior, strongly advocates the development of psychological examinations and the application of psychological technic to the retraining of the felon. However, he holds no brief for the prison; he traces its comparatively recent development from colonial times to the present and shows how its worst evils have grown out of tendencies of human nature which are as often pitiable as reprehensible. This is particularly effective in the case of the prison officials, who, as Mr. Barnes shows, are themselves victims of the system and prisoners in a very real sense, wielding over the other prisoners a power which it is very natural they should abuse. He points out that as we have given up the notion of man as a free moral agent and have come to accept human nature as the resultant of a vast number of influences, both hereditary and cultural, the old prison as an institution designed to furnish punishment to the criminal and the satisfaction of revenge to society has lost its place in modern criminal science. In its stead he anticipates the development of an institution for the examination, differentiation, treatment, segregation, or extermination of the socially sick or criminal class. The new system would insist upon the permanent segregation of those types whose reformation is obviously impossible; it would provide the most scientific treatment for those whose reformation appears possible, but would grant them permanent freedom only when parole had demonstrated the thoroughness of the cure; it would insist upon a vast improvement of detective systems, so that arrest and treatment would become much more swift and certain; and it would probably insist upon the desirability of a general inquisition and investigation of the whole population in order to discover those feeble-minded, psychoneurotic, or other types likely to be guilty of criminal conduct.

Historical chapters study the criminal codes and penal institutions of colonial times, the origin of the prison system in America, the place of the Pennsylvania Reform Society in American prison reform, leading phases of the evolution of modern penology, the evolution of American criminal jurisprudence as illustrated by the removal acts and penal legislation of Pennsylvania, and the development of prison industry. The folly of keeping prisoners at enforced idleness or of imposing tasks upon work the sole end of which is punitive, as in the infamous "crank labor," is pointed out. It is to be regretted that this chapter was not followed by a more specific consideration of the psychology of retraining and reformation through a genuine, rather than a spurious, occupational therapy.

The chapter on How Prisons Punish the Human Mind, while by no means exhaustive, offers an excellent introduction to the subject and might well be used as classic in penology. The chapter on Recent Literature presents in summary form the most authoritative findings in recent years, while in the chapter on Trial by Jury Mr. Barnes resigns his scientific detachment and presents his view with the gusto of The American Mercury. The conclusion is roundly stated:

> A body of individuals of average or less than average ability who could not tell the truth if they wanted to, who usually have little of the truth to tell, who are not allowed to tell even all of that, and who are frequently instructed to fabricate voluminously and unblushingly. Present this largely worthless, wholly worthless, or worse than worthless information to twelve men who are for the most part unconscious of what is being divulged to them and would be incapable of an intelligent interpretation of the information if they heard it.

The program advocated at the end of the book involves provision for a thorough and accurate collection of criminal statistics, without which no intelligent attack upon the crime problem can be made; eugenic provisions to insure that future generations shall be as far as possible well born; adequate education, including instruction in the ideals of American citizenship, vocational education sufficient to provide every able-bodied citizen with the means of earning a living, and the training of backward children; provision for personal hygiene, adequate housing, and recreation; curbing of the exhibition of crimes in motion pictures; the development of adequate measures of apprehension and conviction of criminals; and the development of an ideal of reformation in the place of punishment.

LORINE PRUETTE

The Canary Islanders

The Ancient Inhabitants of the Canary Islands. By Earnest A. Hooton. The Harvard African Studies, Volume VII. Peabody Museum of Harvard University. $15.

OUT in the Atlantic, off the coast of Africa and stretching across five degrees of longitude, lie the Canary Islands, which until the time of the early Spanish and Portuguese navigators constituted the end of the world. In these islands are several fairly distinct types of people. There are undecipherable writings on the rocks of some of the islands, there are several types of culture, there are linguistic differences. Where did these people come from? When, and in what succession? Were they Carthaginians, cruising for mercantile purposes? Or do the populations of these islands constitute a clue to the early history of Africa, the respective types representing the remnants of different migratory waves, the remnants of which in turn were forced by desperation off the mainland? The importance of the problems involved has attracted the attention of numerous scientists, and many hypotheses have been advanced. We have even been told that the islands represent the last remnants of the lost continent, Atlantis, and that here we have remains of the people who inhabited it—an assumption which, we are assured in the work under review, is untenable even from a geographical point of view.

Dr. Hooton's study is an exhaustive contribution to the prehistory of the islands achieved through analysis of a large collection of skulls located in the Municipal Museum of Santa Cruz de Tenerife, which he had the opportunity of examining and measuring on a field trip in 1915. Fortunately, Dr. Hooton is quite aware of the tentativeness of any conclusions arrived at and cautions us concerning the approximate nature of the culture-groups, morphological skull-types, and linguistic classes he differentiates. He finds that there were four invasions of the islands, the first occurring during the Neolithic Period with the appearance of a Mediterranean people with some Negroid admixture. They brought domesticated sheep and goats, and chipped stone and bone technic. Then came a second invasion, when pottery was common to North Africa and barley the only cultivated cereal. These people were brunette whites with Mongoloid features, and came from North Africa. About the same time the third group came, a tall, blond, long-headed people, warlike and athletic, with a caste system of warrior nobles and agricultural and pastoral retainers but with no new cultural features. These he terms "Nordic"; they came from the Atlas ranges of Algeria and Morocco. Finally, a fourth invasion was effected by a people of the Mediterranean type at the time of the Bronze Age in the Eastern Mediterranean. And Arabs and Berbers have completed the melange which is found today.

While Dr. Hooton has used mainly the cranial material which was at hand, he has not neglected the cultural and linguistic features which might shed some light toward the solution of his problem. His attempt to correlate physical with linguistic and cultural data is interesting, although I feel that the fortuitous way in which cultural and physical phenomena may be associated always makes this procedure dangerous. However, Dr. Hooton is well aware of the danger, and warns his readers repeatedly of it. His method, too, of tabulating the cultural traits and neatly referring to the percentages of the total number observed on each island gives a mechanical aspect to his conclusions and introduces a method more properly applicable to the measurement of exclusively physical traits.

The opening chapters are devoted to a résumé of what is known of the cultures of the islands and to a summing up of the traits in the table mentioned. From this table it appears that the sparsest culture (in terms of the traits recorded) is found in the islands lying farthest from the mainland, while those nearer have richer cultures. An attempt is made at a similar tabulation of the linguistic remnants of the early stocks which have survived, percentages being given of words affiliated with dialects and languages of the mainland. Here, I fear, the number of words is too small to make for any conclusive result, a point which is not denied by Dr. Hooton. He then goes into the material culture and the customs of each of the islands in some detail, and finally comes to a presentation of the cranial data which he analyzed, this comprising the main portion of the work.

The treatment of the crania measured is very thorough, and great pains have been taken so that every possible element should be included in the analysis. We first have a comprehensive description of the series in terms of the measurements taken, followed by a discussion of the inter-island differences. Then there is a summary of numerous observations—physical traits which are not measurable—and a similar comparison between islands. There follows a comparison between the Canary crania and recent European and North African series, with further statistical analyses at length and in detail, the resulting distinguishable types being called the "Guanche," "Nordic," and "Mediterranean." While these names are different from those given by other investigators, there is general agreement between Dr. Hooton's findings, if viewed broadly, and those made by others who have studied the material at length. An interesting section is devoted to a discussion of the author's results compared with those which were arrived at for the same material by his colleague, Dr. Dixon, whose arbitrary method of classification as presented in his recent work on the racial history of man raised a storm of objections from his fellow-anthropologists. It is significant that this is the first work to check Dr. Dixon, but in spite of the willingness of Dr. Hooton to allow every point that would show favorably for his colleague's method the results of the two investigators do not seem to coincide.

We have here, then, a fascinating dissection of material which is well worth going through as an example of careful method and scientific procedure. Dr. Hooton displays a proper caution in drawing his sweeping generalizations. He does not hesitate to draw them, but when he does so he calls them generalizations; and always back of them are masses of data. Finally, one cannot but comment on the joy with which one handles this huge volume, with its excellent typography, its large margins, and its numerous drawings and plates. One may merely remark that the material is worthy of its setting.

MELVILLE J. HERSKOVITS

Books in Brief

Fix Bayonets! By John W. Thomason, Jr. Illustrated by the Author. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.50.

Those who like war will like Thomason's book—both its sardonic text and its hard, cruel sketches. Those who do not like war will merely admire the cool skill with which the Marines are here conducted through four terrible battles in France. In either case what the reader will find is the truth so far as battles are concerned. All the talk is about killing and being killed—Captain Thomason has no other subject. And surely no other is important, though many jolly war books have been published. It is to be hoped that this, probably the best of all American war books to date, will survive until the time when another war is being considered. For it proves that the number of ways in which the institution makes brutes of men is literally infinite.

The Life of Henry Howard Molyneux Herbert, fourth Earl of Carnarvon. By the Rt. Hon. Sir Arthur Hardinge. Oxford University Press. Three volumes. $21.

Eton and Oxford, Eastern travels, a country home with sports, books, and "country work," entrance into wide public life in the House of Lords when 23, Under Secretary for the Colonies at 27, thirty full years of office, travel, literature, and dignified domesticity in the great Victorian age—such a life has nowhere else been possible, and now is hardly any longer possible in England. Thirty-five years after his death Lord Carnarvon has left scarce a mark in the memory of his countrymen. A fine independent conservative statesman of the second rank under Lords Derby, Beaconsfield, and Salisbury, Colonial Secretary and Viceroy of Ireland, he stands as one of the first promoters of federation within the British Empire. The present work will occupy a place on the shelf of reputable libraries, and will seldom leave it.

Karin Smirnoff: Strindbergs Första Hustru. Stockholm: Albert Bonnier.

"I never was unfaithful to your father"—thus spoke Siri von Essen to her older daughter; she was sitting in her home in Helsingfors. Siri von Essen was August Strindberg's first wife, the woman whom he maligned in his autobiographical novel "Le Plaidoyer d'un Fou," recently published in English under the title "The Confessions of a Fool." The book which August and Siri Strindberg's daughter, Karin Smirnoff, now has published thirteen years after the death of her parents is not in form a vindication of her mother's good name, but it is in fact a complete vindication. She speaks kindly of her father, emphasizing his good nature and his interest in the welfare of his children when he was of sound mind. But it is very clear that his mind was not always sound. The first year of his wedded life coincided with Strindberg's democratic and [illegible] istic period. His wife fully sympathized with these views, but she could not follow him when he became imbued with Nietzschean ideas. The latter period followed closely upon his trial for blasphemy, instituted after the publication of "Giftas, I." The shock produced by this was profound; and [illegible] mental and emotional life was changed so that he became insanely jealous and suspicious of his wife. Karin Smirnoff's book supplements the picture of Strindberg which he has given to the world in his various autobiographical novels.

A German-English Dictionary. By Herman C. G. Brandt. G. E. Stechert and Company. $5.

Professor Brandt's dictionary was ready for publication in 1915, but the war interrupted the typesetting, and the author continued to revise his manuscript till within a few weeks of his death, in December, 1920. The book, now at last published, is no mere compilation, but the lifework of an admirable scholar. The vocabulary includes about 70,000 words; the English renderings are precise; technical apparatus is reduced to the minimum; the pages are not cluttered with superfluous matter. Most of the articles are very brief, but the longer ones present an abundance of information with great skill. The printing and mechanical arrangement of the dictionary are perfect.

History of Economic Progress in the United States. By W. W. Jennings. T. Y. Crowell Company. $4.50.

A story of the background against which American political development has taken place is well worth writing. It has never yet been adequately done, save for certain areas and short spaces of time, and then the results have usually been hidden away in formidable monographs. It may be that research has not yet gone far enough, for book after book comes from the presses, each repeating the other and each failing to furnish the whole picture we should like to have. Nor is it to be found in Mr. Jennings's book, which is singularly inadequate in illumination. If what is wanted is all the information concerning American commerce, population, and industry that can be got into a single volume, there is probably no better book than this; but to expect college students—and it is professedly a text—to take to its data with avidity is to expect the impossible.

New Values in Child Welfare. The Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science. September, 1925. $1.

The authors of the articles appearing in this issue of the Annals are persons trained in various ways and with much experience. Authorities in the fields of health, delinquency, accident prevention, family case work, settlement work, and child placing have all brought their thinking to bear on the problem of children. They are not engaging in a technical discussion, nor are they attempting to set their remarks into any rigid scheme marked out by the editor. It is this informality which enables them to speak frankly, spontaneously, and vigorously. The entire discussion is marked by a distinct impatience with the old methods and a desire to venture further and try new methods.

The World of the Incas. A Socialistic State of the Past. By Otfrid von Hanstein. Translated by Anna Barwell. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

It would appear that there is hardly need for a new book on this subject unless some fresh material could be offered. There seems to be nothing new in the present volume, although the subject is broadly treated in a convenient and condensed form. The author refers to Squier's not being able to find bottom in Lake Titicaca even at a depth of one hundred fathoms. Squier's rope [illegible] 582 feet [illegible].

Excavations. By Carl Van Vechten. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

The decadent temper with its flair for details, with its preoccupation with the minor and the eccentric, is, in this volume of essays on Ouida, Machen, Saltus, Firbank, and others, held in clear solution for the inspection of the curious in such matters. Mr. Van Vechten's nonchalant and bookish survivors of the saffron decade will, it is to be presumed, have about them perennially a dim charm—that slightly ridiculous allure which resides in every anachronism. One study, that of Oscar Hammerstein, beautifully because simply written, is valuable as biography and moving as characterization.

The R. P. A. Annual and Ethical Review. London: The Rationalist Press Association.

The Rationalist Press Annual is devoted to the cause of intellectual progress. The contributors are men of international fame. They discuss authoritatively and urbanely such topics as The Triumph, Evolution, The Rationalism of Anatole France, and the Causes of Evolution. The last is from the facile pen of J. B. S. Haldane, whose treatment of a highly controversial subject is a model of cogency and succinctness.

Last Leaves of Traditional Ballads and Ballad Airs. Collected in Aberdeenshire by the late Gavin Greig and edited by Alexander Keith. Aberdeen: The Buchan Club.

A worthy appendix to the five great volumes of Child. Aberdeenshire has always been particularly rich in ballad-versions, and in this volume she takes her final stand. The editor in his introduction makes an interesting and convincing defense of Peter Buchan's much-maligned collection of 1828.

Voltaire. By Richard Aldington. Gogol. By Janko Lavrin. Pushkin. By Prince D. S. Mirsky. (The Republic of Letters.) E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50 each.

Three volumes in a new and promising series of critical biographies. Mr. Aldington's, much the best of the three, tells the amazing story of Voltaire's life with remarkable economy yet with vivid plenitude of detail; and concludes with a sensible estimate of Voltaire's importance in the various fields of his activity. The volumes on Gogol and Pushkin survey the two pillars—of different construction but of equal importance—beneath modern Russian literature. Neither study is quite satisfactory, though both as pioneers are to be welcomed.

Not Poppy. By Virginia Moore. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $1.75.

"Such invention as, by producing something unexpected, surprises and delights," and wielded in an idiom at once accurately personal and deft, is nevertheless insufficient to sustain the reader's attention; Miss Moore's poetry, interesting enough in a first few poems, is in bulk invention carried to convention; it becomes the exposure of its own device. The subject matter is erotic disturbance. Any subject matter persisting in art with intrinsic value is vulgarity.

Systems of Public Welfare. By Howard W. Odum and D. W. Willard. The University of North Carolina Press. $2.

A straightforward account of the legislative attempts that have been made in the United States to preserve the healing human touch in all charitable undertakings without sacrificing efficiency.

Que Francia explique. Buenos Aires: Editora Internacional.

This is a Spanish translation of Frederick Bausman's "Let France Explain," supplemented by recent data intended to bring the work down to date.

The French Activities in Syria

By NAZMIE H. ANABTAWY

SUBSEQUENT to the bombardment of Damascus in October, 1925, the appointment of M. Henry de Jouvenel, the first civil head of the French administration in Syria, implied an acknowledgment of the faults of his predecessors. At once the Syrian Nationalists began to build castles in the air, founded on the hope that the new High Commissioner would bring peace to Syria.

M. de Jouvenel faced the problem that the presence of France in Syria as the mandatory was against the wishes of the people and was therefore the primary reason for Syrian dissatisfaction. In theory the mandate system was evolved for the benefit of peoples who have reached such a degree of civilization that their independence may be provisionally recognized, but who, because of lack of experience in self-government, need the aid of a powerful nation to set them on their feet. But in fact the mandate carried out secret treaties previously negotiated between France and England. M. Poincaré admitted in the Chamber of Deputies in 1923 that "since 1912 we have had an understanding with the British regarding Syria." In 1916 this understanding was put into definite terms in an agreement called the Sykes-Picot Treaty, which awarded Syria to France. This treaty violates earlier promises made to the Arabs by Great Britain, pledging the recognition, at the end of the war, of the independence of the Arabian territories within the Turkish Empire, in consideration of their assistance to the Allies. In 1918 France and England confirmed these promises in a joint proclamation, although the policy proclaimed was inconsistent with the Sykes-Picot Treaty of two years before.

The idea of mandates innocently introduced by President Wilson gave France and Great Britain an opportunity to legalize their agreement. At that time it was decided by the Powers that each should send a commission to investigate the wishes of the people. France and England abstained, and the United States was the only Power to comply with the decision. The King-Crane Commission submitted an exhaustive report to the Department of State in Washington, holding in effect that the unanimous wish of the people was in favor of complete independence. In case the Powers were not ready to recognize such independence and the imposition of a mandate was inevitable, the commission warned against giving the Syrian mandate to France, since the Syrians explicitly refused the French. Yet, despite the terms of Article XXII of the Covenant of the League of Nations, which provides that the wishes of the people be taken into account, despite the promises given to the Syrians, and despite the warnings of the American Commission, the mandate was allocated to France in April, 1920.

No sooner had France undertaken the Syrian mandate than the affairs of the country became seriously involved. The introduction of paper money, subject to the barometric fluctuation of the franc, and the policy of exporting gold paralyzed finance and depressed commerce. Average earning-power became inadequate to meet average expenses. The government departments, especially that of justice, were soon nests of corruption. Ordinances issued daily by French officers violated individual rights which are recognized in all civilized countries. Villages, towns, and cities were completely destroyed by gun and airplane bombardment. Thousands of acres of agricultural lands were laid waste by military operations. The country suffered losses which can never be recouped in one generation. This was the situation which M. de Jouvenel had to face.

In Paris, after the bombardment of Damascus, M. de Jouvenel endeavored to vindicate the French intentions. His statements in the press encouraged Syrian nationalists in Europe, Egypt, and Syria to meet him and present their demands. Emir Shekib Arslan, the representative of the Syrian Nationalists in Europe, made the following proposals:

1. Syria should enjoy complete independence, with the rights and privileges of a de jure government and with membership in the League of Nations.

2. Lebanon should have an administration of its own, provided a plebiscite be held among the inhabitants of the territories ceded to it in 1920, to determine whether they retain their present status or revert to Syria. The territories referred to are Tyre, Sidon, Marhouyoun, Rasheiya, Hasbeiya, Tripoli, and Balaback Elbakaa.

3. Syria should be recognized as a single state. (It is now divided into many provinces with local legislative bodies.)

4. As a corollary to her independence, Syria should enjoy the right to political representation by diplomatic agents.

5. In recognition of the French interests in Syria, and to replace the present mandate, Syria would agree to a thirty-year treaty granting France certain economic privileges in preference to other countries.

Negotiations with Syrian Nationalists in Egypt added to these demands two precautions: that the treaty to be entered into must define the relations of the parties to it, expressly abolishing the mandate, and would not be binding until ratified by the Syrian Parliament; and that the army of occupation must withdraw as soon as a provisional government, pending the formation of a de jure government, could be established.

As a practical plan to end the war, nationalist organizations were in agreement on the following suggestions: Negotiations should be entered into with the leaders of the revolution, defining conclusively the international relations of Syria on the basis of national sovereignty. A treaty should state the conditions for the withdrawal of the army of occupation, the time limit of the mandate, and the relation of the mandatory power to the state of Syria. It was suggested also that a convention be summoned to draw up a constitution for Syria. France would submit the agreement to the League, expressing her willingness to concede all the terms, and ratification by the League would be final.

Presented with these propositions, M. de Jouvenel repeatedly evaded any conclusive answer. But when he reached Damascus he announced that all Nationalists should surrender arms unconditionally within a specified period, and proceed with elections. This counter-proposal failed to satisfy the Nationalists, chiefly because it offered no definition of the limits of mandatory power. The Syrians turned to Geneva, with a request that the League of Na-

Real Estate Ads

—If you have a home or property to sell or lease, try The Nation classified advertising section.

—If the experience of other advertisers of real estate is a guide, your advertisement in The Nation will pay.

—Write for rates to Dept. R., The Nation.

Ample argument

THE OLD CHINESE proverb says, "One picture is worth ten thousand words." By much the same reasoning... and it is sound reasoning, too... the best argument for Fatima is Fatima. Taste one... for just one taste is worth a bookful of description

F A T I M A

A MOSCOW DIARY A graphic human-interest story of the life of the people in Soviet Russia today, by Anna Porter. Cloth, $1.00 postpaid. Ask for book catalog.
CHARLES H. KERR & CO. 347 East Ohio Street, Chicago

accept nothing but

...on Depress... non Habit Formin...
In Convenient
Aluminum Boxes
At every drug store
... Tablets 15c
30 Tablets 40c

Midol for HEADACHE

GENERAL DRUG CO., - 94 N. Moore Street, New York

Want someone for a position? Want a position?
The responsive employer and the intelligent applicant for employment read The Nation. Write for rates. Dept. W, The Nation.

CORKING DETECTIVE MYSTERIES

THE WRONG LETTER By W. S. Masterman
G. K. Chesterton, who is seldom able to finish a detective story, praises this one with enthusiasm.

THE SILVER FOREST By Ben Ames Williams
As cooling on a hot day as an iced drink—and it lasts longer—is this story of Maine woods in winter.

THE RED HOUSE MYSTERY By A. A. Milne
The author of "When We Were Very Young" wrote this for his father, who likes detective stories and because he thought of quite a new way to commit a murder.

Anybody would be hard to please if he did not like these.

Each $2.00 at any bookstore, or from

E. P. DUTTON & COMPANY, 681 5th Ave., N. Y.

When writing to advertisers, please mention The Nation

tions send an impartial commission to study the situation. The request was disregarded.

In the meantime M. de Jouvenel was not idle. First, he authorized the election (except in Damascus, which is in the Jebel Druse territory) of provincial legislative bodies. Each legislature was empowered to decide its own political relations with its neighbors. Thus any state could declare independence of the others. This is easily arranged by a slight interference with the elections, and it naturally puts an end to the national aspirations of a centralized government. But the measure was unsuccessful.

M. de Jouvenel next made an agreement with Turkey, relinquishing the Syrian district of Alexandretta as a buffer zone on the north. His predecessor, General Gouraud, had already surrendered Cilicia to Turkey without consulting the League. The effect of these arrangements is to isolate Syria. Following the agreement with Turkey, by which the northern boundaries were protected against possible interference, M. de Jouvenel turned his attention to the British in Palestine, and to King Ibn Saud of the Nejd and Hejaz. It is not yet known what terms he arrived at with Great Britain. The negotiations with Ibn Saud were unsuccessful.

Finally, M. de Jouvenel resorted to public sentiment to smash the Nationalists. He appointed Ahmed Nami Bey, a Circassian, as "President of Syria," with a Ministry composed partly of recognized personalities and partly of renegades. The program of the Ministry, though vague, was drawn up for its effect on public psychology, and on his arrival in Damascus de Jouvenel was actually greeted by a small crowd demonstrating its delight over this apparent concession to national aspirations. It did not take long for the truth to become known. Three members of the Ministry were sent to exile because of their refusal to accept the dictation of the French authorities. The Ministry was then dissolved on the ground of "lack of harmony."

It is clear that M. de Jouvenel did not go to Syria with the intention either of ending the war or of considering the Syrian demands. Rather did he intend, with the use of both political and military skill, to smash Syrian nationalism. Fighting to the bitter end does not solve problems. As a result of the French mandate over Syria a great part of the land is reduced to ashes. It is time for France to concede the justice of the Syrian claim for freedom.

The Propaganda War in China

IN a recent letter addressed to the Chinese Acting Foreign Minister, the Soviet Ambassador to China, Mr. L. M. Karakhan, denied a report that Soviet troops were being dispatched to Kalgan.

I am in receipt of your letter of June 11th, in which you draw my attention to the report in the newspapers to the effect that 8,000 troops of the Soviet Union have been dispatched to Kalgan apparently to assist the Kuominchun.

I wish most emphatically to deny this report; it is false and slanderous. There are no Soviet troops on the territory of China—not 8,000, not 1,000, nor even five. The newspaper report to which you refer is a pure invention circulated, first, for the purpose of rousing hostility against the U.S.S.R., and, secondly, to provide the imperialists with a pretext to increase their forces in China.

Recently, the foreign press in China and that section of the Chinese press, happily a small one, which champions the interests of the foreigners rather than the interests of China, have been engaged in the extensive fabrication of lying information concerning the U.S.S.R. It would be a hopeless task to attempt to refute all the ridiculous inventions that are circulated through these channels; as, for example, that we have dispatched troops to Kalgan, that we have concluded an alliance with Feng Yu-hsiang, that we have provided the latter with millions of money, that we have bribed students, etc. . . .

It is now clear to all the world that the campaign of lies directed against the U.S.S.R.—but now subsiding—was conducted by the imperialists as a means of saving their position in China. The method appeared to be a very simple one: all that seemed necessary was to show that the U.S.S.R. was conducting an imperialist policy. This would lead to the opinion that the U.S.S.R. and the other imperialists were all birds of the same feather. Consequently, it would logically follow that no other policy could be adopted toward China than an imperialist policy; that these were the natural relations between China and the rest of the world.

This kind of logic is easily refuted, however, by comparing the Sino-Soviet Treaty with China's treaties with all the other countries. The lies and slanders let loose by the section of the press hostile to the U.S.S.R. are but transient; the treaty and policy of the U.S.S.R. are permanent, unchangeable things; consequently, the ruse of the imperialists must fail.

With regard to the fear you express that, if it is true that 8,000 Soviet troops are proceeding to Kalgan, it will induce other Powers to dispatch troops to China, permit me to assure you that there are no Soviet troops, either at Kalgan or at Urga, or anywhere on Chinese territory; and permit me to assure you also that we will never provide anyone with a pretext for giving justification to your fears.

Peking, June 17 L. M. KARAKHAN

SUMMER COURSES IN JEWISH SOCIAL WORK

THE TRAINING SCHOOL FOR JEWISH SOCIAL WORK offers summer institutes for Social Workers in addition to its regular course of fifteen months' graduate study in preparation for Jewish social work.

The following courses will be given during the second term of the Summer Session which will begin August 16, 1926:

Social and Religious Institutions of the Jews..M. M. Kaplan
Modern Jewish History.....I. B. Berkson
The Field of Jewish Social Service in the U. S...M. J. Karpf
Adiminstration of Jewish Family Case Work Agencies.....M. J. Karpf
Administration of Jewish Federations.....M. B. Hexter
Post War Problems of the Jews.....I. B. Berkson

THE FALL QUARTER WILL BEGIN OCTOBER 5, 1926

For a description of the Course of Study write for the General Announcement

THE TRAINING SCHOOL FOR JEWISH SOCIAL WORK

(Initiated by the National Conference of Jewish Social Service)

210 West 91st Street, New York City

The Nation

Vol. CXXIII NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 18, 1926 No. 3189

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS
EDITORIALS:
The Matter of Originality..
Lese Majesty
How to Vote
Evolution in Legal Education
CARTOON. By
THE MEXICAN CHURCH AND STRIKE. By
GARVEY, A MASS LEADER. By E.
MARTHA AND SHADOW. By Donald Darling
GLIMPSES OF ARTHUR CRAHAN. By IN THE DRIVEWAY. By
CORRESPONDENCE
POCKET:
Retreat. By Lindsay Jenkins
The Gallop of Death. By Sisters and Parents. By Chicago Bandits in Business. By An Impressive Remembrance. By A Page of the Russian Revolution. By Poe in Antwerp. By Poems in Prose
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
The Women's Peace Congress at Dublin. By

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors
LEWIS S. GANNETT
ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Literary Editor
MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries at the Postal Union rate.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. Chicago Office: No. 30 South Dearborn Street. Branch Office for Subscriptions and Advertising: Mme. Gertrude M. Crane, 27 Walpole Street, London W. C. 1, England.

GERTRUDE HAS WON HER ROADSTER. Incidentally she has, of course, performed an amazing feat and beaten all records set by men for swimming the Channel; she has demonstrated the virtue of a feminine generation brought up without corsets, high heels, or long skirts; she has brought a coveted record home to America and the shores of the Shrewsbury River; she has proved a credit to her father and to "Mum" who hardened Gertrude's muscles and built her endurance on sweeping and floor scrubbing. She has, moreover, brought smiles of guileless satisfaction to the lips of the retail meat dealers of New York who issued the following resolution on Gertrude's success:

> The public will perhaps pardon [illegible] meat dealers if they rise to remark that Miss Ederle's triumph may be attributed in some measure to the fact that she is the daughter of a butcher; that [illegible] article of food in her diet; that a thick, juicy [illegible] favorite dish; and that several times during her swim she renewed her strength with beef extract.

But chiefly, Gertrude has won her roadster. The white shores of England may have seemed dismally remote to the girl as she fought the shifting tide; the honor of her sex may have looked a little abstract when her left leg grew cramped and "wouldn't kick properly"; but Gertrude kept her eyes on the roadster dangled right in front of them by her father. As a New York Times reporter described it:

> Pop continually roared over the side of the boat: "Trudie, don't forget you won't have that roadster unless you get over."
>
> Gertrude always responded, "Pop, I will own that roadster."

Which proves that Gertrude, although perhaps the greatest long-distance swimmer of all time, is primarily an amusing and normal American kid.

OTHER SWIMMERS, with the heart rather taken out of their performance, are almost daily setting out across the Channel. The chances are of course that none of them will get across. As we write, two men have already given up after hours of heart-breaking struggle in the icy currents. Experts admit that small hope exists of bettering Gertrude Ederle's record; only an amazing combination of speed and luck could do it. The cash value of all future efforts must be noticeably depressed. Many of the swimmers, however, are under contract to make the attempt, and if they fail to break Gertrude's record of speed they may at least produce new marvels of distance and endurance. Another American woman, Clara Barrett, three days before Gertrude's triumphant crossing, failed by two miles to make the English shore, covering forty miles of water and sticking to it for twenty-one hours—some ten miles and seven hours more than Gertrude. If a thick fog had not blanketed and bewildered her for twelve hours she could undoubtedly have made her goal; her mileage and endurance were sufficient under any decent conditions. Clara Barrett deserves more honor for her failure than she is likely ever to receive.

CLEMENCEAU'S LETTER to President Coolidge, urging a more generous attitude by the United States toward the French debt, sounds like an echo of war rhetoric—not the Tiger's own war rhetoric, to be sure, but, say, some of the idealistic utterances of Mr. Wilson for which the French Premier at that time had such complete scorn. Likewise it recalls Clemenceau's younger years, when he too was a burning idealist, rather than his cynical hardness at Versailles, where the foundation for French as well as German post-war troubles was securely laid. Can Clemenceau blame us Americans if we have dropped the high idealism with which we entered the World War and borrowed the cynical indifference toward world welfare which we learned in bitterness from him? There is wisdom as well as a plea for generosity in Clemenceau's letter, yet we fear it will not make even a ripple on American public opinion. If Mr. Coolidge were another sort of man it might move him. But if Mr. Coolidge were another sort of man he would not have accepted our war-debt policy. As it is, he finds it easiest and most natural to say that the matter has passed out of his hands and, anyway, he will deal only with the accredited diplomatic representatives. Clemenceau would do more for his country if instead of addressing passionate words to the wooden Mr. Coolidge he urged Frenchmen not to accept the debt agreement and to seek financial salvation elsewhere than in Wall Street.

JUST AS A PLEA for international generosity and vision sounds odd as coming from Clemenceau, so it seems strange to find Raymond Poincaré working to restore the finances for whose disastrous condition he more than any other man is responsible. It was Poincaré's jingoism and hate that led to France's policy of ruining Germany industrially after the war and plunging into a sea of extravagant imperialism. When the Dawes Commission finally made it plain even to Frenchmen that France could not [illegible] and possibly pay the interest [illegible] billions—out of German reparations, the decline in the value of the franc became catastrophic. Soon after the resignation of Premier Briand in July it went below two cents in our currency. The very desperateness of the situation has aided Poincaré, the Chamber of Deputies having given him a support and cooperation which it had refused to his predecessors. What the result of his financial program will be remains to be seen. Let it but [illegible] and [illegible] the franc. The stabilization of which is not announced at about two cents. As a certain of the National City Bank points out, France's pre-war debt was about 33,000,000,000 francs. The present internal debt of some 290,000,000,000 francs is nine times that sum. But with the franc at an eighth of its pre-war value the ratio is almost the same. France has repudiated 90 per cent of its debt through inflation of the currency.

SPEAKING OF EUROPE'S WAR DEBT t America, some trenchant observations have been made by Viscount Rothermere, brother of Lord Northcliffe and proprietor of the Daily Mail and other former Harmsworth publications. Lord Rothermere repudiates some rather strong criticism of America by the editor of his own Daily Mail and blames England as much as the United States for what he rightly considers a mistaken policy. The Nation has repeatedly pointed out that our funding arrangements with Belgium, Italy, France, and other European nations call for [illegible] carried out, and are not in fact likely to continue more than a few years. Lord Rothermere well says that all the [illegible] should have been considered as a whole, and to blame Premier Baldwin for binding England to [illegible] terms instead of standing out for a general settlement. A it is, Lord Rothermere thinks America and England will be the first nations to cry "Hold, enough!" This result he foresees because the low-currency countries of Europe are erecting tariff barriers which are going to ruin the foreign trade of high-currency countries like the United States and Great Britain. The economic health of America, like that of England, he thinks depends upon overseas markets with great powers of absorption.

TORN TO SHREDS politically, with ten thousand miles of boundary lines, Europe is pulling herself together economically. Long negotiations have resulted in a working agreement among the French, German, Belgian, and Luxemburg steel interests. The Polish, Czecho-Slovak, and Austrian steel groups are on the verge of joining their western neighbors. Thus a huge international steel trust has come into being on the European continent. The trust will fix prices, allot quotas of production, and distribute markets; its executive committee will be the international dictator of steel. Thus industry comes to its senses, and renounces the costly pre-war methods of dumping, price-slashing, and cutthroat competition with their waste and friction. Of course, the sacred doctrine of free competition again becomes utter moonshine, but under high-power production and distribution it was doomed. So powerful a combination virtually eliminates the small manufacturer, and it may be an international menace to labor, yet on the existence of such combinations depends European peace in the days when economics override politics. Such inevitable international industrial despotisms are a more serious problem than Europe's sprouting political dictatorships.

HUNGARY'S BLIND GODDESS is a versatile dramatist. Having concluded the farce of the franc-forgers, she donned the tragic mask and brought Matthias Rakosi and fifty-four other political prisoners to trial. Rakosi was a People's Commissar in the Soviet government of Bela Kun. Sentenced to death after the overthrow of Bela Kun, Rakosi nevertheless returned to Hungary to reestablish the Communist Party. He and his fellow-Communists were arrested under the Emergency Act of 1921, which in effect makes an avowal of communistic belief illegal for a Hungarian citizen. Among the prisoners was a group of left-wing Socialists who had been members of the Social Democratic Party until its leaders gave their support to the reactionary Bethlen. The left wing, led by Stefan Vagi, then broke away and formed the Socialist Labor Party, in the kind of split which takes its place, in parliaments all over Europe, between the Socialists and the Communists. The Hungarian Government, however, has its own method of dealing with the opposition. All but twenty of the prisoners were condemned to sentences of from ten months to eight-and-a-half years of hard labor, Rakosi receiving the maximum penalty and Weinberger, another Communist leader, eight.

THE SENTENCES were read to an accompaniment of cheers for communism led by Rakosi. And well might these men cheer. For though they face years in the prisons of Hungary, where torture and starvation are accepted facts, their trial has probably done more to advance their cause than could any effort of theirs had they remained free. In Hungary today there are no rights of free speech, press, or assembly. But in the trial party programs were relevant matter. "With a little cleverness in answering the judge's questions," as the Manchester Guardian correspondent puts it, the prisoners turned the court into a platform from which they denounced the government and appealed to the workers of the country. The press carried full reports of the trial, though in constant danger of suppression; and the Hungarian proletariat, which has been kept on a diet of thin Socialistic gruel—only the thinnest could trickle through the government censorship—has tasted a tonic of beef, iron, and wine. The "dead men on leave," as Weinberger called himself and his companions, must be grateful to the government which in spite of itself gave their cause a hearing.

AUGUST 3'S BATCH of primaries ran off without surprises. Wets, supported by the regular party organizations, won both party primaries in Missouri; Drys came in from the Montana countrysides with large enough pluralities to overcome the Wet majorities in the cities.

The Klan candidate won the gubernatorial primary in Oklahoma, but Kansas gave decisive pluralities to the three Supreme Court judges who had ordered the hooded order out of that State. Curtis in Kansas and Harreld in Oklahoma easily won their Senatorial renominations. No wild flames of revolt are leaping through the Corn Belt, though the Coolidge myth is fading and the regular Republicans have sagely made peace with Brookhart. Immediate political interest centers about the skirmish of the McAdoo and Al Smith forces, looking forward to 1928. Every Wet victory in either party is hailed by the Smith forces as proof of his potential strength; but the effort of Judge Talley and some of the Catholic societies to involve the United States in Mexico's struggle with the Catholic Church increases fear that a Catholic in the Presidency might be dangerously subject to outside influence.

THE SUPREME COUNCIL of the Knights of Columbus calls upon President Coolidge to "put an end to this ignominious contempt that has been shown by President Calles for American appeals," and assesses its membership one million dollars for a "campaign of education" about conditions in Mexico. If by "education" the Knights mean the kind of emotional phrase-slinging about "Russification" which makes up a large part of their appeal we hope the members will go on strike. We would urge Roman Catholics in this country earnestly to consider the possible effects of their campaign. When a Methodist bishop wins applause at a "Citizenship Conference" for declaring that no Catholic "can kiss the Papal ring and even get within gunshot of the White House" sectarian self-consciousness is running high enough. Any attempt to use the United States Government to fight the battles of the Catholic Church in Mexico will only accentuate religious lines and play into the hands of the Ku Klux Klan.

AMERICAN METHODIST MISSIONARIES in Japan have adopted resolutions urging that our naturalization laws be amended to permit all Asiatic peoples to become American citizens. Politicians are likely to give scant heed to their advice, but time will prove them right. America with her dollars dominates the world today, but a time will come when we shall meet and resent discriminations against us in Asia which will be explained as repetitions of measures previously adopted by us. It is natural that missionaries should feel the absurdity of their position, going from a land which practices every form of racial discrimination to preach brotherhood and good-will to the people against whom we discriminate. Common sense might indicate a simple way to retain a measure of the friendly sentiment which we are losing in the East. Our immigration laws already hold Asiatic immigration to a bare minimum. Why add insult to injury by refusing naturalization to the infinitesimal number of Asiatics who cross that barrier and still want to stay?

MRS. HALL, wealthy widow of the New Brunswick, N. J., rector whose unsolved murder mystery solves the problem of hot-weather copy for the newspapers, was held in $15,000 bail—$7,500 on each of two indictments for murder. When Norman Thomas was arrested merely for trying to speak to the Passaic strikers he was held in $10,000 bail—and has not been indicted yet. That's "Jersey justice"—what the Russians call "class justice."

The Matter of Originality

VERY few critics of literature know what they are talking about when they praise an author for his originality or blame him for his lack of it. Perhaps no one could define this most precious of qualities; certainly no one has, though many of us believe we are able to recognize it as soon as we meet it. We can tell, we say, when an artist is standing on his own legs and seeing with his own eyes. But can we? What does it mean to say that one whose function is to reveal the way in which the world walks and talks employs only his own feet and mouth in order to accomplish this end? It once was supposed that his business was to copy nature—in which case, presumably, the more he kept himself out of the picture the better for his art. Those who talk about originality might accept the doctrine of nature, saying that of course the artist reproduces something for our recognition and our pleasure. They rarely are willing to admit, however, that the good artist follows in the path of his predecessors. He may copy nature; he may never copy art.

William Blake showed himself better acquainted with the problem when he wrote on the margin of Sir Joshua Reynolds's "Discourses" "The difference between a bad artist and a good one is: the bad artist seems to copy a great deal; the good one really does copy a great deal." If anything is the whole truth, this is probably it. There is no case on record of a first-rate novelist, playwright, or poet who escaped contamination with those before him who had done well the thing he attempted to do. The Greek tragic and lyric poets are famous examples of workers in a medium which they valued all the more because many had used it. Among modern writers the best, it is almost safe to say, have been the best educated in the traditions of their craft. Students in college writing classes are proverbially advised to study life, not books. But the great writers have been great readers too. Shakespeare was not, as the romantic lover of his plays usually insists, inexperienced in books; rather he devoured them, and did not hesitate to pilfer whole passages from Ovid, Plutarch, and Holinshed. Fielding was one of the best-read men of his day. Wordsworth, who made so much of the inspiration of mountains, went as often to travel books and to the older poets for the matter and even the manner of his lines. Dickens, an "original" if any novelist ever was, grew up on a diet of Smollett and Sterne. Walt Whitman turned his back on European poetry, but he had read it first; and he did not begin to write his "original" things until he had read Emerson. Before long, no doubt, we shall have dissertations on the sources of so wild a wanderer as James Joyce.

What Blake knew, and what most of us do not, is that the artist is dealing both with a world to be apprehended and with a medium through which to apprehend it. The second thing is almost as old as the first, and the artist will respect it as something which existed before he came into being. It is an accumulation from the presence of countless workmen in the shop through countless ages, and if he is a proper man himself he will not mind rubbing his naked elbows against those of other proper men. We expect a cabinet-maker or an architect to take up his task where others left off. We are superstitious about the writer. Of him we ask the impossible—something brand new under the sun of nature and art.

Lese Majeste

FOR several years The Nation has been calling the attention of its readers to the increasing use by the courts of punishment for contempt and the danger involved. We are glad, therefore, that the persecution of George R. Dale, editor of the Muncie (Indiana) Post-Democrat, seems to be rousing a considerable number of newspapers to concern themselves with a tyranny which every year is growing more audacious.

Mr. Dale, whose story we touched on briefly in our issue of July 28 (page 68), had been fighting political corruption and the Ku Klux Klan in his weekly, and was finally arrested and indicted on some probably trumped-up charges. He declared in his newspaper that the prosecution was a frame-up, and was thereupon sentenced to three months in jail and a fine of $500, on the ground that he was guilty of contempt of court. When he submitted an answer to the court, in which he offered to prove the truth of his charges, he was fined another $500 and given three months more in jail. The Supreme Court of Indiana reversed the second sentence, but let the first one stand, making this astounding reply to Mr. Dale's plea of truth in justification for what he had written:

> This may or may not be law, but we make no qualification in calling it outrageous nonsense, and a contemplation of the possibilities [illegible] punishment [illegible] Supreme Court on constitutional grounds, and [illegible] New York [illegible] $5,000 which it is estimated will be necessary to prosecute [illegible].

The Editor and Publisher is also asking for contributions and gives first place in its issue of July 31 to a discussion of the evil of contempt jurisdiction and suggestions of remedies from various quarters. The article in the Editor and Publisher recalls that the abuse of punishment for contempt was born on the [illegible] unfortunate decision rendered by the United States Supreme Court in 1918 in respect to N. D. Cochran of the [illegible] federal courts, accepted also in the tribunals of most of the States, that the power to punish for contempt was limited to "misbehavior of any person in their [the judges'] presence, or so near thereto as to obstruct the ends of justice." In the arbitrary war atmosphere of 1918 the Supreme Court stretched the meaning of the phrase "so near thereto as to obstruct" to apply to any utterance anywhere having a "tendency" to obstruct. This opened wide the road to what has come to be known as "constructive contempt," under which tyrannical judges are more and more denying the constitutional right of free criticism to the press whenever it affects judicial decisions or procedure. The Editor and Publisher goes on to say:

> That this usurpation of power in journalistic contempt cases has become unbearable and that means must be found for relief from its increasing menace is everywhere evident today in newspaper circles. . . .
>
> Can courts do no wrong?
>
> Newspapermen know that they can do wrong and that their wrongs may be gross and strike at the heart of sacred institutions. . . .
>
> Direct contempt, meaning contempt in the presence of the court, was followed by the dictum "indirect contempt," meaning an act just outside the presence of the court, and finally "constructive contempt," which may mean anything that an offended judge desires it to mean. And now, behold! the proposition that even in "constructive contempt" cases [illegible]

Thus has a limitation of freedom of speech come to be asserted by the courts without warrant from the people. The Editor and Publisher proposes a campaign for federal and State laws to enable a person accused of contempt of court to obtain a hearing before a judge of the same rank as the accusing magistrate but in another jurisdiction. This would be an improvement, but to our mind does not go nearly far enough. We believe that the entire contempt-of-court procedure is needless, probably unconstitutional, and chiefly usurped by the courts themselves without legitimate legislative warrant. It is a survival of lese majeste, which has no place in a democratic system of government. "Constructive contempt" is an inexcusable invasion of the right of free speech and should be legislated out of existence. Libel and slander laws afford judges all the protection from criticism that they need or deserve. Direct contempt should be legislated against as a criminal offense, with the right of trial by jury if demanded. There is no "majesty of the law" except in so far as its common sense and justice appeal to an effective majority of any community (as witness the much-abused Volstead act), while the pomp and verbiage and claptrap of our courts lead to nothing but ridicule and distrust in the minds of most people.

But nobody should delude himself with the idea that mere laws will be sufficient to end this medieval tyranny of the courts. The history of such legislation in this country shows that it has time and again been perverted or overthrown by petty judges jealous of their absolutism. The only sure method of overthrowing the abuse, so far as the State courts go, at least, is through constitutional amendments. Arkansas, Georgia, Louisiana, and Oklahoma have all incorporated provisions in their constitutions looking to that end, but except in the case of the latter State the wording is so vague and indeterminate that it has either not been effectively taken advantage of by the legislatures or has been twisted into inconsequence by the courts. In Georgia, for instance, the constitution says: "The power of the courts to punish for contempts shall be limited by legislative acts." But when the legislature passed a law limiting contempt to misconduct committed in court the worthy judges of the State ruled that the constitution gave authority merely to fix the punishment for contempt, not to define or classify it!

How to Vote

MR. SAMUEL INSULL'S skilful donations to the various campaign funds in Illinois should furnish food for reflection to those who still cling to a pathetic faith in the possibility of reforming from within either of the two great political parties. Mr. Insull, central figure in a combination of electric-power interests which dominates several hundred communities throughout the Middle West, handed out cash in ten and twenty-thousand-dollar lots to the man who was sure to win the Democratic Senatorial primary, the man who was likely to lose the Republican primary, and—most of all—to the man who would probably win the Republican primary. This last gentleman, Frank L. Smith, was also indorsed by the Illinois State Federation of Labor, following the Gompers tradition of supporting "labor's friends" within the old parties.

Mr. Smith's managers used about $159,000 of Mr. Insull's yellow-back bills; do Illinois labor leaders think that he and his managers will be as grateful to them for their sympathy as to Mr. Insull for his cash? Do labor leaders think that when a Muscle Shoals or Boulder Dam problem comes before Congress their view of power development for public service will have as much weight as the cogent arguments of Mr. Insull and his friends for private control of the nation's water-power? The facts seem to us to reinforce the logic behind the La Follette campaign of 1924. It takes time to build a new political party, solidly grounded in the producing classes of the country, and it is worth it.

Mr. William Hard, in a recent issue of The Nation, poked his lean finger into some of the weak points in Senator Norris's suggestion that liberals in Pennsylvania, whether Democrats or Republicans, should this year show their disgust with the Pepper-Mellon-Vare vote-buying methods by casting their ballots for William B. Wilson, the Democratic nominee for United States Senator from that State. Mr. Hard, although he dislikes millionaire vote-buying, is an earnest Wet and a disillusioned hater of Wilsonism in general and of the League of Nations in particular; and he inquires whether, had he been born in Pennsylvania, he ought not to vote for the Wet and anti-League Mr. Vare, rather than for Mr. Wilson, who is personally honest but stands on the wrong principles. The lesson of Pennsylvania seems to us the same as the lesson of Illinois: there is scant hope in either of the old parties.

Farmer-Labor parties are, to be sure, not infallible. England's labor leaders did not show omniscience in office. Nonpartisan League Senators in this country have not always showed the courage we might hope to find in them. Labor and farm organizations are not exempt from the corruptions which befall other groups. Especially in Illinois is the record of American labor leaders dispiriting. But we persist in believing that in these organizations of the men and women who do the harsh productive labor of the country lies the most effective safeguard of political democracy. More and more the life of the country is falling into the hands of those who have thousands of dollars in bills in their safes ready to hand out to those who can help them make more. There is nothing in the organization of the old parties able to resist such temptations. In the economic organizations of the farm and city workers there is at least a method of checking the worst abuses. For the present the official organizations of labor may be disillusioned by the fact that they did not win an victory in a single year; but in the end the old system of trusting to "good men" in the old parties is likely to bring more serious and more lasting disappointments.

Evolution in Legal Education

ONLY in recent years have a few jurists realized that the law is an intimate part of the social sciences and that little progress could be expected from teaching the law as a set of rules, unrelated to otherwise. Not in the tradition of the law school exhausted by an analysis and systematization of court decisions. The law grows out of social conditions; to be understood it must be studied as a process in constant evolution. Today the law-school journals are for the first time subjecting the courts, which in this country are raised to a position of extraordinary importance as builders of the law, to regular scientific criticism.

With the improvement in the technique of analysis has come a demand for greater service from the law schools correlating law as a social process with the economic and social phenomena out of which it grows. That requires closer coordination with psychology, economics, and political science, and with the practical agencies for the administration of justice and of government. Hence the demand for research into the practical operation of the rules declared by the legislatures, the courts, and administrative commissions, to determine whether they serve the purpose intended, and what they actually accomplish in the community. In the field of criminal law a bare beginning has been made in this country; and, for the most part, the experiences of foreign countries have been a closed book to the American student of law.

In former days judges and practicing lawyers attempted to write and instruct, in addition to their active professional duties. That day has passed. Life is now so complicated and specialized that legal research and instruction in the law have become the function of a separate craft—the law-school professors. In the process of teaching these have become aware of the sterility of much of what had been taught, of the inadequacy of the available data as to the origin, purpose, and effect of the voluminous work of the legislatures and the courts. On the legislative side progress has slowly been made in the improvement of drafting; on the judicial and administrative side little has been done.

The stronger law schools are working toward more effective legal education and toward organized research in the laboratory of practical life. Columbia announces seminars in legal economics and the intensive study of criminal law in operation; Harvard announces a program of research in legislation, criminology, and legal history; Yale announces the introduction of honor courses for selected high-grade students and research courses and laboratory work; Johns Hopkins is to enter on a program of research in jurisprudence. The American Law Institute, largely aided by law-school professors, is undertaking an extensive task of simplifying some of the more confused and complex departments of the law, such as contracts, agency, torts, conflict of laws, and corporations. It is not too much to expect that in a decade the whole course of legal education may be changed and that the effect of this more realistic jurisprudence will begin to appear in the decisions of the courts.

"I see that West Point and Annapolis are graduating a large number of young men this year."

"Of course they are. We need officers to sit on boards of inquiry."

The Mexican Church Goes on Strike

By CARLETON BEALS

I

Mexico City, July 29

THE faithful in Mexico are crowding a lifetime of emotions into the span of a week. Fanaticism has reached the acme of its brutality and glory. On August 1 the priests go on strike against the laws of the land in accordance with the pastoral letter of July 24 signed by Archbishop Mora and the thirty-four bishops and approved by the Pope. The poor and the superstitious are paying the piper; great mobs of them are clawing their way through the holy portals. Never since the days of the Juarez Reformation have collection-boxes clinked so merrily; never have so many rosaries, scapulars, and candles been sold; never in such short space of time have so many masses been said, so many processionals taken place, so many sacred relics been dusted and paraded. Baptisms, confirmations, confessions, weddings follow one another in kaleidoscopic haste. Babes are torn from the womb to the baptismal font, recklessly exposed to the suffocating, germ-laden air of the crowded interiors; long lines wait interminable hours to buy their confirmation tickets; quarreling sweethearts suddenly bury their troubles and battle through the aisles among the tatterdemalion throngs to be married; well-dressed women walk barefoot, tápalos tight about their tear-stained cheeks, through the early morning streets to mass; penitents kneel, arms outstretched, before the chapel altars; the confessional booths are besieged by woe-stricken throngs of sinners; weary priests pass endlessly up and down the abject, close-packed rows with the pyx, giving sacrament: the acolyte holds up the red shield under lifted chins; the Host is dropped on waiting tongues.

The charged center of this furore is the great cathedral, the largest on this Continent, which rises on the main plaza of the Mexican capital—the Zocalo. Here the mass at the gates, buffeted by the soldiery, struggles into the atrium in the shadow of the lofty gray and white façade and jams on through the high Portal of Pardon into the packed nave. The Indians—the poor and the disinherited—are the ones fighting for this last-minute salvation. The middle and upper classes have not been forced to this extremity. Their children have been baptized, christened, confirmed, married at leisure. But the masses streaming into the church have had to postpone these liturgical acts from week to week, hoping against hope that next month or the month after a few more pennies could be laid aside for the confirmation veil, the necessary candles, the fees. But now in this last-minute scramble they have cheated their stomachs and mortgaged their health to beg, borrow, or steal the sums required for every holy act, every administration of holy water, every declaration of bans. This tearful precipitancy has given the cathedral an aspect festive and catastrophic. Red Cross emergency tents and ambulances stand at the gates. Armed soldiers batter back the throngs. Yet in and out whirl the venders of candies, kewpie-dolls, rattles, newspapers, rosaries, and pet dogs—all calling raucously. Ice-cream and lemonade venders dart from person to person. Women faint from the heat; mothers lose their babies; peregrinators picnic in the less-crowded corners of the atrium; they have hung serapes tent-fashion from the iron fence-spikes to ward off the sun and have spread out their meager lunches of tortillas, beans, and frothing pulque.

This morning I struggled against the human ebb and flow into a side portal beyond the Sagrario. The interior was a blast in my face; stench of unwashed bodies, sharp sting of low-hanging clouds of incense. The far singing of the choir was almost drowned out by the wails of the assemblage and the bawl of ten thousand babies. People hung like monkeys from every column and grill; they eddied about altar, choir, and chapel. Colors clashed: blue and brown rebozos, lace mantillas, embroidered blouses, scarlet sashes. Inch by inch, almost suffocated, I wormed my way toward the barandales of the Crujia. Tier after tier of men and women pressed up coughing, crying, shouting, each carrying a baby to be baptized. Down the long runway paced the soldiers of the state; among them neophytes dashing to and fro for holy water, ever more holy water, and Red Cross aides with ice, cotton, and bandages. Hour after hour the baptismal process continued. First came a soldier, objective and fierce, then a Red Cross aide, an acolyte with a candle, a priest in white and gold robes—swipe of his thumb from holy water to the forehead of each squalling infant, a swab of cotton by another acolyte—finally, the collectors, bringing up the rear, reaching out hands for the fifty-centavo pieces. Hour after hour. Waiting row gave way to waiting row, and still from the back of the cathedral came the press of babies, ever more babies. One woman has but twenty centavos. The coin is snatched by the collector with a snarl, "Baptism's no good." On to the next and the next; more snarls for those who do not have their change ready. Here a peso is offered, the fifty centavos change is tossed back into the throng. The barefoot loser sprawls on his hands and knees, hugging his child in one arm, sticking his hand under the feet of the trampling multitude. A baby falls into the runway. A Red Cross attendant snatches it up. The mother is swept from sight. Crowded back against a pillar, she bawls for her lost infant, holding her arms out helplessly toward the Virgin. Overhead the newspaper kodaks click, the flash-lights boom, and white smoke eddies up into the fumes of incense.

One foot on a bench, the other pressed against the fluting of a column, I look down on the multitude. The whole cathedral seems to sway in the wavering light of thousands of candles, in the quiver of incense from the clanking censers. I have seen religious happenings at Lourdes; I witnessed the epochal procession of the new Virgin of Loreto from the patriarchal church of the Santa Maria Maggiore in Rome; I have followed a great procession up the slashed crooked streets of Toledo in Spain, and these occasions had an aspect of almost sublime solemnity or festivity. But this vast pawing scramble of the excited disinherited of Mexico, this flaunting of idolatry, superstition, rags, dirt, is a profanation of the human spirit. Such is the weapon of the Mexican-Spanish-Aztec church in its battle with the Mexican state.

II

It is easy to be misled by all this fanatic unleashed emotion, easy to overestimate its political significance. In this city of nearly a million inhabitants, in the center of a region harboring a million more, the number of persons caught up on the present wave of hysteria is not proportionately large. Nor does the fact that a mother fights to have her baby baptized necessarily carry with it any threat [illegible] political and military control. In a country where democratic government has only begun to emerge and the army [illegible] still the basic instrument of power, a popular demonstration which would cause an American politician apoplexy means little in terms of immediate political change.

Furthermore, it is the church that is on the defensive, though still with sufficient power, at an opportune moment, to plunge the country into chaos. The greatest spiritual might of the Mexican Catholic church was reached during the earlier period of colonial control when such tireless [illegible] as Bartolome de las Casas, Gante, Maga Catala, Motolinia worked fervently and honestly to protect and stimulate the indigenous peoples. The greatest material might of the church was achieved toward the close of the colonial period. The Declaration of Independence (Chilpancingo, November 6, 1813) stated: "Congress [illegible] the Catholic, and that it shall not permit or tolerate public [illegible] practice of any other," sentiments renewed in the Treaty of Cordoba which established the new Government. Yet they precipitated the long struggle that culmi[illegible] and the definitive separation of church and state. The church, since independence days, has been on the de[illegible] of its power. Indian ceremonies in towns where [illegible] churches are cracked and weed-riven; and the activities of autonomous indigenous congregations in more [illegible], far removed from conventional ecclesiastical control, indicate that the church in Mexico is being crushed between the Indian renascence on the one hand and the machine-age skepticism on the other.

[illegible] state in civil, political, and material affairs; (4) limitation of the worldly goods which may belong to or be inherited [illegible] forced these principles and established other restrictions growing out of the monopoly character of the Catholic Spanish-Aztec church in Mexico, such as prohibiting religious primary schools, public religious processions, political activity by the priests, the presence of foreign-born priests, and the limiting of the number of priests and churches.

The church has never accepted any civil or religious readjustment with good grace. Even in the colonial days the viceroys and the ecclesiastics were constantly at each other's throats, battling for jurisdiction and economic control. The Catholics overthrew President Comonfort and precipitated a bloody six-years' religious war, which culminated in the imposition of a foreign emperor, Maximilian, favorable to their cause. In more recent times they opposed the democratic program of Madero, supported the assassin-President Huerta, and rallied behind the De la Huerta movement to plunge Mexico back into an era of chaos. The federal authorities during that trouble caught priests with rifles in their hands, and the Archbishop of Guadalajara toured Jalisco in behalf of the rebels. Recent short-lived cuartelazos in the church centers, Guadalajara and Aguascalientes, were traced, in part, to ecclesiastical machinations.

The church in Mexico has in the past been such a great property-holder as to cause stagnation in the economic life of the country. Even in colonial times the government had to limit mortmain holding and in 1767 confiscated the properties of the Jesuits. Shortly after the war of independence it was estimated that no less than half the real estate in the country belonged to the clergy and every large hacienda carried a church mortgage. In 1856 some twenty million pesos of church property were sold, the money being turned over to the church. Since then the church has had no legal right to own realty and the government has felt itself justified in confiscating all lands improperly held.

III

The present conflict grew out of the church's renewed anti-government activities, fomented by the bitter apostolic letter of the Holy See of February 2, 1926, and the reindorsement of a manifesto signed by the Mexican episcopacy in 1917 attacking the religious provisions of the constitution. This reaffirmation coincided with the anniversary of the adoption of the 1857 constitution and was coupled with widespread propaganda in the Catholic press at a time when the Government was facing international difficulties over the new petroleum and foreign-property laws. Many of the constitutional provisions affecting the church had remained dead letters, others had fallen into desuetude. But now Archbishop Mora y del Rio was cited to appear before the Attorney General for special hearings; church officials violating the law were arrested; foreign-born priests were seized and deported overnight; additional church properties, clandestinely held, were confiscated; many Catholic institutions—primary schools, hospitals and orphanages—not allowed by the constitution, were closed. The Papal Delegate Caruana, who had entered the country under false pretenses, was ordered to leave.

The more immediate disturbances were caused by a recent law requiring church officials to register with the municipal authorities. Orders were sent out to disobey this law. The National League of Religious Defense called an economic buyers' boycott for the purpose of "paralyzing the economic and social life of the country." A general pastoral letter, sanctioned by the Pope and issued on July 24, attacked the law and constitution, threatened the government officials with excommunication, and called for the cessation of religious services and rites from August 1 on.

The church is likely to gain little through stirring up fanaticism and fear; and it lacks weapons for a military uprising. Its stand is obstructionist, negative. It could afford to disregard the Government had it in the past carried out a constructive program for the distressed country of which it is a part. But the church has opposed every necessary reform of the past fifteen years. Its priests have alienated the rural population by excommunicating peasants accepting ex-church lands, and by hobnobbing with the large landowners. Yet if the church has to bear the burden of the black stigma of such leaders as Iturbide, Santa Ana, Feliz Zuloaga, Maximilian, Huerta, it also has the more glorious tradition of Las Casas, Vasco de Quiroga, Hidalgo, and Morelos, who understood the Indian and knew the people and their problems. These men had social programs which would seem advanced even today; and Vasco de Quiroga, with his Cajas de Comunidades, his reforms, his emphasis upon education created early in the history of the Mexican church a tradition of popular liberty which, had it been preserved, would have saved the institution from the tragic misstep of today when it is placed in the sorry position of denying its own members spiritual ministration.

And so, here in the Zocalo, where the riveting machines, enlarging the national palace of Cortes, shatter the harmony of the great colonial halls of the Church of the Asuncion de Maria Santisima; here where once rose the old teocalli of the Aztec god of war, Huitzilopochtli, this one-time capital of the native empire—here the old conflict between church and state has drawn to a new poisonous head.

August 1

But before the cathedral the next day of August, before its now barred entrance and silent atrium, fifty thousand anti-church paraders are passing. Not with fanaticism but with the enlightenment that strengthened the thought of its greater leaders will the Mexican Catholic church reconquer its dignity and power of service.

Garvey: A Mass Leader

By E. FRANKLIN FRAZIER

THE Garvey movement is a crowd movement essentially different from any other social phenomenon among Negroes. For the most part American Negroes have sought self-magnification in fraternal orders and the church. But these organizations have failed to give that support to the Negro's ego-consciousness which the white masses find in membership in a political community, or on a smaller scale in Kiwanis clubs and the Ku Klux Klan. In a certain sense Garvey's followers form the black Klan of America.

The reason for Garvey's success in welding the Negroes into a crowd movement becomes apparent when we compare his methods and aims with those of other leaders. Take, for example, the leadership of Booker Washington. Washington could not be considered a leader of the masses of Negroes, for his program commended itself chiefly to white people and those Negroes who prided themselves on their opportunism. There was nothing popularly heroic or inspiring in his program to captivate the imagination of the average Negro. In fact the Negro was admonished to play an inglorious role. Certain other outstanding efforts among Negroes have failed to attract the masses because they have lacked the characteristics which have distinguished the Garvey movement. It is only necessary to mention such an organization as the National Urban League and its leadership to realize that so reasoned a program of social adjustment is lacking in everything that appeals to the crowd. The leadership of Dr. DuBois has been too intellectual to satisfy the mob. Even his glorification of the Negro has been in terms which escape the black masses. The Pan-African Congress which he has promoted, while supporting to some extent the boasted aims of Garvey, has failed to stir any considerable number of American Negroes. The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, which has fought uncompromisingly for equality for the Negro, has never secured, except locally and occasionally, the support of the masses. It has lacked the dramatic element.

The status of Negroes in American life makes it easy for a crowd movement to be initiated among them. In America the Negro is repressed and an outcast. Some people are inclined to feel that this repression is only felt by cultured Negroes. As a matter of fact many of them can find satisfaction in the intellectual and spiritual things of life and do not need the support to their personalities that the average man requires. The average Negro, like other mediocre people, must be fed upon empty and silly fictions in order that life may be bearable. In the South the most insignificant white man is made of supreme worth simply by the fact of his color, not to mention the added support he receives from the Kiwanis or the Klan.

Garvey came to America at a time when all groups were asserting themselves. Many American Negroes have belittled his influence on the ground that he is a West Indian. It has been said that Garvey was only able to attract the support of his fellow-countrymen. The truth is that Garvey aroused the Negroes of Georgia as much as those of New York, except where the black preacher discouraged anything that threatened his income, or where white domination smothered every earthly hope. Moreover, this prejudice against the West Indian Negro loses sight of the contribution of the West Indian to the American Negro. The West Indian who has been ruled by a small minority instead of being oppressed by the majority, is more worldly in his outlook. He has been successful in business. He does not need the lodge, with its promise of an imposing funeral, or the church, with its hope of a heavenly abode as an escape from a sense of inferiority. By his example he has given the American Negro an earthly goal.

Garvey went even further. He not only promised the despised Negro a paradise on earth, but he made the Negro an important person in his immediate environment. He invented honors and social distinctions and converted every social invention to his use in his effort to make his followers feel important. While everyone was not a "Knight" or "Sir" all his followers were "Fellow-men of the Negro Race." Even more concrete distinctions were open to all. The women were organized into Black Cross Nurses, and the men became uniformed members of the vanguard of the Great African Army. A uniformed member of a Negro lodge paled in significance beside a soldier of the Army of Africa. A Negro might be a porter during the day, taking his orders from white men but he was an officer in the black army when it assembled at night in Liberty Hall. Many a Negro went about his work singing in his heart that he was a member of the great army marching to "heights of achievements." And even in basing his program upon fantastic claims of empire, Garvey always impressed his followers that his promise was more realistic than that of those who were constantly arguing for the theoretical rights of the Negro. In the Negro World for October 18, 1924, he warned his followers that

> Those who try to ridicule the idea that America is a white man's country are going to find themselves sadly disappointed one of these days, homeless, shelterless, and unprovided for. Some of us do harp on our constitutional rights, which sounds reasonable in the righteous interpretation thereof, but we are forgetting that righteousness is alien to the world and that sin and materialism now triumph, and for material glory and honor and selfishness will slay his brother. And in the knowledge of this is the Negro still so foolish as to believe that the majority of other races are going to be so unfair and unjust to themselves as to yield to weaker peoples that which they themselves desire?

And after all this is essentially what most Negroes believe in spite of the celebrated faith of the Negro in America.

A closer examination of the ideals and symbols which Garvey has set up before his followers shows his mastery of the technique of exciting and holding crowds. The Negro group becomes idealized. Therefore he declares he is as strongly against race intermixture as a Ku Kluxer. He believes in a "pure black race just as all self respecting whites believe in a pure white race." According to Garvey civilization is about to fall and the Negro is called upon to evolve a national ideal, based upon freedom, human liberty, and true democracy." The "redemption of Africa" is the creation of a new paradise. It is always almost at hand.

This belief has served the same purpose as does the myth of the general strike in the syndicalist movement. Garvey, who is dealing with people imbued with religious feeling, endows the redemption of Africa with the mystery of the regeneration of mankind. He said on one occasion: "No one knows when the hour of Africa's redemption cometh. It is in the wind. It is coming one day like a storm. It will be here. When that day comes, all Africa will stand together."

Garvey gave the crowd that followed him victims to vent their hatred upon, just as the evangelist turns the hatred of his followers upon the Devil. Every rabble must find someone to blame for its woes. The Negro who is poor, ignorant, and weak naturally wants to place the blame on anything except his own incapacity. Therefore Garvey was always ascribing the misfortunes of the Negro group to traitors and enemies. Although the identity of these "traitors" and "enemies" was often obscure, as a rule they turned out to be Negro intellectuals. The cause for such animosity against this class of Negroes is apparent when we remember that Garvey himself lacks formal education.

Garvey who was well acquainted with the tremendous influence of religion in the life of the Negro, proved himself matchless in assimilating his own program to the religious experience of the Negro. Christmas, with its association of the lowly birth of Jesus, became symbolic of the Negro's birth among the nations of the world. Easter became the symbol of the resurrection of an oppressed and crucified race. Such naive symbolism easily kindled enthusiasm among his followers. At other times Garvey made his own situation appear similar to that of Jesus. Just as the Jews incited the Roman authorities against Jesus, other Negro leaders were making the United States authorities persecute him.

Most discussions of the Garvey movement have been concerned with the feasibility of his schemes and the legal aspects of the charge which brought him finally to the Atlanta Federal Prison. It is idle to attempt to apply to the schemes that attract crowds the test of reasonableness. Even experience fails to teach a crowd anything, for the crowd satisfies its vanity and longing in the beliefs it holds. Nor is it surprising to find Garvey's followers regarding his imprisonment at present as martyrdom for the cause he represents, although the technical charge on which he was convicted is only indirectly related to his program. But Garvey has not failed to exploit his imprisonment. He knows that the average man is impressed if anyone suffers. Upon his arrest he gave out the following statement: "There has never been a movement where the Leader has not suffered for the Cause, and not received the ingratitude of the people. I, like the rest, am prepared for the consequence." As he entered the prison in Atlanta he sent a message to his followers which appeared in his paper, the Negro World, for February 14, 1925. He paints himself as a sufferer for his group and blames his lot on a group of plotters. In commending his wife to the care of his followers he says: "All I have, I have given to you. I have sacrificed my home and my loving wife for you. I intrust her to your charge, to protect and defend in my absence. She is the bravest little woman I know." Such pathos he knew the mob could not resist, and the final word he sent to his supporters under the caption, "If I Die in Atlanta," with its apocalyptic message, raises him above mortals. He bade them "Look for me in the whirlwind or the storm, look for me all around you, for, with God's grace, I shall come and bring with me the countless millions of black slaves who have died in America and the West Indies and the millions in Africa to aid you in the fight for liberty, freedom, and life."

Since his imprisonment Garvey has continued to send his weekly message on the front of his paper to his followers warning them against their enemies and exhorting them to remain faithful to him in his suffering. It is uncritical to regard Garvey as a common swindler who has sought simply to enrich himself, when the evidence seems to place him among those so-called cranks who refuse to deal realistically with life. He has the distinction of initiating the first real mass movement among American Negroes.

Martha and Shadow

By DONALD DAVIDSON

Martha said, Shadow is little, Shadow is not Able as I when world is gold in the sun.
She walked in the dew of the clover, and Martha forgot
That the day had only begun.

Martha said, Shadow is weak, Shadow will fly
Wherever I come in the dew and clover of morning.
Shadow was smaller at noon but would not die.
Shadow, not Martha, had a long time for growing.

Shadow said, Martha is little, Martha is not Able as I in evening, and evening is last.
Martha said, Shadow is all. I know thee, O Shadow!
I will come into Shadow and rest.

Glimpses of Arthur Gleason

By HELEN HAYES GLEASON

II

THE larger part of our wardrobes consisted of bathing suits, all sorts and conditions of bathing suits. The assortment grew with his habit of swimming in each new place, as he tramped and traveled about, buying a new suit for the time. On a visit to a friend—he used to tell me this chuckling and beaming with the humor of it—he was put into quite a splendid room. His luggage contained two articles, pajamas and a bathing suit. The man-servant courteously unpacked the bag and spread the two garments across the bed as he was wont to do for more formal guests. My husband was delighted over it.

In Maine, where we often went, a bathing suit was the only thing he ever wore, unless walking, and then only the under garment. In time a suit became faded enough for the discard, but it was nearly impossible to get his permission to dispose of the old friend. The first camp we visited permitted us to come to meals in dry suits—a fine camp, he thought. But on returning after an absence abroad, we found the old haunts had become civilized. People "dressed" for outdoor sports, sat about looking unhappy with lack of conveniences, or herded together under lights, not caring for the hush of evening broken by chirp and rustle of night creatures. We had happy times in Maine.

> Three weeks of sunshine, and only one gray day [he wrote a friend from there]. For many hours each day we drink in the energy of the sun. Later it will come out as laughter and health and good cheer. Sunlight is the cure of all maladies of body and spirit. It ends introspection and the modern diseases of ingrowing morbid fancies, for the sun's ray travels faster than the poison weeds and burns them up at their secret root. Under the sun man takes his proper place in the natural world as a wholesome little creature, instead of a bundle of fevers and nerves and swollen egoisms.
>
> The greatest word of the nineteenth century was Emerson's "Why so hot, little man?" meaning man, the sickly and civilized, taking himself so seriously as lord of life and master of things, when he is really one more among a million, million living things that swim and fly and creep and take their moment of being. One is never hot in the sun. One is hot in a closed room.
>
> All social gain of hours and wages will only be good as it frees human beings for the sun and the air, the soil and the water. The social movement can have no other goal than into the outdoors.
>
> I have never known man or woman, loving the outdoors, who did not have a something of distinction.
>
> Nature is the beginning and end of religion, for all beauty is here, and it is man's chief end to adore the creation. Worship and wonder are one. Man is the spectator and the participant in a carnival. Fortunately for him, his five senses are of narrow range and admit only a thousandth part of the color and sounds and motion. If he could hear and see more of the riot, he would go drunk with exuberance; and by nightfall under the moon, he would go mad.

That year we shipped our luggage to Boston, starting south at Old Orchard Beach on foot, each carrying extra shoes, slicker, and night clothes. We followed literally at the water's edge. That brought us to estuaries which meant detours unless some boatman gave a lift. But there is no time element for tramps, no schedule. It delighted him to wander carelessly, to tarry at every whim. A passing trolley bore the sign "York County Fair"; so to the county fair we went for half a day. Perched on a fence we saw the ball game and the team-dragging contest. He entered into all these simple entertainments with the freshness of a child. We ate country-cooked chicken and home-made cake. A "boarding house for workingmen" was recommended for the night's lodging. It was clean and very reasonable, but not a room was left except a small one on the top floor, in which Madam stored her fruit. It contained a camp cot. Perhaps another could be squeezed in, if we would like to stay. So in we turned to dream among the countless jars of gleaming jellies and vegetables lining the walls.

The spot which offered no chance of a swim was really a bit second-class in his mind.

"If I had the range of reading," he said, "I should make myself an anthology of swimming." This he wanted to do very much and had been collecting notes toward it for several years.

All places found him swimming. The shore-line was inevitably the goal, no matter what the mission. The Belgian Coast, the Lido, Bermuda, a New Jersey canal, New Orleans, California. He swam half way round the world and planned to complete the circle. Every stretch of water-front from Portland, Maine, to Atlantic City had been explored by him; every quiet nook around New York he knew. When the crowds gradually seeped through he retired to a more remote spot. A bare rock jutting up off shore, thirty feet of water round about, was a glorious place to swim the day. His system was to take two suits, always lying about in a dry one, for the winds were keen, though the rock was warm under the sun.

* * * * *

I have been turning over quite idly leaves of books frequently in his hands. It was his habit to read with a lead pencil, marking everything that moved him, heavily underlining between the typed lines, if it were special, as well as inclosing the passage in a long curved line at the margin. The old pencil had a way of traveling up and down the page, tapping with the rubber end, as he read.

In the preface of Cardinal Newman's "Apologia" is the following paragraph which in large part could be said of him who has marked it:

> Whose natural impulse it has ever been to speak out; who has ever spoken too much rather than too little; who would have saved himself many a scrape, if he had been wise enough to hold his tongue; who has ever been fair to the doctrines and arguments of his opponents; who has never slurred over facts and reasonings which told against himself; who has never given his name or authority to proofs which he thought unsound, or to testimony which he did not think at least plausible; who has never shrunk from confessing a fault when he felt that he had committed one; who has ever consulted for others more than for himself; who has given up much that he loved and prized and could have retained, but that he loved honesty better than name, and truth better than dear friends.

He was devoted to Newman. During one of our many moves the "Apologia" disappeared, remaining a mystery for months. Not a week passed without a turning out of some corner for the "Apologia"; friends had searching inquiries directed at them and innocent babes were suspected until at last the truant book turned up. The volume is old and fingered. The following sentences seem to have [illegible] part of him: "Living movements do not come of com[illegible] nor are great ideas worked out through the p[illegible] though it and [illegible] pointy part. [illegible] thinking it was allowable in extreme cases for me to li[illegible] never to equivocate."

He always traveled with Gibbon and as invariably—such was the balance of his taste—with the Popular Maga[illegible] for which he used to write and for which he always wanted to write again when time could be found. [illegible] Herbert Knibbs was a favorite for yarns and Western verse. The Popular of 20th December was in his bag on the [illegible] journey, with Vol 2 of Gibbon's Rome. A "San Diego to Yuma" Pullman ticket is between pages 354 and 355. The pages are heavily [illegible]. The chapters [illegible] Gibbon was fond of using certain words over and over in a chapter, and all through the [illegible] The two words are singularly applicable to A. G. —his [illegible] for truth and [illegible] [illegible] him, perhaps.

In his traveling bag, also, in a grubby note-book is written this about someone; it doesn't say about whom, but it fits himself: "A fine chap whom his family adored, whom friends adored, whom his wife adored." There was [illegible] about this [illegible] book habit. He would fill in the first page with his age and weight, height, name, [illegible] just like a child. One of these [illegible] in order to jot down the titles of "books wanted" as they occurred to him.

I wonder if anyone ever [illegible] a trail of personality as A. G. through the books he read. Because he had not read widely in the originals of many languages he felt that he was not widely read. His standard was that of the scholar. [illegible] by a scholar, he was scholarly in tendency. The same thoroughness and interest that characterized each thing he did was evident in his reading. Books were companions. Thumbmarked and [illegible] if you will, but to be stuck in for inner worth not outside dress. He read swiftly and deeply. The things he cared for he read over and over. Two or three old familiar [illegible] at a time he kept going in addition. Deep in [illegible] shelves for special favorites that had been his [illegible] the year—from childhood to [illegible] Dips dated. They included books on swimming, early school and college favorites, fairy tales, "Gil Blas," the "Apologia," books written and given by friends.

To one who wrote with enthusiasm over a light [illegible] seller, he replied:

> As against that, I recommend Richard Hooker and Gibbon.
>
> How are these for rules:
>
> No committees.
>
> No time for magazines, weeklies, and cheap stuff.
>
> A little time each day on the great source books of the ages: Plato, Dante, Goethe, Shakespeare, Whitman, Wordsworth, Hooker, Gibbon, Plutarch, Virgil, Homer, Sophocles, Euripides, Dostoevski, Turgenev, Tolstoi, Flaubert, Melville, Molière, Balzac—whichever one or ones are for the person; whichever feeds.

When a book was given to us together, I asserted an equal claim, having it on my own desk for visits, but if that book had found its place on the three shelves over his desk, then the visit was inevitably short. The day would come which revealed its flight. The companionship of these certain books became a working background as necessary as a pipe.

* * * * *

By his own gift of companionship he drew men and women. His genius for friendship was founded on a mutual give and take. He learned the value of equality in this way.

When he was a very small person he was conscious of a feeling of superiority toward the coachman. One day in the stable yard he ordered the man to do something or other, swelling up inside himself over his own position in the world. Whereupon the coachman turned deliberately and swore at him conscientiously, continuously, for some moments, swore him into thin air, into holy fear, swore him into an everlasting and wholesome respect for all working people. He always gave that man credit for teaching him a great lesson in life. It makes me laugh when I see his early pictures and consider what a meek-looking little boy he was; how [illegible] must have been, that virtuous flood of self-respect splashing over his snobbish head. And snobbish seems an unfair word to use. Yet I take his own account of it, that he had a feeling of superiority and was a snob for the time, but the lesson was final. Never afterward by a tone of voice or a gesture could the word be fitted to him.

(To be concluded.)

In the Driftway

HOW much of genuine objection and how much of contemptible envy is there in the chorus of disapproval that has gone up among American lawn-tennis fans over the decision of Suzanne Lenglen to become a professional? Of all the claptrap the Drifter has caught just one comment that rang entirely sane and sincere. A woman player told a newspaper interviewer that if anybody were to offer her $100,000 to turn professional she would think a long while before refusing. So would most of the others. Or else they would think a long while afterward in remorse. The only exceptions to this are such persons as already have a good income for which they don't have to work.

* * * * *

A GOOD many of those who have discussed Lenglen's action have questioned if it were possible for her to make a satisfactory professional tour in this country. That is the concern not of Lenglen but of her manager, and he probably knows what he is about from his previous experience with "Red" Grange in professional football. What the Drifter takes exception to is the assumption running through most comment that professional sport is less reputable than amateur and that Lenglen has lowered herself by going into it. It is high time that the absurdity of this attitude be generally challenged, especially in a supposedly democratic country like the United States. Modern sport, of course, is a creation of the aristocratic class in Great Britain and was originally intended as the exclusive province of "gentlemen." The whole theory of amateurism is essentially snobbish, although it is only fair to say its most zealous champions in this country have usually not realized it and have been inspired by other motives. The common argument has been that if sport is to be a pastime it is necessary to make it profitless in order that all the prizes and honors shall not be carried off by persons who adopt it as a business. But nearly every sport of consequence has now reached a stage of development and specialization where in order to be a star it is necessary to make a business of it. A champion cannot have a serious and absorbing vocation outside. He must have independent income, be supported by devotees of the sport, or earn his livelihood by some occupation indirectly dependent upon his reputation as a player. There is no more amateurism in the upper realms of tennis than in the most definitive professionalism.

* * * * *

AND if there were it would be nothing to brag about. We do not honor amateur actors or physicians above professional ones. In some fields of sport, indeed, the professional seems decidedly superior to the amateur. The Drifter respects the maligned "pot hunter" who captures game or fish as a livelihood, though he may believe in restricting his actions in the general interest. For the so-called sportsman who kills only for the fun of killing the Drifter has no sympathy at all. And as to professional lawn tennis, the Drifter will sign a contract to engage in it tomorrow for anybody's $100,000. Indeed for that sum he will become a professional almost anything except a drifter. He insists upon his amateur status there for fear that otherwise drifting would become too much like a job—and so a bore.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Who Killed the Nonpartisan League?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your issue of the [illegible] Nation the rash statement is made that "When the [illegible] of North Dakota a few years ago set afoot a genuine program of self-help under the Nonpartisan League, it was smashed by the business and banking interests of the great cities."

From seven years' experience with the Nonpartisan League I would state rather that the league was helped [illegible] tion and killed by its friends. To blame the demise in all States except North Dakota on Big Business is to deprive farmers of a valuable lesson in organization. The foremost cause was the reluctance of farmers to pay dues. Most of them want to carry on war without a commissary department of their own financing. Big Business had no power to keep the average farmer from paying his moderate dues or honoring his signature on the post-dated check.

As early as 1918 agitation was started in several States for "more democracy" by men who wanted power and were woefully lacking in the ability to organize and agitate as compared with the Townley staff. As a matter of fact, there was too much democracy in the league for a fighting farmer organization rather than too little; farmers can't fight successfully unless they trust leaders who have proved themselves.

The most important [illegible] a [illegible] mistake, forced [illegible] by results [illegible] of struggling for mutual [illegible] many really [illegible] daily newspapers and [illegible] and too much [illegible] as one [illegible] The farmers must [illegible] their organization to work out of this mistake.

Next I would mention the [illegible] from successful elections. Outside of North Dakota none of the people elected to prominent office were worth a [illegible] time in help to the farmer organization. Cromwell's Ironsides furnish a better example for farmers who want to vote for their own than "[illegible] parties," "[illegible] for farmers and [illegible]" and other stuff preached by the Farmer-Labor "improvers" on the Nonpartisan League.

"Big Business" wept with the farmers over the dues they paid to the league. But is that a manly excuse for $2,000,000 in unpaid post-dated checks?

If we do not blame the devil beyond [illegible] day, the good people may [illegible] repaid in their own slaveryland.

Devils Lake, North Dakota, July [illegible]

J. H. [illegible]

Formerly editor of the Nonpartisan Leader

Catullus Again

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Verbiage is the chief [illegible] William Hard's translation of Catullus in The Nation of July 7. For the sake of hendecasyllabic lines words are introduced not necessary either for the sense or emotional effect. In the Latin there is no extra word. Is a faithful translation desired, equally unlabored, try this:

[illegible]

Williams, Mass., July 9

MARGARET A. GAFFNEY

American Art or Negro Art?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: For Mr. Schuyler to say that "the Negro masses . . . are no different from the white masses" in America seems to me obviously absurd. Fundamentally, perhaps, all peoples are the same. But as long as the Negro remains a segregated group in this country he must reflect certain racial and environmental differences which are his own. The very fact that Negroes do straighten their hair and try to forget their racial background makes them different from white people. If they were exactly like the dominant class they would not have to try so hard to imitate them. Again it seems quite as absurd to say that spirituals and blues are not Negro as it is to say that cowboy [illegible] Scotland do not belong to Scotland. The spirituals and blues are American, certainly, but they are also very much American Negro. And if one can say that some of my poems have no racial distinctiveness about them or that "Cane" is not Negro one can say with equal truth that "Nize Baby" is purely American.

From an [illegible] it may be entirely desirable that the Negro become as much like his white American brother as possible. Surely colored people want all the opportunities and advantages that anyone else possesses here in our country. But until America has completely absorbed the Negro and until segregation and racial self-consciousness have entirely disappeared, the true work of art from the Negro artist is bound, if it have any color and distinctiveness at all, to reflect his racial background and his racial environment.

New York, June 14

LANGSTON HUGHES

Books

Retreat

By LAURENCE JORDAN

Now against winter let us bring together
Food for our pantry, coal, and woolen sheets,
Thatch of tough straw to roof us safe from weather
And stones to wall us from the noise of streets.
Let us put kitchen-ware upon the shelves
Of cutlery and crockery and plate;
And build a bed for us to rest ourselves
And lay some logs and kindling on the grate.

In hoarded foodstuffs and hard masonries
Must lie security of some small kind.
Out of such perishable goods as these
We build the little hope that we may find Ourselves in thirty years, face pressed to face,
Talking together, sitting in this place.

The Getting of Ideas

The Art of Thought. By Graham Wallas. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $4.50.

A BOOK on the art of thought in general suffers from the initial disadvantage of an extremely abstract subject. Like those college courses in elocution or pedagogy which teach the youthful orator who has nothing to say how to say it eloquently or which instruct the prospective teacher who knows nothing how to impart his ignorance effectively, a discussion of thinking without reference to its concrete objective might [illegible]. Mr. Wallas adds to these difficulties by the peculiar psychological position which he maintains. In his opposition to the unsatisfactory mechanistic view which regards reflective thought as a passive result of instinctive activity, he goes so far to the other extreme as to say: "the cortex of the upper brain may, for instance, of its own initiative, to satisfy its own need of activity . . . start the process of thought." Surely it is not necessary in order to vindicate the significance and the active character of thought thus to assume a vitalistic magic, acting without stimulus, in the cortex. Reaction is still action, and if instincts are satisfied through reason so much the better for both. Not by its separation from instincts but by its coordination of them is reason honored. No treatment of rational activity which cuts it off from its natural antecedents and consequents can ever be profound. Nevertheless, despite all this, a study of thought processes in themselves if the student be a good introspectionist or a careful collector of data may still be practically useful. Mr. Wallas's "Art of Thought" purports to be addressed to the "young adult"; actually it is even more addressed to the teacher, and there are few teachers, young or old, who cannot derive profitable suggestions from its pages.

For Mr. Wallas, as for most modern psychologists, there is no such fundamental difference in method between reason and imagination as was supposed by nineteenth-century writers like Shelley and Carlyle—although, be it noted in passing, Mr. Wallas gives unwonted recognition to the intellectual value of Shelley's "Defense of Poetry," which "ought to be read and reread by every student of the psychology of thought." Both reason and imagination pass through similar stages: Preparation, the gathering of material; Incubation, the unconscious mulling over it; Illumination, the sudden appearance of new ideas; supplemented in the case of reason by a fourth stage, Verification, in which the new ideas are tested by facts. It is in his emphasis upon the necessity of the second stage, whose very existence is not guessed by many teachers and is certainly not allowed for anywhere in our educational scheme, that the greatest value of Mr. Wallas's work lies. But the chapters that follow on the dangers of too much and too little habit, too much and too little energy, too much and too little mysticism, too much—and here no too little—faith in uniform compulsory education are equally reasonable and convincing. Mr. Wallas writes with the practical wisdom born of long experience. He gives no hint, to be sure, as to how to use our new ideas when we get them—and here his art of thought is an incomplete art—but he does, what for most of us is perhaps more needful, suggest methods by which we may at least get some new ideas to use.

ERNEST SUTHERLAND BATES

Soldier and Peasant

From Double Eagle to Red Flag. By General P. N. Krassnoff. Duffield and Company. Two volumes. $6.50.

Broken Earth. By Maurice Hindus. International Publishers. $2.

GENERAL KRASSNOFF, commander of Cossack cavalry during the Great War and ataman of the Don in 1918 in opposition to the Bolshevik rule, presents under a slight fictional disguise his reminiscences of the period from the accession of Nicholas II to the victory of Bolshevism. The English translation has been considerably cut; but even at that, the two volumes contain a sample of almost everything one has ever read in newspapers and novels about twentieth-century Russia. Imagine it all seen through the eyes of an observer whose attitude is clearly that of his hero, Lieutenant—later General—Sablin. "Everything is simple in your mind," says young Sablin's mistress. "Partitions are put up, shelves are made and labels attached: God, the church, candles, ikons, devotions; the Czar, fidelity, parades, the regiment, the uniform, the honor of the uniform, the regimental family in general, things permitted, things not permitted." At the end of his career, just before he is tortured and killed by the Bolsheviks, he is the same. Life has lost all meaning for him because it has been deprived of the beauty which is brought into it by the family, the fatherland, one's regiment, the army, victory, and the Czar as the symbol of all that is elevated. A minor hero is the young and romantic Karpoff, whose example had a "beneficent influence" on his officers and men, devoted to their regiment, their emperor, and their mother country, "ignorant of political events, fulfilling their duty to man and God." General Krassnoff explains the Sablins and Karpoffs in terms of their traditions, training, and ideals; and because he shares their viewpoint he makes them comprehensible and even appealing—to any imagination that has ever been nourished on Scott and Dumas.

The war scenes at the front he pictures as one who knows his business. We see the growing disorganization of the army through his dismayed eyes. Here he had been living the "life of a Christian with other Christians at the front." And then comes chaos in the rear, and a spreading contagion. But the book, too, becomes chaotic as the revolution advances. The raw deeds of men, when their motives are not understood or even plausibly guessed at, make horrible reading. The details of the organized sadism and eroticism, which spell Bolshevism to the general, may be partly the product of the imagination that in war and revolution spawns atrocity tales out of its own perverse cravings. But that men should imagine such things is almost as bad as that they should sometimes execute them. Some can take their vicarious sadism straight; others have to have it disguised with varying degrees of subtlety. One has to take it straight from the general. Of course, he does attempt to motivate Bolshevism—as a Jewish conspiracy: "The seventy sages whom nobody knows, and the Russian revolution led from the depths of Zion. A mystery? But it is far better not to think." He chooses the better part. He calls Lenin—whose "puffed-out cheeks are distorted by the senseless smile of an idiot"—"a monster in the full sense of the word, a product of degeneration brought on by an intellectual life surpassing his mental capacity, as well as by the calm, inactive life of a philosopher." Not, certainly, a charge to be brought against the intellectual life of General Krassnoff. But the Taras Bulbas are more picturesque than the philosophers.

At the end of the second volume one comes across a baroness who executes a batch of local Bolshevik commissars. She sits on her steed, all her gestures full of supple feminine grace, and shoots them one by one. Then she folds her revolver, hangs it on her belt, takes up the bridle, and with a soft sigh of gratified passion, and looking with tired eyes once more on the Bolsheviks she has killed, rides away.

Like her, one looks with tired eyes on the carnage and turns to such a book as "Broken Earth" to recover one's balance and find a credible Russia. Mr. Hindus knew the pre-war peasant and was a part of the village life. After nineteen years in the United States he returned two or three years ago to see what had happened to the Russia that "toils, produces, fights, and dies." He went from village to village, stayed with peasants in their homes, worked with them, attended their churches, dances, festivals, weddings, funerals, mass meetings. He tells the story of the mujik in his own village in central Russia, because he believes it to be essentially the story of the mujik throughout Russia. Or rather, he lets the peasant tell his own story, for he found that he had become amazingly articulate. Mr. Hindus records it all with such simplicity, such freedom from bias, and such a sensitiveness to human values that one is reminded again and again of Turgenev. He rode to pasture with the boys and girls of his village, who were anxious to detach the American visitor from the old people, who hadn't learned anything in recent years. The young people, they assured him, were different; some had been in the Red Army; had read books and listened to lectures. None of them—not even the little ones—any longer believed in ghosts and spirits, water-nymphs and house-goblins. Such beliefs came from the priests who had served the Czar and kept the mujiks in ignorance, so that they could come and sprinkle water in the houses and drive out evil spirits and get some rye and a basket of eggs. Instead of the old talk that Mr. Hindus remembered from his boyhood, talk of girls and dances and horses and town fairs and gipsies, he hears words totally unknown to his boyhood—science, technique, tractors, atheism, education, culture, electricity. The minds of these young folks were teeming with new concepts, new ideas, new beliefs. They were aware of the world outside their village. The older peasants—as one chapter shows only too clearly—are still servile, brutal, dishonest in many ways. But the manager of the experimental farm, in spite of the endless discouragement of the struggle to enlighten the peasant, expresses at the end his belief in the mujik's gifts and possibilities. Come back thirty years from now and you will see! Mr. Hindus gives a moving sketch of one intellectual whom he calls "the last of the Russian Hamlets." Does he really believe that? DOROTHY BREWSTER

Georg Brandes in Greece

Hellas. By Georg Brandes. The Adelphi Company. $2.50.

IT is not often given to a man approaching his eightieth birthday to fulfil a lifelong dream, especially a dream so deeply rooted as was Georg Brandes's desire to see Greece. In 1918 he said: "I have been these forty years the only Dane who was a Greek, not a Hebrew"; this though on both sides he was of Jewish origin. In 1922 he wrote: "He who has longed all his life for Attica, and who finally realizes his dream of standing on the Acropolis, is seized with a feeling of awe. . . . The longer one has thirsted for this sight, the profounder is one's rapture."

There is something profoundly moving in this book commemorating the journey, not because it contains much that is new about either ancient or modern Greece but because it reveals so clearly the tragic aspect of the author's genius. A flaming firebrand of advanced views in his youth, denied a professorship in the University of Copenhagen because of his liberalism, in his maturity the most comprehensive interpreter of the whole range of European culture, he lived to see himself neglected as a reactionary because the rationalism he represented no longer stirred men's minds. Greece, with all its shortcomings, was his homeland, because Greece to him represented the nearest approach in history to the reign of reason. Therefore he could say: "Greece, not Palestine, is the Holy Land, and until humanity recognizes this fact, until humanity discards its indifference to truth and its hatred of reason, which in our day is cankering all souls and permeating all of literature and philosophy, we shall witness nothing more nor less than a continuous and progressive decay of our civilization."

Brandes turned to Greece not only because of its rationality but also because of its respect for nature and the natural man. In addition, Greece had created and exalted the hero, and in his mature years Brandes saw hope for humanity only in the leadership of exceptional men. In the possibility of enlightening the mob he had no faith. "The first decisive trait in the spiritual history of Hellas was its production of the hero." This, we may surmise, is the reason why Homer and Xenophon are the two authors chosen for extended discussion in this book; Xenophon, the eulogist of Cyrus the Great and his distinguished descendant for whom the ten thousand Greeks marched into Persia; Homer, the creator of Achilles, Hector, Odysseus, Ajax, and Diomed. This part of the discussion is vivid and informing, and will interest both laymen and scholars.

The book has no unity save that indicated by its title. The last two chapters deal vigorously with post-war politics, particularly the Venizelos episode and the scandals of Allied diplomacy in the Near East. The translation is frequently awkward and sometimes inaccurate. We are told, for example, that in certain of his writings Xenophon "entered into controversy with Plato," when the meaning must have been "came into rivalry with Plato." CLARA M. SMERTENKO

An Incomplete Examination

Christian Science. An Examination of the Religion of Health. By Sir William Barrett and Rosa M. Barrett. Henry Holt and Company. $1.75.

AS coming from a former member of the Society of Psychical Research who wrote on Spiritualism and Swedenborgianism, this book has a tendency toward the occult. The title is question-begging. Christian Science is not necessarily a religion of health, considering the hundreds of cases of malpractice for which its healers are responsible. The author cites but one instance, that of the death from diphtheria of some young girls in 1903. It is, of course, proper to say that Eddyism preaches optimism, but, as Sir William elsewhere acknowledges, it is a "bastard idealism," a misconception of the system of Bishop Berkeley—of whom, he adds, it is doubtful if Mrs. Eddy ever heard. The latter statement is typical of a book which does not go back to original sources. The first edition of "Science and Health" does mention the good Irish bishop and attempts to utilize his system of genuine spiritual realism to uphold the Eddyite illusionism. The author nevertheless exposes the logical error of Eddyism. Because matter, from the idealist standpoint, is dependent on mind, we do not conclude that matter has no existence.

Mrs. Eddy's "sublime indifference to logic" is amusingly pointed out in the statement that Christian Scientists all find the delusions of clothing, food, shelter, and money necessary, while bicycles, motors, and trains may with advantage be used by them as by others. In fact, the only material thing to be given up is medicine. As a scientist Sir William is logical, but he has not all the evidence at hand. He deplores the lack of an index to Mrs. Eddy's writings, although a complete concordance has been out for a decade. He speaks of the excellences of the Christian Science Monitor, evidently unaware that those qualities were originally due to the English journalist Mr. Dixon, who was finally deposed from his editorship because of his independent spirit. Again, he accepts the statement of Mrs. Eddy herself that she had no physician "besides God," apparently not knowing that she had a private physician in constant attendance in her latter years of invalidism besides the Massachusetts doctor who gave the death certificate; all this in spite of Mrs. Eddy's statement that "the heart, blood, lungs, and brain have nothing to do with life," and that "man is incapable of death." Again the author is too modest in his statement that Mother Eddy left some $2,000,000.

Despite these errors the book is valuable for its showing up of the true Mrs. Eddy, who is declared to be an egoistic megalomaniac like John Alexander Dowie. In the chapter on The Growth of Christian Science the author is misled by statistics from headquarters. The church is not growing as it once did, as is evidenced by the refusal of its directors to furnish an account of their numbers to the Federal Census. However, they may make up in quality what they lack in quantity, for, as Sir William asks: How can poor persons belong to a body which demands a per capita tax, the purchase of expensive textbooks and journals, and, in the case of a healer, extremely high prices for instruction—in Mrs. Eddy's day $300 for seven lessons?

WOODBRIDGE RILEY

A Part of the History of Russia

A History of Russia. By Sir Bernard Pares. Alfred A. Knopf. $6.

THE author of this book, as director of the School of Slavonic Studies in the University of London and chief editor of the Slavonic Review, is a conspicuous figure among English-speaking students of Slavdom. In further evidence of its respectability the book has been included in the Borzoi Historical Serie , edited by our most energetic propagandist of "the new history." Such considerations may tempt the reader to hope for a discussion of the true nature of social evolution in Russia, and to expect a presentation of the subject in the light of the work of Russian scholars in the last half-century.

But these 500 pages offer no improvement in this respect over Rambaud's "Histoire de la Russie," published in 1869. Rejecting the brilliant work of the late V. O. Kliûchevski, who "is lordly in his disregard of all that does not serve his purpose," Sir Bernard meanders pleasantly onward, recording names at the rate of a page to the dozen, and jotting down the day of the month—frequently without identifying the year—on which such heroes as Dmitri Donskoi crossed this or that river or performed other memorable feats. It would not, however, be fair to imply that Sir Bernard does not essay the production of illuminating generalizations concerning human development; the following is a fair sample of his endeavors: "The Russian has a historical feeling for Christendom. But he has also a world-sense, living in his earliest songs, not to be flaunted, very deep-rooted but all the more real for that. . . ." Another tenet of "the new history," the correlation of geography and history, finds place in Sir Bernard's creed; the result is the enunciation of a novel but obviously important sociological principle: "These lordly water-roads could not be of much use to anyone while they remained only scenes of warfare. Thus the river taught peace, and the river taught trade." One of the rare "problems of Russian history" is Paul's paternity; peasant revolts "it would be weary work to enumerate." More enlivening are the relations of Russia with other states; possibly for this reason the diplomatic and military dealings of Russian rulers are recounted with a fulness out of all proportion to the space devoted to the domestic history of Russia. In the latter field are offered such profound conclusions as that, in declining Kiev, "the trouble was that there were too many" princes, or that Ivan IV of Moscow was one of Russia's "most enlightened statesmen," though his policy was "madness."

This curious concentration on the periphery of Russian history, sparing only random observations for the history of Russia itself, is not to be explained by reference to the Russian historians cited in the bibliography. Kliûchevski, whom Sir Bernard salutes as his "teacher and master," produced a splendid synthesis of Russia's social evolution, based on careful analysis of economic as well as political developments. Of the rich historical literature that rewards the student bold enough to overcome the language barrier the existing incomplete and faulty translations of Kliûchevski and Kornilov can convey only a dim conception. Between the history of Russia as interpreted by Kliûchevski, Platonov, or the Marxist Pokrovski and the history of Russia as retailed by a man who deems his subject "pathetic," no comparison is possible.

As a consideration of relatively slight importance must be mentioned the infinity of technical defects in the present work. Sir Bernard, disdaining the standard American and British systems of transliteration, lays down new rules to which he does not adhere. Typographical errors abound, not always assignable to a compositor's dismay at some sibilant name. Eight diagrams function as maps. However, there is a complete and accurate table of English rulers from Egbert to George V. But a truce with technicalities. Ignore them all, the book remains a true borzoi, shaped in the interest of speed, beautiful in its whimsical ungainliness, with very little space for cerebration.

J. D. CLARKSON

But the Answer?

What Is Civilization? By Maeterlinck, Mukerji, and Others. With an Introduction by Hendrik van Loon. Duffield and Company. $2.50.

"WHAT is it all about? And is it possible for the human race to get beyond a certain point of civilization without writing its own sentence of doom?" The answers to these questions, no matter how partial or faulty, would, from the authors selected, make an intensely interesting book. But before he brought on his authors Mr. van Loon's rapidly revolving mind threw out some more questions. "This is an era of rivalry," he says; "the war, that strange racial eruption which took place at the very eve of the supposed brotherhood of man, has made many ancient nations conscious of their almost forgotten past. They now press forward with their claims. They prove to us that their ancestral contributions to the cause of civilization surpass those of any other people. . . . Who will get the prize?"

And so he bows on his crowd of contestants, and the proofs of their ancestral contributions fill the book from which we had hoped to get new light on the more engrossing query, "What is Civilization?" Mukerji states the case for India, W. E. B. DuBois for Africa, Chi Fung-liu for China, Maeterlinck, a critical, almost unsympathetic, and so possibly more interesting expositor, for Egypt, Herbert Spinden for Ancient America, Ralph Adams Cram for the Middle Ages, and Paul Shorey for the Age of Pericles. After them come two curiously inapposite contributions, about Women and America's Bad Manners, from Ramsay Traquair and Elizabeth Robins Pennell.

Each essay offers much that is interesting. Herbert Spinden keeps most closely to the original submerged question, and his brilliant summary of the little-known economic gifts of the American Indian is particularly interesting to the present reviewer.

Mr. Traquair's contribution is extraordinary. Original he must be or perish. And so he takes the attributes popularly accredited to woman and presents them all to men. Are women generally supposed to be more imaginative and more artistic than men? We may not have realized this until he tells us, but in any case he will achieve greatness by asserting that men are more imaginative and more artistic than women. The arts, he says, are thought to be women's particular domain, and their cultivation is considered effeminate in men. Yet in vain do we attempt to force women to be artists, and in vain do we attempt to prevent men. Natural capacities triumph. Although "in art matters women have for ruler a century and a half been better trained than men," "in the whole field of art women are inferior to men in imagination, intuition, and the abstract qualities." Conversely, [illegible] to keep women out of practical affairs. But in these they excel. Witness a long list of great women executives, beginning with Queen Elizabeth. In his enthusiasm Mr. Traquair has forgotten that far from having to overcome antipathies to a woman as an executive, Elizabeth was born to the purple. He has forgotten that half the thrones in Europe were then occupied by women. The traditional differences between men and women wilt strangely under critical analysis, but Mr. Traquair's method simply substitutes for them a new list, quite as unproved, quite as absurd, and quite as dangerous if it should be accepted.

Books in Brief

Notorious Literary Attacks. Edited with an Introduction by Albert Mordell. Boni and Liveright. $2.50.

After a learned and sensible introduction, in which he makes it clear that the joke was not always on the critics who damned for one good reason or another a great writer of their time, Mr. Mordell reprints from nineteenth-century periodicals attacks on Hazlitt, Leigh Hunt, Coleridge, Shelley, Byron, Carlyle, Charlotte Brontë, Hawthorne, Tennyson, Dickens, Swinburne, Rossetti, Whitman, Hardy, and Stevenson. A curious and valuable work of reference.

Swinburne. By Harold Nicolson. Herman Melville. By John Freeman. Walt Whitman. By [illegible]. George Meredith. By J. B. Priestley. [illegible] The Macmillan Company. $1.25 each.

These [illegible] Series are done with uniform competence by men [illegible] recently made names for themselves in England as biographers and critics. The first is much the most interesting of the four, though its subject is perhaps the slightest.

The Selected Poems of Lizette Woodworth Reese. George H. Doran Company. $2.

Presumably the best work of a poetess whose ranking by certain judges remains inexplicably high. Always lucid, intelligent, and sweet, this verse never achieves any important kind of power.

Savonarola: A Dramatic Poem. By Charlotte Eliot. With an Introduction by T. S. Eliot. London: R. Cobden-Sanderson. 5/.

Thirteen scenes in traditional rhymed pentameters from the life of Savonarola. The introduction by the author's son is careful and interesting.

Sherwood Anderson's Notebook. Boni and Liveright. $2.50.

Few of the ideas contained in these scraps will be unfamiliar to a reader of Mr. Anderson's novels and of "A Story-Teller's Story." As always, he protests against a dull, mechanical, and desperate art. But he has never written more engagingly, and he furnishes us a few autobiographical items of [illegible] interest.

Men and Horses. By Ross Santee. With More than One Hundred Original Drawings by the Author. The Century Company. $5.

Mr. Santee's stories of cow-punchers are good, but his pictures of men and [illegible] are better. His eye for character is as keen and sure. Whether his horses are bucking across a whole page or standing forlorn, as if forgotten, in a tail-piece, they are realized with a realism as easy as it is affectionate.

Tall Tales of the Kentucky Mountains. By Percy MacKaye. George H. Doran Company. $2.50.

Mr. MacKaye continues to make excellent if somewhat formidable capital out of his residence among the Kentucky mountaineers. It is his language, smothered in dialect, which is formidable; his own spirit is as generous and guileless as ever.

Acoma, The Sky City. Study in Pueblo Indian History and Civilization. By Mrs. William T. Sedgwick. Harvard University Press. $4.

An attractive contribution to the growing literature of the aboriginal Southwest. A wealth of illustrations assists an intelligent and informed text.

James Thomson. Britannia. A Poem. 1729. John Dryden. Alexander's Feast: or the Power of Musique. 1697. John Gay. To a Lady on Her Passion for Old China. 1725. William Collins. Persian Eclogues. 1742. Oxford University Press. Respective prices: $2.25; $2; $1.50; $2.

Four more items in the series of type-facsimiles so brilliantly begun by the Oxford Press a year ago.

First Wounds. A Story in Five Chapters of Verse. By John Varney. Francesco Bianco.

An autobiography dealing in not always lucid free verse with important states of the soul. If some of this very long poem is hard going, much of it reaches to beauty and truth; and for the idea of such an enterprise there can, of course, be nothing but praise.

Blues: An Anthology. Edited by W. C. Handy. With an Introduction by Abbe Niles. Illustrations by Miguel Covarrubias. Albert and Charles Boni. $3.50.

A remarkable contribution to the growing knowledge of Negro poetry and music. The source in this case was obscure and difficult of access, being the living habits of the race; but the right persons have gone to it, and the result is both wonderful and amusing.

After the Ball, Forty Years of Melody. By Charles K. Harris. Frank-Maurice, Inc. $4.

Mr. Harris is the undisputed [illegible] "sad-couple love" lyric industry. In one inspired hour he wrote the words and music of "After the Ball," and received about $100,000 for his pains. Scores upon scores (he lists over 100 separate titles) of "real, clean, home songs," among which the best known are "Break the News to Mother" and "Hello, Central, Give Me Heaven," have poured [illegible] ointment of his 376-page volume: he admits that, from the beginning, he wisely eschewed "any vulgar stuff" from his ballads and constantly capitalized sentiment. "There'll Come a Time," perhaps, when "Baby's Eyes" and "My Mother's Kiss" will be "Better than Gold" "'Mid the Green Fields of Virginia," but, unless you read this book, "You'll Never Know" how much Mr. Harris is concerned with the royalties that still pour in "In the Good Old-Fashioned Way."

International Relations Section

The Women's Peace Congress at Dublin

By ANNE MARTIN

THE congress of the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom just closed in Dublin has made a notable impression on public opinion in this still-distracted island. The opening reception at the National University revealed Eamon De Valera and President Cosgrave under the same roof for the first time since the treaty was signed in 1921. Not to mention delegates from former belligerent, allied, and neutral countries, the congress brought Republican and De Valera factions, women from the Six Counties and women from the Free State, into peaceful and harmonious cooperation for the pacification of the world, if not of Ireland.

Always acute politicians, Irish leaders of different factions lost no time in arranging meetings at private houses to inform delegates from different countries as to the status and aims of their respective groups. Opportunity was thus given to hear Miss Mary MacSwiney and Miss Albinia Brodrick (sister of Lord Midleton), representing the extreme Republicans under "President" Art O'Connor, who will have nothing to do with the Free State Government; De Valera, Mrs. Sheehy Skeffington, Countess Markiewicz, and Mrs. Despard, who believe the forty-eight Republicans elected to the Dail should take their seats if the troublesome oath of allegiance to the King can be removed, thus creating an effective opposition; and Senator James Douglas, Deputy Tom Johnson (Labor), and Mrs. Stopford Green (Senator in her own right and widow of the English historian), who discussed the international, political, economic, and social aims of the Free State Government.

The unemployed, too, under their leader, Larkin, were heard by the congress in plenary session. They entered bearing placards which read: "80,000 people and their dependents are without work or maintenance," "Children are dying of hunger in this land of plenty," "In the midst of 'peace' we perish of hunger," "The Irish workers enjoy the freedom to starve." A subscription was taken, and a referent appointed on the general subject of unemployment.

During the session the aims of the league were restated, after long debate, to be "to unite the women in all countries who are opposed to every kind of war, exploitation, and oppression, and who work for universal disarmament and for the solution of conflicts by the recognition of human solidarity, by conciliation and arbitration, by world cooperation, and by the establishment of social, political, and economic justice for all, without distinction of sex, race, class, or creed." It was a disappointment, in view of Great Britain's power in the League of Nations, to find that many of the British section, under the leadership of Miss Kathleen Courtney, manifested a more nationalistic spirit than any other section throughout the debate on this statement of aim. At the same time it is amazing that this woman's congress, composed of one hundred and fifty delegates and alternates from eighteen war-torn countries, nearly all of them extremely individual and determined women, reached practical working unanimity in spite of sharp differences of opinion. Probably no one in the world could have organized this Babel into concrete, creative internationalism as successfully as Jane Addams. Nothing is more illuminating than to watch Miss Addams in the chair. Whatever her own views, she is supremely neutral. Her object is to give both sides as complete a hearing as possible within the practical limits of time, and to reach conclusions by general agreement rather than by arbitrary majority rule, whenever possible. She is, as she says herself, a "middle-of-the-road" person. Nevertheless, her far-sighted and neutral leadership as chairman certainly made it possible for this to be more than a "middle-of-the-road" congress.

Its program covered the subjects Women in Parliament, Colonial and Economic Imperialism, Militarism, Arbitration, and Disarmament, and Relations Between Majorities and Minorities. The work of the league, apart from the executive, is carried on between congresses by three commissions dealing with the last three subjects. These commissions, after open session and debates, report their conclusions back to the plenary sessions of the congress in the form of resolutions.

Those presented by the Commission on Colonial and Economic Imperialism and adopted by the congress strike at the roots of war and go as far in urging the establishment of a new international and economic order, without war, as the most ardent radical could wish. The resolutions on arbitration and disarmament call upon the national sections (1) to press upon their governments the necessity of settling all disputes by negotiations for conciliation and arbitration through a third party, (2) to offer an all-in-arbitration treaty to any nation ready to sign it, and (3) to sign the optional clause of the statute setting up the Permanent Court of International Justice. The congress urged further that national sections everywhere should undertake a campaign of education for arbitration and for hastening the development of a system of international law.

The importance of educating children under school age on constructive peace lines was emphasized and the national sections were instructed to oppose attempts to give military training in schools and colleges. A resolution opposing as a form of military propaganda the use by the United States Government of postal cancelation stamps urging the attendance of its citizens at military training camps was carried in principle. Resolutions were adopted against the manufacture of poison gas, armaments, and munitions (the news of the terrible powder and munitions explosion in New Jersey came that day). The congress called upon the International Disarmament Conference of the League of Nations to prepare with all possible energy and good-will for complete and universal disarmament.

The discussions and report of the Commission on Relations between Majorities and Minorities, in the skilful hands of Miss Catherine Marshall (Great Britain) as chairman, assisted by Dr. Hilda Clark (a granddaughter of John Bright) as rapporteur, were perhaps the most expert work of the congress. Frau Yella Hertzka (Austria) stated that in Europe before the war there were minority populations amounting to some 28,000,000, which increased to more than 35,000,000 after the war; that more than twenty different minority groups existed in Austria alone; and that the solution seemed to be some form of federated state government. Miss Marshall spoke of Italy's delay in concluding a minority treaty to define the rights of the millions of Germans it rules in the Austrian Tyrol. Mrs. H. M. Swanwick urged the league to work for the establishment of a Minorities Commission by the League of Nations, because "it is not the least use to have a body like the Council of the League of Nations into which to pour your griefs."

The congress adopted the resolutions of the commission, which in abridged form are as follows:

1. National sections in countries where minorities [illegible] compact [illegible] ernment as a possible solution.

2. Declaring the belief that racial, religious, [illegible] tural minorities form [illegible] majorities are urged to allow special treatment [illegible] as regards language, religion, and other cultural di[illegible] thus serving justice and the interests of the state.

3. The Council of the League of Nations [illegible] carry out its responsibility for the protection of [illegible] by appointing a commission through which petit[illegible] warded to it may be investigated.

4. The coming Assembly of the League of N[illegible] asked to consider whether countries which have minor[illegible] problems, but have not concluded minority treat[illegible] acted in accordance with the resolution passed unanim[illegible] at the third Assembly with reference to the treatmen[illegible] minorities.

The congress also appealed to the governments of [illegible] which are members of the League of Nations to pre[illegible] a convention establishing minimum rights of minorities, which the Assembly of the League could recommend [illegible] its members for signature. The congress requested [illegible] minorities commission to undertake work for conciliation between minorities and their governments by forming branches of the Women's International League composed of members of both majority and minority parties; by publication of facts concerning the treatment of minorities; by helping minorities, when requested, to put their complaints in proper form as required by the regulations of the Council of the League of Nations.

Contributors to This Issue

CARLTON BEALS has been in Mexico for several years [illegible] ing a study of social and political institutions there. He has been chosen to lecture on Mexican history to the committee of Americans now visiting Mexico [illegible] vitation of President Calles.

E. FRANKLIN FRAZIER is director of the Atlanta Scho[illegible] Social Work.

HELEN HAYES GLEASON is Mrs. Arthur Gleason.

ERNEST SUTHERLAND BATES was formerly professor of philosophy at the University of Oregon.

DOROTHY BREWSTER is assistant professor of English in Columbia University and coauthor of "Dead Reckonings in Fiction."

CLARA M. SMERTENKO frequently reviews books on [illegible] literature and philosophy for The Nation.

WOODBRIDGE RILEY is professor of philosophy at Vassar College and coauthor of "The Faith, the Falsity, and the Failure of Christian Science."

J. D. CLARKSON is a member of the department of history at the College of the City of New York.

ALICE BEAL PARSONS is the author of "Woman's Dilemma."

ANNE MARTIN of Nevada was the first woman to run for the United States Senate.

HERMAN MELVILLE'S
MOBY DICK
COMPLETE AND UNABRIDGED
With a new introduction by Raymond Weaver IS NOW IN THE MODERN LIBRARY

Other New Additions Include
A NIGHT IN THE LUXEMBOURG
By [illegible]
OSCAR WILDE'S DE PROFUNDIS with a new introduction By FRANK HARRIS
ZULEIKA DOBSON
By MAX BEERBOHM

120 TITLES IN ALL—NO END OF FIRST RATE READING—LARGE, CLEAR TYPE IN FULL LIMP BINDING, CUT TO FIT THE POCKET

95 Cents a Copy
WHEREVER BOOKS ARE SOLD
Send for a free Illustrated Catalogue

MODERN LIBRARY
INCORPORATED
71 West 45th Street New York

A MOSCOW DIARY A graphic human-interest story of the life of the people in Soviet Russia today, by Anna Porter. Cloth, $1.00 postpaid. Ask for book catalog.
CHARLES H. KERR & CO. 347 East Ohio Street, Chicago

REAL HARRIS HOMESPUNS Direct from the Makers at Manufacturer's Price
Suit Lengths Cut to Order. Price $2.00 per Yard. Postage Paid
NEWALL, 150 Stornoway, Scotland. Write for patterns stating shades [illegible]

Want someone for a position? Want a position?
The responsive employer and the intelligent applicant for employment read The Nation. Write for rates. Dept. W, The Nation.

ENTERTAINING SIGNIFICANT
The Life of William Godwin
By FORD K. BROWN
An interesting biography, filling the need for an adequate account of Godwin's life and a criticism of his works. The romance, all too short, of his love for Mary Wollstonecraft; the tragic comedy of his later private life; his much-discussed relations with his son-in-law Shelley; his contacts with famous men of his time; and his vital contributions to the political thought of both England and America, all receive their due and make it a book of unusual value. $6.00
E. P. DUTTON & CO., 681 Fifth Ave., New York

SUMMER COURSES IN JEWISH SOCIAL WORK

THE TRAINING SCHOOL FOR JEWISH SOCIAL WORK offers summer institutes for Social Workers in addition to its regular course of fifteen months' graduate study in preparation for Jewish social work.

The following courses will be given during the second session of the Summer Session which will begin August 16, 1926

Social and Religious Institutions of the Jews..M. M. Kaplan
Modern Jewish History.....I. B. Berkson
The Field of Jewish Social Service in the U. S...M. J. Karpf
Adiminstration of Jewish Family Case Work Societies.....M. J. Karpf
Administration of Jewish Federations.....M. B. Hexter
Post War Problems of the Jews.....I. B. Berkson

THE FALL QUARTER WILL BEGIN OCTOBER 5, 1926

Send for a description of the Courses of Study given for the General Announcement

THE TRAINING SCHOOL FOR JEWISH SOCIAL WORK

Connected with the Young Men's and Young Women's Hebrew Association

210 West 91st Street, New York City

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

THE English monthly "Foreign Affairs" has recently printed articles on Disarmament by Professor Noel Baker, on Mussolini by Professor Salvemini, on India and South Africa by Lord Olivier, on Anglo-Soviet Relations by Arthur Ponsonby, M.P. (late Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs), on Abyssinia by Commander Kenworthy, on the Balkans by Henri Barbusse, on Freedom of Speech by Harold Laski, on American Capitalism by J. A. Hobson.

It is a live paper, fearlessly dealing with the most burning questions. Price yearly by post $1.22, from 34 Victoria Street, London, S. W. 1.

accept nothing but

Non Depressant nor Habit Forming

In Convenient Aluminum Boxes

At every drug store

Midol for HEADACHE

GENERAL DRUG CO., - 94 N. Moore Street, New York

ADULT CAMPS AND VACATION PLACES

Trout Lake Hotel and Camp

New Lisbon, Otsego County

THE Gem of natural beauty and splendor in the heart of the Adirondacks is now under the management of L. B. BAILIN, formerly owner of the famous and Educational Director of the Workmen's Circle.

An abode for recreation and regeneration. All sports, tennis courts, music band, dancing, concerts, readings, camp fires, etc.

Excellent cuisine—High class American Jewish cooking. All modern conveniences. Moderate prices. Open until October 1st. Special rates after Labor Day.

Address (Booklet) or reservation to

I. B. BAILIN

Director Trout Lake Hotel and Camp

Phone: Sidney Lodge 6 F 21 Thousand Pines, N. Y.

INDIAN HEAD CAMP

ECHO LAKE

$28.50 per week

Adults only

Land and water Sports. Safe Beach

Daily $1.50

WRITE FOR THE NEW SIGN

WONDER CAMP OF THE ADIRONDACKS

P. O. Box 118, Warrensburg, N. Y.

N. Y. C. by Day or Night Boat to Albany and train to Lake George. Individual Boat car will call for you. Send for booklet. Office address: B. Heifetz, 887 Brook Avenue, Bronx, N. Y. City. Melrose 1821

THIRD SEASON

Set among famous scenes of Adirondack beauty 5 miles above Lake George

Round Trip, New York to Lake George, $12.28

CAMP GREATER UTOPIA

Lee Lawrence, Pa.

Hebrew Camp for Boys in America unrivalled in its location. The ideals of [illegible] combine the best of camp life with the highest education.

[illegible] nature and philosophy in [illegible] philosophy.

Rates $28 weekly.

THE OCEANO Bridgeport, R. I.

Open June 15

Charming [illegible] week-end parties

ADULT CAMPS

THE STUDENTS' CAMP

[illegible] N. Y.

Camp grounds cover an entire mountain hollow in the Catskills, 2,000 feet elevation, of great natural beauty. Modern in every Camp [illegible] simplicity and congenial, intelligent companions.

[illegible] accommodations [illegible] the looking [illegible] reservations to

EDUCATIONAL

Mt. Airy School

[illegible] the country where [illegible]

Select a suburb which has a progressive school

[illegible] Street

[illegible] Ave.

Merchantville, N. J.

[illegible] school for boys and [illegible] Hot luncheons. [illegible] Write for booklet.

MISS ANNA J. GANNETT, Director.

STUDY AT HOME

Directed by

The University of Chicago

Courses in English, History, Chemistry, Economics, [illegible] and many other subjects leading to [illegible] degrees. Address: [illegible] Div. 19, The University of Chicago, Chicago, Ill.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXIII NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 25, 1926 No. 3190

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS
EDITORIALS:
The Temples as Factories
Must Colleges Be Prudish?
The Sins of the Sky
The Bargaining of Nations
CARTOON By Hendrik van Loon
HOW AMERICA FOOLS HERSELF By James Truslow Adams
BRITAIN'S MIDSUMMER MOOD By J. Ramsay MacDonald
THE NEW ENGLAND FARM COMES BACK By Nathaniel Vincent Crawford
BOLSHEVISM IN CHINA By Lewis S. Gannett
FATE AND THE OHIO GANG By Ernest Gruening
IN THE DRIFTWAY By the Drifter
CORRESPONDENCE
BOOKS AND MUSIC
Lost Footsteps By Amanda Threatwit Hall
First Glances By Mark Van Doren
A Bible for Rebels By H. J. Muller
The Madness of Nations By Percy Philip Parker
Roads to Heaven By Clifton P. Fadiman
Jesus and Paul By Shirley Jackson Case
Half a Loaf By Robert Dunn
Books in Brief
Music The Emotional Trend in Performance By Lazare Saminsky
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION
The Balkan Government By Edward H. Carlin
Greece and Turkey From an Alliance

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors
LEWIS S. GANNETT
ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor FREDA KIRCHWEY

Literary Editor MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: No. 38 South Dearborn Street. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London W. C. 1, England.

GENERAL MOTORS AND GENERAL ANDREWS have both had a good deal of attention in the public prints lately. General Andrews, our prohibition director, declares his mission to England to obtain the aid of that country in enforcing the Volstead law was "125 per cent successful," but he refuses any details. General Motors, our foremost industrial corporation, declares a 50 per cent stock dividend, and there are enough details to convince anybody. The distribution is estimated as worth some $600,000,000, a greater melon than even the famous 400 per cent stock dividend of the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey in 1922. In addition to its regular dividend of 7 per cent, General Motors has already paid extra cash dividends on its common shares of 5 and 4 per cent this year in addition to its stock distribution. The net earnings on the common stock for the first six months of this year were $17.33 per share. In accordance with the tenets of our industrial system these fabulous profits go to the men who have put their dollars into the enterprise, not to the workers who have put into it their labor, their skill, and their lives. As between the 50 per cent success of General Motors and the 125 per cent success of General Andrews, the former would seem to be the more negotiable. In fact, General Andrews reminds us of the old argument between the parson and the judge as to who was most powerful. "I can consign a man to hell," boasted the parson, "whereas you can send him only to jail." "Yes," replied the judge, "but when I send a man to jail he's good."

NEARLY TWO MILLION CHILDREN of British coal miners are in actual want as the result of the fifteen weeks of strike and lockout. The poverty of the British miners is a tragic thing even when they are working for full-time wages, but when unemployment and strikes cut off normal pay it is difficult to see how their families live at all. Many of the miners' families are living on two dollars and a half of grocery tickets a week. The women's relief committee is spending $3,000 a week on work among nursing and expectant mothers. Even if negotiations in London should end the strike in the near future, the need of the miners' families will be very great. The Women's Committee for the Relief of British Miners' Wives and Children has an office at Room 904, 70 Fifth Avenue, New York. Checks may be sent to Miss Ellen Wilkinson, chairman, or Miss Evelyn Preston, treasurer.

ATLEE POMERENE won the Democratic Senatorial primary in Ohio from Judge Florence Allen, and is accordingly being groomed for the Presidency. There is, so far as we can discover, little to recommend Mr. Pomerene for the post except the fact that he is colorless; and we doubt if colorlessness is enough. Warren Harding won the Republican nomination in 1920 because he seemed an adequately pallid compromise candidate after Wood and Lowden had torn each other's chances to bits. But in the election he was faced by the even more colorless James N. Cox—doubtless many readers of The Nation would be unable to remember today where they had heard that name before—and overwhelmed him. In 1924 McAdoo and Smith fought each other to the death in Madison Square Garden, and John W. Davis was named on the theory that a good candidate was a man who had made few enemies. The guess was wrong; either McAdoo or Smith, despite the bitter enmities of Madison Square, would have made a better campaign. If the Democrats should be foolish enough to nominate for the Presidency a vapid Pomerene we predict another overwhelming defeat. We will venture another prophecy: They will not nominate Pomerene, because he will be defeated at the polls by the handsome, florid, oratorical Senator Willis who at least knows an issue when he sees it, and does not attempt like Pomerene to go through a campaign without mentioning prohibition.

"VIC" DONAHEY, the ardent Dry who won his third Democratic nomination for Governor of Ohio, also nurses Presidential ambitions, and has no love for Mr. Pomerene. His Republican opponent, like Senator Willis, is also a Dry. So Ohio's primaries gave as little comfort to the Wet friends of "Al" Smith as did Alabama's, where Klan-sponsored candidates rode to victory, after charging their opponents with the infamous—in Alabama—crime of being sympathetic to a Catholic's presidential aspirations.

In Arkansas a Wet, J. E. Martineau, captured the Democratic nomination for governor, but Senator Caraway, bone-dry, won his renomination without even bothering to make a campaign. It was Senator Caraway who recently made the shrewd prophecy that if "Al" Smith could get the nomination he would carry the South and the country for the Presidency; but that he could not get a Southern vote at the convention for the nomination. He also thought that if the unit rule, which binds State delegations to vote solidly, and the two-thirds rule, which defeated Champ Clark in 1912 and McAdoo in 1924, were abolished "Al" would get the nomination. Maybe. Meanwhile "Brother Charley" Bryan has come back into the field by winning the Democratic nomination for his old post of Governor of Nebraska. And the Tenth District of Kentucky has proved loyal to the New Feminism by nominating Mrs. John W. Langley to fill her husband's post in Congress while he takes up a temporary residence in Atlanta Penitentiary, following his conviction for illegally removing whiskey from government warehouses.

CARMI THOMPSON'S BODYGUARD of newspapermen is doing its best to persuade America that Philippine opinion is divided upon independence and rubber. They make much of the fact that a Filipino assemblyman has introduced a bill to permit corporations to acquire more than the four square miles of rubber lands which the present law allows them; they do not mention the fact that the sponsor of this measure owes his membership in the Assembly to appointment by Governor General Wood. No elected Filipino would dare make such a proposal. Other correspondents hail Aguinaldo's friendship with Governor Wood, apparently unaware that Aguinaldo, precisely because of that association, has lost his popular following in the islands. He may soon lose even his presidency of the Veteranos de la Revolucion, which he himself founded; and his government pension may be cut off because of his intimacy with the hated Wood. And not even Aguinaldo dares openly oppose independence; not one Filipino leader has come out against it. Wherever Carmi Thompson and the reporters have gone, with one exception, they have been met with independence demonstrations. That one exception was the Havemeyer sugar estates in Mindoro. The villagers may be backward, but they have absorbed the traditional belief in self-government which America itself seems to be losing.

MEXICO'S LAWS, harsh as they are, permit priests of Mexican birth to offer the sacraments in church edifices to the faithful. But the Catholic church, in its violent effort to bring the Mexican Government to terms, is refusing to permit even its Mexican-born priests to perform their sacerdotal functions. To deny good Catholics the privilege of mass while teaching that mass is an important means to salvation hardly seems Christian. From the church's own point of view it would seem that it was committing a grievous moral and spiritual wrong to its own members. No sign appears that the Government is thinking of yielding. The protests by foreign Catholics have only strengthened its position at home; indeed it is now talking of prosecuting the archbishop for criticizing the anti-clerical laws and of removing federal prosecutors who have not been sufficiently stern in prosecuting priests who violated the laws. It would seem time for a truce. We would urge the Mexican Government to permit the priests the widest latitude in criticizing the laws; and we would urge the church to accept and obey them while seeking their repeal.

ANOTHER FORMIDABLE REVOLUTIONARY MOVEMENT to overthrow the Soviet Government has started and died—in press dispatches from Bucharest, Copenhagen, Paris, and Berlin. This time Stalin was murdered, Trotzky in flight, Zinoviev exiled, and a Menshevik army marching on Moscow. Most editors refused to accept the rumors without a whole shaker of salt, but the New York World's Paris correspondent scribbled as in the good old days of 1917-1920, the New York American plastered several editions with sensational collapse-news, not omitting the usual headline, End of Soviet Rule Foreseen by Kerensky, and the Indianapolis Star gloated editorially over the certain downfall of an economic system opposed to American business morals. The decreasing gullibility of the press concerning alarmist news from Russia is encouraging; perhaps it is related to the growing conviction among American business men that Russia is a valuable market. Certainly the Associated Press came through the last orgy of rumors with no sensational myths to its debit: its Moscow correspondent cabled that > Peace and order reign throughout Russia. M. Stalin continues to direct affairs of state from his sanctum in the Kremlin. Trotzky, who occupies a small apartment near that of M. Stalin, is engrossed in literary pursuits and work for the concessions committee, while Zinoviev is taking a much-needed period of rest in the Caucasus. . . . There has been no mobilization of Soviet troops, as reported abroad, nor has there been the slightest indication of any uprising within the army. . . . Moscow is as quiet as any American city on Sunday morning.

THE PASSAIC STRIKERS have been admitted to the United Textile Workers of America; the United Front Committee is destined to pass from the scene; and its Communist head, Albert Weisbord, has promised to withdraw from all participation in the affairs of the new local. Thus a young and outcast strike organization becomes a duly legitimatized union and is taken into the respectable family of the American Federation of Labor. It will be harder now for the employers to refuse to associate with it. During the long weeks of struggle they have exploited and capitalized the Communist affiliations of the strike leader and some of his associates. They have charged that the strike was directed from Communist headquarters in Chicago, if not from Moscow. They have, perhaps, dragged this red herring around a bit too freely. The transformation of a group of strikers whom they have advertised as bolsheviks and rebels into a local of one of the most conservative unions in the American Federation of Labor has snatched their herring away. They are left with the uncomfortable alternative of discussing terms with their workers or of thinking up a new set of [illegible].

JUDGE ROBERT C. BALTZELL of the United States District Court was a major factor in breaking the recent strike of Indianapolis street-car men with an injunction enforced in the Daugherty manner. The motormen and conductors of the Indianapolis Street Railway Company, who received 37 to 42 cents an hour, joined the Amalgamated Association of Street and Electric Railway Employees and went on strike for a wage increase and the recognition of their union. They had not even started the strike when Judge Baltzell issued a sweeping injunction ordering them not to persuade any workers to break their "labor contract" with the company. John M. Parker and Robert C. Armstrong, international vice-presidents of the union, were sent to Marion County jail for ninety days for contempt of court without a trial by jury because they expressed themselves in favor of the strike. Harry Boggs, the local union president, escaped to West Virginia, but was brought back and jailed. Parker and Armstrong were released on $10,000 bond only after they promised to leave town. So the strike was beaten and Indianapolis made safe for a 37-cent wage scale.

COULD MEN BE SENT TO PRISON for contempt of court without a trial by jury for advocating the destruction of a contract to work for one cent a day for life? Presumably they could be. A contract is a contract, say the judges; men who seek jobs are free agents, say the judges. A few years ago the anti-picketing injunction was the favorite weapon of employers; the restraining order granted by the judge in time of strike was based on the danger of physical violence. Today it seems unnecessary to prove physical violence to get an injunction. In 1924 the United States Supreme Court ruled that even labor leaders should have a trial by jury when accused of violating a federal injunction if they were also alleged to have committed a crime. But, as The Nation pointed out at that time, federal judges were still left free to send men to prison under their most despotic injunctions for acts which were not crimes under the law. So the injunction against breaking a labor contract is becoming even more popular with employers than the anti-picketing injunction. Non-union employees can be bound in perpetuity by contract not to strike; if they strike, a federal judge may be found to send their leaders to jail for contempt of court. An air-tight barrier against strikes—only a federal law against such use of injunctions can preserve the workers' right to strike.

STRIKES ARE AS VARIOUS as pickles. Not all are by employees against employers—sometimes bosses walk out on other bosses. In Brooklyn recently customers of small neighborhood tailoring shops, rushing around to have a crease put in their Sunday trousers, found the door shut and the following notice staring them in the eyes:

CLOSED

ON ACCOUNT OF STRIKE AGAINST THE WHOLESALE CLEANERS WHO HAVE FORMED A TRUST TO DRIVE THE RETAIL STOREKEEPER OUT OF BUSINESS BY RAISING THE PRICE AND COMPELLING US TO ACCEPT WORK IN ANY CONDITION.

Also That The Factory Refuses To Be Responsible For Shrinking, Buckles and Belts On Your Clothes.

THIS FIGHT IS FOR THE BENEFIT OF THE PUBLIC

The Retail Cleaners & Tailors Union
Local 17798, American Federation of Labor

These shops are small places subsisting mostly on repair work, pressing, and dry cleaning, which latter they send out to large establishments. The boss is usually the hardest worker in the shop but he commonly has a helper or so. We know nothing of the merits of this case of Tailor vs. Tailor, but we are often annoyed ourselves at the exactions of big business and heartily sympathize with the grievance in regard to "shrinking, buckles, and belts."

LIBERTY, the Chicago Tribune's weekly imitation of the Saturday Evening Post, has discovered a solution to the French debt problem. It is all quite simple—like the Mexican problem. Liberty's solution of the Mexican problem would be to wipe out the Mexican boundary without consent of Mexico; Liberty's solution of the French debt problem would be the sale of the French West Indies to us for part of the debt. It ignores the fact that we do not want the islands, France does not want to sell them, and the natives do not want to be sold. The third point is the most important and it is also the one most likely to be ignored. Why should colored citizens of a self-respecting community submit to the patronage and policing of Jim Crow officers from Virginia? And who, after the experience of Haiti, could want American bankers and marines? Incidentally our experience in buying second-hand islands would seem to indicate that the upkeep exceeds the initial cost plus the gross profits by several hundred per cent.

WILLIAMSTOWN'S INSTITUTE OF POLITICS continues to discuss international affairs in the cultivated atmosphere of an academic tea. Now and then outsiders who do not understand the rules of the game introduce a little realistic bitterness—as when a Bulgar and a Serb discuss Macedonia at the same round table. But it was typical of Williamstown that even in this battle the combatants violently accused each other of "discourtesy." Something in the peaceful foliage of the Williamstown elms seems to give the discussions a pale cast of unreality. Perhaps, too, there is something in the choice of speakers. We should like to see more of the passion and drama of world politics presented to these round tables—we should like them to listen to a Hindu pouring out the bitterness of his hatred of British empire, a Manuel Ugarte from Latin America proclaiming the menace of Yankeeism, a Russian preaching the advent of communism, a Chinese who has never suffered intellectual naturalization in the West. There is nothing to equal the institute as a sounding-board for tempered discussion of international politics, but a certain caution in its leadership shelters it from the world as it is.

ONE HUNDRED NEGRO TENNIS PLAYERS fought for the Rhetta cup at St. Louis in the tenth annual Negro tennis tournament of the United States. Why should these tennis players be segregated in a race tournament? Is national tennis a white man's burden? Why should not the best of the Negro players be entered in the national tournaments at Forest Hills? Many Northern colleges make a contribution to racial understanding by welcoming Negro players in football, baseball, and track; last year the University of Chicago had a Negro tennis player on its team. But in professional baseball, non-collegiate tennis, and in most other sports Negroes are barred from competition with whites. The major leagues never admit even the most brilliant colored baseball player; the National Lawn Tennis Association is made up exclusively of white members. Even in pugilism Dempsey has been able to use the color line to evade meeting his most powerful rival, who happens to be a Negro. The colored athletes have only one alternative, to develop sporting events of their own. There are already Negro baseball circuits throughout the country; near Westfield, New Jersey, the Negroes of New York have their own country club and golf course, and a new club is opening near Boston.

The Tropics as Factories

THE conquest of the tropics means the extension of the factory system to them. Europeans and North Americans, having reared a civilization on a basis of factories and slums (but not having half solved the problems raised by either), are pushing this method into the plains and jungles of the torrid zone. The character of the factory differs but the system remains the same. In the temperate zone a factory is usually inclosed by walls and a roof and is devoted to the production of a fabricated article; in the tropics it is given to the raising of a natural product and often is not even surrounded by a fence. But in each case there is a large investment of capital, corporate management, the displacement of handiwork by machinery wherever it is possible; there is a curtailment of opportunity and independence for a majority of the workers; there is the standardized life of the automaton—company houses, company stores, company schools, company theaters, sometimes even company brothels.

The extension of the factory system to the tropics is the result of the difference between the agriculture of the temperate and the torrid zones. The diversified farming of the United States has grown through individual effort and ownership. We are still essentially a country of small farms and farmers. Some look to factory methods as the solution of our present agricultural distress, but so far it is mostly talk. Meanwhile factory methods are already an actuality in the tropics. The crops of those regions seem to call for larger-scale production while the preliminary attack upon the land calls for the expenditure of large capital and the application of the best modern technology and science. Parched and desolate plains have been irrigated and made green with rustling sugar-cane; dark, tangled, steaming jungles have been turned into waving banana groves.

There is something magnificent about this present-day assault upon the tropics. As recently as a quarter of a century ago many eminent authorities believed that the white man must stick to the temperate zone. Benjamin Kidd declared that the tropics were not for the Caucasian. Yet we are there. The building of the Panama Canal was a great object lesson. Since then no tropical climate or disease has been viewed as beyond the conquest of modern medicine or sanitation; no miasmatic swamp or insect-ridden forest has been regarded as impossible of subdual by twentieth-century capital and engineering working hand in hand.

During the twentieth century the United States has assumed a foremost place in the economic subjugation of the tropics. Tobacco we have long bought there, and in recent years American companies have acquired vast plantations and large control in the Caribbean and the Philippines. The ever increasing demand for sugar has brought still more important changes. Hawaii and Cuba have been planted acre upon acre with cane; they ooze syrup down to the very seashore. The arid south coast of Porto Rico has been redeemed with giant irrigation works and made sweet with sugar, while the rich, moist acres of Santo Domingo are today giving way before the plow to rise in fields of luxuriant cane. Then there is the banana. The West India islands can no longer supply the demand, and the United Fruit Company owns enormous tracts of land, railways, docks, and—almost—governments along the low, steaming east coast of Central America. Most recently of all has come the stupendous call for rubber. Harvey Firestone has already begun the exploitation of Liberia, and an insistent campaign is rising for large-scale production in the Philippines. Carmi Thompson, who theoretically is in the islands to report on conditions to President Coolidge, is practically using his visit—or allowing it to be used—in the interest of a raucous propaganda for the exploitation of the Philippines rubberwise by American interests, even if native wishes and all our promises have to go by the board.

There is something terrible as well as magnificent in the entrance of the new conquistadores of the tropics. Our attack upon humanity has been as ruthless and invincible as that upon nature. Native life in the tropics has commonly been poor and squalid but it has been warmly human. We have brought it medicine and sanitation for our own self-preservation and for economic reasons, but we have also brought it standardized ugliness and peonage. We have turned men and women from a fairly free and easy existence through desultory agriculture into wage slaves with sophisticated ambitions and vices. We have brought the drabness and soddenness of the mill town or the coal mine among the palm fronds of the Caribbean and the Pacific. In Hawaii we have even dispossessed the native Kanakas and imported the more industrious and economically profitable Japanese.

Probably the most serious of all the consequences of the introduction of the factory system to the tropics is the elimination of the small landowner and producer—the swallowing of his holdings by large plantations and his own downfall into a wage-worker and a renter. In Porto Rico individual farms decreased in number by about one third from 1910 to 1920; those of fewer than ten acres fell by one-half. The republic of Haiti, as a measure of self-protection, had a law against the alien ownership of land; the American Occupation, in the interest of industrial exploitation, repealed the measure.

The profit-making industrial system of the United States, in its newest and largest-scale manifestations, is going head-on into the tropics. Thus far there is no stopping it, and just in those places where there is most need of limitation and control by government such authority is usually weakest and most corrupt. But there is hope that as the newer, more democratic forms of industrialism make way in the United States they will penetrate also to our tropical frontiers. As the cooperative movement, unionization, and employee control grow, they will make themselves felt. Also the increasing interest in city planning, garden villages, and public parks may lead to some effort toward beauty as well as efficiency in our tropical factories. Most hope of all, perhaps, is to be placed in the rise of intelligent proletarianism in Mexico and China—far-reaching examples—and the tendency toward self-protective nationalism in the Caribbean and the Pacific. For if beauty, individuality, and humanity are to survive in the tropics, they can do so only through an insistent desire for them on the part of the native inhabitants.

Must Colleges Be Treadmills?

WHY is it that so many college professors at forty are sick of their jobs? There are hundreds in that pathetic state. They are not the failures or the frauds. As professional ability goes most of them are able; they have at least been through the mill and know how to do their work. What tries and discourages them is the work itself, the conditions under which they live what is lightly called an intellectual life, and the gloomy outlook ahead. They have spent half their lives and most of their earnings to equip themselves for what they imagined was a career, only to find, when the coveted professorship has been attained, that the game seems curiously out of proportion to the candle.

Dr. J. F. Kirkpatrick, whose recent book entitled "The American College and its Rulers" contains some plain speaking, finds the explanation of the unhappy situation in the fact that the average American college is neither free nor frank, and in addition is bossed. The professor teaches and studies, but he does not control. The student is offered a bewildering variety of information, much of it useful as a species of intellectual small change, but he is rarely taught or even encouraged to think. The typical college has developed the non-resident board of trustees, few of whose members know anything or learn anything about education, and legal trusteeship has produced the all-powerful president. In the face of this embattled authority, intrenched in precedent and backed by certain legal sanctions, the faculty has become a body of hired men engaged in tasks about which it may indeed be consulted, but over which it has, in the last resort, no real control whatever. What the students think about it is commonly a matter of indifference; they are in college to take—or leave—what is offered, and in the worship of the sacred curriculum to find salvation for their souls.

The result is exactly what should be expected. There is a mass of academic business, but little genuine academic freedom. Someone has remarked that academic freedom does not mean freedom to be a damned fool, but the line which separates what today is called foolishness from what tomorrow may be adjudged good sense is perilously hard to draw, and the all-powerful president and his businesslike trustees usually deem it better to play safe. A so-called consensus of the competent, which being interpreted means a consensus of those in power, shadows the college like a hoodoo, perpetuating outgrown methods because innovations are feared, applauding cheap personal popularity over scholarship because it draws students and funds, and stunting research because research does not pay. Is it a wonder that such a college so often ceases to offer an inviting career? A certain security of tenure, with a pension when one is about to die, it does afford to those who discreetly hold their tongues and watch their steps, but with faculty influence checked at every point by presidents and boards we get only a treadmill culture labeled preparation for life.

Mr. Kirkpatrick agrees with those who think that the authority of rulers has increased, is increasing, and ought to be diminished, but when he comes to reform he falls under the spell of the hopeful tone. College control, he adjures us, ought to be more democratic, and he even suggests that the spirit of youth in college halls may be enlisted by allowing student representatives to sit in faculty meetings. Theoretically, it would seem, the faculty should be the college, leaving to the trustees the fiduciary function of caring for the funds and keeping the property fit; and student opinion is entitled to respect. There are two weighty reasons, however, why no such changes are likely soon to come about in any American college now in being. The first is that the privately endowed college is legally a trust, and the average board of trustees may be expected to hesitate a long time before it turns over the expenditure of funds and the management of property to a faculty which, as such, has no legal existence and hence no legal responsibility. The second is that faculties have been so long in servitude that they are hardly in the least agreed about what should be taught or how teaching should be done. A body of scholars who do not know their own minds is a dangerous aggregation to turn loose with money to spend.

Nevertheless, the salvation of the college seems to lie in the directions which Dr. Kirkpatrick suggests. We need to get rid of the curriculum obsession, and convert the college into a democratic community in which teachers and students work together at things intellectually worth while. Some day, perhaps, a wise man of exceptional solvency, despairing of making over any existing institution, will provide an endowment, assemble the nucleus of a competent faculty by the grace of God, turn the whole thing over to professors and students, and then go abroad. The experiment would cost much less than setting up a new chemical plant in preparation for the next war, and the few explosions that might occur as a result of academic carelessness or inexperience would be sure to do less lasting harm.

The Size of the Sky

HARLOW SHAPLEY, the brilliant young astronomer who at forty is director of the Harvard Observatory and has been director for five years, has written one of the most satisfactory essays in popular science we have seen for a long while. It is called "Starlight," and it appears as the second member of a series of short books which takes its name from James Harvey Robinson's "The Humanizing of Knowledge" (Doran).

Mr. Shapley's task was not to write about man, or even about "his" world. It was to describe the universe of inorganic matter which only of late generations science has begun to measure with appropriate and adequate instruments. Here is a theme which often has been used to mystify and shock the average man. We have heard a great deal, and too frequently in grandiose terms, about the vastness of the heavens. We are used to being told how small man is in comparison with those systems of suns which burn so far away that only their light ever reaches us, and then after thousands of years of dizzy travel through space. Mr. Shapley, going very directly about his business of exposition, gives us thick and fast the best theories and the known facts. Beyond that no rhetoric, no celestial fireworks. And the result is something more impressive to the imagination than the celestial rhetoricians have ever given us.

With eager energy, and with a supply of that learning without which popular science is worse than useless, Mr. Shapley adventures with us among the millions of stars and groups of stars which he and his coworkers over the earth are busy these days examining. He bothers very little with the figures—light years, parsecs, and kiloparsecs—customarily invoked to stun us. Most of them leave us cold because we cannot take them in. His is a better method of showing the size of the sky. It is the method of implication. He tells us what is going on in space, or at least what the most modern of astronomers have reason to believe is going on; and from the picture of this activity emerges another picture which we ourselves create—a picture all the more appalling because no mere pen has drawn it.

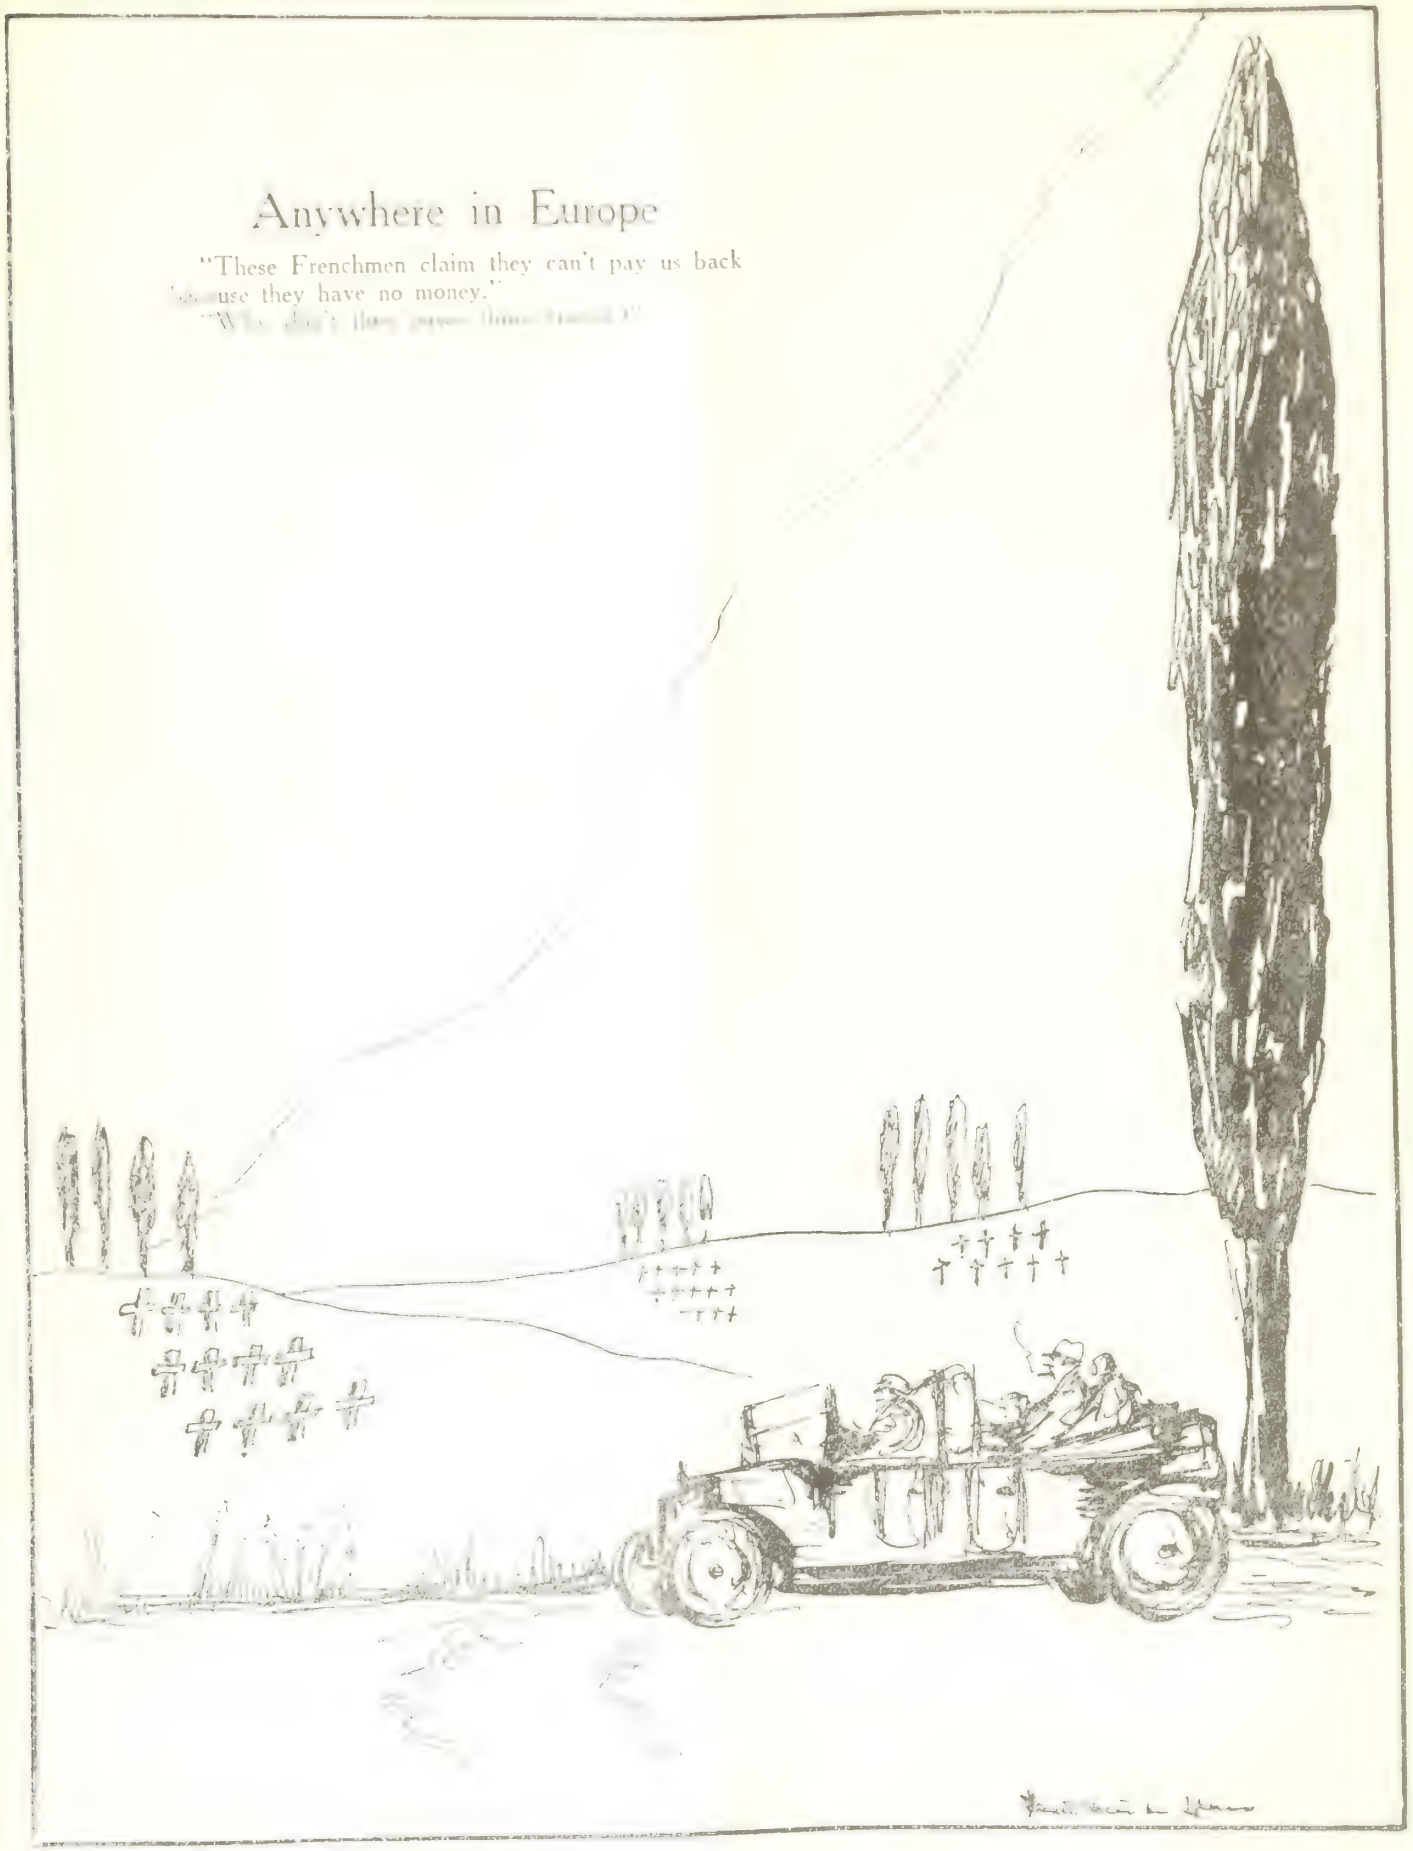
It is a furiously whirling and changing universe to which we are conducted. The stars are in their places, but they are doing mysterious things there, and these places are paths or orbits of inconceivable magnitude. Pairs of stars are revolving about each other and periodically eclipsing each other. New ones are flaming up; old ones are fading out. Millions of dwarf stars are already cold and hence invisible; no one knows how many dead, black giants are obscuring live worlds behind them. Regular gradations of color indicate a regular evolution in temperature. Stars begin large and red, as Antares, with a diameter of 400,000,000 miles, is now; they shrink to yellow and grow hotter; they burn for a while pure blue; they grow yellow again, dull down to red, and at last go out. Our sun, which is one of the dwarfs, is in its decline. The great galaxy, however, of which it is a remote and minute part will continue for billions of years to show its white ring around the sky to any beings who may be here or elsewhere to see it and call it perhaps something else than the Milky Way. It will continue to draw into itself the great star clusters and distribute them—though Mr. Shapley does not know whether it will ever affect the faint star cloud called N. G. C. 6822, which is about 4,500,000,000,000,000,000 miles distant from us. He does after all indulge in a few figures. He remarks that the probable diameter of our galaxy is 1,800,000,000,000,000,000 miles.

And he does after all indulge in a little pardonable reflection upon the place of man in this universe. Mr. Bryan would have been bewildered to hear the evolution he mustered all his waning powers to fight dismissed as an incident:

> Evolution is not limited chiefly to the relation of man to his anthropoid forebears. That phase is one of the minor steps in the development that pervades the whole universe. In truth, we cannot restrain the feeling that the whole of organic development . . . is trivial and transient from the standpoint of the development of the material cosmos.

Mr. Bryan would never have appreciated the restraint with which Mr. Shapley's conclusion upon the significance of man is worded:

> The future history of the stellar system appears, indeed, thoroughly independent of our temporary terrestrial career. Man's station in this scheme is not too flattering—an animal among many, precariously situated on the crust of a planetary fragment that obeys the gravitational impulses of one of the millions of dwarf stars that wander in remote parts of a galactic system. His place in the universe . . . is unimpressive; and his importance in some non-material way is a subject not suited to scientific research or speculation. We leave the subject here, noting that man's role as an investigator and would-be interpreter of the universe is surpassingly fascinating, whether or not it is cosmically significant.



The Buncombe of Bigness

THERE has bobbed up again in the newspapers a project which has been broached at intervals for a number of years—that of enlarging New York City by creating some nine square miles of new land at the foot of Manhattan Island, filling in the upper bay from the Battery to Staten Island, and leaving only narrow channels along the Brooklyn and New Jersey shores for the passage of vessels. Probably nothing will ever come of the idea—unless influential and insistent real-estate interests buy the ocean and whoop the project up. The lack of such barkers in this instance is more certainly deterring than the engineering and financial obstacles or the difficulty of obtaining the necessary sanction of the States of New York and New Jersey and the federal Government.

In this discussion there is a typical American assumption that it would be desirable to enlarge downtown New York if possible. A consulting engineer, in advocating the scheme, argues that people and industries are being crowded out of Manhattan; the new land, he says, would greatly increase real-estate "values" in Brooklyn and Staten Island; and by the expenditure of $400,000,000 at least $5,000,000,000 would be "created." We wish we believed that people and industries were being crowded out of Manhattan, but census-takers seem to find that new inhabitants are rushing in faster than old ones are going out. Why do people cling to the pathetic notion that a big city is better than a small one and a bigger city is superior to a big one? It is doubtless a legacy of the boom psychology of American development that this view is more pronounced in the United States than anywhere else in the world. It would be heresy to suggest in any chamber-of-commerce meeting in any city in the United States that a condition of equilibrium or even restriction might be better than continual growth.

Is there more "prosperity" for the majority in a great city than in a small or medium-sized one? Growth means chances for new business, but it also means more persons seeking to exploit them. India has a vast population; are its people happier than Siam's? Is the average German better off than the average Dane, an Iowan poorer than a New Yorker? For a few persons there are better chances of great wealth in a large than in a small community, but for many there is a certainty of more acute poverty. From every other than a business standpoint most of our cities have surely grown—are growing—too fast. Overgrowth is behind our most serious problems in connection with transit, housing, almost everything. In New York City, especially, with its intolerable street congestion and inadequate transportation, it would be madness to increase the strain right at its central point. What New Yorkers with vision and intelligence should work for is not the massing of more millions of people on Manhattan Island but a scattering—and perhaps a segregation—of industry and population in outlying districts.

And the problem is not much different in other cities. Real-estate speculation is about the only business that thrives through mere bigness. "Bigger and better" is a slogan that has gone too long unchallenged. It is commonly a contradiction and an impossibility. The real issue is bigger or better.

Anywhere in Europe
"These Frenchmen claim they can't pay us back because they have no money."

How America Fools Herself

By LOUIS FISCHER

Berlin, July 22

ADD $63,000,000 which England receives in 1926-1927 in reparation payments to $10,000,000 collected from Italy under the Volpi-Churchill agreement to $20,000,000 more from France under the Caillaux-Churchill agreement, and deduct the total from the $160,000,000 which Great Britain annually pays into the United States Treasury. The result is $67,000,000 which Englishmen must actually take from their pockets to meet the obligations Baldwin accepted in Washington. The mighty British lion groans under this burden, and London experts tell you that it furnishes one of the explanations of Great Britain's economic [illegible].

It will require the application of tons of pressure before the Chamber of Deputies approves the French debt-funding treaty with the United States; a Paris daily calls the Bérenger pact "onéreux, dangereux, immoral" because it involves $30,000,000 in 1926-1927. This sum plus the $20,000,000 paid to England makes $50,000,000, as against $150,000,000 which France will obtain during that year in reparation payments.

In other words, Britain sighs when she pays $67,000,000, France complains though debt payments yield her a surplus of $100,000,000, but the Dawes Plan taps Germany to the tune of $285,000,000 in 1926-1927 and more than double that figure each year after 1928. This is Germany's penalty not for starting the war but for losing it.

Assuming the ratification of the Bérenger-Mellon accord, the Allies will, in 1927-1928, be paying the United States about $230,000,000. And in the same year Germany will pay the Allies about $417,000,000. In reality, then, Germany is funding the Allied debts to America.

Germany pays. After notes, conferences, bayonets, and Ruhr invasions failed to collect marks, the Dawes scheme is accomplishing that worthy purpose with a thoroughness which is as cruel as it is futile.

The account is a simple one. Unless it wreck its currency and unbalance its budget, a nation can in the long run transfer money abroad only on the basis of a foreign trade surplus. Now, the recent report of Mr. S. Parker Gilbert, Agent General for Reparation Payments, covering the nine months from September 1, 1925, to May 31, 1926, shows that during that period Germany had an active trade balance of 17,800,000 marks. But in the same nine months Gilbert transferred abroad some 600,000,000 marks, which leaves a deficit of approximately 582,200,000 marks. Germany's "invisible exports" are greater than her "invisible imports," so that this deficit is even more serious, but it is bad enough at 582 millions. How did Germany make up the loss? By borrowing 850,000,000 marks in foreign countries, most of it in the United States. America is thus financing reparation payments, while Germany piles up a huge debt on which interest at 8 per cent is charged her. The money borrowed in Wall Street goes to London, Paris, Rome, etc., in the form of Dawes annuities, is there heavily discounted, and then wanders back to Wall Street and Washington earmarked "Allied Debt Payments." The sooner Americans realize that this silly circle is self-deception the sooner they will be prepared to listen to common sense on the question of cancelation.

These loans gradually enslave an increasingly large part of German industry to American capital and burden the country with a debt the interest on which alone is stupendous. Moreover, they are demoralizing the entire German economy. During the last thirty months the United States lent Germany close to $500,000,000, says Secretary Mellon. Much of this gigantic total is now changing hands on the bourse. The stock market blossoms, and credit is cheap and easy to find because the crisis of the last eight months does not diminish. Factories are idle, production fails, and industry cannot absorb much money. So the money is used for bourse speculation which is often misread as prosperity. Nor is the increase in savings-bank accounts a trustworthy index of conditions. The Minister of Finance hints, and a brilliant expert in the Ministry of Finance tells me plainly, that a large, if not the larger, part of these deposits represents sums borrowed in America by states and municipalities for power stations, gas works, etc., and placed by these on savings account until the funds will be required for operations.

The presence of much foreign gold in Germany thus prevents the reparation situation from growing critical and creates an impression of smooth progress which is illusory. But when Churchill's statement in the House of Commons immediately after the signing of the Franco-British debt settlement explicitly envisages a reduction of reparation payments it is clear that such a consummation might not be objectionable even to the two countries involved. Indeed, there is reason to suspect that England is pressing for a revision of the Dawes Plan, since it would inevitably lead to a reexamination of the entire debt problem. Preliminary pourparlers have perhaps commenced already. One may never know just why, about a fortnight ago, Governor Norman of the Bank of England, Governor Strong of the New York Federal Reserve Bank, and Mr. Gilbert suddenly decided, quite independently of course, that the climate of Antibes on the French Riviera was urgently necessary for their health, and by accident reserved rooms in the same hotel. In this connection the European trip of Secretary Mellon and J. P. Morgan naturally becomes the center of varied rumors and combinations.

The foreign Dawes instalment collectors in Mr. Gilbert's office are optimistic, or at least they say they are, and serve to their visitors large portions of hopefulness based presumably on the conviction that within five or ten years and with the aid of foreign loans Germany will be sufficiently restored to meet from her own means the obligations imposed on her by the Dawes experts. The German Ministry of Finance, however, paints a dark picture. The prevailing opinion is that Germany will not be in a position to pay the two billion marks which will be required of her in 1927-1928. Next January the question will be answered definitely. All depends on the unemployment curve. Germany today counts 1,742,000 who receive a dole plus about 200,000 who obtain aid under the new law, and then there are 700,000-odd on part time d[illegible] the fact that many hands find work during the summer on the fields and in construction enterprises. If the number of the jobless rises next winter, or even if it remains stationary—and this will be clear by January—Germany will be unable to pay the full amount of reparations. At best she will raise one billion marks, and for the [illegible] creditors would have to declare a partial moratorium or give the Government a [illegible] debt-enveloped world moratoria are dangerous precedents, while the country is already bent too low under the [illegible] of raising interest and amortization on previous [illegible] make a new billion-mark loan a profitable or ra[illegible] undertaking. Remains the modification of the Dawes Plan.

The Dawes Plan is predicated on the rehabilitation of the German economy. The speed of this rehabili[illegible] however, has not kept pace with the stipulations in the annuities schedule. This is a German as well as a world problem, and the difficulties are:

1. Unemployment is here to stay as it is in En[illegible] and unemployment is merely the most evident reflection of a sub-normal industry;

2. Germany has already paid more than she could afford and she has reduced the standard of living of the masses below a decent limit to do so. Wages and the [illegible] nomic level of the workers are so low, and the amount of work required of them so high, that to tighten the v[illegible] order to raise more funds for reparations would l[illegible] J. M. Keynes has said, to court serious political disturbances.

3. Germany's industrial revival depends, in the final analysis, on the extension of her foreign trade. But such development is hampered by protective tariff walls and impoverished markets everywhere. Industry could probably absorb some of the free money and labor in the country if it could find buyers abroad. Increased domestic consumption would also make matters better. But neither of t[illegible] ditions exists.

The benefits of the Dawes scheme must not be denied. It took the reparations problem out of the hands of generals and put it where general staffs and French politicians could not touch it. With the efficient Gilbert at the helm, default on the part of Germany can only be due to her incapacity to pay rather than to lack of good-will. The Dawes [illegible] confirmed the currency stabilization, paved the way to a balanced budget, and made possible the influx of huge sums of money in the form of foreign loans. In a word, it provided a breathing space. It is largely for this reason that so many Germans are reconciled to outside control of their customs, finances, railroads, and, in part, of their industries. It is largely for this reason, and because tribulations have dulled their pride, that Germans swallow insults such as the classification by Sir Andrew McFadyean, Commissioner of Controlled Revenues, of coffee, teas, cocoa, and tobacco as "luxury articles." This is the tone which Sir Andrew's countrymen assume in Egypt and India, yet the Germans do not protest. To this moral disadvantage must be added far greater economic disadvantages. Despite the foreign loans which they have received, the federal and state governments increased their taxes in order to meet their share of the Dawes annuities; despite foreign loans to trusts and corporations, wages have not risen nor has production. The cost of living is 140 per cent of pre-war. The pawned railroad system charges higher freight and passenger rates, thus damaging business, but cannot under[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] almost half of the annuity; finally, the excise [illegible] tobacco, and beer which is determined from Mr. Gilbert's office has mounted upwards. Mr. Gilbert reports that [illegible] sports have [illegible] and imports [illegible] and since this development coincided with a diminution of domestic production the net result points to reduced consumption and a [illegible] evils are of course not caused by the Dawes Plan alone, yet without it (and without reparations therefore) the state of affairs would be much more hopeful.

Foreign loans swell Germany's active trade balance and enable Mr. Gilbert to send reparations money to the Allies. They solve the problem of transfers, assuming indefinite borrowing, but they do not solve the problem of the collection of reparations within the country. Sums from abroad flow into savings and other banks or circulate on the bourse or supply doles for the unemployed (this year as much is being paid in doles as in reparations) or are [illegible] for the improvement of public utilities and the rationalization of industries. Ultimately these productive uses should redound to the benefit of the average citizen, but as yet he has had no appreciable gain. In fact, industrial rationalization, which is occasionally synonymous with the sweating of labor, is responsible for about 30 per cent of the present army of unemployed. Meanwhile, nevertheless, this average citizen must foot the reparations bills. And year after year it will grow worse. That Germany must default in 1928-1929 when the annuity rises to two and a half billions all Germans are agreed. But many foresee the crash as early as 1927-1928, which means next spring.

Conditions in France also play their role. Today France is producing much and "dumping" everywhere. On the other hand, the "flight of the franc" has brought rather large sums of French money into Germany. The time must come when, with the help of a miracle or of a veiled Dawes Plan, France will cease slaughtering ministries and succeed in stabilizing her currency. It may take three months or six months, but some day the franc must stop dropping. There will follow the unavoidable critical readjustment period characterized by reduced production and increased unemployment. France will not need 1,500,000 tons of German reparations coal as she does today, nor will she permit Germans to carry out construction contracts at home or in the colonies while Frenchmen are idle. She will therefore demand cash from Mr. Gilbert rather than deliveries in kind and contracts. German mines will have to close down and German firms will lose valuable orders. The cash, moreover, will have to be borrowed in America and the interest will be an additional charge to be met by the nation.

When Messrs. Morgan, Mellon, Norman, Gilbert, and Strong meet in Paris, therefore, they cannot treat French conditions as an isolated problem. Nor can they deal separately with the question of reparations or of inter-Allied debts. The franc, debt funding, and reparations are part of a single complex the solution of which this Big Five must supply. Their meeting is proof that under its present system Europe cannot lift herself out of the morass without American assistance. America has been lending Germany the money to pay the reparations, with which England—and France, if she pays at all—pay their debts to America. What right solution will the great men devise next?

Britain's Midsummer Mood

By J. RAMSAY MacDONALD

London, August 2

THE result of the Wallsend by-election on July 29 was so staggering that our papers reported it with difficulty and in the intervening three days have been doing their best to induce us to forget it. Nobody in the end expected the Labor Party to lose Wallsend, though at the beginning not a few people were rash enough to entertain the hope that that might happen. Our candiate was a woman, and the Tyneside was expected to shy at that; she was a member of the General Council of the Trade Union Congress and shared responsibility for calling off the general strike, so there was a chance of the miners (who compose about a fourth of the electorate) and the left tendencies in the Labor movement being cool, if not hostile, to her candidature; moreover, she had not hidden that she was no admirer of Mr. Cook's leadership and did not accept the slogans upon which he was conducting the mining fight. The Labor movement has frequently sacrificed a big victory under the irritation of a smaller immediate grievance, so there were possibilities of trouble when Miss Bondfield was selected as candidate.

In the coalition "khaki" election of 1918 the Government candidate won the seat by 10,246 votes against 6,835 given to Labor and 3,047 to what was then called a Free Liberal. In 1922 Labor won the seat on a straight vote against a Tory by 16,126 votes to 12,950. At the "red letter" election two years later we kept the seat, again with no Liberal intervening between us and the Tory, by 17,274 to 15,672. At this by-election, a Liberal returned to the lists. As he came from a mining family it was expected that he would cut into the Labor vote and reduce our chances, if not of victory, certainly of a striking one. The result declared was: Miss Bondfield (Labor) 18,866, Mr. Howard (Tory) 9,839, Mr. Curry (Liberal) 4,000. When the figures came over the wires on Thursday afternoon they were hard to believe. A 9,000 majority over the Tory and a 5,000 majority over both the other candidates combined was not only a victory, it was a smash-up. Once again the Liberal candidate had failed to poll one-eighth of the votes and had forfeited his deposit.

What is the meaning of this? Wallsend is a typical working-class constituency with a middle-class piece attached to it, a suburb of Newcastle where perhaps 75 per cent of the electors are socially Tories. The bulk of the electors are ship-builders, boilermakers, engineers, miners, and the miscellany of general workers that congregate around these trades. The political traditions of the district were Liberal, tending if anything toward Toryism before the war, and it is doubtful if any Labor candidate except Sir Patrick Hastings, the eminent King's Counsel, would have won it in 1922, or kept it in 1924. It has been badly hit by unemployment. There are scores of such constituencies in the country, some held by us and some lost in 1924 owing to the dishonest use made by the Tories of the "Zinoviev letter." Wallsend, following upon our almost equally astonishing gain at Hammersmith last Whitsuntide, shows that we could get practically the whole of them. The Government has forfeited the confidence of both employers and work-people for its feeble handling of our industrial difficulties and its failure to put energy and businesslike management into its custody of our national interests. If an election were to come now, the only chance the Government would have of keeping in office would be the social influence of Toryism on wealth and the sections that imitate and follow wealth, together with the support of the more backward rural areas. Its vote would be far short of a half of the electors and its Parliamentary majority, vastly reduced from what it now is—even if it existed at all—would depend solely upon the fact that by the arrangement of our constituencies a minority vote in the country can secure a majority vote in Parliament. With the reduction of the Liberal vote that will not be permanent, however. If it were, alterations, fortunately not necessarily proportional representation, would have to be made to obviate it.

The interesting revelation of both the Hammersmith and the Wallsend elections, however, is the light they throw upon the results of the general strike. Immediately it was ended the telegraphs and the cables quivered all over the world with the most absurd accounts of how the Government and the Prime Minister had the country at their feet. In so far as the news was not conscious humbug it was an excited misreading of the situation, and this was shared by some of the Left-Wing sections, as a recent article in The Nation by Mr. Ewer amply shows. Tory partisans who during the general strike had returned to war mentality and propaganda, and communistically inclined observers who thought they saw a glow of fire in the sky, never understood the strike and went off like automatic rattles when it was ended. It is now about three months since the general strike terminated and the forecast of its effect which I made in The Nation at the time happened to be right.

The general strike united the working class and those whose emotional impulses were attached to it as they were never united before, and at the same time threw this massed union into politics. While lawyers and the Government were fussing about the strike being a challenge to the Government, the community, and the constitution, the people themselves were showing good, sound common sense. Whether they agreed with the strike or not, they knew what its purpose was, they understood the impulse that made it inevitable, and they praised the moral heave that made it in its spontaneity, its proportion, and its spirit such a singularly enlightening occurrence. The strike raised the respect in which the Labor movement was held, and thousands pay homage to it today who were hostile or indifferent six months ago. In other words the general strike has strengthened the influence of constitutional forces in Great Britain, has convinced many that industrial conditions are bad and ought to be remedied, has intensified the sympathy for Labor, and has laid emphasis upon the view that the political method of change is that which gives greatest guaranties of permanence and the best assurances of a minimum of social inconvenience and suffering. Hence in the municipal elections which have taken place within the last two months Labor candidates have won seats where hitherto they had failed, and in the two Parliamentary elections that have been held our vote is in the aggregate 3,717 more than it was at the general election, and the Tory vote has fallon by 9,278. If we take the Liberal vote as being opposed to the Government, the anti-government vote has increased by no less a figure than 9,691. In estimating the significance of the increase in our polls at these two elections it must be remembered that though we lost so many seats in 1924, our polls were greater than they had ever been, so that the increases are on a very high vote and not on a low one.

Every political sign of the times here points to the thorough discrediting of the Government. Not only has it come badly through this industrial turmoil, not only have the pious declarations of some of its leaders about goodwill in industry (a virtue so sadly needed) become irritants to men who expect fruit from professions, but the general handling of national interests both at home and abroad is causing concern and apprehension. Mr. Churchill's statements regarding our indebtedness to the United States is a case in point. There is a very widespread feeling here that the United States is not behaving well regarding the settlement of debts, and that if it would show more genial friendship when it considers the burdens we have to bear as a result of the war the condition we find ourselves in would be eased not from charity, which never crosses our minds, but from comradeship, which might be expected as a result of our common effort during the war. Nevertheless, there is no suggestion made here by any responsible section that we should press for a reconsideration of the Baldwin agreement. That we leave to the United States itself. There is, however, general disappointment with the figure that our Government has cut in the recent exchange of shots between Mr. Churchill and Mr. Mellon, and the clumsy way in which that controversy has been handled is regarded as typical of how our Government is transacting delicate national business. The part we have played and are still playing at Geneva is also raising a feeling of distrust and disquiet. In all quarters and in all parties one sees heads shaken in doubt and hears whispers passed round that the Government has failed and that some change is necessary. The Independent Labor Party has just issued a manifesto calling for a General Election. That is, perhaps, nothing more than a propagandist document. Discontent will have to go far before the country demands that it be allowed to take matters again into its own hands. For the moment, however, confidence is diminishing and the demand for a change is growing. Unless something happens speedily there will be a political landslide in this country.

The New England Farm Comes Back

By NELSON ANTRIM CRAWFORD

THE American farmer of popular history, of romance, of poetry, of melodrama, of the cartoon even, is the New England farmer. The revolutionists were in large part farmers from this region. It was at Concord, in Massachusetts, that the embattled farmers "fired the shot heard round the world." The rural snow-storms recounted by Emerson and Whittier obviously occurred in New England. It was New England farmers who used to say "By heck," and the gaunt, bearded figure that still typifies the tiller of the soil in many a cartoon belongs to the Eastern seaboard and has little in common with the agriculturist of regions farther West. Hence New England farming is invested with a sentiment that does not cling to the prairies or the Great Plains, and there are few Americans but have read with sorrow of the abandoned farms of New England. For years it has been usual to ask the question, What can be done to make the farming of New England prosperous again?

The answer is that the New England farm is beginning to come back. Its history has throughout been economically determined. The casual observer commonly thinks only of the loss of soil fertility. This, however, is but a small part of the story. It is true that farming in New England long followed the natural-husbandry system, in which nature is depended on to furnish the necessary recuperation for the soil. But much of the soil was never good. It was thin and rocky. The valley farms afforded a living but the hill farms probably never paid a labor income equal in purchasing power to ordinary factory wages today, though they afforded social conditions in many respects superior to those under which wage-earners commonly live. In numerous cases, whether on hill or valley farms, farmers also had trades, such as shoe-making, watch-making, and cabinet-making. They were not wholly dependent on agriculture for a living.

The industrial revolution and the consequent specialization in industry brought many of the better artificers from the country into the growing cities. Canals and railroads made transportation easy and cheap, and led to the production of crops in those regions where they were most profitable. When the more productive lands to the West were made accessible they competed disastrously with New England farms. Finally, the invention of farm machinery, adapted best to great level stretches, gave Western farms a further advantage. Some farmers moved to the cities, some moved westward. Abandoned farms were the result.

Much greater than the proportion of farm abandonment in New England was the reduction in the acreage devoted to crops. This acreage diminished 22 per cent from 1880 to 1920. Some land formerly devoted to crops was, under the pressure of Western competition, allowed to revert to woodland and pasture, but the fact that the smallest decrease, 2.4 per cent, occurred in Maine, and the heaviest decreases, 36, 42, and 57 per cent, in Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Rhode Island, suggests that the growth of cities, with resultant development of suburbs and demand for parks, golf links, and other recreational facilities, was a more conspicuous factor.

The actual number of idle farms in New England is now estimated at about 10 per cent of the total. This is not a large proportion in the light of American agricultural practice. In the dairy States and the Corn Belt, where farming is the outstanding industry, nearly all farms are worked; but in parts of the South and of the Far West the proportion of unworked farms is very high, reaching 30 per cent in Montana and Wyoming and 19 per cent in Georgia.

Indeed, the last five years, a period of perhaps unprecedented agricultural depression, have had upon agricultural New England an effect surprising to many. While in other parts of the country, especially single-crop regions, there has been a tendency to abandon agriculture for urban pursuits, New England, with small farms and a more varied farm system, has increased in number of farms, in farm population, and in land utilization. The increases, it is true, are slight, but they are the first gains shown since 1880, with the exception of a 1 per cent increase in number of farms (accompanied, however, by a decrease in acreage devoted to crops) between 1890 and 1900.

There are various reasons for the change. For one thing freight rates are high, and on bulky commodities such as farm products represent a considerable proportion of the cost to the consumer. Nearness to market, which is characteristic of New England farming, therefore makes up in part for the greater productivity of Western agriculture. This phase of the situation is accentuated by the lower prices of New England farms, which thus do not require so large an acre return.

Because of climatic conditions New England will probably never produce enough wheat or corn for her own use. She cannot compete with Western farms in these products even on her own market. She may, however, grow enough oats, barley, and rye for local consumption, which she perhaps can afford to do in view of the cost of transporting a bushel of these products from the Middle West.

The production of hay, silage, and forage crops in New England is steadily increasing. The large industrial cities offer a good market for milk, and freight rates are as effective as an embargo in keeping bulky crops like hay from being brought in from the West to feed dairy cattle. The carload rate on hay from Chicago to Boston is 59½ cents a hundred pounds; the rate from Greenfield, in the northwestern part of Massachusetts, to Boston is only 21 cents. In a region like New England products can often be taken to market economically without using the railroads at all.

The demands of industrial markets are also causing increases in fruit- and vegetable-growing and in poultry-raising. Nearly one-fifth of the people [illegible] live within short shipping distance of New England's farms. Massachusetts and Rhode Island have a larger proportion of the crop land in fruit than has any other State except California. In these States and in Maine the proportion of crop land in potatoes and other vegetables is exceeded only by that in New Jersey.

Specialization in these crops and in poultry production offers distinct future opportunities, provided modern scientific methods are employed and quality products sought. In agriculture, as in other fields, the demand for quality, particularly in the cities, is steadily on the increase. New England farmers may draw a lesson from the well-known experience of Pacific Coast fruit growers and the somewhat less known success of Utah egg producers. The latter, supplying graded eggs under the trade name of "Milk White Eggs," find it profitable to ship two thousand miles to the New York market, where the commodity brings a price exceeded only by eggs from the immediate vicinity of the metropolis. The practice of permitting middlemen to do the grading and reap the consequent profits results in serious losses to agriculture. New England farmers have favorable conditions for joining together in the production of standard fruit, vegetables, and poultry products. The effect would be simply to give the farmer a larger share than he now receives of the retail price paid for his products.

Steps are already being taken. Brands established by cooperatives in the Nashoba apple district in New Hampshire and Massachusetts are meeting with appreciation in the larger New England markets. In 1925 the 20,000 members of the New England Milk Producers' Association sold more than a billion pounds of milk at prices arrived at through scientific study of costs, supply, demand, and other factors. This association, further, is active in emphasizing butterfat content, in encouraging winter dairying, and in leveling out seasons of surplus and shortage. Residents of the Connecticut Valley, farmers and non-farmers, are uniting to solve the problem of the local tobacco-growing industry, which is faced with a falling demand for the types produced in the valley. A careful survey is in progress, on the basis of which readjustment of the agriculture will be undertaken.

In zeal to bring back New England farming care must be taken not to try to restore to cultivation such hill land as is better adapted to timber than to crops. Timber is now a profitable and much-needed product. Some of the land allowed to revert to forest since 1865 is now yielding an annual net return of from three to five dollars an acre. This also affords winter employment. In New England the wood-lot is a proper part of the farm. There, as elsewhere, marginal agricultural lands should not be put into crops. Under present circumstances attempts to farm poor soil assure the development of a peasant agriculture, living under hopeless economic and social conditions.

New England will never be a great agricultural region. It was such, even comparatively speaking, only when there was little competition. The farms will always be small, though not so small as in the past. Farms of upwards of 100 acres are proving profitable, but the very large farms, 1,000 acres or more, maintained by wealthy city men, have, after increasing in number from 1900 to 1910, diminished rapidly since the latter date. Small farms involve both advantages and disadvantages. Agricultural New England will remain largely free from landlordism. On the other hand, small farms, if efficiently managed, require much hand labor, which commonly, though not necessarily, means lower living conditions. Furthermore, hand agricultural labor is, as a steady thing, distasteful to most Americans.

The result is seen in the fact that a fifth of New England's farms are now operated by the foreign-born, and many more by the sons of the foreign-born. The proportion has for years shown a steady increase in all the New England States, with the smallest increase in Maine and the greatest in Connecticut. The two extremes in the total proportions are likewise found in these States. According to the most recent census figures, the proportion of foreign-born farm operators to the total number of farm operators was 9.1 per cent in Maine, 12.8 in New Hampshire, 13 in Vermont, 23 in Rhode Island, 27.9 in Massachusetts, and 33.7 in Connecticut. No figures are available as to the sons of the foreign-born engaged in farming in New England.

Farmers of native stock complain that they cannot compete with the "foreigners." In part this complaint is a rationalization of the dislike for innovations of any sort in conservative rural communities. The foreign-born have unfamiliar ways. Their families, especially the women, do different, though perhaps no harder, work than the families of native Americans. Somewhat different agricultural methods are employed. Often the foreign-born supplement their farm income by taking in summer boarders of their own race—a practice repugnant to many of the native farmers. The objections of the New Englanders, many of whose families have lived for generations in the same community, are natural enough. One of the prized advantages of New England has been homogeneity of the population, which is disturbed by the influx of Europeans.

This is a temporary phase. The farms will gradually pass into the hands of the sons of the foreign-born, as indeed many have already passed, and these young people are as American in their viewpoint, habits, and talk as any native. They wear American-made clothes, carry American fountain pens, talk American slang, cheer American politicians, and patronize American bootleggers. In their farm practice they are likely to follow more modern methods than the farmers whose remote ancestors settled the region. They employ labor-saving devices. They operate larger farms than did their fathers. Fortunately, they are not real-estate speculators—they do not amass great tracts of land to hold for a rise in value; but they obtain if possible the size of farm unit which will yield the most satisfactory annual return, and this is somewhat larger than the old-time New England farm.

These farmers, too, tend to be less individualistic than typical rural Americans. They take an active part in cooperative farm organizations, which are proving increasingly important to agricultural prosperity. Cooperative marketing organizations, if well managed, will be economically profitable, reducing the spread between the price received by the farmer and the price paid by the consumer, and experience, notably in Denmark, shows that standards of living rise under a system of agricultural cooperatives. Already, though still relatively young, farmers' cooperatives in the United States are turning toward stimulation of education and social life.

Another development of agriculture and rural life in New England is found in the purchase and use of small suburban farms by factory employees and other city workers. The automobile has made this possible. For fifteen miles around Worcester, Massachusetts, farm after farm of this type is furnishing financial returns while affording a more wholesome home life than the owners could obtain in the town. New England, it is estimated, now has 10,000 suburban farms. This manifestly adapts to contemporary conditions the old New England practice of carrying on farming and a trade at the same time, and offers possibilities for the reestablishment of the nucleated village with its opportunities for communal life.

Nothing is more to be desired in American rural life than the restoration of a real communal life. New England may offer the opportunity. It will not be the same type of life as existed in the early nineteenth century; husking bees and quilting parties are gone forever except as artificially revived as quaint amusements. For that matter, one need not accept "Desire Under the Elms" as a literal picture of nineteenth-century life in rural New England to realize that not all in that region was truth or beauty. If a communal life develops in rural New England, it will be better, not worse, than what preceded. For under present circumstances it cannot develop at all except on the basis of an agriculture that rewards fairly those engaged in it, and of cooperation on the part of farm people.

Bolshevism in China?

By LEWIS S. GANNETT

KARAKHAN sits in Peking in the North of China, and Borodin in Canton in the South. Karakhan is the Soviet Ambassador to the Chinese Republic; Borodin is adviser to the Canton Government, holding his appointment from the national congress of the Kuomintang Party which dominates Canton; but both are Russian agents, paid from Moscow, and both are able, energetic men. What are they doing? Are they trying to sovietize China?

Karakhan is an Armenian, born in Tiflis, Georgia, only 37 years ago; a revolutionary in his school-days, he was forced to flee to Siberia; in Harbin he served a prison term in 1910, in Vladivostok in 1912, in Petrograd in 1915 (for opposition to the war); but he was never outside the borders of Russia until he was named Minister to Poland in 1921. He reached Peking in September, 1923; in nine months he had negotiated a treaty with China which made Russia the most popular foreign nation among the younger generation and himself the official dean of the Diplomatic Corps, and in general had created more stir than most diplomats do in a lifetime. He is a born actor, responsive to his audience, with quick, mobile gestures of his almost feminine hands. His lips are full; his nose somewhat hooked; his eyes gleam behind thick octagonal eyeglasses; his hair is already slightly grayed, but his pointed beard, shaved to a sharp line on the cheeks, is thick and brown. He, most foreigners believe, is the fountainhead of all the recent troubles in China, with thousands of paid agents among the students and workers.

"Propaganda?" he said to me one day. "Of course I do propaganda. But I don't have to pay for it. Why should I pay students and professors to say what they want to say anyway? Paid propagandists are never any good; how can a man stir others unless he has the fire of sincerity in his own breast? I spoke last week at one of the universities, and my speech was all propaganda—and so was your Silas Strawn's when he spoke at Tsinghua; last summer, when student delegations flooded Peking, I received them all, fed them just such tea and cakes as I am offering you, and talked to them. That was propaganda." He chuckled. "It was good propaganda too, especially when those same students went to your American Legation and were received by a third assistant under secretary who was obviously in a hurry to get away from them so that he could play golf. It was propaganda last week when we lowered our Embassy flag to half-mast on the anniversary of Sun Yat-sen's death, while no other legation remembered to honor the first President of China. They are fools, fools! They miss their chances—and then they think I have to pay for my propaganda!"

What Russia wants in China, Karakhan said, is "a strong, independent China." "We are the only Power that really supports the Nationalist movement," he insisted. "The others say they want a strong government, but they refuse to abandon their unequal-treaty privileges until China is strong—and of course she never will be strong until she has thrown overboard those treaties. We have proved our sincerity by our actions; we have renounced the unequal treaties. It's not idealism; it's just sense. A strong, independent China will naturally be our friend. Inevitably she will be against imperialism, which is everywhere our enemy. She will need foreign capital—she cannot develop without it—but, like Russia, she will not want to grant special privileges and control to the financial powers that lend her money. And in that fight Russia is her only possible friend. The facts fight with us; China's struggle for emancipation brings her every day closer to us. No wonder they are afraid of us; the vision of a strong China close to a strong Russia is enough to make the colonizing Powers shudder. That's why they stick to their treaties."

(As I look back over my notebooks I find an interview with an American official on the same day that I talked with Karakhan. These phrases rise to punctuate Karakhan's argument: "The Nationalist wants to deal with theories; we have to deal with facts, and the treaties exist." "We don't want to wipe out Japanese interests by a too high customs tariff in China." "The Powers don't want free money to come into the hands of the present Peking Government; they don't trust it." "Sentiment is no use. You can't honestly argue that the Chinese have any deserts they have been so absolutely immoral in their domestic and international relations.")

Karakhan scoffs at the idea of sovietizing China. "China is in a very hopeful stage," he told me. "You may read of civil war in the newspapers, but colossal historic forces are at work beneath the surface. And if you want to know what the result will be, look at Canton."

I had looked at Canton, and seen there the things which cause the Constitutional Defense League to describe it as "a full-fledged soviet government." In Canton, for more than a year a Strike Committee maintained a boycott of British goods; the century-old foreign hospital has been closed because its employees were not unionized; the foreigners live on sufferance, and the students in the missionary schools are currently described as "running dogs of imperialism." I had seen union headquarters decorated with pictures of Lenin and Trotzky; walls pasted with lurid anti-foreign posters of obvious Russian inspiration; Russian officers drilling Chinese cadets, Russian advisers serving in half a dozen government departments—although General Chiang Kai-shek summarily ousted, in March, a score of them whom he thought too bumptious. I knew that Russia had lent money to the Cantonese to help them build their army and establish their Nationlist government, and I had talked with Borodin, the tall, dark, slow-spoken Russian who in three years has won for himself a position of curious authority with the Chinese, and with the leading "Communists" of Canton.

Tam Ping-san, for instance. Tam is a veteran revolutionist reminding one of Hippo'yte Havel, the amiable anarchist who used to have the reputation of being the best cook in Greenwich Village. "Communism is a long way off," Tam said, "because China is economically so backward. But the road to communism lies through China's national emancipation. Our Nationalist movement is to us what the labor movement is to the West—and it is the working class in the most developed parts of China which leads the Nationalist movement here. For the present we have to cooperate with the petty bourgeoisie and the militarists. But it will be a long fight, and in its course class lines will develop. How the class struggle will work out we cannot yet tell."

Indeed they cannot. I talked long with many so-called Communists—both older men and passionate young students who make Sun Yat-sen and Lenin their twin gods, and spend their vacations (often their study months too) touring the country to rouse the villages against the imperialists—and they never seemed more than very intense and earnest Nationalists. Of the struggle against foreign capitalists they could and would talk in fierce terms; but of class struggle among Chinese they had small conception. I talked too with leaders, both Chinese and foreign, in the well-financed anti-Russian movements which center about the British-owned North China Daily News of Shanghai, and I was never able to understand the basis for either fear or hope of communism in China.

Two factors, absent in China, made the bolshevik revolution in Russia possible. One was the network of railroads centering in Moscow. The coast regions, accessible to the anti-communist foreign Powers, dropped away; but Moscow, the railroad center, controlled the continental mass of Russia. China has no railroad centers; its great cities are all on the coasts, accessible to Western gunboats, and independent of each other. Canton, Shanghai, Hankow, Peking, Mukden—each has its own government. With the Western Powers in full control of Hongkong, Shanghai, and Dairen, established in Tientsin and Hankow, patrolling the Yangtze, and administering one quarter of Peking, the unification of China is difficult enough under any circumstances; it would be ten times more difficult to unite it for an economic principle and system of government remote from Chinese practice and tradition.

Furthermore, China has no class-conscious farmers. Its rice-and-cabbage peasantry live close to the starvation line (the average farm in some regions is under one acre), and doubtless would gladly revolt if they saw anything to revolt against. The Russian peasant worked in sight of a landlord who obviously lived in relative luxury; and when the Bolsheviks, alone among the Russian parties, said "Take the land" they won the peasants, for the crucial moment, to their support. But the wealthy Chinese live in the cities, often under foreign protection in the foreign concessions; except, perhaps, in Anhwei, China has few great landed estates. Wealth is concealed. In the Canton and Yangtze deltas, to be sure, where the soil is rich and the market cities close, land rentals are oppressively high, and wherever water must be artificially supplied for irrigation—which requires capital—absentee landlordism, with its attendant evils, enters, and peasant class consciousness begins. Some of the orthodox Moscow economists, who are professional prophets of communism, build vast hopes upon this peasant proletariat; but despite the success of the Canton Government in organizing peasant unions to support it in that province and the spontaneous appearance of peasant self-defense organizations in soldier-ridden Honan and Shensi, I saw scant reason to believe in their permanence. Peasants and farmers are the hardest class in the world to organize—largely because their class enemy is not visible. The great mass of China lives on as it has lived for untold centuries, untouched and unaware of the industrial contacts which are revolutionizing the self-conscious port cities. China's revolutions—dynastic, nationalist, or economic—will receive little either of effective aid or opposition from the peasant masses.

Russia's real contribution to the Chinese Revolution is a method of party organization. The Canton Government, like the Moscow Government, is ruled by the "Political Bureau"—a sort of executive committee—of a political party, which in Canton is Sun Yat-sen's old Kuomintang, rejuvenated under Russian expert guidance. This party now has nearly half a million members in all China; it governs Canton, and has a certain influence in Feng Yu-hsiang's, the "Christian general's," territory. Where it holds power it rules as a party dictatorship—and this comes as near as anything in China today to political democracy. The attempt to establish a republic on the American model has been a total failure, nothing is left of it; it had no roots in the soil, and it washed out. Its last appearance was in the Parliament which Tsao Kun bribed to elect him President in 1923. All China, with the partial exception of Canton, is ruled by military dictators, and even in Canton General Chiang Kai-shek seems to be growing in influence. The Russians, with their technique of party dictatorship, have provided China with a method by which it may in time grow beyond personal dictatorships. It may be called sovietism, but honest democrats will welcome it.

Karakhan and Borodin would, I believe, deplore anything like an attempt at Communist rule in China today, because they want a strong, friendly neighbor, and realize that chaos in China provides opportunity for their enemies. They are not averse to stirring up trouble in regions where European—or Japanese—control is strong. The fantastic stories of thousands of Russian agents circulating about China are unquestionably fairy tales, but every Chinese radical who wants it can have sympathy and encouragement at the nearest Russian consulate. Radical leaders in Peking sought the protection of the Russian Embassy when the political climate became unhealthy for them last spring. Borodin lectures every day in Canton on the lessons and methods of the Russian Revolution; and both Canton and the Christian general have had Russian aid in their military operations. (Since traveling by automobile the 1,100 miles across desert, mountains, and bridgeless rivers which separate Feng Yu-hsiang's railroad base from the Trans-Siberian Railway, however, I have lost faith in the stories of immense Russian munitions supplies being shipped across Mongolia to Feng.) Karakhan dilates upon the foreign control of Chinese banking (although Russian banks have a virtual monopoly in Harbin); he denounces the foreign bondholders of the Chinese railroads (although the Chinese Eastern is virtually governed by Russians);* he expatiates upon the nobility of the Russians in renouncing exterritoriality (although it had already lapsed in practice after the Soviet Revolution); he elaborates upon the example of Russia in not joining the Powers in their various ultimatums to China (although when the Chinese Eastern was threatened he spoke promptly and vigorously and effectively).

Westerners in China make much of these apparent inconsistencies. It is their right. It is also Karakhan's right to exploit his position to the utmost. Russia has abandoned her concessions in Hankow and Tientsin; she is ready for customs autonomy; and as long as Russia and China are capital-importing countries, they will continue to have a real community of interest in defending themselves against the efforts of the capital-exporting countries to control them. While the Western Powers stumble along in their present stupid unconceding fashion the Russians can make hay. As Karl Radek, rector of the Sun Yat-sen University, which is giving 400 Chinese boys and girls a Moscow education, said to me: "You Americans still have an opportunity to keep the Chinese Revolution in bourgeois channels. You are not tied, like England, to a burdensome past; and you have capital to invest. If you put yourselves on the side of the national renaissance you can keep the Chinese revolution bourgeois for twenty years at least—perhaps more. But I doubt if you will have the sense to do it."

[This is the sixth in Lewis Gannett's series of articles on China. The last—America's Role in China—will appear in The Nation for September 8.]

Fate and the Ohio Gang

By EDGAR MELS

FLANKED by cohorts of press agents and captained by their leader, Harry Daugherty, the Ohio Gang swooped down upon Washington in the spring of 1920. The Best Minds took office and established a record of inefficiency, graft, and political thieving that will probably never be fully exposed. Much of it is lost beyond recall; more is buried deep in mountainous reports of Senate-committee hearings. The law has been slow to move against the political adventurers who pillaged the public till during the Harding regime, although a few are behind bars. And, as was pointed out in The Nation for July 28, the oil scandal is forgotten while the men involved still evade justice.

But if the mills of men have been slow in their grinding, the mills of the gods have ground both fast and fine. Death, who knows no party and is susceptible to no influence, has garnered an amazing crop among the members of the Ohio Gang. With very few exceptions every notable member of Harding's retinue of personal friends in office is ill, dead, in jail, or under indictment.

Let us begin at the top. Warren Harding, riding along Pennsylvania Avenue to take the oath of office, little dreamed that within three short years he would die. Amiable, likable, a weak man for so great an office, a good country editor and a negative Senator, Harding was the tool of the Ohio Gang. Personally honest, he permitted the gang to do as it pleased. Only when Howard Mannington grew reckless did Harding assert himself. He ordered Mannington to leave Washington.

Daugherty, the real commander of the Harding Administration, is in failing health. Indicted in connection with the American Metals case, his trial is scheduled for early next month. His son, Draper, who is accused of having shared in the enterprises and profits of the gang, has been in a sanitarium, from which he was recently released. Jess Smith, Daugherty's best friend and collector (so termed by Daugherty himself), died in a mysterious manner in Daugherty's apartment in the Wardman Park Hotel in Washington. That he did not commit suicide is my belief. He knew too much about the inner workings of the gang. His doom was sealed and he paid the price.

Cramer, appointed by Harding as chief counsel to the Veterans' Bureau after he had bought the Harding residence in Washington, committed suicide. Harding's personal physician, Brigadier General Sawyer, accused by Forbes of being the real villain in the Veterans' Bureau scandal, is also dead. Charles Forbes, appointed by Harding to head the Veterans' Bureau, is in Leavenworth prison, serving a term for malfeasance and other crimes. He is partially paralyzed and may not live his term out. Thompson, his partner in crime, died before he could be taken to prison. The case of Secretary of the Interior Albert B. Fall, indicted in the oil scandal, is now in the courts.

Next comes John T. King of Bridgeport, Connecticut, political boss and opportunist at large. Associated with Jess Smith, he is accused of having manipulated the Alien Property Custodian's office to his own benefit. He was indicted in connection with the American Metals case. Within a few days after pleading not guilty he died. His will, offered for probate the other day, left $50,000 in American Metals bonds to his widow. He was accused of having accepted that sum to help return the property to its German owners.

Indicted with King is Colonel Thomas W. Miller, appointed by Harding as Alien Property Custodian. Miller was Eastern manager for Leonard Wood, but eventually supported Harding. As thanks, Harding appointed him to handle the vast German properties seized during the war. Miller, like King and Daugherty, is facing trial in connection with the return of the American Metals Company to its alien owners. Miller, who claims a perfect defense, was stricken with blood poisoning shortly after his last and superseding indictment, and almost died. Then there is George Remus of Cincinnati, who made millions out of liquor withdrawals, sanctioned by the Department of Justice. Remus served a term in Atlanta penitentiary, where Gaston B. Means, another member of the Harding entourage, now is.

Of the whole gang, Howard Mannington stands out as the only successful survivor. He is rich. He made large sums during his comparatively brief stay in Washington; his most remunerative sortie being his visit to Cuba for the National City Bank to adjust its sugar investments. Why he was chosen for this responsible post may some day be told. But apart from Mannington the gang has drifted to a destruction which puts to scorn merely human agencies of law and justice.

In the Driftway

THE following letter breezes into the Drifter from Minneapolis, on the banks of the Father of Waters:

DEAR SIR:

The Drifter has been abroad, I see, and he has had a merry time of it in Constantinople, Paris, and other foreign cities, because wherever he tried to order ham and eggs no one understood him. English is not as universal as some would have us believe, I take it. May I offer a word of advice to the Drifter. Before you go abroad next time send [illegible] for a month and when you leave take with you the Year Book of the Universal Esperanto Association. You will then be linked up with a huge fraternal organization, as it were, whose members are to be found in every nook and cranny of the world. U. E. A., as it is called for short, has delegates almost everywhere and they are eager to serve you. If you know a smattering of Esperanto, hunger need no longer gnaw at your vitals, and Constantinople will no longer be a city in which your health and happiness will be threatened by a linguistic food blockade. Turning to page 261 of your Year Book you will find that the delegate for that far-away city is Constantin Anastassaidi, civil engineer, rue Validé Djismé 37-39, Péra. Go to him and tell him who you are and what you want. The chances are a hundred to one he will not only be delighted to meet you but he will see to it that you are both fed and entertained.

How about little old Paris? Is there a delegate there? Bless your heart, yes! One chief delegate, one vice-delegate, twenty delegates. You will also find eight Esperanto clubs and the Central Esperanto Office and Library, the latter at 51, rue de Clichy.

Kun alta estimo,

DR. LOMAN WARFIELD,
Pres. Twin City Esperanto Club

* * * * *

THERE is much in this letter which appeals to the Drifter. He would like immensely to trot about in Constantinople with Mr. Anastassaidi, but he doubts if the conversation would continue for long in Esperanto. If Mr. Anastassaidi is enough of an Occidental to be interested in Esperanto, he is also modern enough to speak English much more fluently than the Drifter would be likely to speak Esperanto after six easy lessons—and the Drifter is too lazy to take any other kind. So after a few introductory passes in Esperanto, in which the Drifter would be a poor second to Mr. Anastassaidi, the latter would politely switch into English. That is the Drifter's usual experience in using a foreign language, and why should Esperanto prove an exception? Esperanto is theoretically the only language that anyone needs to know, but practically the Drifter observes that it is taken up principally by persons who are excellent linguists and have already mastered several other tongues. Perhaps that is why they find it so easy. Another thing which makes Esperanto a good conversational medium is that it is an artificially acquired language on the part of all persons using it. But in similar circumstances possibly any other language is as good. It is common experience, for instance, for an American who has difficulty in understanding the French of Frenchmen to find that he can get along in that language swimmingly with a Russian or an Italian.

* * * * *

BUT although the Drifter would like to call on Mr. Anastassaidi in Constantinople he imagines he would have a pretty thin time among the chief delegate, the vice-delegate, the twenty delegates, the eight clubs, and the Central Esperanto Office and Library in Paris. There is not always strength in numbers. Merely to encounter a fellow-American in, say, Ragusa, Sicily, means a friendly welcome, while the meeting of two white men in some parts of the Orient may be an excuse for an elaborate pow-wow. But the Drifter would not undertake to go about London visiting persons merely because they were Americans. Too many doors would be closed in his face with the chill information: "I'm sorry but I can't lend you anything."

FINALLY the Drifter denies the suggestion that "no one understood him" abroad. The Drifter is perhaps the sole inhabitant of this sphere who does not consider himself misunderstood. His regret is that both at home and abroad people understand him much too accurately and are not all as charitable as the mother of Jurgen—who loved him though she knew him very well.

[illegible even more Ah's coming],

THE DRIFTER,
Pres. Twin Hemisphere Ignoramuses' Club

Correspondence

Pay That Debt in Maple Sugar!

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The diplomats having been unable to find a way of settling the matter of the French debt, I submit the following plan. The French have been made to appear as a nation of dead beats. This is unfortunate, for if there is one thing above all others which a real American cannot stand, it is a dead beat or bilk.

They should call Andy Mellon's bluff, and offer to pay the entire debt at once. The French ambassador should announce that French factories will soon be producing great quantities of a new and improved form of aluminum ware. He should point out, at the same time, that as American shells were admitted to France free of duty in 1917 he would expect a reciprocal favor for his aluminum. For the benefit of Senator Borah he should add that because of the unusual wool crops of Algiers and New Caledonia the French will export many million dollars' worth of this commodity, and that their plan is to send it all to America to be credited toward the debt. It might be a little more difficult to convince Jim Reed that enough French corn and hogs could be sent this year to knock the bottom out of the American market, but it would be worth trying. And a few words might be added of the enormous quantities of French maple sugar that are awaiting exportation.

If the French ambassador has a sufficiently good poker face to do this, I believe that the matter of the French debt will disappear from our political discussions like ice from the ice-box in August.

Champaign, Illinois, July 27 HENRY J. RAVENSWOOD

Mary, Guaranteed Genuine

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your article, Henry Ford, Antiquarian, you mention the schoolhouse at Sterling, Massachusetts, to which Mary Sawyer took her little lamb one morning in 1811 or 1812, etc.

There has been a controversy between Sterling, Massachusetts, and the Argus-Champion of the Sunshine Towne, Newport, New Hampshire, in regard to the authoress and the scene of this event. I extract from Newport's Sunshine Towne bulletin the following:

> NEWPORT THE BIRTHPLACE OF MARY AND HER LITTLE LAMB
>
> The poem, Mary had a Little Lamb [illegible] the world over, was published by Sarah Josepha [illegible] Newport's noted author in a book of [illegible] for Our Children," in 1830. The schoolhouse to which the lamb followed Mary (in the person of Sarah Buell, later Mrs. Hale) is standing in Guild, a village in Newport. It was made over into a dwelling-house some years ago. A fund is being collected by the Newport Board of Trade to erect a fitting memorial to Mrs. Hale, Mary, and the Lamb, which shall become a shrine of American Childhood.

Brooklyn, July 30 CHESTER S. EHRMAN

On the Purity of Readers

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Referring to John T. Morgan's communication stating that the Congressional Library will not permit Havelock Ellis's "Studies in the Psychology of Sex" to be taken from the library, what is the meaning of your caption officially "Censorship" over that letter?

You seem to jump to the conclusion that this excellent rule is another case of "Censorship." The Librarian of Columbia University, which has a similar ruling, tells me that some of the volumes of this set in that library have had to be purchased three times, and this third volume is already mutilated by vandals who take out a page, or sometimes even four or five, of the more lurid case histories. The Congressional Library can probably cite a similar experience. How long the books would last if allowed to leave the library may be judged.

New York, August 1 ROBERT J. CONKLIN

—Advt.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: To those of us from the North who have long lived in Florida your article Florida Cashes in Her Chips was amusing. It will benefit Florida by helping to keep out of the State such people as those who—incompetent and unsuccessful wherever they may live—poured into Florida last year with the undying hope of finding a place where it would be possible to get something for nothing and to acquire a fortune without labor. Naturally there was prolonged wailing and gnashing of teeth when these people had to learn by experience that, even in Florida, figs are not gathered from thistles. The advent of these, and of the dishonest who came to exploit them, and who callously destroyed magnificent live oaks, great magnolias, and many other beautiful things in their avidity for money, made it seem, for a time, that Florida was in the deplorable process of gaining the whole world and losing her own soul. The fact that these people now cherish the belief that Florida is "seriously affected" by their departure recalls that masterpiece of irony in which Chicken-Little frantically reported "The sky is falling!" when a rose-leaf chanced to fall on her own feathers.

The fact that the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad is [illegible] ent spending vast sums on its lines in Florida is not exactly indicative of "collapse" here. Even Coral Gables recorded building permits last month amounting to more than one million dollars. Many of the automobiles that recently passed "a Georgian, lounging on his doorstep," will appear again when the owners return in the autumn, for many thousands of Floridians spend the summers in the North. We who live here hope that the others will not return.

Winter Park, Florida, July 7 MARY FRANCIS BAKER

Beyond Ford's Utopia

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: If all business men accepted Ford's program and carried it out intelligently; if the wage motive supplanted the profit motive; if prices were reduced to an unbelievable minimum, and wages elevated to an utopian maximum; if we had a five-day or even a four-day week for wage-earners; if all these most desirable consummations were every-day facts of life, then what would happen to the price of real estate and to rents?

I am, of course, a single-taxer, but to my obtuse mind the question cannot be laughed off because of that fact. The status of land tenure cannot be ignored.

Los Angeles, July 23 GEORGE A. BRIGGS

Books and Music

Live Epitaphs

By AMANDA BENJAMIN HALL

A Poor Woman

Some say she has to wear a shawl
To hide her bones, and some Say once a mouse crept from her wall
And offered her a crumb.

Miser

Once through the window we looked in
And saw how he would count and gloat:
The man is tighter than his skin,
And older than his overcoat.

Village Belle

Three stalwart suitors strove to win
Kate Byrd, who wedded last December
A man who's never had a chin
Since any of us can remember.

Dressmaker

I think the Lord when he's dismissing
Transgressions will forgive her sins.
Poor Jenny's lips, once red for kissing,
Are sentenced now to holding pins.

Inheritors

"It is not time for you to go,"
They told him, but as though to mock
Their words, the sick man seemed to know
Each had his eye upon the clock.

Economist

Miss Jones is frugal in her way.
To find if something had gone bad
She tried it on a tramp one day
Who died. It seems it had.

First Glance

THE Oxford University Press is to me the most interesting press in the world. No publisher's catalogue holds half the excitement, I am convinced, that is to be found in the annual volume which Mr. Humphrey Milford issues out of Amen House; no list of titles now in print is better calculated to tease the poor scholar with thoughts of the good things he will never be able to buy. I speak of the scholar, for it is he whom the Press particularly serves. And at present I have even more particularly in mind the scholar in literature who looks to Oxford for editions of the old English poets. There he will find them to his taste—solidly introduced and annotated, impeccably printed and bound, and frequently, alas, expensive beyond the dream of purchase. But there they are; and as he can the scholar provides himself with the Chaucer, the Donne, the Ben Jonson, the Herrick, the Milton, or the Vaughan. He will look elsewhere for signs that literature is alive today, if he wants such signs at all. In his Alexandrian moods he will lock himself in among the treasures here brought to him out of the past.

In its zeal for definitive editions the Press is sometimes Alexandrian with a vengeance, lavishing its wonderful resources upon the most minor of men. An instance is "Satirical Poems published anonymously by William Mason, with notes by Horace Walpole now first printed from his manuscript; edited, with an exposé of the mystification, notes, and index, by Paget Toynbee" ($14). The six obscure satires of Mason are nothing whatever but curiosities, and the commentary by Walpole, while, like anything from the once so busy hand of this supreme dilettante, it is worth preserving, is certainly without present or past significance. Yet Mr. Toynbee as editor has performed his slender task with monumental pains. More can be said for "The Poems of Richard Lovelace," edited by C. H. Wilkinson (2 vols.: $35), though here, too, we have the spectacle of vast editorial effort expended upon a text of very little weight. Lovelace wrote two lyrics which many poets would give their necks to have written; further than that, though he published a good deal, he is inconsequential. Mr. Wilkinson, however, rakes all the rubbish; examines it with exhaustive care; loads notes galore upon it; reproduces in sixteen lovely engravings the faces of Lovelace, Lucasta, and Althea, the texts of documents bearing on the poet's life, and the musical settings for several of the songs as they were sung in the seventeenth century; and gives us in the end a surpassingly beautiful book for the eye and the hand—though hardly the mind—to enjoy. His biography of the poet, while arduously undertaken, yields little information of a positive nature. The handsome frontispiece, he admits, may not be a picture of Lovelace after all; he proves that To Althea from Prison could not have been written from confinement; and he concludes that nothing is to be known about either Lucasta or Althea.

In an entirely different category are two more recent Oxford reprints. "William Blake's Prophetic Writings," edited by D. J. Sloss and J. P. R. Wallis (2 vols.: $14), and "Wordsworth's Prelude," edited from the manuscripts by Ernest de Selincourt ($8.50), give us in important new forms the major works of major men. Messrs. Sloss and Wallis, following a host of editors who of late years have labored to make their mad master intelligible, may now claim to have produced the standard working text of Blake's prophetic books. The great Nonesuch edition notwithstanding, this is the place to go for an understanding—if understanding is the word—of the whole metaphysic contained in the whirling space which lies between "The Book of Thel" and "The Ghost of Abel." The General Introduction in the second volume furnishes the most patient and intelligent statement I have seen of Blake's growing philosophy of liberty; and everywhere the two editors manifest a sympathy, joined with a sanity, such as no dealer with Blake henceforth can afford to be without. As for the prophecies themselves, here at last an accessible edition presents them with all their monstrous defects, all their demonic strength, and—on occasion—all their angelic freshness.

There can scarcely be a question concerning the importance of Mr. de Selincourt's labors, since "The Prelude" is the outstanding achievement in English poetry since "Paradise Lost." The only text we have had heretofore is that of 1850—Wordsworth's final version, published after his death. That Wordsworth valued his masterpiece properly is proved by the existence of five virtually complete manuscripts and several notebooks containing portions of the poem. Of these Mr. de Selincourt makes a composite text which he opposes page by page to the published one; and in an introduction he analyzes the significance for Wordsworth's mind and art of the differences between the two. The final version is clearly the best of them all, though intellectually the man of eight-and-forty was less daring than the man of thirty had been. In the beginning he thought too much for the good of his art. At the end he thought too little. "The Prelude" comes out of that happy early prime when he both thought and felt, and when he best knew how to write.

MARK VAN DOREN

A Bible for Bibuli

A Book of Wine. By P. Morton Shand. Brentano's. $4.50.

THIS is not a book; it is an encyclopedia. I can imagine no reasonable question, issuing out of a wine-bibber's yearning soul, that it does not answer. The whole tale of French wines, Northern and Southern, red and white, sparkling and still, is told in voluptuous detail, with lists of all the extant varieties, notes upon the grapes that make them, and wise observations about vintages. One hears (and instantly believes) that Château Latour is "richly spacious and inspiring," that Château Margaux is "delicate and poetic," and that Château Lafite is "grand and sublime." There follow glowing pages upon the wines of Burgundy, upon those of the Loire, upon those of Alsace-Lorraine, upon those of the Jura and Savoy. Then comes a superb treatise upon the incomparable white wines of Germany—the tart and lovely Rheinish, the fragrant Moselle, the luscious Pfälzer, the ancient and romantic Steinwein in Bocksbeutel. And there are chapters upon the wines of Spain—not only the familiar sherry, but also the vastly underestimated light wines—upon port and its fraudulences, upon the Austrian and Hungarian wines, upon Madeira and Canary, upon the fiery wines of Italy, and even upon the wines of Greece, Algeria, Chili, Cyprus, Australia, the Crimea, and even Persia.

Mr. Shand, an Englishman, is both scholar and artist, scientist and connoisseur. His learning is of that vast and luminous sort which seems to clothe its subject like a blanket—nay, like a brilliant banner, glowing with stars. He is no mere cataloguer of vintages and retailer of vineyard scandals. When he speaks of the "hallowed hectares" of Puligny-Montrachet one picks up the vibration of his palate; when he says that the humble Cassis, grown near Marseilles, has "a peculiar gritty flavor," one feels his teeth gritting. One pictures him spending long days in his wine-cellar, respectfully accoutered in claw-hammer and white waistcoat, with his eye seeking secrets in the cobwebs and his heart going pitter-pat. Is there a suspicious cloudiness in that majestic Château Rauzan-Ségla? Are the corks sick in that 1917er Hattenheimer Hassel Auslese? Is there what seems to be a fly (Musca domestica) in that last priceless half-bottle of Close de Bèze? Then wurrah-wurrah! Then Potztausend Donnerwetter! Then hosanna backward out of the Black Mass! Mr. Shand dedicates his book to his father, to his son, and to his old schoolmaster. There are whole chapters in it that were plainly written on his knees.

Curiously enough, he shows a foul and preposterous ignorance when he comes to the wines of California. Can it be that the English have reached such a state of mind that everything American is obnoxious to them? Whatever the cause, the fact remains that what he says of the California vintages, generally of the last years, is full of nonsense. He speaks of them as if they were fit only for Greenwich Village and the waiters' trayers. Nothing could be further from the truth. I give him Cresta Blanca, as a Burgundy not to be scoffed at even in Paris. I give him the Beaulieu Vineyard Cabernet, and even some of the Muscats. I give him a white wine that failed, not from California but from the object in Lake Gate. Can it be that the most objectionable, the essentially unclean, is that instead of the sour? I half suspect it. Certainly if he had ever flooded his oesophagus with Cresta Blanca of a good year, he would not talk so [illegible] style of American viniculture. We had still a long way to go, but we were assuredly on our way. I cannot see how such labels would have caught up with our wines, and even Englishmen would have learned to [illegible] Hollywood, Chateau Montelena, and 1919er Rauenthaler-Sterlinger Terrassenau [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

The Madness of Nations

The Neuroses of the Nations. By C. E. Playne. Thomas Seltzer. $5.

THIS work is the beginning of what promises to be the most thorough and penetrating psychological study of nationalism yet executed by any author. It is cast in terms of psychopathology and, in general, is based upon a sound individual and social psychology. There is a certain risk involved in the direct transference of the symptomology of the individual to the behavior of national groups. There is also occasionally some quite evident straining in the effort to fit the facts of nationalistic expression into the adopted categories of psychopathology. On the whole, however, the procedure is sound and the treatment convincing.

The author first describes with some care the typical traits of the individual neurosis as expounded by the best present-day dynamic psychology. These he finds to be increased anxiety; heightened excitability; greater susceptibility to intense hatreds, often upon slight or imaginary pretexts; hyper-suggestibility; frequent surrender to illusions; loss of memory; and, occasionally, general dementia.

Turning to a consideration of national psychology, Dr. Playne discovers in the psychology of Germany and France before the war the following symptoms: (1) A general deterioration of national morale and intelligence; (2) an increasing frequency of easily precipitated panics; (3) the wild and irresponsible tendencies of armed forces, remarkably similar in character to the behavior of criminals; (4) a growing tendency to place reliance upon war and to welcome the approach of conflict; (5) a capitulation to the psychology of haste and anxiety; (6) a marked decline in intellectual poise and religious faith; (7) a general lust for concrete achievement; (8) the domination of ruthless personal ambition on the part of unscrupulous leaders; (9) the gradual suppression of memory and a growing inability to profit by experience. These led to a complete breakdown of group control. Dr. Playne asks whether such traits were ever characteristic of European society at an earlier date, and answers with the assertion that such symptoms were never so widely diffused over Europe as they were in the generation before the World War. This was due primarily to the development of the new technology of communication and to the gradual spread of democracy.

The remainder of the volume is devoted to a penetrating analysis of nationalism in Germany and France since 1870; a second volume will treat the national neurosis of England. The discussion of German nationalism is illuminating and convincing, even if the author relies at times upon such shaky testimony as the memoirs of Ambassador Gerard and of Dr. Davis, the Kaiser's American dentist. The German neurosis

Dr. Playne assigns primarily to the combination of exuberance after the victorious Franco-Prussian War with the remarkable growth of German material prosperity and power. Added to these were the fear of encirclement and the ability of the German jingoists to exploit the manifestations of the French revenge spirit and the diplomatic threats of the Triple Entente. After Bismarck's retirement those in control of German policy did not possess the wisdom or capacity to keep matters under judicious control. Too much space is given to an analysis of the vagaries of the Pan-American League. Had the author been acquainted with Dr. Wertheimer's admirable monograph he would have realized that, however imbecilic this organization may have been, it had no general following in Germany and did not receive governmental approval. It offers rich material for a study of the psychopathology of special groups but it had no great influence upon German foreign policy before the World War.

The study of the French neurosis is particularly valuable, not because France was essentially worse than the other European states but because of the general ignorance of the French state of mind on the part of English and American readers. In England and America there has been no lack of conviction as to German arrogance and aggressiveness, but we have generally believed France to have been quiet, pacific, and thoroughly terrified at the prospect of war. A perusal of Dr. Playne's trenchant pages will put an end for all time to this naive illusion. The author deals with gratifying thoroughness with the part played by Maurice Barrès in stimulating French nationalism, but he does not tell us enough of Déroulède, Thérenne, Coppée, and Judet. It is made clear that the [illegible] Nationalism lay in the sting of the defeat of [illegible] in disappointment to recover Alsace-Lorraine.

[illegible] to the heart of the complex. The w[illegible] caused by the German possession o[illegible] The [illegible] the center around which the [illegible] The intellectuals of the progressive [illegible] worked deeply under the conditions of [illegible] Materialism, wealth and well being of all [illegible] the unpleasant realities. They had the means to [illegible] they lived and old grievances could be [illegible] While certain families and clans [illegible] kept up strong francophile feelings, the bulk of the population were taken up with the distractions of a flourishing and busy epoch. But French chauvinism, the "France herself again" sentiment, which grew up about the turn of the [illegible] ized on the lost-provinces complex, revived it, [illegible] it for all it was worth. Alsatian men [illegible] women in native costume were sent to take part in [illegible] in France in order to arouse "true" nationalistic feelings. It is indicative of the neurasthenic character of these feelings that emotional storms were [illegible] the performances and processions, so that many [illegible] witnessed the affecting sight presented by [illegible] of the lost provinces, in the national dress of [illegible] which had been "torn from the body of France."

Chapter seven of Part II is a very valuable study of the origins of the World War based upon a knowledge of the new evidence. The author errs, however, in contending that a general psychological exhaustion brought on the World War; as a matter of fact the explosion came after war had been decided [illegible] actually declared. All in all the volume is a distinct contribution to the literature of nationalism, and constitutes an excellent supplement to Professor Hayes's somewhat more calm and judicious collection of historical essays on the subject. We shall await with particular interest the appearance of the second volume dealing with England, for it has been generally assumed in America since 1914 that nobody but the most obsessed Hibernian could possibly imagine that England has ever entertained sentiments other than those of the sweetest humility and the most determined pacifism.

HARRY ELMER BARNES

Roads to Illusion

Mape: The World of Illusion. By André Maurois. D. Appleton and Company. $2.50.

HERE is an intrepid Frenchman. At a time when les jeunes are one and all wearing hobnailed boots that they may the more ferociously step upon the grave of the Master, André Maurois quietly continues the tradition of Anatole France. In him, confronting us like so many revenants, are the familiar careful lucidity, the restrained fancy, the library flavor, the disinclination to take one's characters seriously, and finally, that substratum of idea, never so thick as to be profound, never so thin as to be trivial. Mape, a child's term for the world of illusion, is furthermore the world in which so many of Anatole France's people live. It is a constructed cosmos, that happy "place to stand on" from which, with the lever of irony, one may move, or at least, poke at, the world. Brotteaux and Bonnard already live in Mape. They are almost indigenous. It is because they are so completely set outside the hurly-burly of reality that they are able to make so many neat if not wise remarks about it.

In Maurois's book, on the other hand, Mape is a land sought for, not found. The three stories of which it consists detail three separate voyages of discovery. How does one build up illusion? Here are three ways, at least. The first is the way of the Creator. In the charming anecdotical manner of "Ariel," the author etches for us a picture of the young Goethe. We see the wooing of Charlotte Buff. Unable to win her, the poet suffers intensely. How shall he untie the Gordian knot of his inhibited feelings? In a flash the mirage of Mape swims into his ken. He translates his thwarted passion into art; and "Werther" is born. By a feat of imaginative sympathy Maurois has evoked the history of a sublimation; and by so doing, he has simultaneously presented us with a piece of pure genetic criticism. That he has chosen to do this anecdotically rather than analytically is what separates his tale from a piece of criticism such as Mr. Krutch's Poe.

There is another road to Mape. It is a beaten thoroughfare, this one, for it is that which we take when we read a book. It is the way of the Reader. If the Reader makes his hero-identification in thought only, then is his Mape evanescent. But sometimes he solidifies his Mape. "Life imitates Art much more than Art imitates Life." We act out our heroes. Julien Sorel read the Napoleonic proclamations, steeped himself in a mythos, and so lived the life of a Man of Destiny as much as he did that of Julien Sorel. In Maurois's story the course of a young man's life is changed because, at a critical moment, he remembers what a Balzac hero did in a corresponding situation. There is poignant tragedy to follow, for we may not translate the evasions of illusion into the solidities of actuality. True enough that Balzac himself lived the lives of Rastignac and Goriot—but it was in his study and at his writing-table that he lived them.

Finally, there is a road to Mape known as the way of the Interpreter. In The Portrait of an Actress Maurois recalls for us Mrs. Siddons, Reynolds's Tragic Muse, and the pitiful story of the love of her two daughters for Lawrence, the portrait painter. It is on this tragedy, not on the figure of Mrs. Siddons, that the author throws the clear light of his narrative; only to reveal to us, with an oblique suddenness, the way in which the actress, the histrion, finds relief for her harrowed soul in the portrayal of Shakespeare's tragic heroines. The Englishwoman in her stopped up the channels of her own emotion, but there was always Constance to be played, there was always the Mape of Shakespeare, friendly, a land of relief.

The psychology that underlies these three stories is perhaps too agreeably simple. French clarity has been too conscientious in its labors. But when the idea-base of this book is reduced to a theorem formula, there still remain, exhibited as admirably as they were in "Ariel," Maurois's gifts of ironic characterization, narrative swiftness, and suggestive impressiveness in the depiction of a milieu.

CLIFTON P. FADIMAN

Jesus and Paul

Jesus the Nazarene. Myth or History? By Maurice Goguel. Translated by Frederick Stephens. D. Appleton and Company. $3.

The Life of Saint Paul. The Man and the Apostle. By F. J. Foakes-Jackson. Boni and Liveright. $4.

BOTH Jesus and Paul were from the first generously heroized by their followers, perhaps quite beyond anything that either of them would have desired. They were both picturesque individuals with dynamic personalities that evoked highly emotional reactions even among their contemporaries. Few characters in history have been as devoutly admired and as bitterly hated by those with whom they came in contact, and each paid the extreme penalty of martyrdom, the price so often exacted in antiquity of one whose conduct proved unpopular with the guardians of the established institutions.

Jesus was not only admired by his friends, but in the years following his crucifixion he was glorified, divinized, and ultimately worshiped. The second and third generations of His disciples composed books in which they blended surviving memories of His words and deeds with their own interpretations of His personality viewed in the light of their present disposition to revere Him as the founder of a new religion. Gradually the simple story of His earthly career was transformed into a display of supernatural power befitting one who subsequently should become an object of adoration. Thus the Jesus of history became the Christ of faith, and ultimately the second person in the godhead. This duality in the early Christian portraiture of Jesus is a discovery of comparatively recent times, when modern historical science has forced students of ancient documents, sacred as well as secular, to distinguish sharply between the interpretative interests of an author and the actual facts that have been embodied in his composition. The New Testament books when read in the light of this critical method of studying documents are now commonly thought to yield two portraits of Jesus, one that of the actual historical person and the other that of the new divinity exalted by the faith of His disciples to a position of honor beside God Himself.

Professor Goguel is a distinguished French scholar who maintains that the historical Jesus is discoverable by eliminating His divine features from the New Testament pictures. But others have drawn a different conclusion. They have held that no such real Jesus is recoverable, that, in fact, he never existed at all except as a purely mythological figure. This skeptical opinion, sporadically advocated in one or another quarter for over half a century, has of late been revived in France and provided the occasion that called forth Goguel's book in defense of the historical reality of an earthly Jesus. As has formerly been the case with protagonists of the negative position, they seek to demonstrate their views by appealing to the evidently mythological features in the New Testament records, while the more sober side of the picture fails to impress them as real. He was simply a cult hero, and the gospel pictures are efforts, not to divinize a real person, but to anthropomorphize a mythical deity.

On the other hand, Goguel appeals to the conclusions now familiar to students in the field of literary criticism of the gospels. Thus working from different premises and employing incompatible methods, the result is the usual impasse. Neither party can convince the other. But it should be said that the present volume is a masterly presentation of its author's position and will seem entirely convincing to readers accustomed to pursue the lines of critical literary study of the New Testament writings.

The task of Professor Foakes-Jackson is of a different sort. It is expository rather than controversial. Then, too, he has documents of Paul's own composition, and his apostolic followers have never transported his personality into the metaphysical sphere. These circumstances greatly simplify the task of a modern biographer. Yet problems are not wanting, though most of them have been rather lightly touched in the present book. It will prove very satisfactory for a reader who has never been troubled by the question of how far Paul's Christianity was influenced through contact with other religions, such as the mysteries, popular in the gentile environment within which the apostle carried on his missionary labors. One whose curiosity has been awakened by this comparatively new but very important aspect of Pauline study will find no answer to his problems in the work of Professor Foakes-Jackson.

SHIRLEY JACKSON

Half a Kingdom

Cyclops' Eye. By Joseph Auslander. Harper and Brothers. $2.

THIS is a book not wanting in lyric lines and keen images. It reveals an alert sensuousness, a young hurt tenderness, a searching responsive mind. But Mr. Auslander seems not yet to have discovered how best to employ his gifts. There are few complete poems here. Most of the inclusions are too elliptically terse for clarity, or flawed by an overstrained intensity of emotion, by a technical equipment whose facility forbids strictness. He has the cyclops' eye of the true poet—he sees, he burns, he makes the giant gesture. This is not enough. The pause, louder than sound, bids the listener shudder. Restraint avoids anti-climax.

Mr. Auslander shows his virtues in such a piece as Inarticulate, a fine voicing of Spring madness; in the vivid portrait evoked by the group of Sonnets to Amy Lowell; in such deft images as these:

> When the branches of the tree
> Antler velvet in the spring. . . .
>
> The wind has edges honed on frost . . .;

but most in the lyrics which speak of water, rains, mist, and fog. When he writes of these, magic spills from his pen-point. He finds words which have the half-palpable contours, the cloudy texture, the twilight density of the weathers whereof he writes. He takes you out to feel and smell them, to melt into their vagueness, and to flicker with their sullen lights.

> The air is wedded with a stiff frost
> And foggily the kenneled hound
> Booms; and every noise is lost
> In its own sound.
>
> Black meadow mist steams
> In a silver vat.
>
> Fog like wool
> Softened the duck's horn;
> Cow and bull
> Stirred steaming, forlorn.
> Ghostly, beautiful.

Mr. Auslander can convey color and the nuances of sound with a nice and skilful hand. He is intensely aware of the sensible manifold that presents itself to eye and ear and touch. He is aware, too, of the tears of things, of the fates that wrench the heart and kindle the mind. But these wake in him a distress that is either too sharp for clear utterance or not woven into the body of his thought as closely as the natural scene which he so finely celebrates. The impression given by this, his second book of verse, is that a poet of nature is discontentedly seeking to be the poet of man. When Mr. Auslander tries for pure mood, or when he experiments with narrative, be it under the influence of Masefield, Sandburg, or Frost, he is merely adequate, not excellent. His gift is indubitable. It is only his use of it that is in doubt. Because he can write beautifully, one is more impatient with his lapses. There is too much obscurity, too much tenuity; there are too many classic refer-[illegible], too many mixed images and words used for the rhyme's rather than the meaning's sake. These faults would matter less in work that gave less evidence of power.

BABETTE DEUTSCH

Books in Brief

The Art in Painting. By Albert C. Barnes. Harcourt, Brace and Company.

A new edition under a new imprint of an important critical work recently reviewed at length in The Nation.

The Magnificent Idler. The Story of Walt Whitman. By Cameron Rogers. Doubleday, Page and Company. $2.50.

A great [illegible] trimmed to the size of a conventional modern biography.

The Sacred Tree: Being the Second Part of the Tale of Genji. By Lady Murasaki. Translated from the Japanese by Arthur Waley. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.50.

So the delicious story of Prince Genji goes on; and a third part will soon be ready. Mr. Waley wisely prefixes to this portion two essays on Japanese fiction before Lady Murasaki and on the art of Lady Murasaki herself.

The Romantic Theory of Poetry: An Examination in the Light of Croce's Aesthetic. By A. E. Powell (Mrs. E. R. Dodds). Longmans, Green and Company. $4.50.

A philosophic [illegible] the romantic conception of poetry as something which revealed "reality" developed by Blake, Coleridge, Wordsworth, De Quincey, Shelley, and Keats. One of the most careful statements so far made of the intellectual process by which poetry today is being once more revolutionized.

Contemporary Russian Literature: 1881-1925. By Prince D. S. Mirsky. Alfred A. Knopf. $4.

This book falls between two stools. The critical opinions expressed are too personal for the orthodox bio-bibliographical handbook which the author aimed to make. On the other hand, it is not a history of literature of the more ambitious sort because the main outlines are obscured by a clutter of often irrelevant detail, and further because a good deal of the material is too recent to be viewed in historical perspective. The author's avowedly bad English is a serious flaw in a book of literary appreciations. In spite of its failings the volume has some uses as a reference work, because it offers a mass of information which is not otherwise accessible to the English-reading public.

The Romance of Design. By Garnet Warren in collaboration with Horace B. Cheney. Doubleday, Page and Company.

A praiseworthy but superficial effort to popularize the story of designs used through the ages on fine fabrics—silks, velvets, satins. Praiseworthy because the book is the result of research inaugurated by Cheney Brothers, manufacturers of textiles. Such research on the part of any manufacturer is interesting. The authors attempt to set forth the chief social customs, beliefs, and national characteristics which have influenced patterns woven by different nations at different times. Their work is superficial because they fail to show just cause why they do not apply the same standards to modern work. Is there no modern design worth reproducing? And if not, why not? At the back of the book are 76 pages of samples of the designs used by Cheney Brothers, all composed of eclectic work borrowed from other times and other countries. Yet in France Raoul Dufy and other prominent artists are designing patterns for use on textiles, and here the Stehli Silks Corporation are now bringing out a series of "Americana Prints" designed by well-known contemporary artists.

Imperial Rome. By M. P. Nilsson. Translated by G. C. Richards. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $5.

This is a conservative and sound survey of the political history of the Roman Empire with judicious observations on social and economic conditions. The author knows the value and contents of his sources and also most of the pertinent investigations of his fellow-scholars. He has not attempted to impose any brand-new explanations of a national tragedy that has already invited too many conjectures. The general reader will find the book rather level-going and as profitable as any similar survey of the period; and the specialist will not be harmed if he reviews his pet theories in the cool light of this tranquil book. There are many full-page illustrations, but no footnotes or references. The translation reads well and seems to be competent.

Letters from William Blake to Thomas Butts. Collotype Facsimile. Oxford University Press. $8.50.

The ten letters which William Blake wrote to his faithful and generous patron Thomas Butts have for long been well known. First printed by Gilchrist and reprinted elsewhere, they have recently been reedited by Geoffrey Keynes in the Nonesuch edition of Blake's "Writings." It is probable that the collection as we have it here is complete, for Butts seems to have guarded them carefully; at most no more than a few brief and unimportant notes are perhaps missing. The extreme care with which they were written makes them especially well adapted to reproduction in collotype; and so exquisite are the facsimiles that in turning the pages one seems to be almost in the presence of the poet's own manuscript. The only novelty in the present collection is a letter from Butts to Blake which had previously been printed only in part. That Butts kept a rough draft of this letter with his letters from Blake accounts for its survival. As now given entire it explains several references in Blake's reply. Its tone of somewhat elephantine humor and good-natured patronage is interesting evidence of the relationship existing between the two men.

Music

The Emotional Trend in Performance

A COMBINATION of optimistic and democratic philosophy is responsible for the belief that artistic excellence, and excellence alone, is rewarded by widespread appreciation. As proof of this contention there is cited the Sturm und Drang to hear the Boston Symphony under Dr. Muck, the present Philadelphia Orchestra, or Arturo Toscanini.

But if the enthusiasm at Mr. Toscanini's final concert last season, an enthusiasm described as unprecedented, was a direct response solely to his competence, why was his first visit, in January, 1921, a comparative failure? As a matter of fact, there was just as great a demonstration at the final concert of Mr. Furtwaengler's first visit a year ago; and if this was, as contended at the time, a direct response to his competence, why did presumably the same competence arouse so much less enthusiasm and interest at his second visit? But the greatest tumult of all time occurred in March, 1921, at the final concert of Mr. Mengelberg's first season with the National Symphony; and if this was a response to competence, why has Mr. Mengelberg's work since then, though of equal quality, been treated with indifference?

It depends usually on the reviewers: let them lose their heads, and the public will lose theirs. The report of phenomenal excellence (the old Boston, the Philadelphia, Mr. Mengelberg in 1921, Mr. Furtwaengler in 1925, Mr. Toscanini in 1926) or of anything else that is phenomenal (Mr. Koussevitzky in 1924; also Mr. Klemperer, whose mannerisms triumphed over unfavorable reviews) sends the public stampeding after things. When these are all gone [illegible] is a necessity for trying to get in: the fact that one can't. Reports of inaccessibility attract the persons who will struggle for anything that is inaccessible; reports of struggles attract the persons who assume that what is fought for is worth fighting for. Inside the hall there is lightning and thunder. And to all this the reviewers [illegible] as confirmation of their own judgments: the public is responsive to artistic excellence. The [illegible] if the concerts are still few and filled about (Mr. Stokowski and Mr. Koussevitzky), the atmosphere continues to be electric; but when the guest returns as permanent conductor of a resident orchestra with several series of concerts (Mr. Mengelberg and Mr. Furtwaengler) he is an old story and accessible, and interest, first of the reviewers and then consequently of the people, flows away.

The decisive fact, then, is that in 1921 Mr. Aldrich of the Times was lukewarm to Mr. Toscanini and all but excited over Mr. Mengelberg, and in 1926 Mr. Downes of the Times is cool to Mr. Mengelberg and hot about Mr. Toscanini. For me this difference in critical opinion represents a shift in taste, and this, in turn, a change in the executive art to which the latter refers.

Musical performance seems to be paralleling the development of music itself: from architectural it has become emotional. Formerly changes in tempo and color revealed pattern and structure, now they convey emotions; and as against Mr. Mengelberg's architectonics of form we now have Mr. Toscanini's architectonics of emotions. This tendency is all to the good in a work like "Götterdämmerung": Mr. Toscanini's performance is the more shattering, and therefore to be preferred to Dr. Muck's. It is less good for Beethoven: here, though there is emotional content, the style remains architectural and demands the solidity of Mr. Mengelberg rather than the sinuous curves of Mr. Toscanini. And it is no good at all for purely architectural music. For it did music with emotional content little harm to be performed by Mr. Mengelberg, for example, as though it were purely architectural; the moods were realized anyhow, indirectly; but when architectural music is performed as though it were emotional, it acquires emotional content and in so doing changes its essential character. When, in particular, Bach is played by Mr. Samuel like Chopin or Liszt, he draws closer to Chopin and Liszt. This makes him more attractive, but it is well to realize that what is more attractive is no longer Bach, but Bach plus—plus a style of performance, plus the emotions associated by convention with the changes in tempo and color that make up that style.

It is well to realize this because of the very nature of these emotions, which has also changed. Formerly they were objective, a content of the music; now performance has come to include extreme, eccentric nuances which we associate with the emotions of the performer. What is conveyed to us is not so much a romantic Bach as [illegible] we think a romantic Samuel. Similarly a pressing tempo, interrupted by nuances out of proportion to it, conveys not so much an impetuous and imperious Brahms as an impetuous and imperious Stokowski; for this personal or subjective style, until recently restricted to performance on a single instrument (a pianist would play more soberly with orchestra), has now been transferred to orchestral performance as well. Formerly, then, though we heard a symphony or tone-poem necessarily through the ears of a Muck or a Mengelberg, what we heard was a structure of the symphony or a mood of the tone-poem; now what we get through the ears of Mr. Toscanini impresses us chiefly as the personal élan of Mr. Toscanini. Formerly the aim was to make explicit in the music its own inner coherence, or at least [illegible] inherence; now the music is carried [illegible] personal manipulation which is essentially extra-musical but as such more direct and much wider in its appeal.

Hence, perhaps, the shift in taste. The listeners of 1921 required the formal architectonics they had been accustomed to, in Dr. Muck's performances, for example; and this they found in Mr. Mengelberg. The nuances and curves of Mr. Toscanini impressed these reviewers as introducing into music an essentially alien, if occasionally alluring, Italianate element; and the term they applied to Mr. Stokowski's performances was "perfumed." Today it is precisely the perfumed, the Italianate, the sinuous that is wanted, or rather, the intense personal emotion it seems to communicate. For the most part the architectonic skill of Mr. Mengelberg finds no comprehension; of a marvelously articulated and integrated performance of Strauss's "Also Sprach Zarathustra" the incredible Mr. Chotzinoff writes that the parts had no relation to each other. But even Mr. Gilman, who does appreciate it, finds the other more alluring and intoxicating; a mere pressure in tempo and Mr. Stokowski is everything a great conductor should be, instead of only one or two things. Music, Mr. Gilman insists correctly, cannot speak for itself, its full stature is revealed only by a great interpreter; but it appears, from his judgments, that it attains its full stature only when it communicates to him an élan which is the dynamic force that propels it and the magnetic force that holds it together. For Mr. Gilman, again, the great interpreter is one who reveals new beauty in familiar music, makes the second-rate appear first-rate, and gives each type of music its correct style; but, so far as I can make out, the new beauty Mr. Gilman hears in familiar music is only the élan of Mr. Toscanini, the first-rate in the second-rate is again Mr. Toscanini, and the uncanny perfection in each style is still Mr. Toscanini. And Mr. Toscanini, paradoxically, is the artist whom all praise for his selfless attitude toward his art.

B. H. HAGGIN

IS IT GOD'S WORD?

By Joseph Wheless

Associate Editor, American Bar Association Journal

George A. Dorsey writes: "Every boy and girl in America should have access to 'Is It God's Word?' and every pulpit in Christendom should have a copy. The time has come for a showdown between mummied superstition and enlightened curiosity. Wheless deals the fetish worshippers a staggering blow—they should no longer be allowed to control the education of the youth."

$5.00 at all bookstores

ALFRED A. KNOPF

730 Fifth Avenue, New York

BORZOI

International Relations Section

The Bolivar Centennial

EDWARD E. CURTIS

On [illegible] Bolivar, the first Pan-[illegible] from the [illegible] June 16 to [illegible] cultural relations with Latin [illegible] Minister to Panama, William I. [illegible] Minister to Panama, and [illegible] the purpose of the congress was [illegible] from the start a [illegible] ter. Especially was it tempted to touch the forbidden fruit [illegible] the Caribbean. There was [illegible] the United States because of its intervention in Haiti, [illegible] and other Caribbean lands.

The evil impression created by our domination of this [illegible] the opening of the congress. The head of each delegation was asked to make a brief speech of greeting and congratulation, the speeches being delivered in alphabetical order according to countries, beginning with Argentina and ending with Venezuela. Most of the orators confined themselves to innocuous generalities and the hand clapping was rather perfunctory. When the turn of Dr. Alfredo Trejo Castillo of Honduras arrived he seized the opportunity to hit at the growing power of the United States in the Caribbean and to warn his hearers against the "Colossus of the North." His remarks were greeted with a storm of applause and he was obliged to rise and bow [illegible] times before the audience would permit the program to be resumed. No other delegate was equally honored. In fact [illegible] from the United States perceived how [illegible] to the estimation of many Latin Americans.

Dr. Castillo was the stormy petrel of the congress. A few days later he boldly introduced a resolution to the effect that one of the most cherished aspirations of the American states was to see Porto Rico independent. The president of the Unionist Party of Porto Rico promptly sent a message urging the congress to support the resolution, but the executive committee of the congress shelved the whole business as containing too much dynamite.

The delegate of another Caribbean republic long occupied by United States marines also illustrated the suspicion entertained by the countries to the south regarding the government at Washington. Dr. Daniel Gutierrez Navas of Nicaragua proposed that the headquarters of the Pan-American Union be transferred from Washington to Panama. At once the fat was in the fire. Everyone realized that Dr. Navas was expressing a feeling widespread throughout Latin America that the Pan-American Union as at present located is too much under the thumb of the State Department. Warm applause greeted the proposal. Mendez Pereira, the president of the congress, adjourned the proceedings before a vote could be taken, ostensibly on the ground that Dr. Ricardo J. Alfaro, the representative of the Pan-American Union, was not present. When the matter was subsequently taken up, Dr. Alfaro made a cogent plea for the present location of the Union and Dr. Navas with obvious reluctance withdrew his undiplomatic resolution.

One sensed, too, that the aggressive policy of the United States in the Caribbean was present in the minds of the Latin-American delegates, when Dr. Harmodio Arias of Uruguay persuaded the congress to adopt a resolution to the effect that any act violating international law committed against one American republic should constitute an offense against all and "provoke a common and uniform reaction."

To be sure, President Chiari of Panama took occasion in a speech to the chairmen of the different delegations to deny that so far as Panama is concerned the United States harbored any purpose of domination; but when one considers that Panama is now seeking a loan in the United States through the agency of the National City Bank, President Chiari's rush to defend the good name of the "colossus of the North" is understandable.

The work of the congress was done partly in plenary session and partly in committee. Five committees were appointed in addition to a steering committee consisting of the heads of the delegations. One was charged with consideration of a league of American states, a second with the subject of a pan-American university, a third with pan-Americanism and international law, a fourth with the problem of diffusing more effectively among the states of the New World a knowledge of one another's language and culture, and a fifth with the influence of the Panama Canal upon the Americans. Scholars had, by invitation, prepared papers on these subjects to be read at the congress. The papers were turned over to the appropriate committees which discussed them and frequently used them as the basis of recommendations to the congress. The official delegates of the United States were forbidden by the State Department to vote on any resolutions of a political character.

Outside of the business sessions of the congress and the round of social events the most significant episodes were the unveiling of Benlliures's monument to Bolivar and the inauguration of the Bolivarian University, a pan-American institution designed to unite the peoples of America through intellectual ties and develop the ideals of peace and cooperation which were Bolivar's dream. The ceremonies inaugurating the university were not wanting in interest and solemnity. The outstanding addresses were those by Antonio Mediz Bolio of Mexico and Professor Hackett, who represented on this occasion not the United States Government but the United States educational delegations. His speech, finely idealistic, was delivered in Spanish.

The congress accomplished three major results. First, it recommended the establishment of a league of American nations based upon the principle that an injury to one, in violation of international law, should be regarded as an injury to all. Second, it inaugurated the Pan-American or Bolivarian University. Last, the congress showed that the principal bar to genuinely friendly relations between the United States and its Southern neighbors is the policy of the United States in the Caribbean. Whatever may be alleged in defense of that policy the fact remains that it raises in the popular mind throughout Latin America distrust and suspicion. Statesmen of the two Americas may dwell eloquently upon the common interests of the United States and the other republics of the New World, but their words are, as one Latin-American delegate put it, mere "apple sauce" as long as the United States treats the little Caribbean states as hunting grounds for American capitalists and training grounds for American marines.

Persia and Turkey Form an Alliance

THE Frankfurter Zeitung of July 29 gave the following summary of an important Turkish-Persian treaty concluded on April 22, 1926, as abridged from the official French text published in the Messenger of Teheran:

This treaty, called a treaty of friendship and security, binds the two contracting parties not to attack one another, not to participate in a hostile action undertaken by a third power, not to enter a political, economic, or financial treaty or convention directed against the other.

The contracting parties further agree to oppose with its military forces any third Power which attempts to make use of its territory in a move against the other, by the passage of troops or military stores, for military surveys, as a base of military operations, as an avenue of retreat, or by inciting its people against the other state.

The contracting parties further agree not to tolerate within their boundaries any organization whose purpose it is to disturb the peace or security of the other or to change its constitution, and to expel all persons who indulge in such activity.

The contracting parties further agree to take all necessary measures, either separately or together, to prevent unstable border peoples living in their territories from making incursions into the territory of the other.

Within six months after the ratification of this treaty the two states will send plenipotentiaries to Teheran to conclude agreements on commerce, consular representation, customs, postal and telegraph service, and extradition. They will further agree upon methods of settling disputes arising between them which cannot be settled by diplomatic means.

This treaty was written in Turkish, Persian, and French, but in case of differences of opinion the French text is to be considered authentic. Its duration is set at five years, but it will continue automatically from year to year unless denounced, upon six months' notice, by one of the Powers.

Your Fall Problems

If you want to rent a house or an apartment or if you have one to rent—or sell, advertise in the classified section of The Nation, read by honest landlords and desirable tenants. Rates on application. Special three-time rate. Dept. F. P., The Nation.

Contributors to this Issue

LOUIS FISCHER, who has been The Nation's correspondent in Moscow, is now in Berlin.

J. RAMSAY MACDONALD, Labor's first Prime Minister of England, is a frequent contributor to The Nation.

NELSON ANTRIM CRAWFORD is Director of Information in the United States Department of Agriculture.

EDGAR MELS investigated the Daugherty case for the North American Newspaper Alliance.

EDWARD E. CURTIS teaches history at Wellesley College.

AMANDA BENJAMIN HALL is the author of "The Dancer in the Shrine," which won the Poetry Society's prize.

H. L. MENCKEN is editor of the American Mercury and contributing editor of The Nation.

HARRY ELMER BARNES is the author of "History and Social Intelligence."

B. H. HAGGIN is a teacher of music who writes on musical subjects for various publications.

"THE STORY OF PHILOSOPHY," according to book-dealers, reads better and sells faster than most novels. "THE STORY OF PHILOSOPHY" is a book for the years.

THE STORY OF PHILOSOPHY

by WILL DURANT

¶ The lives and opinions of SOCRATES • PLATO • ARISTOTLE • BACON • SPINOZA • KANT • VOLTAIRE • LOCKE • SCHOPENHAUER • SPENCER • NIETZSCHE BERGSON • CROCE • RUSSELL • SANTAYANA • JAMES • DEWEY.

¶ A Fact: "The Story of Philosophy" is the best-selling non-fiction book in America. This is why:

¶ "Exciting". —HEYWOOD BROUN

¶ "A liberal education."—B'klyn Eagle

¶ "Just what I've been hunting for for 44 years." —HENDRIK WILLEM VAN LOON

¶ "Thoroughly scholarly, thoroughly useful, human and readable." —JOHN DEWEY

¶ "The profoundest story our race can tell, full of wonder and delight." —JOHN MACY

¶ "Fascinating . . . a week with 'The Story of Philosophy' is easily worth a year with the average college professor." —STUART P. SHERMAN

¶ "A book thus brilliantly written is far more than a tour de force. It will be enjoyed by both experts and amateurs." —Boston Transcript

¶ "Durant brings that refreshment to the general reader which was so notable in the writing of William James; as a biographer he has something of the gifts of Lytton Strachey." —New York Times

¶ "Where Addison failed, Durant has succeeded. He has humanized philosophy. He has made it live and dance and sing. It is a fit companion for Wells's 'Outline of History'. . . . Fascinating . . . Brilliant . . . Human." —HENRY HAZLITT, The New York Sun ¶ Octavo size 586 pages, 21 full-page illustrations. $5.00 at all book stores.

SIMON AND SCHUSTER, New York

WEALTH, VIRTUAL WEALTH, AND DEBT

FREDERICK SODDY, F.R.S., eminent Oxford Professor of Chemistry, and Nobel laureate, who applies to our economic system the accuracy of analysis and the exact reasoning used in the physical sciences. He develops a new theory of money, solving what he calls "the economic paradox." $3.50.

Order through your bookseller

E. P. DUTTON & Co., Publishers, New York

accept nothing but

Non Depressant nor Habit Forming

In Convenient Aluminum Boxes

At every drug store

Midol for HEADACHE

GENERAL DRUG CO., - 94 N. Moore Street, New York

A MOSCOW DIARY A graphic current interest story of the [illegible] in Soviet Russia today. [illegible] Ask for free catalog.

CHARLES H. KERR & CO. 341 East Ohio Street, Chicago

REAL HARRIS HOMESPUNS Direct from the Makers at Manufacturer's Price. Suit Lengths Cut to Order. Price $2.00 per Yard. Postage Paid. W. WALL, 158 Stornoway, Scotland. Write for pattern stating shade desired.

ADULT CAMPS AND VACATION PLACES

Trout Lake Hotel and Camp

Near Lake George

This [illegible] of natural beauty and splendor in the heart of the Adirondacks is now under the management of I. B. BAILIN, [illegible] of the Forward and Educational Director of the Workmen's Circle.

An [illegible] for recreation and rejuvenation. All aquatic activities and sports; tennis-courts, music band, dancing, concerts, reading [illegible] camp fires, etc.

[illegible] modern-built, [illegible] American-[illegible] cooking. All [illegible] conveniences. Motor [illegible]. Open until December 1st. Special rates after Labor Day.

Write for Booklet or reservation to

I. B. BAILIN

Director Trout Lake Hotel and Camp

Phone: Bolton Landing 55 F 21 Diamond Point, N. Y.

CAMP GREATER UTOPIA

Tuckawaxen, Pa.

WM. J. FRIEMAN, Director
MRS. DORA, Assoc. Director

The most beautiful camp in America, unrivalled in scenery. The [illegible] of lawn, with shady shores, plenty of boats and canoes, swimming pool with free instruction. [illegible] woods with cozy nooks and lovers' retreats. [illegible] court, [illegible], [illegible], [illegible] and [illegible] sea. [illegible] for [illegible] and most of it, in a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible] of Judaism and philosophy in an [illegible] manner by [illegible] and by well-known [illegible] of the Jewish Publication [illegible].

Rates $35-$40 weekly.

THE LLOYD, Bellport, L. I.

Near South Bay. Open June 20th.

Cool, Comfortable, Charming.

Regular guests and week-end parties.

HOUSE WANTED

WANTED [illegible] Long Island about 200 miles from New York for summer [illegible] Write [illegible] The Nation.

ADULT CAMPS

THIRD SEASON

Set among famous scenes of Adirondack beauty

5 miles above Lake George

Equipped with [illegible] known [illegible] for comfort and [illegible]. Limited [illegible] cabins. [illegible] per week. [illegible] in each log cabin.

Round Trip, New York to Lake George, $12.25

[illegible]

TALLEY, Warrensburg, N. Y., or Phone Wisconsin [illegible] New York.

INDIAN HEAD CAMP

on

ECHO LAKE

$28.50 per week

Daily rate $5.00

Adults only

Land and Water Sports. Safe Beach

WATCH FOR THE INDIAN SIGN

WONDER CAMP OF THE ADIRONDACKS

P. O. Box 114, Warrensburg, N. Y.

N. Y. [illegible] to Lake George on Night [illegible] to Albany and train to Lake George. Inter-Urban Boat car will await you. Send for booklet. [illegible] R. Helfant, 885 Brook Avenue, Bronx, N. Y. Tel. Melrose 1821

OPPORTUNITY FOR TEACHER

TEACHER [illegible] wanted for two boys [illegible] 10 years old in family of [illegible] Commutation [illegible] position [illegible] one or two other children. [illegible] 8:30 A.M. to [illegible] P.M. and one evening [illegible] Sunday [illegible] or Sunday [illegible] [illegible] would [illegible] Boys have own small [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] control. If teacher [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to him or her. Teacher must be [illegible] with and greatly interested in modern methods of liberal education. No one else need apply. Write fully, giving all relevant information to Box [illegible] care The Nation.

TURKEY

TURKEY — American [illegible] Long or Coney Island people and [illegible] about [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] or "Turkey" [illegible] or travel. Box [illegible], care The Nation.

BOOKS AND BOOKSELLERS

Just received from Germany

GEIST und GESICHT des BOLSCHEWISMUS

by Rene-Fueloep-Miller- (in German)

Critical survey of cultural life in Soviet Russia, with 500 illustrations. $9.25 postpaid.

W. BEYER, Inc., 259 5th Avenue, N. Y. C.

The TRUTH SEEKER National Freethought Weekly. Est. 1873. G. E. Macdonald, Edr.

Three mos. Trial, $1. Sample free.

Books: Voltaire, Paine, Ingersoll. Catalog free.

TRUTH SEEKER CO., 49 Vesey St., New York

EDUCATIONAL

Mt. Airy School

A little school in the country where boys and girls from 5 to 12 may learn and grow in a world not only of text-books.

ELIZABETH MOSS MARGARET HARRIS

CLIFTON ON HUDSON, New York

POSITIONS WANTED

TWO [illegible] and [illegible], [illegible] educated and [illegible], would [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] The Nation.

YOUNG [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] teaching and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXIII NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 1, 1926 No. 3191

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS

EDITORIALS:

Professor Sam. Melligan

Whose Y. M. C. A.?

Stuart Sherman

THE SUMMER WHITE HOUSE STATESMAN By Harold Quinn Lyon

MY GREAT GREAT GRANDFATHER AND I By Stuart Chase

THE TARIFF AND THE FARMER By George W. Norris

SMOKE GOES UP SLOWLY By Ernest Gruening

GLIMPSES OF ARTHUR CRAVAN By Harry Hervey Gleason

IN THE DRIFTWAY By Jim Tully

CORRESPONDENCE

BOOKS:

Poems By John Erskine Dillon

The Thoughtful State By Harold Rugg

Mrs. Barton on the War Cult By Raymond Moley

War Declarations from the Indians By Lewis Hanke

Man, Nature, and Culture By Melville J. Herskovits

Madam's Madam By Lewis Gannett

Books in Brief

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:

Opium Up to Date By Frank W. Le Maire

Denmark and the Three-Power Conference By Chester C. Pond

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor Literary Editor

FREDA KIRCHWEY MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. Chicago Office: No. 38 South Dearborn Street. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London W. C. 1, England.

GREECE HAS BEEN TREATED to another revolution and another dark-browed general has come into power. Condylis replaces Pangalos. The affair was carried out according to the strict conventions governing south-European revolts. The army and navy are reported to be behind the incoming general; civil liberties are to be restored to the people; the military machine is to be reorganized; the currency is to be stabilized; and the other elements of a healthy national life are to be established. But are they? General Pangalos was equally reassuring in his language when he seized power. He turned out to be a pretty poor dictator with a flair for issuing unpopular decrees and making himself ridiculous. He was both bold and foolish. He attempted to regulate the length of women's skirts and to reform the morals of the sexes. He announced his contempt for democracy and his faith in armed force alone; and then suddenly he called for elections, had himself made president, and decreed that Greece should be a republic modeled after the United States. He executed and exiled his opponents with no apparent thought of the future. And later, rather rashly, he released many of his surviving opponents, including General Condylis who has now seized him and promised to put him and his government on trial. We fear that the accession of a new general in Greece, even though he comes in promising elections and a president, will do little more than throw one crop of politicians into jail and another into office.

CHINA'S POLITICAL MERRY-GO-ROUND whirls dizzily, but the tide of nationalism continues to swell behind the showier events that absorb the newspapers. Wu Pei-fu has succeeded in driving the army of the Christian general, Feng Yu-hsiang, out of the almost impregnable Nankow Pass northwest of Peking, probably because Feng's Russian friends were unable to move sufficient ammunition across the mountains and desert. But in the South Feng's Canton allies have spread northward through the passes and absorbed the province of Hunan, menacing Wu's rear at Hankow, the "Pittsburgh of China." So Wu, after his northern victory, is turning south to defend his capital, leaving Peking in the hands of his erstwhile enemy and present ally, the protege of Japan, Chang Tso-lin. It is a dizzying succession of changes—and unimportant. More significant is the action of the so-called Chinese Government in denouncing the Belgian extraterritoriality treaty which was about to expire. For although the action is taken by a shadow government, the shadow speaks in such matters with a voice that will be accepted by all China. On these treaties the Canton Government, Wu, and Feng think alike. The Powers may growl and glower, but their treaty "privileges" and "rights" are destined to disappear.

SECRETARY KELLOGG'S SPEECH at Plattsburg has received more attention perhaps than its content merits because it had been widely heralded in advance as containing important declarations in regard to the Administration's policy with reference to disarmament. Mr. Kellogg spoke hopefully—too hopefully, we think—of the discussion at Geneva, laying especial emphasis on the practicability of regional agreements as a means of promoting peace and reducing military preparations among special groups of nations. We have no quarrel with the idea, but we do not see how the United States is in a position now to initiate any such agreements. As to the discussions at Geneva, it should not be forgotten that although our delegates went there without any plan to advance in America's behalf they have opposed the suggestion of the French that armament be related to a country's natural resources and equally the proposal for an international body to see that disarmament agreements, when made, are carried out. The latter suggestion, however repulsive to us, would seem essential to effective action. Although Mr. Kellogg pretends to be hopeful of the Geneva conference, we fail to see what the Administration at Washington has contributed to give substance to that hope.

THE ACTION of the Passaic mill owners in refusing to deal with the American Federation of Labor after communist leaders had withdrawn from the strike is a little more brazen and hypocritical than anything in recent labor history. For thirty weeks these mill owners have denounced the strikers because of their communist leadership; they have dragged in the wildest rumors with no examination of the sources; they even stooped to circulate a fake scandal concerning Albert Weisbord, the communist head of the United Front Committee. Very well, said the strikers, we Weisbord withdrew, the strikers voted to join the United Textile Workers, the United Textile Workers and the American Federation of Labor accepted them. Did the employers soften their opposition? Not a whit. They refused to deal with any labor union. Communism has been their straw man; they have really been fighting against decent collective bargaining and a living wage. The only choice that the workers have left is to fight the strike to the last ditch.

THE NEW YORK SUBWAY STRIKE was defeated, but the Interborough Rapid Transit Company is still suing sixty-two strikers for $239,000 damages for violation of their "yellow dog" contracts. Only four strike leaders are left to fight the suit; if they work fifty-two weeks a year at a motorman's wage they can pay the damage bill in thirty-two years—provided they live on nothing a week in the meantime. What does the I. R. T. mean by pressing such a suit against a handful of unemployed men? (The company has refused to reinstate them.) It cannot hope to recover a cent, and its expenses in court will be enormous. It is obviously trying to establish a legal precedent for all future fights between company and labor unions. A legal victory for "yellow dog" contracts and an award of nominal damages might be worth millions to the "open shop" manufacturers of this country. Joseph Brodsky, labor attorney, who is now waging a lone fight for the strike leaders should have the backing of all American labor and liberal forces.

FLORIDA HAS PUT four white men in jail for killing Negroes. Two of them face the death penalty and the other two have been sentenced to life imprisonment. Britt R. Pringle, one of the two men who are condemned to die, is the first white man to be convicted of first-degree murder for killing a Negro. The accused are making the usual efforts to avoid the penalties of what were extraordinarily brutal crimes, seeking retrials and commutations of sentence; but, according to the Associated Negro Press, the county officials who prosecuted the cases seem determined to see the course of justice run to a finish. Florida's passion for the law, however, works curious paradoxes in regard to Negroes. While with one hand she protects the life and property of Negroes from white criminals, with the other she punishes them for securing for themselves the commonest of civilized comforts. Mrs. Blanche Brookins bought in New York a Pullman reservation for a through trip to Orlando, Florida. At Jacksonville she was asked to leave the Pullman in accordance with Florida's Jim Crow law. She refused. At Palatka she was removed from the train, imprisoned over night, and in the morning fined $500 and costs, the maximum penalty for a Jim Crow violation.

A NEW YORK BUSINESS MAN, says Postmaster General New, will soon be able to leave his office on Saturday noon and reach San Francisco by airplane for the opening of business Monday morning. Air lines for passenger and mail service are springing up in all parts of the country; many of them are making money. The New York-Chicago night service, the Salt Lake-Los Angeles and the Jacksonville-Tampa-Miami lines are all on a paying basis. The Government now has an unparalleled oppportunity to develop a publicly owned and operated air system. Will it seize the opportunity? Not if Postmaster General New has his way. Although the Government has demonstrated its capacity to run air lines at a profit, Mr. New declares: "I have said as often as I have either written or spoken on the subject that the Government should turn the business over to private capital." Mr. New would have the Government bear the brunt of air pioneering, spend the millions, lose the lives, and discover the pitfalls of air navigation. Then he would have private capital come in to build on the government foundation. The story of the railroads is to be repeated: watered stock, high profits, franchise manipulations, costly regulation, the corruption of government. Perhaps some twenty-first century La Follette will adopt as his campaign slogan: "I will recapture the air for the people."

THAT LITTLE GROUP of men who a quarter of a century ago had the vision to see in the Spanish-American War and its aftermath the beginnings of the corroding imperialism which has in fact grown out of it is getting smaller each year. It lost a stalwart figure on August 16 in the death of Henry Wade Rogers, judge of the United States Circuit Court. He first came into collision with the forces that censor the expression of opinion—when it is unfavorable to them—in 1900. He was ousted as president of Northwestern University chiefly because of his public disapproval of the McKinley policies in the Philippines. He went to the Law School of Yale University, of which he became dean, continuing to be an outspoken opponent of centralization in government and attacking the Roosevelt Administration even more sharply than he had that of President McKinley. In 1912 he came out for Woodrow Wilson "to punish the Republican Party as the representative of the mercenary interests that have preyed upon the people for a generation, and to punish it for the sins of Big Business in partnership with crooked politics." Judge Rogers and other liberals of his type have been vindicated in all that they predicted of the growth of imperialism, but they signally failed to check it merely by following a "good man" and switching from the Republican to the Democratic party or vice versa.

ON CHARLES W. ELIOT, who died on August 22 at the age of ninety-two, we shall make more extended comment in a subsequent issue. At this time it is sufficient to add our voice to the great tribute which is being paid to him in every quarter and by every kind of person in this country—and in the world. The universality of this tribute is perhaps Dr. Eliot's best epitaph. In his public life he was as much above race or creed or class as in his educational career he was above clique or fashion. For forty years president of Harvard University, Dr. Eliot not only made of it one of the world's great centers of learning but he profoundly affected the entire development of higher education in America. In his wider contacts with his fellow men as a citizen he was respected for his abundant wisdom, his high courage, his serene tolerance, and most of all, perhaps, for his fine humanity. It was the latter quality that kept him youthful and gave him the ear not only of the present generation but of the youngest elements in it long after most of his contemporaries had slipped into the background. In one of his last messages to the young people of America Dr. Eliot said characteristically: "Don't think too much about yourself. When all you can think of is yourself, you're in a bad way."

Professor Sam, Militarist

IN South America Uncle Sam is rapidly becoming a professor of military expansion. While our representatives at Geneva discuss disarmament our admirals in Brazil and Peru have for several years been teaching these South American nations to build larger and better navies for new wars. The project began in November, 1922, when sixteen commissioned and nineteen petty officers were dispatched by the United States Government as a naval mission to Brazil. Some naval missions are brief dress parades; this mission is no dress parade and it is not brief. It has already spent almost four years in Brazil teaching the Brazilians naval tactics and helping to expand the Brazilian navy. Recently the State Department announced that Brazil had renewed the contract for our naval mission for another four years from November, 1926. Unless someone interferes Professor Sam will stay in Brazil until 1930.

Peru is also one of our military clients. An American naval mission has been in Peru more than two years helping to reorganize the Peruvian navy, and there is no indication of an early withdrawal. Peru, it may be noted, is building part of her new navy in America; two Peruvian submarines were recently launched at New London.

Does our Government appreciate the danger to us from this military intervention in South America? If under our tutelage Brazil gets so strong and rambunctious that she makes war on Argentina and Peru fights Chile, we are likely to see an attempt at intervention by the League of Nations. Peru and Chile belong fully to the League and Argentina has never actually resigned. League intervention would be called for upon a declaration of war and, if any of the countries involved had begun the war in violation of the covenant, they would be subject to blockade. Our own commerce would be interfered with; what would happen to the Monroe Doctrine nobody knows. There are some who would want us to hurl Europe out of America by force. Do we want that sort of a melee? If not, why do we help one American nation that is a member of the League to arm against other American nations that are members of the League?

Another question should be faced by our Government. When we teach South American nations to fight, how do we know that they will fight with us in a war? Why shouldn't they fight against us? Take, for example, a war with Japan. The South American nations are restive under our financial domination. Japan has not attempted to rule them. An alliance with Japan is quite as natural as an alliance with the United States.

What right have American officers on the payroll of American taxpayers to spend their time teaching other nations to fight? Offhand, we would say that they have no right at all except in the case of allies during a war. When a few Russian officers appear as military instructors in Canton, China, the press of the Western world denounces Russia for attempting to use the Chinese for selfish (Russian) ends. Are we doing in South America what Russia is charged with doing in China? Probably the intentions of Congress were legitimate enough when the special act of 1920 was passed authorizing the President to accept the invitations of South American republics "whenever in his discretion the public interests require, to detail officers of the United States naval service to assist the government of the republic of South America in naval matters." The act is innocent enough on the surface; it was renewed last May with even more sweeping provisions, allowing us to lend army and marine as well as naval officers. The Congressmen who voted for it no doubt considered the act a means of strengthening the friendship between Latin America and the United States, a military bulwark for the Monroe Doctrine. So it might have been if all the South American nations had invited help. But to date only two have asked for assistance, Brazil and Peru.

The effect of extending military aid of any kind to some of the South American republics is unfortunate. Brazil's greatest potential enemy is Argentina; we are helping Brazil but not her rival. Peru's nemesis is Chile; we are certainly not helping Chile. To all appearances we are helping Brazil to get ready for a war against Argentina and Peru to get ready for a war against Chile. If Brazil and Peru are not preparing to fight their South American neighbors, what are they getting ready for?

It is a peculiarly tactless thing of our Government to keep a naval mission in Peru at the present moment. Chile is seething with bitterness against the United States because our representatives seemed to favor Peru and condemn Chile in the Tacna-Arica dispute. Probably Chile deserved the condemnation but her sensitiveness cannot be ignored; if we presume to act as judge it is hardly a wise thing at the same time to play the role of a military auxiliary of Chile's avowed enemy to the north. The Peruvian militarists who want the people to believe that Tacna-Arica is worth dying for do not need the support of an American naval mission.

Who is paying the costs of our South American naval missions? The law authorizing these missions provides that the naval officers lent to foreign Powers shall receive "in addition to the compensation and emoluments allowed them by such [South American] governments, the pay and allowance of their rank in the United States naval service." (Italics ours.) A fat bonus for lucky officers! The foreign governments pay the expenses of our naval missions but we continue to pay the salaries, and the act of 1920 makes no provision for reimbursing the United States Government for these salary costs. If the thirty-five commissioned and petty officers of the mission to Brazil received the lowest pay given to the lowest commissioned officer after ten years service in the navy, our salary bill for the eight years in Brazil would be more than $700,000.

The question of costs, however, is trivial compared to the major question: Are we allowing our admirals to Balkanize South America? Apparently we are. We are encouraging armament rather than disarmament in a continent which may easily destroy itself in a competitive armament race. We are callously drifting into military arrangements which destroy our claim of impartiality; we may awake some morning to find that we have helped to divide South America into military blocs. The next session of Congress can do much for permanent peace in South America by terminating Uncle Sam's engagement as a military instructor in Brazil and Peru.

Whose Y. M. C. A.?

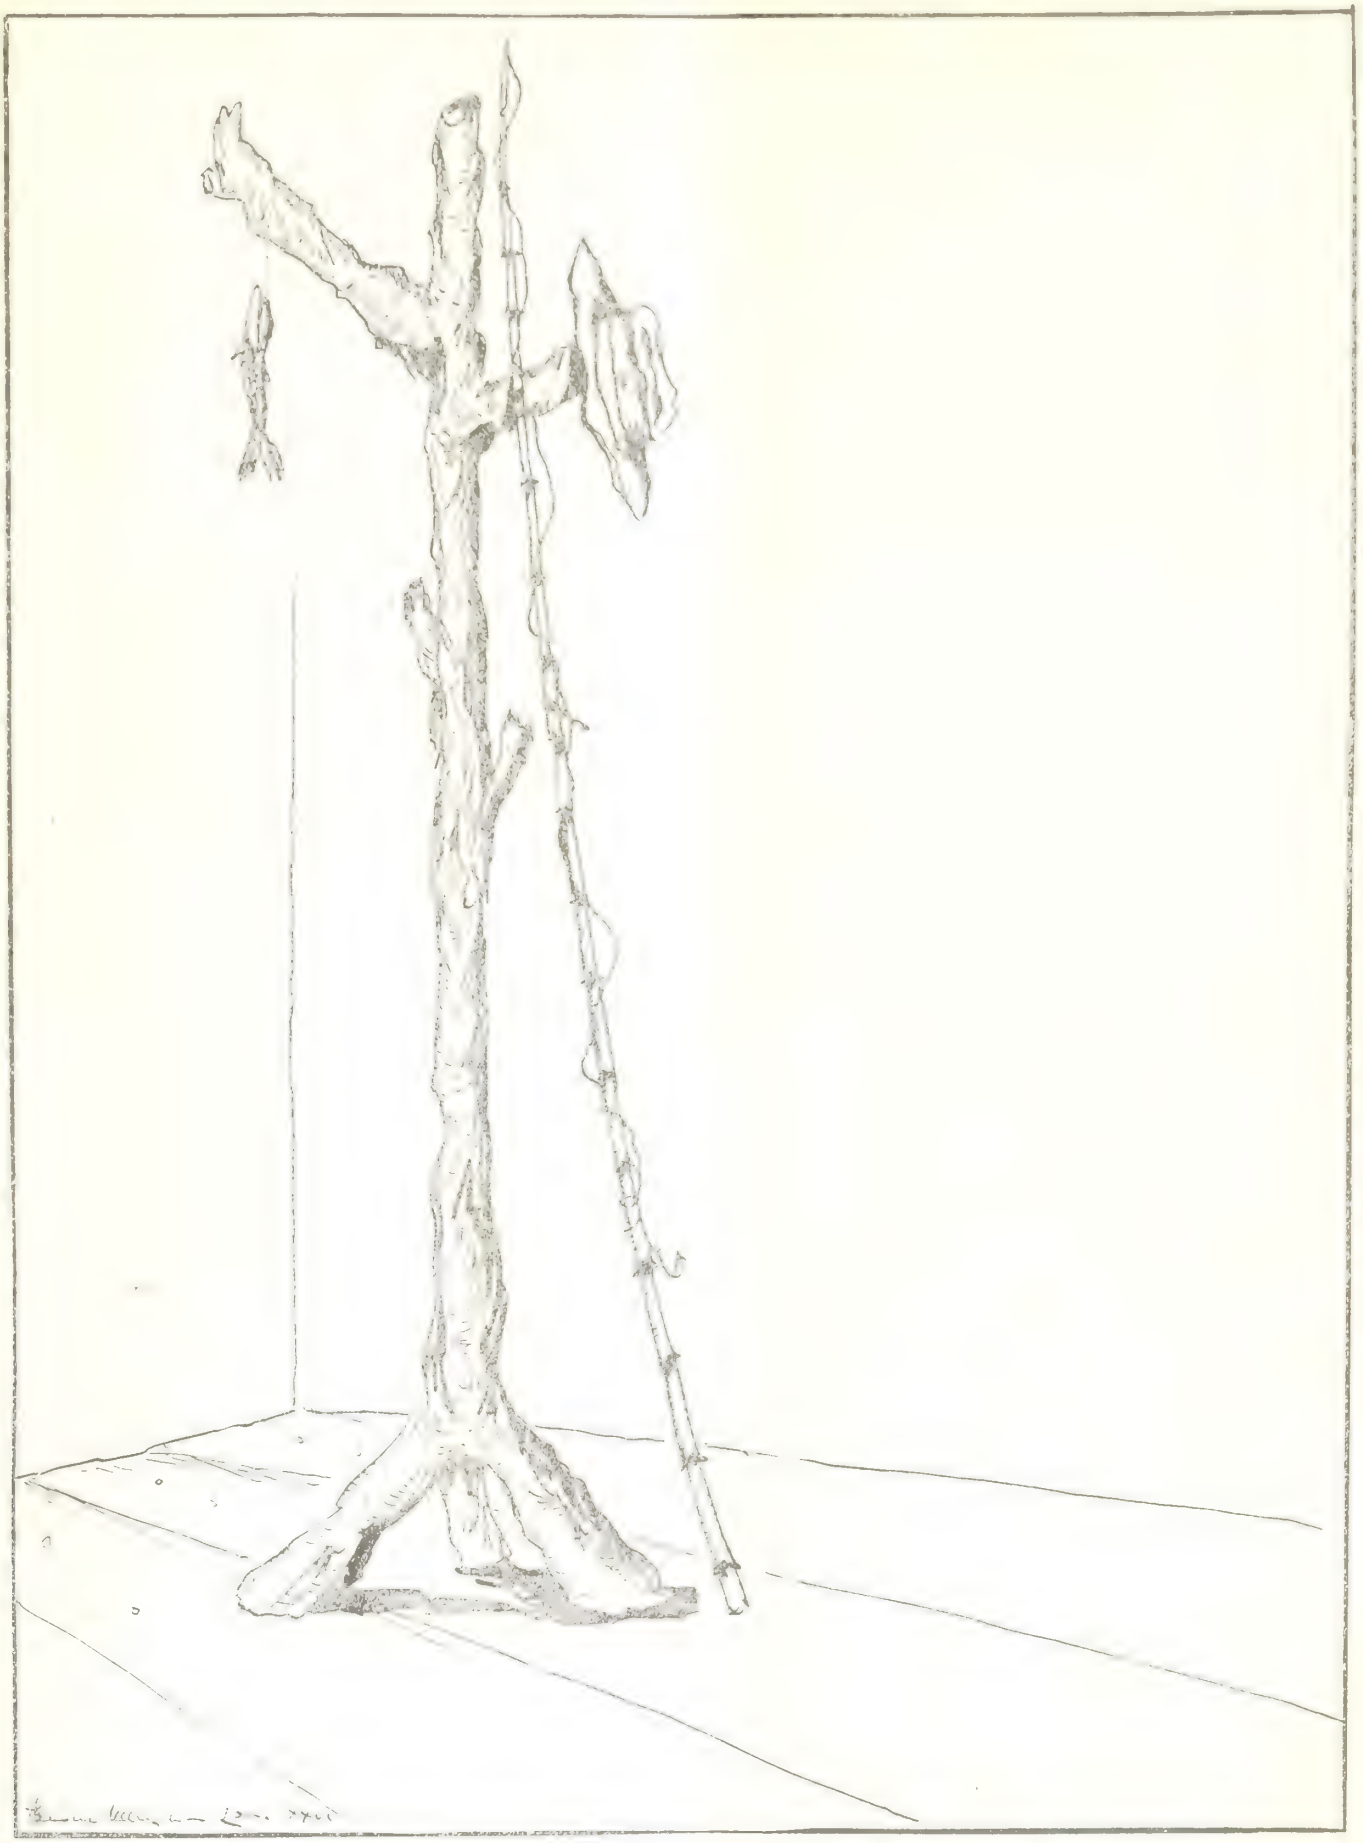
LIBERALS and reactionaries are fighting a determined battle for the control of the collegiate Young Men's Christian Association. Public attention has not been focused upon the struggle because of the more spectacular rift between fundamentalists and modernists and because there has been no open break in the ranks of the Y. M. C. A. Thus far the liberals have kept in the saddle, but their control is not secure.

The struggle goes back to the changing character of the collegiate Y. M. C. A. Something has happened to this institution; it is not the thing that it was ten years ago. Its secretaries, once long-faced vendors of piosity, are evolving into a new type. In most American colleges the new Y. M. C. A. secretaries believe in evolution more or less militantly, hate the Reserve Officers Training Corps and the preparedness gospel, distrust American business standards, and call race discrimination un-Christian. They are repeatedly attacked for their heresies by army officers and civilian super-patriots. In numerous cases the local college Y. M. C. A. has become a center for student self-expression and independent criticism of trustee control, curriculum vandalism and the football craze.

It is quite natural that collegiate Y. M. C. A. secretaries should be converted to the new social evangelism. The students are not interested in any other kind. They regard the old evangelism of personal salvation as unimportant or unproven or futile. It will not stand the test of classroom analysis. Except in scattered denominational schools fundamentalism is everywhere on the run in our colleges. The Y. M. C. A. would commit suicide by sympathizing with it.

Unfortunately the sponsors of the city Y. M. C. A. do not appreciate what has happened to the collegiate Y. M. C. A. The two branches of the organization move in different orbits, although they are officially bound together by an international committee. The big capitalists who contribute to the support of both kinds of Y. M. C. A. probably do not know what is happening in the colleges. The alignment of the two groups under one head is grotesque. The typical city Y. M. C. A. is a hotel and gymnasium for young business climbers, thoroughly commercialized, thoroughly safe. It is manned by secretaries who combine the qualities of Sunday-school superintendent, athletic director, and hotel clerk. It teaches short cuts to business success and, on Sunday afternoons, diluted Protestant optimism. It is more directly dependent on the approval of business men than any other religious institution in America.

These city Y. M. C. A.'s, which comprise the great bulk and riches of the international body, would like to whip the collegiate Y. M. C. A. into line. They do not like its "radical" ideas. Recently in Texas they smashed the Southwestern committee for collegiate work because the committee had brought "dangerous" speakers to the State. They are constantly bringing pressure through financial sources to force back the collegiate Y. M. C. A.'s to "the fundamentals of Christianity."



Ultimately the two types of thought represented by the collegiate and city branches of the Y. M. C. A. cannot live together. The collegiate Y. M. C. A. cannot be subservient to the smug success-gospel of the city "Y." An independent college Y. M. C. A. is the desirable and not improbable result of the present struggle.

Stuart Sherman

THE eager and devoted following which Stuart Sherman enjoyed was the result—if the sheer ability of his criticism be for the moment disregarded—of two or three human qualities which could not but be felt behind the even front of his many essays. His followers yesterday may not have been identical with those of two or five or ten years ago. The audience he reached through the New York Herald Tribune was not only wider but more liberal than the audience which first acclaimed him—the readers of The Nation of the days before the World War. Yet there could never have been any disagreement among his admirers concerning the kind of man he was.

He combined, for one thing, courage in a high degree with another quality not often found in its company. He was sensitive also. There have been many blustering critics, men who drove straight before them with whatever weapon came to hand, men who blurted their opinions. Stuart Sherman's courage was of the opposite sort, having perhaps been cultivated in an attempt to fight against the shyness, to cover up the delicacy, primary in his nature. Certainly to those who knew him or who read him knowingly there was evident a mind equipped with many fine, invisible feelers which it instinctively put out whenever a book or a person came near. And the purpose of this putting out was not, it need scarcely be said, to discover what others were thinking; it was to gather the materials of his own eventual thought. To such a man many ideas are possible in a given circumstance. The more light-hearted members of the sensitive tribe end by expressing several or all of these ideas in quick, nervous succession. Not so Stuart Sherman. His courage and his sense of dedication to the most serious tasks of criticism kept him pondering until he had decided upon a course; then they thrust him forward, it would seem half unwillingly, with his mind very firmly made up and his judgment flying like a banner. There were those who confused him with the simple fighters; they did not understand the complications of a temper which never did or could display the whole of itself.

With much of his critical campaign the newer Nation was inevitably out of sympathy. He began (under the shadow of Paul Elmer More) as one who, himself inheriting a healthy intellectual constitution, felt called upon to diagnose most of the symptoms of the modern mind as pathological. The brilliant essays—hardly anywhere surpassed in American criticism—which composed his first published volume, "On Contemporary Literature," applied a rigorous, classical test to the greatest of our writers. That these writers failed to qualify was the fault of the test, not of themselves; and the subsequent history of Stuart Sherman is the story of his gradual, rather stubborn adjustment to the fact. Never abating his earnestness and never abandoning his search for the best of which the human spirit is capable, he nevertheless concluded that the present had to be studied in its own terms. In that study he was engaged when he died. The preface to his last volume of essays contained an admission that dogmatism concerning "the good life" is ill-conceived. The contents of the same volume showed that he was well on his way toward an appreciation of the vitality which is in contemporary literature. That he now will never be able to define that vitality is a tragic loss to American letters.

The Summer White-House Spokesman

My Great-Great-Grandfather and I

By STUART CHASE

IN the year 1800 my great-great-grandfather was living with his family in a little farm house near the town of Newburyport, Massachusetts. For the past five years I have been living with my family in New York City. As a test of progress, how much more abundant, more rewarding, is my life than his? He lived at the threshold of the industrial revolution—the first textile mill in America was built in 1802. I live on the crest of the greatest wave of applied technology that the world has ever seen.

Newburyport in 1800 was, with its outlying villages, largely a self-supporting community. The bulk of its food, shelter, and clothing was locally grown and fabricated. By and large—save for the town sot—every able-bodied person worked, and worked at making something useful. Despite the rigor of this economic necessity, the work produced bears the stamp not only of utility, but of a gracious and lasting beauty. I sometimes think that High Street in Newburyport [illegible] architectural grouping in America—unless it be the village green of Old Lyme in Connecticut. An early Nantucket ordinance bears the phrase "mechanics and other artists," and as one looks upon the houses, the doorways, the glass, the pottery, the pewter, the hooked rugs, the masonry, the ironwork, the chairs, the tables, and the cabinets of that eighteenth-century period in New England, one cannot but believe that the [illegible] fathers of Nantucket spoke truly. While a few years later in the harbors of Newburyport, of Salem, and of Boston, the spars and halyards and cloud-like canvases were to rise, of what has been termed the most beautiful and vibrant thing ever fashioned by the hand of man—the clipper ship.

Hope slipped [illegible] was no product of labor driven and unwilling, but the expression of an age which gave to life [illegible] lives lived at the full. And it is dubious if [illegible] could ever have come to birth at all without a wide participation in [illegible] by the bulk of the community. Here and there one finds an eighteenth-century [illegible] a [illegible] a silhouette of outstanding ability, but [illegible] the output flowed from [illegible] work not of an individual genius but of a general culture level. On this level my great-great-grandfather lived his life and from it drew his sense of values and his measure of happiness.

Let us run down the list of essentials and compare my life with his.

First, as to shelter. I live in a decaying Victorian apartment house up three flights of stairs in a dark and [illegible] well. In certain [illegible] for as much as an hour in the afternoon, sunlight will make its way through [illegible] window in the kitchen and lie like some rare flower on the floor. Otherwise there is no sunshine, summer or winter. And very little light; and not too much fresh air. We open our windows, but we never, if we can avoid it, look out of them. The art of the jerry-builder has affected woodwork, plaster, and plumbing so that nothing is ever quite clean, or quite dry, or quite workable. My wife struggled with a New England housewife's conscience for two years and then, to save her sanity, strangled it. We have a bathroom it is true, we have electric lights and a gas stove. But is my housing today—particularly when children and their needs are considered—superior to that of my great-great-grandfather in his sunny, low-eaved, great-ovened farmhouse in the town of Newburyport? It is true that for the same monthly rental we might have secured a cleaner and more attractive apartment, but owing to the immutable laws of real-estate investment, it would have to shrink so in size as to be almost uninhabitable by virtue of congestion.

Take food. The food we eat is vastly more varied; it is probably richer and undoubtedly softer than the diet of my great-great-grandfather. The softness has an unfortunate effect on our teeth, and one wonders if the whole-wheat grains, the fruits and berries fresh picked, the simple vegetables from the garden or the root cellar, did not constitute not only a more wholesome but a more toothsome and succulent diet. One grows weary of pale food in cans and bottles and packages—however meticulously sterilized, however flamboyantly advertised. Not only vitamins, but the very juices which act most powerfully on the salivary glands seem to be missing.

Take clothing. Again the variety today is as conspicuous as its lack of durability. As the jerry-builder has undermined housing, so the shoddy-maker has undermined textiles. Not that sound cloth cannot be made on the machine. I saw an overcoat recently which had been used continuously for ten winters—and showed no sign of wear. It was not, however, a product of the higher salesmanship, but was made of cloth tested for the United States Government and ordered for a military officer. Today the clothes my wife wears are, I suspect, more comfortable, more suited to the lines of the human body, than those of my great-great-grandmother—however deficient they may be in workmanship. But the clothes I wear—in town at least—are both [illegible] and hideous compared with the [illegible] the noble colors, the brave brass buttons of Newburyport a century ago. I doubt if in all the centuries since men wore clothes there has ever been a mode so ugly and so depressing as the somber cylinders which have encased us since the forties. Along with the smoke of the coal age came what might be termed the smoke-stack style for men. Just lately one notes the arrival of a [illegible] mode which admits color and line, but only an infinitesmal fraction of the population—at due and circumscribed seasons and places—can avail itself thereof. Undertakers' regimentals still constitute the last word for the bulk of the male citizenry.

Take health. There were no reliable vital statistics in Newburyport in 1800, but I doubt if the average duration of life was as long as it is today. I suspect that we spend more days per year incapacitated by sickness, but medical science pulls us through where the blood-letters of Newburyport only assisted the gentleman with the scythe. If you fell ill, your chances of dying were considerably greater in the old days, but you did not fall ill so frequently—you couldn't afford to. The net result is a lower death rate today, but for that advantage—if it be one in terms of abounding life—consider the price that we pay in the services of doctors, dentists, hospitals, X-rays, injections, inoculations, and the staggering costs of blasting water systems, sewage-disposal systems, garbage-collection systems, and public-sanitation systems generally into a congested city area utterly unadapted, through lack of community planning, to such arteries.

Take education. I send my two children to one of the best, modern experimental schools. We have tolerated the bleak apartment chiefly to be near this school. Yet I gather that the bulk of the effort of those competent women who operate this experiment in education is directed to the recreation in a hostile environment of those factors of craftsmanship, manual dexterity, awareness of nature, spontaneous play, which my great-great-grandfather's children received naturally, automatically, and costlessly in Newburyport. The world those children took to as a duck takes to water, is now being searched for in the city's canyons with a large outlay for "equipment" and "material" and "project study"; with a terminology altogether stupefying; and with no assurance as yet that, beleaguered by an enviroment in which child life is implacably ignored, the search will be successful. The public schools of course have never even thought of such a search, much less begun it. In respect to the three R's, however, instruction not only in the experimental schools but in the public schools as well is vastly more competent than it was a century ago.

Coming finally to intellectual life—the life of the spirit, not classed as a stern essential by economists, but nevertheless relevant to the parallel which we are trying to develop and supremely relevant to the question of living life to the full. New York City today possesses resources for stimulating the mind and the higher emotional centers that places it, at first blush, utterly beyond the Newburyport of 1800. (Incidentally, and in passing, it possesses resources for stimulating the lower emotional centers on perhaps an even more magnificent scale.) One can take one's pick of sixty theaters, scores of lectures, the opera, a dozen concerts, art galleries, museums, scientific gatherings, what not. The sum total on any winter's night is stupendous. And I, for one, in the face of such an intellectual feast, feel often like the historic centipede.

> The centipede was happy quite
> Until the frog in fun
> Said, "Pray which leg comes after which?"
> And wrought his mind to such a pitch
> He fell exhausted in the ditch,
> Considering how to run.

Or else, and more frequently, I try to keep up to some degree with the plays that are being talked about, and the concerts and lecturers and exhibitions that are being talked about, and the books that are being talked about. Which tends to leave me very little time in which to talk about things that are being talked about. My wife and I become two highly specialized automatons, gathering pollen with incredible dispatch from a hundred flowers, booming our way in subway and elevated train and taxicab in and out of lobbies, up and down elevators, through revolving doors, but—and here's the rub—when the cultural debauch is ended, with so little opportunity to distil honey for our future joy and sustenance.

> What is this world so full of care
> There is no time to stand and stare?

And the most saddening thing of all to us is the hostility which New York offers to the making and holding of friendships. We have acquaintances without number and among them many whom we long to know better; we call scores by their first names, clap them on the shoulder, promise to call them on the telephone, assure them "we must get together for dinner." We do an immense amount of greeting and an immense amount of handshaking and an immense amount of promising and then, because we cannot maintain the pace, a quite collossal amount of what can only be called bare-faced lying. Almost never do we sit down in that atmosphere of peace and timelessness which is essential in the cultivation of friendship. And we find that good, unhurried discussion in this city is as rare as friendly intercourse. Perhaps the two are governed by the same relentless law. It was Goethe who said that a civilization should be measured by the excellence of its conversation. The keenest intellectual joy I know is good discussion. In it one participates, feels something of the excitement of thought-creation, is not bound speechless in a lecture seat to be thundered at from above. In all the four years we have lived in New York, I have not had a dozen good discussions. Rather I have gone to a hundred committee meetings with a watch in one hand and in the other a pencil which forever seems to be turning out budgets and lists of possible contributors.

God knows there is culture enough but it is a spectator's culture, a listener's culture, not a participant's culture. It is handed down at so much a head including war tax. It is not the culture which the free citizens of Athens knew as they sauntered eager and expostulating through their academies, nor yet that cruder but still vital culture which drew every man who could walk to the New England town meeting a century and more ago.

Where does the balance lie? In terms of living as set off from mere existing, who lives the more abundantly, my great-great-grandfather or myself? Before you answer, note this point well. He was an average citizen of his community, economically speaking; while probably the joint income of my wife and myself is two to three times the average of my community. Compare him with the average New York family as you find it in the Bronx, on the East Side, in the wilderness of suburban Brooklyn. Where then does the balance lie?

I started to make an impartial survey, but perhaps I have tilted the scales. The tendency to become maudlin about the old days—particularly to a New Englander—is a powerful one. I have probably succumbed to it somewhat. Certainly Newburyport in 1800 was no Utopia. Discount, then, the parallel which has been recited by a wide margin of tolerance, and again, where does the balance lie? I confess I do not know. But the significant thing is that there should be any question at all; that I should look back with eyes that are so often envious to a time when all the results of modern technology were non-existent. Finally I may be accused of unfairness in comparing life in a small town with life in a great city. Remember, however, my standard of reference is net welfare. I have included the life of the mind as well as that of the body. By and large, I believe that a properly planned city promises more in net welfare, and so I think the comparison is not an unreasonable one.

There is a machine today which can make nails one hundred and nine times faster than the blacksmith in Newburyport could fashion them; a machine which can make plows thirty-two times faster. Cotton sheeting can be made one hundred and three times faster than ever my great-great-grandmother could spin and weave it. And it is alleged by competent technicians that we have, in the energy released by the turbines and engines of America, the equivalent of the labor power of three billions of slaves, or nearly thirty servants for every man, woman, and child in the country. Why is it, in the face of such unparalleled technical improvement and engineering development, such a wealth of natural resources laid bare since 1800, that my standard of living in terms of vital values is so little better, if indeed it is better at all, than that of my great-great-grandfather; while the standard of living of the average family in New York City is almost certainly worse? How has this stupendous gain in technology, in control over the forces of nature, been drained away and wasted?

Machine production in terms of tonnage output is a meaningless, and if the output be guncotton, an actively destructive thing. Trade statistics, transportation load, steel output, even harvest yields are only wind to inflate the empty brains of small-town boosters until they are correlated with the vital statistics of the day-by-day life of the wayfaring man. The wheels hum, the freight trains roar, the mines belch, the forests crash, the oil wells spout, the sand hogs curse, the cities reach their white pinnacles to the stars—and what do we who live here in New York today get out of it?

Not nearly as much as we ought. Not a tithe of what Fulton and Arkwright and Watt promised us. The world is full of stuff, but it is largely ugly, depressing, mean, or swanky stuff. It carries little nourishment for the human organism. This is no triumph of human intelligence. This is the defeat of human intelligence. This is a child smashing a microscope. This is waste—meaningless, destructive, gigantic.

The Tariff and the Farmer

By GEORGE W. NORRIS

THE trouble with agriculture can be summed up under two general heads: First, the farmer does not get the full benefit of the protective tariff. Second, the cost of distributing food products is unreasonably high and adds to the burdens both of the producer and of the consumer.

How can we give the farmer the benefit of the tariff enjoyed by the manufacturer and the laboring man? A tariff on imports, whether enacted with the idea of revenue or of protection, but particularly if it is for protection, cannot be defended if its benefits will not accrue to all citizens alike. The manufacturer can increase his selling price until it is raised to the level of the tariff wall. In other words, he meets no competition from the foreign manufacturer unless he raises his price above the tariff. The article is passed by the jobber to the wholesaler; the wholesaler passes it to the retailer; and the retailer adds it to what he collects from the consumer. As a matter of fact, most of these middlemen add more than the tariff, so that in reality the ultimate consumer not only pays the tariff but considerably more. If the consumer be a laboring man, he additionally pays that he pays it to some manufacturer collected in a higher wage; but when it reaches the farmer it stops. He cannot pass the additional burden on to someone else. If the tariff enabled him to add the cost to the selling price of his product he would be able, at least in part, to meet this additional cost; but when he sells his product he is confronted with an entirely different situation. In the principal staple food products, the farmer produces a yearly surplus, and this surplus must find a market in the trade centers of the world. In the production of wheat the farmer must sell the surplus in competition with the wheat produced in India, in the Argentine, in Russia, and in other parts of the world where the cost of production is much less than in America. The price that the American farmer gets for his surplus in foreign markets fixes the price of the entire product. In other words, he must buy on this side of the tariff wall and sell on the other side. He must live, as far as consumption is concerned, in an artificial atmosphere raised above world conditions by the tariff, while he must sell his product at prices established by world conditions.

Because the farmers are scattered all over the country, and because their numbers run into the millions, it is almost impossible for them to meet the situation by organization. The manufacturers, comparatively few in number, can and do organize for the purpose of making the tariff on their products effective to the consumers and for the purpose of limiting production. There is no practical way in which the production of farm products can be limited. The manufacturer, at the beginning of a year, knows with reasonable certainty what the consumption of his product is going to be. He arranges his business accordingly. And even if he has failed to judge the amount the country will consume he can, almost over night, lessen his production or increase it. The farmer can do nothing of the kind. He battles against the elements of nature in his business, and cannot know in advance whether he is going to produce a surplus or, if so, how much the surplus is going to be. He often produces a larger crop on a small acreage than in other years he produced on a much larger acreage. He must gamble with the winds and rains, with dry weather, with hail, with bugs, with worms. When his crop is planted there is nothing for him to do but to go on and produce as much as he possibly can. Even though he realizes during the months of his summer's toil that there will be a large surplus of his product, he cannot shut down his operations as the manufacturer can, but must gather his whole crop, knowing that even if the profit is small on any given unit, his only salvation is to produce an additional number of such units.

The legislation recently defeated in the Senate and in the House aimed to give the farmer the same tariff protection that is enjoyed by other classes of our people. It did this by providing a method for the purchase and disposition of the surplus product. It provided for the purchase in our markets of that part of the product over and above what would be required for domestic consumption and the selling of this surplus in the markets of the world. It is conceded that if machinery could be enacted by which the surplus could be purchased and kept off of the domestic market, then the price of the product would rise to the level of the tariff wall. But in the sale of the surplus there would, of course, be a loss, and the proposed legislation contemplated the paying of this loss by the farmers themselves by what is ordinarily known as an equalization fee. While getting the benefit of the tariff, therefore, he would have deducted from this benefit, and taken out of his profit, whatever equalization fee was levied, so that in practical application of the contemplated law he would still be handicapped where the manufacturer is not.

There is nothing involved in the proposal that is not involved in our existing tariff law as it applies to the manufacturer, and no objection has ever been raised to it that does not apply with equal force to any tariff that may be levied on any article produced in America. There are those, of course, who oppose, and oppose strenuously and honestly, the levying of any tariff, particularly a tariff for protection; but we have such a tariff, and everyone must, if he is fair, admit that as long as it exists the farmer ought to benefit as well as the manufacturer.

Even if the farmer were given the full benefit of the tariff, he would still be suffering under handicaps not applicable to other classes of citizens. The cost of distribution in many of our principal food products is greater than the cost of production. The result is that the farmer frequently gets too little to pay him for his investment and his labor, while the consumer pays a price so high as to be almost prohibitive. There is no doubt that this excessive cost of distribution decreases greatly the amount of consumption. From the time the food leaves the farmer who produces it until it reaches the table of the consumer many middlemen have either directly or indirectly had something to do with the handling of the product, and in every instance have added to its cost.

The object of those who would relieve the situation, whether by voluntary action or by legislation, should be to bring the consumer and the producer as close together as possible. The farmer ought to get more and the consumer ought to pay less. Cooperative organizations of producers and cooperative organizations of consumers should be encouraged by law. Much progress has been made in this direction, but even the largest cooperatives have found themselves seriously handicapped by the powerful organizations of middlemen. It will require legislation to bring about the elimination of a large portion of this great army of middlemen. Our producers as well as our consumers are so widely scattered and so difficult to organize that nothing can bring about the elimination of this waste except the strong hand of the Government.

A few years ago the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry unanimously reported a bill which set up a giant corporation, capitalized with government funds, which should act in its corporate capacity as a great middleman between the producer and the consumer. It was authorized to buy from cooperative organizations of producers all kinds of food products and to sell these products to cooperative organizations of consumers, either in this country or abroad. It was authorized to establish agencies in all parts of the country to handle these food products; and to construct warehouses of all kinds for the storing of non-perishable products. The proposed legislation turned over to this corporation hundreds of idle ships owned by the Government, then tied up at the docks, with a provision that it was to pay no rental for the ships but was to keep them in repair and turn them over to the Government in case of war or national emergency, without charge. Under this plan it was proposed to carry the farm products of America to all parts of the world. The corporation would not only have performed the service of a giant middleman but would have preserved intact the merchant marine. It was not expected that this corporation would carry on all the food distribution of the country, but rather that it would do enough business to regulate prices. It would have given encouragement to a private extent that has ever been contemplated to cooperative organizations. This bill, although it had the unanimous indorsement of the committee, was defeated by the power of the Administration and the influence of millionaire middlemen scattered all over the country.

The railroad is perhaps the greatest of all middlemen. As far as its principal revenue is concerned, it is nothing but a middleman—a necessary one it is true, but a middleman nevertheless. Its freight revenue is acquired by a levy upon the products of human consumption as they travel from the producer to the consumer. Every living being has a direct interest in the cost of freight distribution. The man who never sees the railroad or hears the sound of a whistle must nevertheless pay his share of the freight. It is part of the price of everything that we eat, wear, or use. Nothing in our modern civilization escapes its charge. It ought therefore be given to the people at cost or as near cost as possible.

The farmer has a greater interest in the freight question than any other class. All dealers, from the manufacturer down to the consumer, add the price of the freight to the commodity they handle. When it reaches the farmer he has no opportunity to pass the increase on. He is at the end of the equation and therefore must absorb it. On the other hand, when he has anything to sell the freight charge is immediately deducted from his return. The price of his wheat at the farm is the Chicago or Minneapolis price, less the freight. The cost of his plow or his harrow or his clothes or anything else he has to buy is the manufacturer's price plus the middleman's profit, and always plus the freight. Thus he pays the freight twice, and he is the only class of our citizens who does this.

When the farmer begins to realize how directly the freight question affects his business and how he helps to bring about a loss where there should be a gain in his operations there will be a united demand for a solution of the railroad problem; and when the consumers of the country awake to the fact that the railroads are now in politics and always have been in politics, and that the best way to take them out of politics is to operate a government-owned system, public sentiment in favor of a final solution will be irresistible.

Smoke Goes Up Slowly

By ELI SIEGEL

Smoke goes silently up to the sky, while the sun is setting;
Setting, setting, this day after thousands and thousands and thousands of days.

Feet move along pavements, people talk in the clean, cool time before twilight, and smoke goes up to the waiting, quiet skies.

Work is over, rushes are over; those who went out of kitchens in the morning are now in kitchens again; and smoke goes slowly up to the waiting, quiet skies.

Glimpses of Arthur Gleason

By HELEN HAYES GLEASON

III

DINNER parties were to be shunned. Restaurants were different. There one could go with a companion to linger over talk. Though at the very center of rush and congestion, Arthur Gleason was at ease in a restaurant; it went with traveling to his nature. The Playbill Restaurant of years gone by in New York was one of his favorites; the oyster-stew counter at the Grand Central Station was another. You sank into a restaurant chair as into a well, observing the world through a periscope. Something took place, atmosphere poured down and around, creating a delightful privacy. This was accomplished as easily at Childs as any less popular place.

A friend has written of his London days:

> There was a pleasure in going with him to an Italian restaurant he had discovered near Victoria Station and an engaging charm (like the endearing grace of a child happily at play) in the care he took in choosing the meal—he had found a good Chianti there, I remember.

For him a new dish, a new drink, a new person, a new scene, by change and contrast brought out the known values of life. His was a stimulating combination of loyalty to the old and enthusiasm for the new. In his own words:

> There is a wayward element in life which makes the turning of a street corner an adventure. There is something amazing in the squandering of power and charm, at random. . . . Life refuses to be organized, has no bureau of registration for beauty, no central clearing station for its multitudinous wonder. The next turn at the fork of the road may be reserving for us a loyal friend or a fresh encounter.

Meals were never just meals when he was home. They were gatherings for friendliness and talk. If we hadn't guests in the flesh, we had their representatives, hundreds of them on shelves at arm's length. He would rise, choose a book in a flash, turn to the paragraph suggested by talk, share it, return to food. If that paragraph led to another and another, he would go on, kindling to the thought, dipping here and there. Nothing to do then; uncover his plate.

Given a smoke and any stranger, he could talk for hours, leading or following, drawing out, picking up information—often most valuable contacts—giving himself with complete focus. His conversation was always interesting, frequently brilliant and sparkling, unhurried. He talked like a connoisseur, choosing words for value and flavor. Their music was his daily habit. He swore seldom but with a fine finish. When he swore his eye carried the glint to kill, if necessary.

Certain things, like baseball and movies and vaudeville, for which he had a special passion, he felt were great common denominators in America. As much as books and travel they were to him channels of friendship and understanding by which he could identify himself with the mass flow of human life. He read the sporting page regularly for its tang, its touch of vulgarity. He was extremely fond of baseball; the skill of the big League players was pure joy to him. He knew the teams and their records and would grow absorbed matching reminiscences about them.

But for many years one of his greatest delights was vaudeville. I am haunted with thoughts of the old Saturday afternoons when we had subscription season tickets at the Alhambra on 125th Street and Seventh Avenue, New York. When we lived downtown we came up; when we lived uptown we came down. The Alhambra was our center. We liked the third row left aisle, end seats, for on that side passes down the magician from stage to audience. At that angle we could watch the keen profile of Ben Roberts, the orchestra leader. He was half the show. We liked his careful work in giving a newcomer a fair hearing and his abandon with the old-timers. We were much saddened when he was lifted over to a newer and bigger theater and from there to the Palace. The best acts on the circuit, the best seats for fifty-five cents, "Red" a property man, and Ben, the most gifted leader, a little spoiled us. Such were the offerings of the Alhambra Vaudeville.

It was a mixed feeling of pride in having spotted a good act and disappointment in seeing it go that swept us when one by one the favorites broke through years of hard work in vaudeville to become headliners in glorified revues. But A. G. never forsook vaudeville. In his own words:

> Vaudeville is speed, skill, brevity, fun. It is various, accidental, and natural. The spirit is one of play. . . . It is not trying to lift the stage nor degrade it. Its stage is level to the audience, so level that the performers walk out among the people and continue their act. They would use good songs as quickly as any group if good songs there were. Vaudeville has no concern with grief and conflict. For human suffering its only answer is a change of tune. But it knows its own little world of play, and sometimes for a few minutes it makes children happy and turns grown folks into children.

To some Arthur Gleason was a publicist, to others a reformer, a radical; to his wife he was the writer with the vision of beauty and suffering filling his eyes.

Two envelopes, which I found among his papers after my own paragraphs had been written, bear the inscriptions "Dissolution" and "The Darker Drink." This material had been written through the years from 1909 to 1922. It is the intimate autobiography of a man's soul:

1912

> The next ten years will not be as the last ten years (1901-1911) have been—dreary, a process of breaking the human spirit and then remaining sweet under the discipline. One learns at last that we must not lie down under injustice, nor accept deep personal humiliation.
>
> I have come to see that we are not called upon to resign ourselves to a lifetime of barren routine, nor to bend the will to the arrogance and foulness of men in power, nor to accept their insults in patience and flatter their weaknesses. . . .

I have done what is "wise" and "sane" and those things that lead to regularity and "respectability" of life, to conforming with the scheme of things, and to success. And I find that they destroy the only living thing within us, the human spirit, the only gift that can create, and that can communicate joy. . . .

1913

The free life of writing is for me blessed from heaven. It alone brings the sense of earning my way, of being justified in continuing to live. It clears the consciousness of suffering. The routine of office work is hateful to me because it destroys the power to write, and fills my life with a sense of pain. It carries, too, a sense of futility, unworthy tasks in endless succession. I came out of office work sick and wounded. It has taken four years to repair that loss. That which gives inner light and peace is right to do. That which brings darkness is wrong. It is foolish to set the rule of the course by the very moments when we are choked by glooms and blinded by failure. It is time to plan the larger purpose when the outlook ahead is clear. At this level, with an untroubled mind, and a sense of large self-expression, I wish to record for weaker moments my resolve to continue to hold fast to this true way of life, and my resolve not to be turned into routine by temporary discouragement.

And, more than that, I wish not to be turned aside from dwelling in this clearer air by the petty ethics of the world's standards. I wish no thought of the lesser duties and responsibilities to deflect me from the work which I do best. All considerations on the give-and-take of average community living are secondary and negligible, save only as they contribute to the main purpose.

I write this as giving voice to the best insight that I possess. I believe this to be the way of truth, and any other way a coward's retreat. I believe this is in obedience to the invisible deep-running laws of being which somehow show us what is life's will for us.

1914

Having acquired a technique by much hard work, I should like to use that technique instead of being forced into work where no technique is required.

One more year has gone, to a man past thirty-five years of age, and in that year, only a few weeks granted of work along lines which bring out his powers and employ his skill. For the rest, a filling of time with chasing about in many directions on matters of which he is ignorant, and so an ache at the heart through power thwarted and unfulfilled.

Never at any other time is there a sense of well-being except when writing. Then alone the thwarting disappears. Only as a singer do we approach the presence. . . .

1922

The attempt to organize the writer, and to force him to fulfil functions other than his own—functions sometimes that are destructive of his aptitudes—awakens the self-protective instinct. We exist to affirm our essence, unless we accept ourselves as clerks of an office. . . .

The constant contacts, the many conferences, violate me. They are a scatteration of forces. What I want above other things is quiet times in quiet places to gather together and arrange the deposits of the flux of things.

* * * * *

The essence of life is change. So at each change there were great rejoicings. Whenever he gave up stifling work to become himself, free, winged, we celebrated with a vacance or went voyaging to find a fresh impulse. He never permitted situations to "get him." He moved on.

Financial relief [he wrote] is the everlasting problem of the artist.

If he works hack, it kills creation.

If he makes beauty, it sells poorly.

If he accepts subsidy, he becomes indolent.

The nearest to a solution seem periods of active practical work, and periods of creative leisure.

Only a great purpose like Webb or Darwin can suffer a secure income.

* * * * *

It is almost impossible to speak of the years in Europe—they were so close-packed with suffering and loneliness and great experience. Only those few who did it know what price was paid to live from 1914 to 1917 trying to serve the Allied side. First and last we were aliens, under constant and often stupid surveillance of new officials; courteous superiority, a faint amusement from the English, suspicion from the French and Belgians. We grew tired many times in those years proving that we were friends.

But England for the six years was our base. To A. G. England was a second home. Her quiet rhythm, a certain well-seasoned stability, free speech, and her humor were congenial to him. He had known England from boyhood. He loved the best in her.

* * * * *

At last the time came to go home. We sailed back to New York in early 1920. We had left home in early 1914 to find rest. Now we were wistful to leave the place that had given anything except rest, but which had become so much a part of us; old and dear friends and newer ones, whom we should not see soon unless they came to us.

The years in Europe had been devoted to causes. They were six of the most valuable years in his life; a war at close range, contact with the best in several countries. But they left him dumped back in America, psychologically quite alien, as all those who had any real war experience felt on returning—a crispness lacking understanding, an intolerance with the war-weary—physically and financially at low ebb. "Your much-valued word," he wrote, "cheers the heart in these desolate days in America. We have come back to a suppressed, freedom-hating community. It seems to me I have never known folks so short-tempered, so full of bitterness and the desire to strike down the hopes of the world."

During the interval abroad nothing could be saved and savings had been invaded. All the money above living expenses had been given to the soldiers and to the babies. It was not much, but it was all he had.

There was now a real need of rest, for, with brief bits of respite here and there, winters and summers had been much alike, those years of service and separations. The underthrum of war bred doubts even then; always the anxious separation followed the holiday. War lifted through the surf; bombs fell at high noon: destruction spilled more accurately under a full moon. War means separation from all that is worthy and dear; it is the essence of war. It took home, art, health, some of the best years of his prime. War really took him. He "went West" with the others. Acute danger, sudden danger, laughed at him, fell about him like a mantle and left him undaunted. But like the drip of water on stone, the long drumming fatigue of war ate into vitality, sapped strength and resistance. . . .

In the Driftway

AS these lines are written, that Jersey leopard is still at large. In fact, he is so much and so long at large that officials of Monmouth County, from a zoo in which he was reported to have escaped, are said to be coming to the conclusion that there isn't any such animal. They are putting him in the same class with the giraffe. An escaped leopard, it appears, must kill a man, or at least a chicken, every day or so in order to be believed in. This Jersey beast, not having killed anything of which anybody is certain, has lost caste, and inhabitants of Monmouth County who for several days lived behind barricaded doors and windows are coming out to gossip with the neighbors again.

THE Drifter confesses that from the first his sympathies have been with the leopard. He imagines that if alone in the jungles of South America or Africa—or wherever it is that leopards live—he were confronted by one of those animals his sympathies would be largely with the Drifter. But when from a safe distance he thinks of the entire population of a county in arms against a single leopard his sense of fair play is outraged. Probably the leopard meant no harm in his escape. He may have tired of his diet of fresh meat in the zoo and strolled out in search of vegetables and vitamins. But the chances are that he had become enough of an American to take up with our idea of summer vacations and simply decided to start off on his own well-earned outing. There is no reason why wild animals should not get away for a few weeks in the country as well as anybody else. As one sees them in the zoos they seem to need it. The Drifter commends to some enterprising newspaper "Vacations for animals" as a good slogan for a campaign. In fact, the leopard's example was followed a few days later by a pet ape in a nearby town, so that the idea may be spreading without any special propaganda.

THE most humane man in Jersey is the one who supplied a picture of a leopard or a stuffed representation—the Drifter has forgotten which—for the benefit of the amateur hunters of Monmouth County. The man proclaimed himself to be a lover of yellow cats and declared that since the escape of the leopard no animal was safe in Monmouth County that had a streak of yellow in its hide and ran around on four legs. Even yellow taxicabs were in some danger, as everybody was going around with whatever weapon he could lay his hands on from a pea-shooter to a soixante-quinze. (You knew what that was during the Great War even if you've forgotten since.)

AND if the Drifter's theory is correct, that the leopard has merely gone on his summer vacation, he is likely to be back at the zoo any Monday morning as tired and unready to resume his job as any other beneficiary of our conventional summer outing. He'll be back except for one possibility. His human pursuers seem all to have been distanced, but there are worse dangers in the State. He may have had a grade-crossing collision with a full-grown Jersey mosquito. If so——

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Whitewashing the Shipping Board

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The men guilty of or responsible for the gigantic looting in the Shipping Board were, with few exceptions, not of President Wilson's party, but, in the emergency created by the war, were called by him to the service of the Government. They then killed two birds with one stone—they made a ghastly failure of the government merchant marine, the legislation for which they had by every device attempted to defeat and block, and they made way with and dissipated the taxpayers' billions.

The alibi offered by the New York World—"It is true that the Government sometimes made bad bargains because of the inexperience of its agents or because of the need of speedy action during the rush of the war"—will not hold for the Shipping Board. The men who administered that organization were our most prominent and experienced shipping men, and more than 80 per cent of the money spent by the Shipping Board was spent after the war. A few of the ships were, long after the war had ended, given to inexperienced and unfit agents who employed certain lawyers whose fees in the matter certainly did not cover legitimate legal services.

The people have fallen between two stools—the Democratic Party is responsible for the Shipping Board's doings under the Wilson Administration and would whitewash it, and the men who profited most are Republicans of national prominence. That is why we have had so many whitewashes of the Shipping Board.

And now, the last act in this tragedy is about to take place by the disposal of the remaining worthwhile ships—all that the Shipping Board has to show for the expenditure of more than five billion dollars of the people's money—for a few million dollars, which will quickly go the way the rest of the people's money went so as to clinch the lies against government ownership and government operation.

New York, July 1 PHILIP MANSON

Tsanko Bakaloff Tserkovsky

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The death of Tsanko Bakaloff Tserkovsky on May 2 removed the father of the Bulgarian Peasant or Agrarian Party from the stage of Bulgarian politics. He was also a most prolific and popular poet, short-story and play writer. Being a cabinet minister from the armistice to March, 1923, he put into operation the well-known Bulgarian universal labor-service law and rendered tremendous services to the post-war reconstruction of his defeated country.

When in 1919 Georges Clemenceau, handing the treaty of peace over to Premier Stambulisky to sign his name on the dotted line as the sole delegate of Bulgaria, asked aloud: "Is Bulgaria a monarchy or a republic?" Tserkovsky wrote to King Boris advising him to abdicate in favor of a republic. After the military coup d'etat which overthrew the Stambulisky Government in June, 1923, the old poet was thrown into prison and held under lock nearly three years without judicial sentence or warrant and under such harsh treatment that he officially begged to be shot dead. As late as February, 1926, he was brought to trial, charged with high treason against the king. The court, of course, acquitted him. But as soon as he left the prison and returned home he died, saying to his family: "Tell all my relatives and friends that no one should even think of [illegible]."

Bulgaria lost one more of her worthy sons—a poet, a statesman, and father of thirteen children.

New York, June 23 THEODORE GESHKOFF

Books

Bones

By JULIA JOHNSON DAVIS

Bones, bones, bones, bones,
Nigger, th'ow away dem bones!

De debbil once say "I needs a game
Fo' ter pass de time away,"
An' he got him de bones of a po' black man
Dat come ter Hell dat day.
He cut 'em off straight, an' he trim 'em off smooth,
An' dey look like li'l squar' stones,
An' he mark 'em wid soot an' den he say,
"Now I gwi' roll some bones!"

Roll dem bones, roll dem bones,
De debbil say ter roll dem bones!

Now Li'l Joe an' Big Dick down in Hell
Is de debbil's two right han' men,
An' nigger, w'en yuh calls on eider of dese
You's callin' on de debbil's frien'.
Snake-Eyes wuz de one dat talk ter Eve,
Don' you 'member po' Adam's moans,
Oh think what de bulge in yo' pockets means,
An' nigger, th'ow away dem bones!

Bones, bones, bones, bones,
Nigger, th'ow away dem bones!

Oh nigger, I sees you on yo' knees,
But you ain' kneelin' down ter pray,
"De baby needs new shoes, come on, bones!"
Dat's whut I heahs yuh say.
"Bring home de bacon," yuh hollers an' shouts,
But brudder, I sets an' groans,
Fo' you'll be de bacon fryin' in de pan,
An' de debbil he will roll yo' bones!

Bones, bones, bones, bones,
De debbil he will roll yo' bones!

The Thoughtful State

Social Control of Business. By John Maurice Clark. University of Chicago Press. $4.

IT is a rare thing to be the thoughtful son of a thoughtful father. John Maurice Clark possesses both distinctions, and his new book is an excellent example of one of the best kinds of thinking that are being done by contemporary economic theorists—which is to say, with all due deference to the past, one of the best kinds of thinking that have ever been done with regard to social affairs. This is not to say that the book is simple or is easy reading. On the contrary, its distinguishing merit, like that of all the best contemporary theory, consists in its keeping forever in mind the endless complexity of the forces and the motives at work in our bewildering present-day life, and trying to search out the lines of social action most promising in consequence. The result of the search, needless to say, is not a panacea. It is not even two or three satisfactory "principles" on the basis of which everything can be settled without further thought. We have got to get forward from where we are; in Mr. Clark's judgment, we shall probably get along fastest by further thoughtful development of methods already in use, rather than by saying lo here or lo there. It is a disappointingly pedestrian mode of progress, but at least we are not likely to get a flat tire or to have both brakes suddenly go bad half way down a steep hill.

Mr. Clark is not one of those social philosophers who know all about it. Even "the goals we need to strive and act for ourselves are long-run affairs and call for more knowledge and foresight than we have available to bring to bear; while the objectives of our actual policies are sadly shortsighted and [illegible]." The idea that our existing economic system is [illegible] a natural one, in which control is altogether unnecessary, in fact. Our system is made up of a particular set of controls, with government playing a highly important part by maintaining our present laws of property. Those laws might be vastly different from what they are; they do vary widely as regards different kinds of property (compare a street railway with a pencil factory); and they are constantly changing. It is silly to represent our choice as a choice between control and no control; we can only choose between systems of control, our present one or some other. Mr. Clark, on the whole, is for what we have, made just as good as we can make it.

After a careful definition of terms, he gives an excellent analysis of the existing scheme of control. The compulsion exercised on us by machinery is strikingly brought out, then the control to which we are subjected by our economic necessities working through the pressures imposed on us under our property system; and, in more detail, control by competition (whose essential nature it is to harness the predatory interest in man to the end of service), control by the ethical codes of business and the professions, by public opinion, vague as it is, and by the law operating in manifold unseen ways. Social control is thus an omnipresent fact. Men being what they are, our present system works, on the whole, pretty badly, with great friction and waste. Any other one would probably work worse. Even those who disagree should be grateful to Mr. Clark for indicating so clearly that legal and other institutions, along with men's habits, beliefs, and aims, are important economic facts.

We proceed finally to a detailed study of the practical problems of regulation and price control, which must be solved if we are to make progress along present lines. A brief review cannot thread the economic and legal maze of costs, earnings, fair value, and fair return through which our author must find his way. Suffice it to say that, like most sensible economists, he rejects reproduction cost as the proper basis on which to figure returns to railroads and public utilities. As regards the trusts, in the light of our experience he still favors the indirect methods of control advocated a quarter of a century ago by his distinguished father and since that time increasingly embodied in our legislation—publicity and the legal prevention of unfair competition, together with the growth of business knowledge and the development of business morals. "Industrial knowledge is a public utility, which may properly be delegated to private ownership only so far as that is the best condition for the performance of its public function." The sole test of control is that it should aid in making business subserve the ends of life.

Reformers in a hurry will quarrel with Mr. Clark for the moderateness of his proposals and the inconclusiveness of his conclusions; they will damn him for a conservative professor. They would do better to understand the genuine open-mindedness and liberality of his thought, the broad understanding and genuine wisdom underlying his concluding sentences: "Even a wrong solution which those concerned have worked out for themselves may be better than a more enlightened one imposed from above. And this is the last lesson of tolerance, which impatient reformers find it hardest to learn."

HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY

Mr. Barnes on the War Guilt

The Genesis of the World War. By Harry Elmer Barnes. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

THIS excellent work proceeds upon facts stated not always with the composure of historical writers but stated clearly, fully, and well. The citations are copious and the bibliographical tables most comprehensive. And there is no retreat from any of the positions originally taken by the author; on the contrary, there is an advance.

The memoirs of Sir Edward Grey, when read by a penetrating, informed mind, are signally convincing that the British Foreign Office had a more willing hand in this bad business than we dreamed. Parsons and good old ladies, to be sure, find in dear Sir Edward imperturbable virtue, but students will see how adroitly Grey leads his readers around pitfalls of truth. Indeed many such students will, upon gaining the whole view of Grey's policy, turn against him from his own account of it. The present reviewer, when he first perused these memoirs, felt himself convinced that the Grey-Northcliffe party had at least resolved not to prevent the war—had resolved simply to let France and Russia crush Germany, while there should be preserved a spotless record north of the Channel. But the record was not spotless. Grey's tale of British pre-war conduct must be read along with the narrative of Colonel House in order that we may fully discern the adroitness of the maneuvers made to draw our country also into the war. Upon this phase Mr. Barnes [illegible]. It is the complacency of Grey, his piety of attitude, that maddens us; the fact of his being safe because most readers will not look beyond his own book; the fact that they wish to believe just what he says, and that in consequence one of those who could have done much to prevent the great crime is during the present generation its most secure defender.

A keen exposure is made by Mr. Barnes of one plausible act often cited in Grey's favor and in proof of his desire to prevent the war—namely, his proposal of a "conference" in the last few days. Now, as was long ago pointed out, and is today by Lowes Dickinson, this conference was to consist of a group among whom Germany would be outvoted—a conference which Britain herself would never have entered in the same circumstances. Mr. Barnes now fully analyzes the situation at that moment, setting out much of its stages to show what Grey's suggestions were worth under rapidly changing conditions. He [illegible] Grey's failure to point out that Russia [illegible] had rejected this proposal. As he says, another proposal, the one made by Germany that Austria and Russia themselves have an immediate and direct consultation, was better. In point of fact, Grey himself had favored it, though he now says nothing about it.

Mr. Barnes properly comments upon the terrible price to Britain of all this diplomacy. It is too early, however, to reckon loss or gain. The territorial profits of Great Britain by the Treaty of Versailles are prodigious—so vast that in the long run they will probably compensate for all the loss. As Moulton and Lewis in their recent work on the French debt estimate that Alsace-Lorraine will reimburse France in the devastated regions, so German East Africa and rich Mesopotamia and a hand no longer controlled in Persia may in a decade make Britain fat again.

This fearless book closes with an estimate of the changing opinion concerning war guilt, a point which the experience of the present reviewer serves to illustrate, since only three years ago no American house was brave enough to print a book by him containing almost identical arguments not more tartly stated. It was in London that a publisher had then to be found. Opinion has indeed changed, and Mr. Barnes has helped to change it with his brave attacks. He lays about him now with no gloved hand, for when the public prefers to plug its ears only the loud can be heard. This much is certain—that almost without exception every batch of new documents tends to prove France and Russia more guilty. Readers are at last beginning to notice that the French still refuse to open their files, while the memoirs of Allied statesmen when scrutinized tend to confound their authors.

Mr. Barnes's book should be read by all scholars and historians. Incidentally, it is one more proof of the lively argumentative powers of its author.

FREDERICK BAUSMAN

War Diplomacy from the Inside

Smaranda. A Compilation in Three Parts. By Lord Thomson of Cardington. George H. Doran Company. $2.50.

ONE of the most remarkable features of war literature has been the bitterness with which the soldiers who did the actual fighting have assailed the politicians, the diplomatists, and particularly the General Staff at whose hands they suffered most directly. Now comes a book by a distinguished British soldier who during part of the war combined the functions of staff officer and diplomatist on a military mission. Lord Thomson is in an excellent position to thrust a satirical pen under the gold lace which covers up the weaknesses of his former colleagues, and he makes good use of his opportunities.

"Smaranda" is divided into three parts. The first half is the diary of a "General Y." It is difficult to see why Lord Thomson chose to mantle himself in this very exiguous disguise. "General Y." does everything in the war and after the war that Lord Thomson did and dies very conveniently on the day the Labor Government assumed office and his editor was elevated to the Peerage, as Minister for Air. The diary is largely devoted to "General Y.'s" experiences in Rumania, which he calls Smarandaland. Here for two years of the war he was engaged in a semi-military, semi-diplomatic mission, the tribulations of which were offset for him by a romantic friendship with a great lady of the land whom he calls Smaranda. The romance is described with considerable charm and humor, but the main interest of the diary will undoubtedly be in its first-hand account of war diplomacy in the Balkans.

"General Y." went to Rumania early in 1915 with instructions to "bring in" that country on the side of the Allies. It was not altogether an easy task. Bucharest was a center of intrigue where representatives of both sides strove, with cajolery, bribes, and threats, to capture Rumania as an ally. Nor was the General's heart entirely in the job. He was far from convinced that Rumania would be a greater asset as an ally than as a neutral, and events certainly proved him right. However, the pundits in high places would not listen to his warnings, and in the end Rumania came in.

When "General Y." was ordered to destroy the Rumanian oil wells he pointed out that the cost of compensation, which the British Government was to meet, would be enormous, and that even if the Germans got the oil the difficulties of transport for them were enormous. He was instructed to go ahead. In carrying out the destruction it was necessary to secure the cooperation of the Standard Oil agent, whose comments he reports as follows: "'Well, it's a wicked waste, but if the British Government is going to pay, I'll help you.' I thought sadly to myself, the British always pay. His last remark was—'I reckon God made oil to be burned some time or another, and it makes no odds to me—if you are going to pay for it—when and where you burn my stuff.' And on this practical and pious note we parted." Without doubt this diary will be read with interest by those in high places, though probably they will derive no great pleasure from such comments as the following:

> Army and navy officers profess contempt for politicians and say that politics is a dirty game; yet many play it when they get a chance. On their side, the politicians are discovering that intrigue is not unknown in military and naval circles.

I met one yesterday who, [illegible] a hopelessly homeless civilian; he is now a colonel, and [illegible] back from our headquarters in Prussia to breathe the pure air of Westminster for a while.

The second and third parts consist of a number of sketches of the Near East during and after the war and a longish story written around the perpetual struggle between Greek and Bulgar in Western Thrace. They are interesting and well written, but the present reviewer would cheerfully have [illegible] lot for some more of the indiscretions for which, we are told in the compiler's preface, "General Y." was notorious. For those who took an [illegible] part in the war, [illegible] not only the better part of valor but a boon to a war-weary world.

KEITH HUTCHISON

Man, Nature, and Culture

The Relation of Nature to Man in Aboriginal America. By Clark Wissler. Oxford University Press. $3.50.

THE swinging of the ethnological pendulum continues at an accelerated rate. A few years ago its direction was away from the extreme of the theory which held that all societies developed along the same lines and in identical evolutionary fashion; it was swinging toward a new theory that each society had to be studied historically to be understood. Passing this point, the pendulum swung on until it reached the extreme of the historical point of view, which may be called diffusionism, or the idea that all cultures are the result of traits each of which could have originated but once somewhere—that when two cultures have similar traits there must have been contacts making for diffusion. It is to this school, in its less extreme form, that Dr. Wissler's book belongs. He presents a diffusionist position, it is true, which is more logical and tenable, and much more acceptable, than that of the extremists Elliot Smith and Fritz Graebner. But, reading the work, one can understand why many ethnologists believe that one must be cautious in applying the diffusion principle—that, valuable as it is, it is most valuable when it is used with the realization that culture is too human, too psychological a thing to be plotted on a map.

Briefly, the thing for which Dr. Wissler is searching is any possible law that will enable us to cope intelligently with the problem how old a culture may be and what historical contacts it may have had. Developing an idea which has been presented by him and others in the past few years, he produces a work which, if taken with the caution with which he surrounds his theses, is very stimulating. The method used is one which Dr. Wissler foreshadowed in his earlier works on "The American Indian" and "Man and Culture." It comes from a consideration, first, of archaeological data, and, in essence, is this: If you plot the distribution of a trait, either cultural or somatological, on a map—any trait, Dr. Wissler emphasizes, and one found anywhere—you will discover that it is found most frequently, and, if it is a cultural trait, in its most intensive and complex form, at a certain place. From this region, as concentrically as the topography of the continent allows, will go, like ripples in a pool when a stone is thrown into it, a series of areas in which the trait will become less intensive and less complex. The center of this distribution, then, is the place where the trait presumably originated and has grown to its present complex form, and in the outlying regions with [illegible] to this center you will find the simplest, and therefore the oldest, type of the trait.

The book tests the theory by numerous distributions. Material culture and archaeological traits and trait-complexes, which are treated in the first two chapters, offer, of course, the most persuasive results. Next are considered social traits, and Dr. Wissler was courageous indeed to plot distributions of such illusive things. One can imagine his sigh of relief as he turned to the physical traits of the human form. In a final chapter he brings all his findings together, formulates his law, and studies the geographical basis for the distributions the type of which he has found. One would not, in any case, call Dr. Wissler a geographical determinist, but he stresses the importance of the environment [illegible] in turning [illegible] a point well made in his earlier works—the limiting role to culture played by the environment. It is to be hoped, since the processes and theories discussed by Dr. Wissler are operative and important, that he will pursue his researches further and give us the elaboration of the present work that it calls for.

MELVILLE J. HERSKOVITS

Molnar's Medium

Eva and The Derelict Boat. By Franz Molnar. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $2.50.

THESE two stories by Molnar exemplify a formula to which the Hungarian novelist and playwright returns again and again and in the manipulation of which he is thoroughly at home. The strength of human passion is matched against the frailty of other human relationships, and the resultant drift toward a tragic conclusion is traced quietly, deliberately, and with a due regard for the artistic value of atmosphere. In "The Derelict Boat" the scene is laid in Budapest; in "Eva" the silver mines of the Slovakian highlands provide the setting. In one case the woman is a child; in the other the men are children. In other respects the mood and the treatment are much alike.

Eva is a symbol for all the discord which the heartlessly feminine may spread in a tranquil community. Even before her arrival the atmosphere of the mine officials' club underwent a disturbing change; it was "dedicated to expectation." "The thoughts of all the men were occupied with that woman, some of them rather sensuously. 'What's her name?' They smiled to think that this question had not occurred to them before. The director answered: 'Eva.' This name appealed to them. 'Eva,' they said, 'it's a beautiful name.' They would have thought any name beautiful." In prose of this simplicity, gently and ironically, Molnar weaves his tragedy.

Mellower and more melancholy, "The Derelict Boat" is remniscent of other Molnar tales, done in the Schnitzler mood. "Pirko was fifteen, her father was a lawyer and her mother a tall blonde woman who whispered at five o'clock teas with young men behind the window curtain." And like all unhappy fifteen-year-old heroines—at least in Hungary—Pirko would rather die than grow up. Emil Lengyel, who translated the stories, has written an introductory study of his fellow-countryman.

LISLE BELL

Books in Brief

Sumptuary Legislation and Personal Regulation in England. By Frances Elizabeth Baldwin. The Johns Hopkins Press. $2.50.

A rather pedestrian account, twice too long, of sumptuary legislation in England from the accession of Edward III to the death of Elizabeth, together with extended descriptions of English costume in that period. It is primarily a collection of facts drawn from the printed sources of information, often at second hand.

Education in East Africa. Report Prepared by Thomas Jesse Jones, Chairman of the Second African Educational Commission of the Phelps-Stokes Fund. The Phelps-Stokes Fund.

This work, taken in conjunction with the Report of the First Commission of the Phelps-Stokes Fund, gives a comprehensive account of education in Africa as far as the native peoples are concerned. The present volume deals with East Africa, and contains full accounts of all the types of schools in all the provinces and countries of the eastern half of Africa from Abyssinia to the Cape. The statistics in every case are full and adequate. Dr. Jones is a firm believer in the Hampton-Tuskegee program primarily of industrial training for Negroes, and is convinced that it is education of this type which will be the solution of the problem of "civilizing" the natives. Perhaps he is right; one wonders if there is not also need among them for an appreciation of the value of their own cultures.

The American Year Book. A Record of Events and Progress for the Year 1925. Edited by Albert Bushnell Hart and William M. Schuyler. The Macmillan Company. $7.50.

This is a revival of a publication that appeared annually from 1910 to 1919 and then was interrupted. It is described as "not intended to be an almanac of various concentrated information and statistics, but a general survey of the advance of the nation for each year," with particular attention to "new ideas" and "the new results of scientific and other intellectual activity." It would be easy to attack it from these or other standpoints. The chapter on Territories and Dependencies is a statistical presentation with no hint of the seething discontent in many of our island possessions, while of seven pages given to a scant review of our Latin-American relations, a third is devoted to two separate articles on the Tacna-Arica question which overlap and to some extent conflict. But, although it is easy to point out defects in a work of this kind, it is better perhaps to concede that in the deluge of "current events" which overwhelms us any honest, intelligent effort at summarization and classification is welcome.

An Englishman in Japan. By Theodate Geoffrey. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.

This volume would naturally be classed with travel books, but it is so different, so far superior to even the best of travel books on Japan, that it should have a classification to itself. Mrs. Geoffrey came into contact with the "foreign colony," including the missionary element, and because of her remarkable power of detachment was able to see it with all its faults and all its virtues, both of which she finds among missionaries as well as business people. Later she moved into Japanese quarters in a suburb of Yokohama and lived very much in the Japanese fashion. The book is a most valuable contribution to the interpretative literature of our Pacific neighbor.

Dean Briggs. By Rollo C. Brown. Harper and Brothers. $5.

Dean Briggs is a sturdy flower of the Cambridge of President Eliot's day. He is even more of a gentleman than a scholar, and his gentlemanliness takes no account of clothes or class. Scoffers at New England Puritanism would learn by reading of him—if Mr. Brown's story did not seem too good to be true. It is, in fact, almost too true to be good—such constant appreciation, even salted with so many good stories, must make Dean Briggs seem unreal to those who have not known and, knowing, loved him.

The Life of Stephen F. Austin. By Eugene C. Barker. Dallas, Texas: Lamar and Barton. $5.

The first account of the personality and performance of "The Father of Texas." A remarkable book, moving with the economy and firmness of a Cromwellian summons. Austin emerges as a gentleman cultured, sensitive, patient, tolerant, the very opposite of the burly, damn-your-eyes backwoodsman typified in Sam Houston, who came to Texas barely in time to reap what Austin had sowed and who yet has popularly been regarded as summing up in himself Texan pioneer character.

The Fiftieth Anniversary of the Ethical Movement. D. Appleton and Company. $2.50.

Here are recounted a half century's experiences in a new type of religious organization far more radical than even the most liberal of the modernist churches. As Felix Adler explains in the leading paper, this pioneer movement was called into being in order to accord to ethical progress—independently of any theological sanction—the primacy among man's needs, to search for more light on life's ideals than can be found in the Bibles of a simpler age, and to put into practice the better ways of personal and group endeavor thus indicated. Seventeen of Dr. Adler's colleagues in America and abroad contribute autobiographies, confessions of faith, and records of the activities of the societies.

The New Baltic States and Their Future. By Owen Rutter. Houghton Mifflin Company. $5.

Mr. Rutter has given us a most informing, useful, and readable volume concerning the infant republics of Lithuania, Latvia, and Esthonia. There is just enough of geography, of history, of economics, of social conditions, and of politics to satisfy the reader who makes a specialty of none of them. And there is just enough of personal adventure and actual contact with the peoples to give the book a flavor of life and reality and make it acceptable as a travel book.

The Heart of Black Papua. By Merlin Moore Taylor. Robert M. McBride and Company. $3.

A belated contribution to the literature of discovery. The author and a British official, learning that there is trouble in the interior, dragoon a native village, force its men to leave their tasks to act as burden-bearers for them (knocking them about rather freely when they become dissatisfied), and, with the protection of native members of the governing constabulary, proceed into the interior, where they demonstrate the majesty of the law by violating every item of the code of ethics, religion, and good breeding which either they or the natives have been brought up to respect. Outside of some damage from leeches they all come through in good shape. The tale is as good an example of how to misgovern a native people and how not to obtain ethnological information as may be cited.

By the City of the Long Sand. By Alice Tisdale Hobart. The Macmillan Company. $3.50.

In the tradesmen and their wives who set up tiny American Main Streets in all the treaty ports of China, Mrs. Hobart sees the legitimate successors of the pioneers and homesteaders of the great American frontier. Here is a vivid and sweet picture of China as reflected in the life of a Standard Oil wife.

Your Fall Problems

If you want to rent a house or an apartment or if you have one to rent—or sell, advertise in the classified section of The Nation, read by honest landlords and desirable tenants. Rates on application. Special three-time rate. Dept. F. P., The Nation.

LECTURES

MEXICO AND THE CATHOLIC CHURCH

An interpretation of this vital problem in relation to the future.

By HARRY WATON

author, lecturer and thinker.

Friday, August 27th, 8 P. M.

Community Church House, 34th St. at Park Ave., N. Y. C.

ADMISSION 50 CENTS

AUSPICES WORKERS' EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTE

International Relations Section

Opium—Up to Date

By ELLEN W. LA MOTTE

LET me give you the latest news about the opium question, as seen during the eighth session of the Opium Advisory Committee of the League of Nations, held at Geneva from May 26 to June 8 of this year—a thoroughly prejudiced account, by a thoroughly prejudiced observer. Without straining a point, you could call this committee a "packed" one, since the majority of the delegates represented countries with large stakes in production, consumption, and manufacture—Great Britain and India, France, Holland, Portugal, Germany, Switzerland, and Japan. There was also Siam, browbeaten and discouraged, and one real anti-opium delegate from China. But the Chinese delegate, while profoundly antagonistic to the opium trade and traders, could promise nothing on behalf of his distracted, disorganized country—one of the worst offenders as far as production goes. Normally, the committee has three assessors or experts, representing no country, unbiased and honest. One of these, however, Sir John Jordan, died a few months ago and has not been replaced. Mrs. Hamilton Wright was thrown overboard—she always made a fuss at these meetings and insisted that the trade was being shielded. And the French assessor, a negative person, did not even show up this last time. Mrs. Wright has been replaced by Colonel Arthur Woods, who necessarily played a watching game, being unfamiliar with their methods. So, except for Mr. Chu of China, nothing disturbed the international harmony.

The only work done (if you call it work) was to go over the vast mass of reports on illicit traffic sent in from every corner of the world. Every country was caught out, trading in contraband. And as one country after another was exposed, the delegate would shrug his shoulders and smile, and the others would smile with him—their turn next. But, after all, there was nothing to do about it, since they were all in the same game, and all determined that the game should go on. These contraband seizures are supposed to represent a tenth or a twentieth of the actual contraband in transit. And the figures were so formidable that even Sir John Campbell of the India Office commented on the "colossal magnitude" of the illicit traffic. Everything, in fact, is wide open—production booming and the drug factories turning out drugs by the ton. Not the slightest effort was made to deal with production, or to limit the factory output—no rationing of factories, no oversight of their sales. To sit listening day after day to these disclosures, and to realize that the delegates were only concerned with the annoyance of having these figures made public, makes one realize the huge financial interests involved. Colonel Woods remarked toward the end of the sessions that these revelations showed clearly that nothing could be done till production was checked and factory output limited. At which, the Dutch delegate flew into the air and said that his Government would never tolerate any rationing of the factory. And the British delegate added, with some hesitation, that of course this would seem to be the direct method of dealing with the question, but that the indirect way (i.e., the superficial and futile) seemed more feasible.

The abuses of the export and import certificate system were completely revealed. Each consignment of opium or drugs is shipped from country to country on these certificates, issued by the importing country and honored by the exporting country. But who questions the good faith of Patagonia when it asks for three tons of morphia for "medical purposes"? What nation dares cast the first stone? Besides, countries like Patagonia are so useful. Three years ago Sir John Jordan said this certificate system was a device through which the illicit trader could drive a coach and four—today it seems like a circus parade, with crowds cheering the procession.

To defeat publicity the committee adopted rather extraordinary tactics. At all previous meetings the documents under discussion have been given out from day to day to the press, and to the two or three persons who go to Geneva for these opium meetings—persons interested in the subject, who often represent large associations or organizations. To this handful, as well as to the press, the documents have always been freely and generously given, thus saving months of waiting till they are published. Not so this time. Nothing was issued except to the delegates themselves, and the discussions were conducted in so guarded a manner that the public could gather little or nothing. Thus, the delegates would read their documents in silence, and the chaiman would ask: Gentlemen, you have now read Document 418. I take it there is no discussion. Good. We will now pass on to Document 419. Any discussion? Sometimes a delegate would ask for enlightenment as to paragraph 3, page 9. To which would come the answer that if you turned to Document 399, page 10, third paragraph, full details would be found. Whole mornings would be spent in this fashion, days in fact, if one added the hours. While preserving the appearance of open meetings the public was shut out from all information as completely as the committee could manage it. True, a lot spilled over in spite of their best efforts, and the astonishing thing is that one learned as much as one did. This disgraceful proceeding, this effort of a committee to reverse the one policy the League has stood for successfully—publicity—is a sufficient commentary on the Opium Commiteee and the interests it represents.

The statement made by the Indian delegate as to India's "sacrifice" in giving up her exports of smoking opium to the various countries of the Far East is not as good as it sounds. This proposal was made originally by Sir John Jordan, a year ago, but he qualified it. He suggested that India shou'd decrease her exports 10 per cent a year for ten years, while pari passu these countries should decrease consumption by a like amount. Now India makes the gesture, but no answering signal comes in return. Not a word from all the British colonies—Straits Settlements, Federated and Unfederated Malay States, Hongkong, North Borneo, Brunei, and Sarawak; not a word from French Indo-China; not a word from the Netherlands Indies; not a word from Portuguese Macao. Presumably therefore all these countries are going on with their consumption, their monopolies, and their revenues. So one asks, where will they get their opium? If not from India, then where?

Will they buy it from the Native Indian States? These Native States raise large quantities of opium, and sell a great deal of it to British India, but their production, consumption, and sales are unknown quantities. Which is odd, considering they are right in the middle of India, with a population of some seventy million. The Indian delegate at Geneva does not represent them, nor have they a delegate of their own—a curious situation for a group of large producing states. One knows less about the output of these states than about China—much less, for there are many to guess at the size of China's production, while no one mentions these Native States. When one hears of reduced acreage under poppy in India, that means British India; there may be a compensating rise in acreage in these independent States, but no figures are ever given. A highly convenient situation, evidently. So: Will the opium smoking countries get their opium in future from the Native States? Or from Turkey or Persia or elsewhere? Or will they raise it themselves?

Another thing: For the last few years we have been constantly told that Indian opium is so low in morphine content as to be useless for manufacturing into drugs. An exploded bubble, as this meeting showed. It is now suddenly discovered to be quite as rich if not richer than Turkish or Persian opium, and just as valuable for making into alkaloids. England is already importing large quantities of it for manufacture (as she did during the war, when other supplies were not available) and now it seems that India itself has gone in for the manufacture of alkaloids. Manufactured indeed, in 1924, some 2,033 kilos of morphia, or about two tons! As if the world was not already overloaded with drug factories! Therefore, this "sacrifice" assumes a new aspect. It may not be as onerous as it sounds. It comes at the very moment when Indian opium is found to be as rich as that of any other country—at the very moment when India itself has become a large producer of alkaloids. Can it be that the cessation of exports to the Far Eastern countries for smoking will be compensated for by other markets more profitable?

Denmark and the Free-Trade Conference

By CHESTER C. PLATT

Copenhagen, August 2

DEMOCRACY, in the field of economics, has gone far in Denmark. Among other things Denmark prohibits child labor; it has established old age pensions, unemployment insurance, widows' pensions, sickness insurance; it has a liberal workman's compensation law, government ownership of railroads and steam ferries, low freight rates, thousands of cooperative stores and factories, free homes for country school teachers, compulsory education, state aid to farmers by government loans, cooperative banks, and almost complete free trade; it has started a system of taxing land values which will help to destroy landlordism.

It was the political atmosphere which engendered these reforms which led to the selection of Copenhagen for the Third International Conference to promote the Taxation of Land Values and Free Trade, held there from July 20 to August 1. This conference brought together over 400 persons, representing 17 countries. Two members of the Ger-

The New School for Social Research

Registration begins September 27
School Year begins October 4

HARRY E. BARNES—Intellectual History of Europe. Wednesday, 5.20—6.50 P. M.

FRANZ BOAS—Race and Culture. Tuesday, 8.20—9.50 P. M. (Twelve lectures)

NATHANIEL PEFFER—Imperialism and Its Practical Implications. Thursday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

EDWIN B. HOLT—Psychology of Response. Monday, 8.20—9.50 P. M. (Ten lectures)

JOHN B. WATSON—Behaviorism and Psychoanalysis. Friday, 8.20—9.50 P. M. (Twelve lectures)

S. FERENCZI—Selected Chapters in the Theory and Practice of Psychoanalysis. Tuesday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

EDWIN W. KOPF—Insurance History of the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries. Thursday, 8.20—9.50 P. M. (Twelve lectures)

IRA S. WILE—Conduct Disorders in Childhood. Monday, 5.20—6.50 P. M.

FRANKWOOD E. WILLIAMS—Mental Hygiene—Its Personal and Social Aspects. Monday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

LEO WOLMAN—The Labor Movement in the National Life. Monday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

NORMAN B. WARE—Rise of the Modern Labor Movement. Wednesday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

PAUL SINGER—Social and Economic Functions of International Banking. Friday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

WALTER W. STEWART—Current Tendencies in Finance. Monday, 8.20—9.50 P. M. (Twelve lectures)

FREDERICK R. MACAULAY—Principles of Statistical Method. Thursday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

H. W. L. DANA—Literature Since 1918. Friday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

STARK YOUNG—The Theatrical Season, 1926-27. Tuesday, 5.20—6.50 P. M.

WALDO FRANK AND OTHERS—Modern Art. Wednesday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

TERRY RAMSAYE—The Motion Picture. Thursday, 8.20—9.50 P. M. (Twelve lectures)

ARTHUR F. PAYNE — Technique of Vocational Guidance. Friday, 5.20—6.50 P. M.

EVERETT DEAN MARTIN—Fundamental Problems in Adult Education. Wednesday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

EDUARD C. LINDEMAN—Method and Content of Adult Education. Monday, 5.20—6.50 P. M.

HARRY A. OVERSTREET—Practice Course in Adult Education. Tuesday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

LETA S. HOLLINGWORTH—Educational Psychology. Thursday, 5.20—6.50 P. M.

Tuition for course of eighteen lectures, $20; for twelve lectures, $1

Write for Catalogue

465 West Twenty-third Street, New York City

ADULT CAMPS AND VACATION PLACES

Trout Lake Hotel and Camp

Near Lake George)

THIS place of natural beauty and splendor in the heart of the Adirondacks is now under the management of I. B. BAILIN, formerly editor of the Friend and Educational Director of the Workmen's Circle.

An abode for recreation and regeneration. All aquatic activities and sports; tennis-courts, music band, dancing, concerts, readings, camp fires, etc.

Excellent meals—High class American-Jewish cooking. All modern conveniences. Moderate prices. Open until October 1st. Special rates after Labor Day.

Write for Booklet or reservation to

I. B. BAILIN

Director Trout Lake Hotel and Camp

Phone: Bolton Landing 60 F 21 Diamond Point, N. Y.

ECHO LAKE TAVERN

THIRD SEASON

Set among famous scenes of Adirondack beauty

5 miles above Lake George

Equipped with every known facility for comfort and sports. Reservations strictly limited to 125 campers.

Rates: $30 per week.

Modern sanitation in each log cabin.

Round Trip, New York to Lake George, $12.28

Address

TAVERN, WARRENSBURG, N. Y., or

Phone Wisconsin 3754-2164

LENA BARISH MOE NUDELL

INDIAN HEAD CAMP

ON

ECHO LAKE

$28.50 per week

Daily rate $5.00

Adults only

Land and Water Sports. Safe Beach

WATCH FOR THE INDIAN SIGN

WONDER CAMP OF THE ADIRONDACKS

P. O. Box 114, Warrensburg, N. Y.

N. Y. Central to Lake George or Day or Night Boat to Albany and train to Lake George. Indian Head car will await you. Send for booklet. City address: R. Helfant, 885 Brook Avenue, Bronx, N. Y. Tel. Melrose 1821

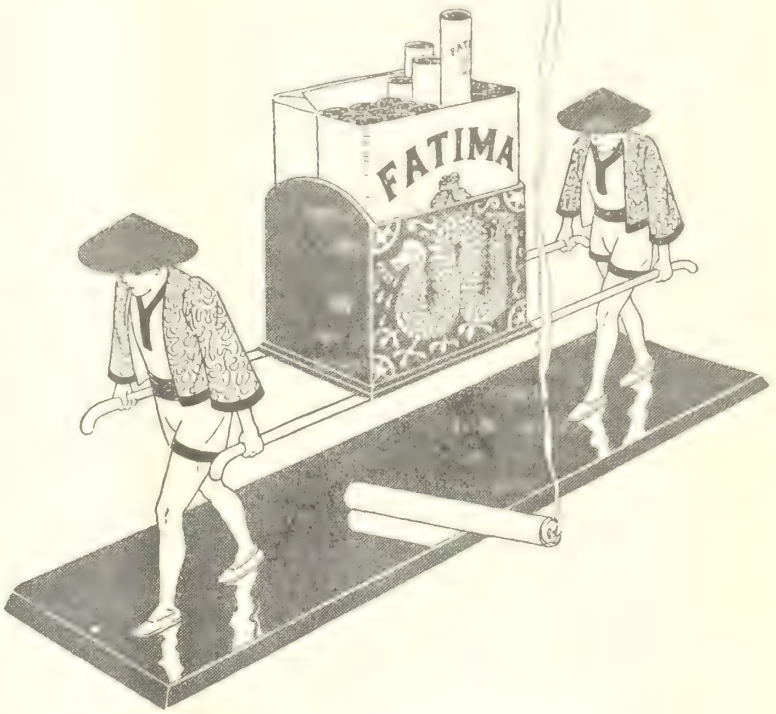
THE LLOYD, Bellport, L. I.

On Great South Bay. Open June 23d

Cool, Comfortable, Charming.

Regular guests and week-end parties.

MEADOW BROOK LODGE



A Summer Camp for Girls

LOCATED in the heart of the Berkshires, will accommodate adults for the Labor Day week-end, following the closing of its summer camp season. Open September 1st to September 15th. Modern comforts and conveniences. Tonic effect of Berkshire air, lake bathing, tennis, hockey, basketball, baseball, volley ball, horseback riding. Rate $6.00 day.

Take N. Y., N. H. & Hartford R.R. to Springfield, Mass. Change at Springfield for Northampton, Mass. Camp bus will meet you at Northampton station by appointment. Camp telephone: Cummington 56.

In three words...

NOT too much Turkish, not too little Turkish; neither over-rich nor commonplace . . . But just enough Turkish . . . there, in three words, is the secret of Fatima's extraordinary delicacy

What a whale of a difference just a few cents make

LIGGETT & MYERS TOBACCO CO.

EDUCATIONAL

ROAD to FREEDOM CAMP

CROTON-ON-HUDSON, N. Y.

A course on Child Education will be conducted by Alexis C. Ferm during the week of August 23 to August 29.

Monday—What does it mean to be educated?
Tuesday—The family and the child.
Wednesday—The child and society.
Thursday—The educator.
Friday—Childhood and play.
Saturday—The Creative spirit.
Sunday—Summary.

All week the lectures will be conducted in the evenings at 8:30 P. M. Saturday and Sunday in the mornings at 10:30 A. M. Camp is within one hour's ride from Grand Central station. Trains run every hour. Stop at Croton-on-Hudson.

Mt. Airy School

A little school in the country where boys and girls from 2 to 12 may learn and grow in a world not only of text-books.

ELIZABETH MOOS MARGARET HATFIELD

CROTON-ON-HUDSON, NEW YORK

HELP WANTED

A HOUSEKEEPER for the Living House of the Modern School, Stelton, N. J. Must be an all-round person and have an educational approach towards children.

A TEACHER and a Kindergartner to conduct their respective groups along the lines of progressive education, at the Modern School, Stelton, New Jersey.

WANTED by the New School for Social Research, a competent typist and bookkeeper. Hours, 1-9 P.M. Salary, $35. 465 West 23rd St., New York City.

YOUNG woman; college graduate; teaching and business experience, wants work immediately. Indulges no preferences. Box 520, c/o The Nation.

ROOM WANTED

GENTLEMAN wants large room with many closets and private bath. Preferably with board within 20 minutes from downtown. No radio or victrola around. Room with fine view and open fireplace preferred. Box 530, care The Nation.

man Reichstag were present and one member of the British Parliament.

An American delegate, Charles O'Connor Hennessy, was the president of the conference, and there were present some 40 Americans, representing 15 States. The conference met in the Danish Parliament building and discussed a program which occupied six days; but ten additional days were spent visiting various cities and country places in Denmark in order to study the schools, the small farms, and the cooperative enterprises.

The people of Denmark do most of the banking of the country and put into their own pockets the excellent profits thereof just as they put into their pockets, through their cooperative enterprises, the profits which otherwise would go to grain speculators and middlemen.

Progressive legislation, resulting in the breaking up of old feudal landed estates, the creation of many small farms, and the adoption of a wise system for the taxation of land values, has been brought about by a fusion of farmers and labor votes in Parliament. Social Democrats have their principal support among the trade unions, while the Liberals are strong among the farmers, but they have usually voted together for reform measures. More than 90 per cent of Danish farmers now own the farms they occupy, and this percentage is growing; in America about 50 per cent of the farmers are tenants, and this percentage is growing. Although nearly one-third of Denmark's revenues comes from the tariff, present duties average less than 5 per cent, and this average has been falling. Most of the articles in demand by people of moderate incomes enter the country free.

The conference sent a message to the League of Nations asking it to recognize in protective tariffs and the private exploitation of natural resources the principal cause of war.

Contributors to This Issue

HENDRIK W. VAN LOON'S most recent book is "Tolerance."

SUSAN GLASPELL is attached to the staff of The Outlook. An article by Mr. Glaspell on another aspect of the problem established in Mr. Glaspell's Grandfathers and I appears in the current Harper's.

GEORGE W. NORRIS, United States Senator from Nebraska, is chairman of the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

JULIA JOHNSON DAVIS is a poet living in Virginia whose verse has been included in Braithwaite's Anthologies for a number of years.

HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY is professor of economics at Wellesley College.

FREDERICK BAUSMAN, a former judge now living in Seattle, is the author of "Let France Explain."

KEITH HUTCHISON is a young Englishman at present connected with the London office of the New York Herald Tribune.

MELVILLE J. HERSKOVITS is a lecturer in anthropology at Columbia University.

LISLE BELL is a New York journalist at present in France.

CHESTER C. PLATT is a Wisconsin journalist.

ELLEN W. LA MOTTE is the author of "Peking Dust," "The Opium Monopoly," "The Ethics of Opium," and other books.

DUTTON'S AUGUST BOOKS

SEVENTY YEARS A SHOWMAN
"Lord" GEORGE SANGER tells of his life as "Europe's Barnum" with all the zest of a born showman. $2.00

WEALTH, VIRTUAL WEALTH AND DEBT
FREDERICK SODDY, famous chemist, analyzes our concept of money with the exact reasoning of the scientist. $3.50

BIRTH CONTROL AND THE STATE
By C. P. BLACKER (Today and Tomorrow Series). Reviews arguments for and against and urges sane handling or the subject by both church and state. $1.00

E. P. DUTTON & CO., 681 Fifth Ave., N.Y.

BOOKS AND BOOKSELLERS

Just received from Germany
GEIST und GESICHT des BOLSCHEWISMUS
by Rene Fulop-Miller (In German)
Critical survey of cultural life in Soviet Russia, with 500 illustrations. $9.25 postpaid.
W. HEFFER, Inc., 256 Fifth Avenue, New York City

The TRUTH SEEKER
National Freethought Weekly. Est. 1873. G. E. Macdonald, Editor.
Dept. 24. Sample free. Read Voltaire, Paine, Ingersoll. Catalog free.
TRUTH SEEKER CO., 49 Vesey Street, New York

The Lost Manuscript of Marx and Engels translated for the first time in English in
THE MARXIST (Third Number)
German Ideology
(The Materialist Conception of History) by Karl Marx and Frederick Engels.
Two articles analyzing and criticizing this subject, by Harry Waton.
Obtained from Workers' Education Institute, P. O. Box 24, Station E, Brooklyn, N. Y. and at Radical Book Stores. Price 50 cents.

MISCELLANEOUS

ONE Dollar (in stamps) sent to The Harry Dearborn Treasure Unorthodox, Free, Constructive Thoughts. Harry Dearborn, Box 81, Cashmere, Wash.

AMERICAN TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH COMPANY
AND ASSOCIATED COMPANIES
BELL SYSTEM
One Policy, One System, Universal Service

A MOSCOW DIARY A graphic human-interest story of the life of the people in Soviet Russia today, by Anna Porter. Cloth, $1.00 postpaid. Ask for book catalog.
CHARLES H. KERR & CO. 347 East Ohio Street, Chicago

REAL HARRIS HOMESPUNS Direct from the Makers at Manufacturer's Price
Suit Lengths Cut to Order. Price $2.00 per Yard. Postage Paid
C. WALL, The Stornoway, Scotland. Write for patterns stating shades desired

accept nothing but
Non Depressant nor Habit Forming
In Convenient Aluminum Boxes
At every drug store
Midol for HEADACHE
GENERAL DRUG CO., - 94 N. Moore Street, New York

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXIII NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 8, 1926 No. 3192

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS
EDITORIALS:
Valentine and Yellow Journalism
Professor Ripley Picks the Lot
If Gandhi Were Emperor
The Importance of Being a Foreigner
CARTOON. By Rollin Kirby
AMERICA'S JOB IN CHINA. By Frank I. Cobb
"BYNG OR KING": THE ISSUE IN THE CANADIAN ELECTION. By Richard De Bedts
CONFESSIONS OF A MOVIE READER. By Ruth Suckow
THE KEY TO EUROPEAN PEACE. By Paul Scheffer
ROBERT GRAVES. By Edwin Muir
THE AGRICULTURAL RECOVERY. By Edward G. Janes
WHO'S WHO IN WISCONSIN. By Ernest Gruening
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Dolphin
CORRESPONDENCE
BOOKS AND ART:
Words for a Young Woman Who Wished to Be a Famous Poet. By Louis Untermeyer
First Glance. By Mark Van Doren
Two Stages of Historical Science. By Harry Elmer Barnes
The Time of Woman. By Dorothy Dudley
Whither Mr. Boobe? By Louis S. Gerstein
Sway Song! By Clifton P. Fadiman
Inside Looking Out. By Sylvia Kopald
Auld Lang Syne. By Alexander Goldenweiser
Books in Brief
Arts Words of Cheer for Women. By Lt.-Col. J. Dennis
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
South Tyrol Again. By L. O. N.
Abyssinia Appeals to the League

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors
LEWIS S. GANNETT
ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor
FREDA KIRCHWEY LILIAN TROY
HARRY HANSEN

Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States, Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: No. 38 South Dearborn Street. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London W. C. 1, England.

WE ARE IN DEEP in Nicaragua. The policy of attempting to regulate the internal affairs of little Latin American republics has led us from one misstep to another. If it were not tragic the situation would be comic. The latest scene is the landing of several hundred United States Marines to prevent the revolution which the United States Minister to Nicaragua had invited. How deep we shall sink into the bog of Nicaraguan politics remains to be discovered. We landed troops in 1912, and did not get them out until 1925. Then we withdrew, following the election of Carlos Solorzano as President. Solorzano was shortly deposed by General Emiliano Chamorro, veteran of a dozen revolutions. We refused to recognize Chamorro, although he obviously controlled the country. Our Minister invited the chiefs of the political parties to the Legation and told them that, while opposed to violent measures, the United States could not and would not recognize Chamorro, and earnestly hoped for the restoration of the constitutionally elected Solorzano. Solorzano's friends took the hint; they started a revolution. It threatened to succeed. Thereupon the hoary old story of "protection of foreign life and property" appeared on the stage. We rushed warships to both coasts. When the revolutionaries were about to take Bluefields, the government commander appealed to the Marines to save the foreign property. They saved it—and saved Bluefields for the Government too. Meanwhile, two American army aviators who have been engaged in training Nicaraguans to drop bombs flew over the sea hunting and bombing the revolutionaries' supply ships.

IN SHORT, THE UNITED STATES is fighting a Central American war. In the 1912 campaign the Marines—under the redolent Smedley Butler—killed 3,000 Nicaraguans. They may get out of the scrape more lightly this time, but it is plain that Washington's meddling endeavors to produce a nice, constitutional government in Nicaragua have produced not constitutionality but more warfare. On the other hand, we may get in even deeper than we did in 1912. We refused to recognize Chamorro on the ground that he came into power in violation of the Central American treaty of 1923. But it is reported that the latest Nicaraguan revolution was organized in Guatemala, which would be another violation of the Central American treaty of 1923. That treaty forbids each Central American country to allow its territory to be used as a base for military operations in any other Central American country. If it was our duty to enforce the 1923 treaty by encouraging revolution in Nicaragua, is it not our duty to enforce the same treaty against Guatemala? This business of serving as a tutorial maiden aunt to all the naughty little boys of the western hemisphere has its drawbacks.

CARMI THOMPSON behaved like an American gentleman when faced with the possibility of trouble in Zamboanga, Mindanao, where Moros and Christian Filipinos meet on almost equal terms. While the local commandant, Major Allen Fletcher, leaped fences in his eagerness to get the President's representative away from the pro-independence Filipinos, Mr. Thompson listened patiently to everybody, belittling the "misunderstanding" which led the Filipino crowd to break the agreement and flood down to greet him on the pier. He heard without comment the clear charge that American army officers had engineered the anti-independence demonstration, feeding and housing the demonstrators in the army barracks, then moved over and listened to the other side. Apparently the chief incident was the hot excitement of an American major who made trouble by his own nervousness. The Moros and the Filipinos get along together well enough when Americans let them alone. It does not help to predict, as Leonard Wood did, that they will be enemies forever because they have sometimes been enemies in the past. Governor Wood was at Zamboanga looking for trouble two days before the "incident"; he returned immediately afterward; and instead of calming excited passions he delivered a public curtain lecture to the Filipino patrios in a fashion which could successfully do anything but aggravate racial and religious prejudice. If there is any less worthy occupation for a governor-general we do not know what it is.

SIX MEXICAN REVOLUTIONISTS, headed by General Jose M. Rangel, spent thirteen years in a Texas prison because one Mexican serving as an American deputy sheriff was killed in 1913 when the Mexicans sought to cross the Rio Grande. They have just been pardoned by Governor Miriam Ferguson after years of vain petitions for their release by President Obregon, President Calles, Samuel Gompers, and William Green. The case against these Mexicans was doubtful: there was no direct evidence to prove who killed the deputy sheriff. The prisoners deserved a one-year sentence for violating American neutrality laws, but only the intense anti-Mexican feeling of 1913 could have produced a conviction for murder against all of them. In releasing them Governor Ferguson said that "in all frankness it must be said and admitted they did nothing and were doing nothing more than the immortal Travis, Bowie, Crockett, and their brave companions were doing at the time they were captured and massacred at the Alamo." Their long imprisonment was a case of Yankee tyranny; their release does "Ma" Ferguson honor on the eve of her disappearance from public life, crushed by "Dan" Moody in the second Texas primary.

NEW JERSEY has evolved a new technique of expression for its prejudice against its Negro citizens. Isaiah Hopkins, a Negro contractor, bought a plot of ground in the residential section of the town of Kearney and began excavating in preparation for the building of a Negro colony. At once numbers of white residents gathered at the spot and jeered the laborers so effectively that work was suspended. The townspeople next threatened to quit the town unless Hopkins was forced by the municipal authorities to resell his lots to citizens of an acceptable color. Unfortunately the world will be deprived of the chance to witness a second Exodus, for the Town Council is firmly attached to its fellow-whites and has promised to convert the ground into a playground if Hopkins carries the case to court.

THE ORGANIZED CAP-MAKERS of New York City won a notable victory in their general strike when the manufacturers signed a three-year agreement for a minimum wage of $44 a week for operators and cutters, $30 a week for less skilled workers, an unemployment insurance fund to be created by the employer and administered by the union, and the 40-hour week after July 1, 1927. That looks toward health and constitutionalism in industry. The ladies' garment workers of New York are not so fortunate. Thirty thousand of them are still on strike after rejecting Governor Smith's offer of immediate arbitration. The garment workers refuse immediate arbitration with the large manufacturers because the jobbers who control 75 per cent of the production would not be subject to an arbitration award. As the fall season nears its height both sides need peace badly. But there will be no permanent peace until the chaos of irresponsible, small-scale producers is replaced by a responsible, inclusive employers' body capable of maintaining minimum labor standards.

ONE HUNDRED AND NINETY-THREE BILLION locusts settled down for a summer vacation last June in the Crimea and proceeded to eat everything in sight. The Soviet Government, not believing in biblical methods of meeting a plague of locusts, sent a few airplanes with poison gas. The locusts were killed. We call this incident to the attention of James F. Norris, president of the American Chemical Society who made a speech at Williamstown about [illegible]. Dr. Norris declared his belief that [illegible] not knowledge has been the driving force behind the attack upon chemical warfare by women's clubs and other organizations. Is it sentiment? Can a human being live through a barrage of gas that kills 4,000 locusts per square yard? The people of New York would have no more chance of survival under a strong poison-gas attack from the air in the next war than the Russian locusts. More dangerous types of poison gas are being perfected each year; gas-masks are entirely useless against the new varieties of gas. No adequate defense against an air attack with gas and bombs upon a city has ever been devised. It is simply a question of which will be eliminated, war or the human race.

KRISHNAMURTI, YOUNG HINDU MYSTIC, may or may not be a "Vehicle of the World Teacher." We know no way of divining the presence of deity in the person of a pleasant and cultivated young man, and we tend to be skeptical about claims to supernatural relationships. But we refuse to admit that those claims are weakened by the modern tastes and the conventional appearance of the "vehicle" in question. Krishnamurti wears attractive clothes; he enjoys swimming, tennis, and golf; he speaks several languages and delights in Shaw and Anatole France; he holds Shelley's work as sacred as the Bible. None of these proclivities disturbs us. Far from doubting the quality of this young man's mysticism, we respect it far more than if it came dressed in white robes and sandals and flowers of speech. Jesus dressed in the manner of his day and country. Krishnamurti is a modest, well-educated, quietly dressed modern. Mystic power may cheerfully inhabit a body that can swing a racket and a mind that can appreciate Voltaire. Even interviews and lecture platforms and trips on the Twentieth Century Limited should be compatible with modern saintliness. The modest utterances of the young teacher are often apt and well-directed and in the vein of our better-educated Christian ministers. If the Vehicle of the World Teacher is to operate in the United States he must not be asked to use the methods of ancient Galilee.

A MERE WEEKLY MAGAZINE cannot hope to keep up with the procession of Channel swimmers. We had no sooner finished welcoming Gertrude Ederle to down-town New York than Mille Gade (Mrs. Clemington Corson) plowed across from the French coast to Dover in 15 hours and 38 minutes, and disclosed to the world that she was not merely an American and a woman but a mother as well. She was, perhaps, unnecessarily insistent upon her maternity and her determination to win riches and honor for her two children, but the gallantry of her performance was not dimmed by her talk. And the talk had not yet subsided when a German, Ernst Vierkoetter, propelled himself across [illegible] set a new record, beating Gertrude's time by 1 hour and 49 minutes. The business has now arrived at the point of accusations and challenges and races and contracts. Already an international contest at Catalina Island has been arranged, and a race around Manhattan has been proposed by Mille Gade's managers. Huge purses are rumored or discussed; fat sums are mentioned for exhibitions. The hazardous adventure of a few courageous and sturdy persons is suddenly, by the magic of commercialism, transmuted into a competition for prizes and publicity. This is inevitable; but it should not be allowed entirely to [illegible] victory of man—and woman—over a peculiarly [illegible] bit of nature.

Valentino and Yellow Journalism

PUBLIC sobbing, onion-produced tears, and peach-colored extras made the illness and death of Rudolph Valentino a startling and hideous orgy of sentimentalism. Lines of the curious eleven blocks long waited in the rain to see his body; women screamed and fought for a glimpse of him. Was this demonstration a revelation of "the American mind" or was it a phenomenon of publicity produced by the press?

While Valentino was dying the newspapers made him into a colossus by the simple device of featuring everything about him; his breathing, his temperature, his ex-wives, and his bracelet. They could probably create a similar interest in any tolerably famous person whom they sought to exploit. They have done it at various times with Dempsey, Helen Wills, Harry Thaw, Gerald Chapman, and Calvin Coolidge. Only last month the papers of Los Angeles performed a similar feat with Aimee Semple McPherson. The mob likes familiarity. But having once worked up public interest to a hysterical pitch the yellowest of the New York papers felt a moral (financial) obligation to keep it up. New editions must be produced, new developments must be discovered to sell the extras. That was evidently the policy of the New York Evening Graphic.

On August 18, when Valentino was critically ill but apparently in no immediate danger, the Graphic flashed a two and one-half inch headline: "Rudy Dead". Then in small letters on the side: Cry Startles Film World as Sheik Rallies. Valentino was steadily improving when the edition went to press and probably the editors knew it. But people bought the paper by thousands and rumors based on the head-line flooded the hospital with thirty-two telephone calls a minute. Mobs collected outside the hospital. Two days later when public excitement lagged the Graphic sprang its second fake. The whole Valentino scare was a publicity stunt, the public was informed. The headline read: Pan Rudy's Fight as Publicity. The story declared that Valentino's recent film, "The Son of the Sheik," needed publicity, so his illness which was a trivial one had been exaggerated for the sake of advertising. The Graphic even declared that Valentino had hired a large hospital room on the first floor for $300 a week as a publicity bureau; the indignant denials of the hospital authorities were ignored.

After Valentino's death the Graphic published an edition which devoted eight complete pages to the star, crowding out nearly all news of international importance except the diary of "Peaches" Browning, which blazoned the legend across the top of a page: I'm Sitting on Top of the World; Peaches Writes of Her Love-Life. The same reporter who had produced the fake advertising story now followed a new tack. Across the top of Page 1 screamed: Foul Play Hint in Death of Rudy. Within, the reader was greeted by a streamer: "Jealous Woman May Have Poisoned Shiek in Revenge." The story began:

> Persistent reports along Broadway the past week, hinting darkly that the death yesterday of Rudolph Valentino might be attributed to causes not disclosed in official bulletins by his physicians, may result today in a complete investigation of the film actor's last visit here.
>
> Soon after Valentino had been rushed from an all-night revel at the cabarets to an operating table in the Polyclinic Hospital these three stories began circulation:
>
> 1. Rudolph Valentino had been poisoned by a jealous woman.
> 2. The Sheik had been injured in a fight with a man who had resented Rudy's attentions to a woman.
> 3. Valentino had been shot in a quarrel during a gay party.
>
> Told of the nasty reports that had followed Valentino's sudden appearance at Polyclinic a week ago Sunday, Assistant District Attorney Ferdinand M. Pecora declared last night that when the matter is brought to him officially he will begin an investigation to refute or prove the stories. [Picture of Mr. Pecora.]
>
> At the same time Dr. William B. Rawles, assistant house physician at Polyclinic, denied that Valentino's condition has shown signs of poisoning or foul play. Nevertheless, in Broadway's night clubs and cabarets this morning credence was given this general belief by the bright light habitues:
>
> "Poor Rudy—the kid was knocked off. Yuh can't tell me he died from those things the doctors said—the whole thing looks fishy to me."

Not content with the blazoning of this baseless rumor the Graphic flung across an inside page another headline: Spirit Declares Sheik Poisoned. The editors could not locate any responsible human being to act as vehicle for their story, so they appealed to heaven. They chose an Italian spiritualist medium. The story read:

> Psychic confirmation of the report that Rudolph Valentino was poisoned at the party which he attended before being taken to the Polyclinic Hospital for operation was obtained last night from the medium Nicola Peccharara during a seance at 800 West End Avenue.
>
> The seance was under the auspices of the Unbiased Commission for the Investigation of Psychic Phenomena, sponsored by Ghost Stories Magazine, which is offering $10,000 in prizes for actual materializations from the spirit world. . . .
>
> "What was the cause of his death?" the spirit was asked.
>
> "Strong medicine."
>
> "When was it given to him?"
>
> The reply was muffled and confused.
>
> "What was the medicine?"
>
> There was a ghastly shriek and a long drawn out cry. The voice then continued:
>
> "But that was not the primary cause. Valentino was poisoned at the party he attended before taken to the hospital for his operation. The doctors there did their best, but they could not work against the poison which he had taken before. Valentino's spirit is in the room now."

It seems that the seance was a very successful one; in fact the spirits rattled tambourines, moved tables, and said just what the Graphic wanted them to say. Strangely enough, however, there is no announcement that Mr. Peccharara won the $10,000 offered by Ghost Stories Magazine. Ghost Stories Magazine and the New York Evening Graphic are both Macfadden publications.

In the long run such journalism must be its own reward. A censorship which could destroy Bernarr Macfadden would be more likely to destroy many a brave pioneer of social idealism. We must trust to a growing intelligence in the reading public to demand more accurate, honest news.

Professor Ripley Pokes the Pig

ALL too commonly the investor in an American industrial corporation buys a pig in a poke. He should be grateful to William Z. Ripley, professor of economics at Harvard University, for at least poking the pig. Incorporation covers a multitude of sins. And it is a method whereby the control of industry has fallen more and more into a few hands although investment in it is becoming increasingly scattered. A generation ago people with small savings to invest put them into real estate or real-estate mortgages and occasionally into government or railroad bonds. But the rapid evolution of the United States as a manufacturing nation has opened vast fields for new capital in industrial enterprises, while the incorporation of such business and the raising of capital through the sale of stock has made it possible for people even of humble means to have a small stake in this great fabric with its unrivalled [illegible] can have at least one share of oil, steel, public-utility, or department-store stock.

Our financiers boast of the wide distribution of stock ownership in America; they point to it as a proof of the democracy of Big Business. But although a minority stockholder is theoretically an owner he usually has no practical control and not even any adequate information about the business that is supposedly part his. Wall Street, which makes its living in buying and selling securities (ironic word in so many cases), is oblivious. Wall Street is hard-fisted and hard-boiled when it comes to either the losses or the profits of an investor. But it is not oblivious to anything which affects the value of or the market for the wares which it handles. Thus when, not long ago, Professor Ripley assailed the growing tendency on the part of industrial corporations to issue non-voting shares, it had an immediate repercussion in Wall Street, the New York Stock Exchange barring from its list several proposed issues of that sort.

We look for a similarly beneficial—and probably more important—result from Professor Ripley's article in the September issue of the Atlantic Monthly, in which he criticizes unsparingly the meager, meaningless, and misleading information which most industrial corporations in this country supply to their stockholders and theoretical owners. Professor Ripley does not write in general terms either; he names names and cites instance after instance of the way in which large corporations have defrauded the many and enriched the few by concealing their true financial condition [illegible] pooh the strictures of Professor Ripley. He is not only an educator of conservative and high standing but has served as an economic expert to the United States Industrial Commission, the War Department, the Shipping Board, the Interstate Commerce Commission, and private companies.

Professor Ripley calls for better accounting and the publication of adequate balance sheets and income accounts on the part of our industrial corporations. He thinks their finances should be revealed as fully as are those of railroads and national banks under the regulations of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Federal Reserve Board respectively. He emphasizes the fact that incorporation is a privilege, carrying with it obligations:

> The people grant to a private body the ineffable enjoyment of immortality, of succession, of impersonality, and, the greatest boon of all, of limited liability. Under partnerships or other purely private forms of organization, where trading is carried on without limitation upon the personal liability of those who engage therein, certain obvious safeguards for creditors and the public arise from the purely personal attributes of the concern. The grant, by public act, of limitation upon this personal liability for debts or other obligations abrogates many of these formerly existant safeguards, which must of course be offset by new provisions at law. But in any event the release from these personal obligations affords so great an advantage, and is accompanied by such novel risks, as to make it clear that it is indeed a privilege, conferred out of hand by gift of the people. In other countries where these valuable grants proceed from a single source, and that, too, a supreme one—to wit, the central government—this privilege is more likely to be taken at its face value. But in the United States such public gifts are scattered with a lavish hand by forty-eight different little sovereignties more or less jealous of one another both financially and prestige-iously.

Professor Ripley thinks that little can be accomplished through State legislation toward remedying the conditions which he criticizes. "Blue-sky" laws have been useful in suppressing palpable frauds, but that is the most that can be expected. Professor Ripley gives the New York Stock Exchange credit for having done a great deal already toward protecting investors, and he thinks it can, if it wishes, accomplish much in the way of obtaining better information from the companies whose securities are listed on its board, although not too much can be expected of any company whose competitors do not conform to the same usage. He notes, also, that the securities of a large number of important enterprises are not listed on the New York Stock Exchange but are sold on the Curb, in the exchanges of other cities, or simply over the counter, as brokers say. He believes that ample power and machinery for obtaining better financial information from industrial corporations already exists in the Federal Trade Commission, citing convincingly the law establishing that body. While certain phases of the law are now in litigation, he thinks a vigorous assertion by the President of an intention to press for corporate publicity through the Federal Trade Commission would carry the day.

We agree with Professor Ripley in his criticisms and in his suggestions for betterment, but we think any initiative at this time must come from Congress; it will not emanate from Mr. Coolidge nor from the Federal Trade Commission which, as emasculated by the President, has been trying to restrict publicity as much as possible in the work of the board. Messrs. Thompson and Nugent, the two remaining liberal members of the commission, are quoted by the newspapers as in sympathy with Professor Ripley's proposals, but a majority of the membership is said to be in opposition. It would be. Timid business men and "me too" journalists are arguing that the publicity which Professor Ripley advocates would reveal valuable trade secrets to competitors and injure the companies making the reports. This is antediluvian rubbish. Any company that would be injured by such an X-ray of its financial past and present [illegible]

If Gandhi Were Emperor

THE phrase "If I were King" has served more than one idealist as the key to a door of escape from the gloomy present into a future of his own. A British journalist writing on India opened that door for Mahatma Gandhi with a challenge. "If he [Gandhi] were Emperor of India invested with full plenary powers," this writer ventured, "the regulations that he would make for the admission of Europeans and their settlement in [illegible] would differ from those which the South Africans are attempting to impose on Indians in South Africa today."

The challenge is readily answered. The South African Color Bar Bill is the restriction imposed by a powerful majority on a minority which has neither defense nor escape. Gandhi's ideals of Swaraj and Swadeshi represent the desire of a majority deprived of power to be free of the control of a minority, free to govern itself and grow to its natural height. If this majority suddenly were given power, the means it would use toward its end might take a form similar to the South African bill. But its [illegible], its motives, even its effect on the restricted class would remove it from all suspicion of consanguinity with the Color Bar legislation.

What he would do, if he were Emperor, is a subject on which the Mahatma is clear. He says:

> If I were Emperor of India I would extend the hand of fellowship to the whole of the world irrespective of caste, color, or creed, for I claim the whole of mankind to be the children of one God. I would disband the whole of the army of occupation, retaining only such police as may be necessary for the protection of her citizens against thieves and robbers. I would not bribe the frontier tribes as they are being bribed today, but I would cultivate the friendliest relations with them in order to find out the ways or means of providing useful occupation for them. I would guarantee the fullest protection for every European living in India and all honest European enterprises. I would impose a prohibitive tariff on all foreign cloth so as to exclude it entirely from India and bring Khaddar under State control so as to enable every villager who chooses to spin to feel that the products of his or her spinning-wheel would be taken up. I would prohibit the importation of intoxicating liquors and close down every distillery, confining the manufacture of alcohol and opium for proved medical necessity. I would guarantee full protection to all forms of religious worship, save what is repugnant to the moral sense of mankind. I would throw open to the so-called untouchables every public temple and public school to which all other Hindus have right of admission. I would summon the representatives of both the Hindus and Mussulmans, search their pockets and deprive them of all eatables and of all lethal weapons, if they have any, and lock them together in one room and open it only after they have settled their quarrels.

Whatever else may be said against it, benevolent despotism is indubitably the shortest and quickest route to a given point. The Mahatma goes as the crow flies to the realization of ideals which [illegible] dilatory settlement by the man-built road. His remedy for the Indian communalism which cleaves so threatening a chasm between Hindu and Moslem is delightful in its directness. Yet, although we speak only from Occidental experience, we would suggest that quarrels are more likely to be settled when the disputants are well-fed than when they are starving—provided they have not got indigestion.

The Importance of Being a Socialist

BERNARD SHAW, upon the occasion of the [illegible] birthday dinner recently given him by the Labor members of the House of Commons, made what for him was a modest gesture when he attributed his achievement as a man and as a writer to the fact that in his youth, casting about for something to do and be, he had become a socialist. "Socialism," he insisted, "made a man of me", and he implied that whatever value his plays possess derives from the faith which through all of them he has so valiantly kept. This, with all respect to Mr. Shaw as man and writer, is surely nonsense.

Think of the faithful socialists—faithful to the end—who have not been brilliant, or convincing, or moving, or valiant, or gloriously wrong. And think of the writers in this day—they are few, it must be confessed—who have been some of these things without the aid of socialism. With all respect to socialism, we must suppose that its importance in the case under dispute was to Mr. Shaw alone; and even this may be questioned. For the essential thing was that Mr. Shaw should find some ground upon which he could stand and continue to stand. Some other ground might have done as well as the one he chose—Nietzscheanism, for instance, or theosophy. Or, granting that the very fibers of his being called out to him to join the Fabians and make street speeches in the East End, granting that there was no other ground suitable to his peculiar genius, there is still the little matter of that genius, which, we are inclined to think, came into existence in 1856.

Given genius, it is of course necessary that a man who wishes to write well or do anything else well shall fall into a consistent way of looking at the world. To see life at all, correctly or no, he must see it from somewhere; and the biographies of great artists are the stories—or could be—of efforts made to arrive at points of view. No major work of its generation is without this point of view; and the chances are that works claiming to be major will rank in the order of their comprehensiveness. The greatest of them will be that in which the author has seen the most things with his single pair of eyes, has brought the largest number of apparently separate phenomena into one circle of vision. There is no proof, unfortunately, that this author must be he who stands closest to the truth. We might like to think so; we might like to believe that Mr. Shaw is great as an artist because he has seen things as they are. But there is Mr. Hardy, a contemporary, who has seen things far otherwise—and, for the purposes of art, as fruitfully. And there was Shakespeare, whom Mr. Shaw affectionately abuses because he beheld the world as a stage upon which people are moved inexplicably to joys and rages; there was Shakespeare, who had no trouble finding things to write about significantly. Remoter still, there was Homer, who filled a capacious scene with careless heroes and filled it very well. And then, too, there were Milton and Wordsworth, seeing the universe finally as something personal to themselves—not at all something which needed correction by legislation. To [illegible] well in other matters.

No, we prefer to think that there was a man in Mr. Shaw before he went to London and read Karl Marx. Without this experience a very good and useful man might have been wasted. The important thing is that he was there.

The Movie Finger writes; and having writ,
Moves on; and all our Piety nor Wit
Shall lure it back to cancel half a Line,
Nor all our Tears wash out a word of it.

America's Job in China

By LEWIS S. GANNETT

SOME Americans think of our role in China as that of a guardian angel, pointing the way to true democracy and assisting China to struggle along it despite her wicked enemies. The Chinese do not see things that way. They have had a little sentimentality about America, but they are beginning to think of us as just one of the rest.

We kept the "open door" in China twenty years ago—but the open door is not so beatific a vision to Chinese as to us. America wanted it because it prevented other nations from staking out reserved areas into which our trade would not be able to grow. We were for it because it was in the interest of our commerce. It helped China at that time, but it is associated in Chinese minds with the indefensible treaties, to which we are a party, which keep her from shutting the door, even partially, in the face of all parties. She would like to raise her customs duties, as the United States and other nations have done, and protect her home markets, as we do; and we, among others, refuse to allow her to do so. Very recently the Customs Conference, which was to realize the good things promised at Washington in 1921, dissolved without action, ostensibly because China was in such chaos. Of that, more anon.

We "remitted" part of the Boxer Indemnity in 1908 and more in 1924. It was a good piece of diplomacy. The money has been carefully spent under American auspices in giving Chinese students an American type of education, and the American-educated "returned students" have vastly increased American influence in China. But the cynical young Chinese patriots of today say that the indemnity was an outrage in the first place and that if it was to be remitted it should have been returned to the Chinese Government without condition, to be spent exclusively at its direction.

We have given largely to missionary enterprise—which, again, the young Chinese regard as an effort to de-Chinafy China.

And we maintain a "Legation Guard" of 450 men in Peking, another guard of 1,000 men along the Tientsin-Shanhaikwan Railway, a fleet of river gunboats which run a thousand miles up the Yangtze and six hundred miles into Canton and Kwangsi provinces; we share through our consul in the administration of the foreign city of Shanghai, the chairman of whose Municipal Council is an American lawyer from the State of Maine; our consulates in Tientsin, Shanghai, and Canton are in foreign-ruled quarters, under the protection of foreign flags; we cling to exterritoriality (or "extrality"), which gives Americans in China rights which Chinese do not have; and we are allied with the Powers in maintaining foreign control of China's customs.

At the Washington Conference, in 1921, the world was assured, great things were done for China. A careful reading of the treaties and resolutions shows rather that they were, so to speak, adumbrated. A foreign commission was planned to "inquire" into the state of justice in China, "with a view to reporting" conditions to the foreign governments and suggesting to China legislation and reforms which might eventually warrant the Powers in taking steps toward relinquishing extrality. Which really did not mean much. A customs conference was to discuss—not customs autonomy but a 2½ per cent increase in the customs rates. At Washington also Japan promised to return Shantung and Britain to return Wei-hai-wei, and it should be noted to the honor of the Japanese that theirs was the only pledge which has been fulfilled. The British are still haggling, I understand, about the privileges which their officers may continue to enjoy at the golf course in which they have invested so much time and money, and they refuse to give up Wei-hai-wei until the golf question is settled. The customs treaty was not even ratified until, three and a half years after its signature, the outbreak of nationalism in China stirred the Powers into a semblance of action; and the customs conference broke up as soon as the nationalist movement seemed to sink out of sight behind the civil war.

Customs and extrality conferences dragged a weary life through last winter in Peking. The American delegates were pledged to the principle of cooperation with the other Powers; the official theory was that America was ready to give almost anything to China if the other Powers would agree; but that independent action by the American Government would somehow be most unfortunate—a theory which condemns us to sterility. The extrality commission met solemnly, studied the new Chinese law codes (which may be applied occasionally in model courts) and found them excellent; visited a few recently white-washed prisons, and enjoyed the pleasant cosmopolitan social life of the Legation Quarter. It intended to tour China in the spring time. Unfortunately civil war cut it off from Shansi, and Canton's proud Government told it to stay away. So it left extrality where it found it—which is what it was intended to do.

At the customs conference the Powers rather ludicrously revealed the nature of their interest in China. The conference began with an ambiguously worded declaration in favor of tariff autonomy three years later—a declaration which, however, requires confirmation in a treaty which has not yet been drawn up, much less ratified—and which some of the signatory parties hold is conditional upon simultaneous abolition of internal customs duties, or likin, by the Chinese. If it is really conditional, it is meaningless, for the local militarists are not likely to give up likin. The Powers next discussed immediate steps to increase the Chinese customs receipts. A program was worked out to increase the duties sufficiently to develop $90,000,000 of new revenues; but when the proposed increase was analyzed the surprised Chinese discovered that it meant nothing to them. Thirty-seven millions were to go to the provinces to compensate for likin and assure its abolition; 30 millions were to be applied to pay interest on the consolidated debt—in part on the infamous Nishihara loans which Japan forced on China in 1918; 10 millions were to pay interest on the Hukuang and Tsinpu railway bonds, already in default (it will be recalled that Morgan interests bought up the German rights in the Hukuang railway); while the remaining 13 millions were at first destined for a Chinese government, the Powers began to feel doubtful of the wisdom of giving it to any government in China's state of chaos and decided it might be wiser to convert it into a contingent fund, to pay interest on the other railway bonds which were sure soon to go into default! The conference finally adjourned, however, without taking even this action, leaving China stuck with her old ridiculously low customs rate. The Powers had exposed their self-interest. The British and Americans, desiring to open large-scale trade with the interior, were most concerned with the abolition of likin, and also with provision for interest payments on the railway bonds in which their nationals had invested; the Japanese wanted interest paid on the government debts, but without raising the customs duties, which would interfere with the market for their cheap goods in China; the Italians, Dutch, and Belgians, having no trade, but heavy investments, were willing to have the customs raised to the sky limit if only interest was provided for their railway bonds. It was a sorry spectacle.

The amiable policy of giving an air of intense activity whenever the Chinese [illegible] and of offering to do something on condition that the Chinese do something else is wearing out. The Chinese do not accept the quid-pro-quo theory; they want to be free, even to misgovern themselves, and the nationalistic philosophy of the West [illegible] like a whirlwind [illegible] their [illegible] Government, however strong its military or financial support, can [illegible] keep against it. The present Government, Japanese and British-backed, is making [illegible] demands today as the Russian-aided Feng Yu-hsiang [illegible] year; and its successor will be even more radical. China will not have Western standards of justice for [illegible] but more and more she will develop a [illegible] that it is unfair for foreigners to have more privileges than Chinese in China. Already extraterritoriality is fading out in the provinces; only along the rivers and the coasts, within range of Treaty warships, is it in force. It is silly to spend time and money investigating the [illegible] of Chinese justice as if the foreigners were moral arbiters of China. Whatever conditions may be, foreigners will have to suffer them—like the Chinese. "If you don't like this country as it is, you can go back where you came from"—that 100-per-cent American slogan is being naturalized in Asia. The only question is whether the Powers will give up their special privileges voluntarily and gracefully or wait for the exasperated Chinese to snatch them.

The present situation is absurd—the customs rates are determined by foreigners, collected by foreigners, and used by foreigners to pay interest on bad foreign investments. No [illegible] awake people would tolerate it, and anti-foreign demonstrations in a thousand cities last summer proved that the Chinese people, led by the boy and girl students, is [illegible] awake. Even the idealistic younger generation [illegible] the new national power has passed to a shrewd older generation. Already the full revenues, now used to pay the foreign interest, have been seized by local militarists [illegible] at Tientsin, under the noses of the foreign gunboats! And the [illegible] may not be the same one. The process will discourage foreign investors, and we shall hear a great deal about poor China, deprived of the opportunity [illegible] to exploit its resources; but in the long run the Chinese people will be better off if the process of industrialization, though [illegible] rapid, can be retarded. The transformation which China is undergoing is so fundamental, so [illegible] of her old settled civilization, that at best it will require years of civil war, apparent chaos, bankruptcy, and default. Speed can only aggravate its hazards. The literary renaissance which has dignified the popular tongue and opened the road to literacy to millions hitherto barred by the difficulties of the classical language is rapidly providing China with the mass-cultural background which modern industry requires. One of the great transformations of history is occurring in our day, making our American conquest of a continent seem slow and palsied; and the process is rapid enough without the stimulation of greedy foreign capital.

For America in China the choice today is between sympathy and opposition to that great revolution. Such a choice seems to involve alliance with Russia or alliance with Britain, and most Americans instinctively choose Britain. The phobia of bolshevism prevents a clear vision of the momentous issue. China, a people of four hundred millions, is awakening. Shall we align ourselves with the Powers which are trying to keep her bound by the shackles of her nineteenth-century weakness? Or shall we join Russia, the one Power which openly encourages the effort of Chinese youth to restore their nation's dignity? It is with the earnest desire that America should be regarded as the friend of Asia, not as another enemy, that I would urge America to announce now:

1. Intention to withdraw our consulates in China from the protection of foreign flags, and to retire from participation in the administration of foreign settlements, concessions, or quarters.

2. Renunciation of exterritoriality—say, three years hence. If China wants to suggest intermediate stages in a process of transformation, let China do it. Meanwhile, let us merely postpone the change long enough to give American interests in China time to prepare for their new status.

3. Withdrawal of all United States troops from Chinese soil and of United States warships from Chinese waters. This would mean abandonment of the six river ships which we are now building in China for the Yangtze River patrol.

4. Abrogation, in so far as the United States is concerned, of the anachronistic clauses of the Boxer protocol which give the Powers special rights in the Tientsin-Peking area.

5. Recognition by the United States that China has the right to fix her own customs rates without interference by foreign Powers.

Such action sounds like red revolution to the crusted minds of the foreign business community in China. They have lived for years in the tradition that while Chinese art should be greeted with romantic respect, politically and economically the yellow races must submit to white leadership forever. They may be right; if so, it is high time for the Powers to use their gunboats and restore their prestige. But also they may be wrong, and if they are wrong that policy would be disastrous. At present all the white nations [illegible] drifting, and drift is dangerous. If they continue to drift they may wake up some day to discover that their own nationalistic, imperialistic, militaristic philosophy, absorbed by the East, is at last creating a real Yellow Peril.

[This article concludes Lewis Gannett's series of impressions of China. A later article will recount his experiences in coming out of China across the Gobi Desert and the mountains of Mongolia.]

"Byng or King"

The Issue in the Canadian Election

BY RICHARD DE BRISAY

THE present state of Canadian politics is confused and exciting, and the election of September 14 will be the hottest battle in the history of the confederation. The late Liberal Ministry of Mr. Mackenzie King is accused of an unholy partnership with a gang of millionaire bootleggers; the present Government of Mr. Meighen is charged with having defied the supremacy of Parliament; and the Governor-General is a storm-center as a result of having exercised a prerogative that everybody considered as dead as Queen Anne. The indirect cause of this interesting situation lies in American legislation, and the outcome will have a direct economic effect on the relations of the United States and their Northern neighbor.

The scandals in the Customs Department which caused the fall of Mr. King's Government were unquestionably due to the workings of the Volstead Act. The Eighteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States may or may not have been a good thing for that country, but it has certainly proved a very bad thing for Canada. When the United States distilleries were closed down and bootlegging across the border became a new and profitable trade, it rapidly developed into an organized industry on which many of Canada's recent fortunes have been founded. But with organization came new developments; the brighter minds engaged in the business recognized the waste of a transport system in which all the freight was going one way, and they soon had their vehicles carrying goods both ways and making double profits for its management. Motor trucks loaded with scotch and rye going south, rolled back over the border carrying silks, cigarettes, and cotton goods; and with this smuggling business operating at its present rate, a conservative estimate puts the customs revenue loss to Canada at $30,000,000 a year. Probably it is more.

Of course, if the Liberal Government during the past session had had a working majority of its own party it would have easily survived the revelations of this organized smuggling business with its ramifications of graft and corruption in the Customs Department. But Mr. King's Ministry suffered from an inherent weakness for which the development of the new agricultural group in the Canadian Parliament was responsible. After the election of 1921 Mr. King found himself with a Liberal majority of one over the combined opposition, which was fairly evenly divided between his old opponents, the Conservatives, and the new Progressive group representing the farmers—who had gone into politics with a splash when they made the belated discovery that the Liberals were free traders only when out of office. But since the Progressives were more kindly disposed toward the Liberals, who at least paid lip service to free trade, than toward the Conservatives, who openly derided it, Mr. King found it fairly easy to hold office for four years without doing anything of importance; it was a "safe and sane" government which let things take their course and patted itself on the back as each year marked the slow improvement in conditions that was bound to follow the post-war slump. In October, 1925, Mr. King went to the country, and the result marked the end of the traditional two-party system in Canada. True, the Conservatives gained many seats, while the Progressives lost half of theirs, but for the first time in history neither of the old parties had a clear majority in the House of Commons. Mr. Meighen and his Conservatives had 116 seats; Mr. King had only 101; and the Progressives held 24. The Progressives had the whip-hand at last, and they cracked the whip with gusto. Mr. King they placed in power, but they bent him to their will. During this year's session more sound, radical legislation was passed by the House of Commons than is usually talked about in a decade; the high tariff on motors was cut, the income tax was reduced on the lower levels and raised on some of the higher ones, an amendment to the Grain Act was put through which meant millions of dollars for the farmers' pockets, a scheme of old-age pensions was carried, and money was voted for the completion of the Hudson Bay Railway. The Liberals themselves groaned, but the Conservatives gnashed their teeth; some of this unpalatable legislation they managed to hold up through their majority in the Senate; but for their prime object, the defeat of the Government, they had to seek a lever with which they could pry the Progressives off their Liberal benefactors, and they found it in the customs scandals.

There are some issues on which feeling in Canada is divided on much the same lines as in the United States. One is the liquor question; and while there are urban constituencies in which a wet candidate has a chance of election, there is hardly a rural constituency in Canada outside the Province of Quebec in which any candidate would have a dog's chance unless he pledged himself to undying war on the Demon Rum. Also, the farmers are strong for public morality. Consequently when the Conservatives dug up evidence of the corruption of officials in the Customs Department, and proved that they were hand in glove with a gang of millionaire bootleggers, they had the Liberals and Progressives exactly where they wanted them. And when the report of the Parliamentary committee of investigation was put before the House, the Conservatives presented an amendment censuring the Government for its indefensible negligence which put the Progressives in a cleft stick. On the one hand, if they helped defeat the Government, their chances of any more farmer legislation were doomed; but on the other hand lay the devilish alternative of having to face their stern-eyed constituents at home as the shameless champions of the wicked old-party men whom they had consistently denounced. It is not surprising that they broke under the strain. After an exhausting week of turbulent debate it was clear that a fatal number of them were determined to follow their conscience rather than their material interests, and Mr. King walked over to Rideau Hall and asked the Governor-General to dissolve a Parliament which could no longer be carried on with dignity. This, of course, meant another federal election immediately; but to Mr. King it seemed the lesser of two evils. To everybody's surprise, the Governor-General refused to follow his Prime Minister's advice, and took the ground that Mr. Meighen should have the chance to form a Government before the drastic remedy of a general election was resorted to. Mr. King resigned; Lord Byng asked Mr. Meighen if he would accept the responsibility of forming a Government, and Mr. Meighen accepted it with pleasure.

But if the Liberal tenure of office had been short and stormy, the career of the Conservatives was even more spectacular. Mr. Meighen had to form a Cabinet, and according to the Canadian Constitution when a member of Parliament accepts a portfolio he automatically loses his seat and must be reelected before he can sit in the House holding a position of emolument under the Crown. Yet if Mr. Meighen took enough members to form a Cabinet out of the House while it was sitting, he automatically lost his all too narrow majority. On the first day of his Government the House was informed that he proposed to wind up the work of the session by appointing a Cabinet of Acting Ministers. On the same day the Acting Government got a majority of ten on the vote of censure on the defunct Government of Mr. King. On the third day the Liberals retaliated by introducing a motion that Mr. Meighen's Government was unconstitutional—either his Ministers were really Ministers of the Crown, in which case they had no right to sit in Parliament, or they were not Ministers and therefore had no right to administer the government moneys. And on that motion Mr. Meighen's ill-starred Government was defeated. The next day members of the House of Commons were astonished to find its doors shut and to be informed by the pages that Parliament was dissolved. The work of the session was left unfinished, and the Liberals and Progressives took it as an insult that they were thus dismissed with no ceremony of prorogation.

The chief issues of the election are therefore constitutional ones. Both Liberals and Progressives hold that the Governor-General had no right to refuse Mr. King his dissolution, for although there are precedents for His Excellency's action they all date from colonial days, and since Canada is now an independent nation and a copartner with Great Britain in the Commonwealth, a Governor-General can have no rights that the King has not in Britain. Technically, the King still has the right to refuse his Premier's advice, but since he has not exercised it for a hundred years it is now considered obsolete. Some of the Liberals, fearful of being branded disloyal or separatist, are now trying to explain that their quarrel is with Mr. Meighen rather than with the popular Governor-General; but the Conservatives feel that "Byng or King" is a good battle-cry. So the Governor-General's action is undoubtedly the major issue of the campaign.

The result of this election is bound to have repercussions in the United States. It is improbable that the Liberals can get a clear majority, since their strength has always been greatest in the rural districts and the Western farmers now realize that they can gain more by returning their own representatives. Therefore we may expect either that the Conservatives will have a clear majority or the Liberals will again be returned to power subject to the will of a Progressive group. If the Conservatives win, they will be encouraged to put into effect at last their cherished idea of a brick-for-brick tariff wall against the United States. But if the Liberal-Progressive alliance is continued, a definite advance toward free trade will be made, and the question of reciprocity with the United States in natural products will be revived. It is an interesting exposition of the interlocking interests of the two countries that an amendment to the Constitution of the United States should be the indirect cause of a constitutional issue being raised in Canada, and that the result of a Canadian election fought on that issue may affect to an appreciable extent the economic interests of American industry.

Confessions of a Movie Reader

By RUTH SAPIN

I AM a reader for the movies. In the great industry far flung to the Pacific, rising skyward on the Atlantic until God who once upon a time created a super-movie of his own must be jealous and dismayed, I am an ant. I have never seen a movie producer or a movie director or a movie star. I have never been in a movie studio. I am so busy working for the movies that I have neither the time nor the inclination to go to a moving-picture show.

My business is with books. Most scenarios have a connection, though a remote one, with a book. Before the one book can be chosen for a scenario, hundreds of books must be read. I am the creature who by burrowing through mountains of books breaks the ground for the higher-ups who, later on, must deal indirectly with them. In order that I may get no false notion of my own importance, after I have read a novel (four hours), done an eighteen-hundred-word synopsis of it with various carbons, record sheets, and filing cards accompanying it (four hours more), and returned it to the office, I must sign a paper headed in big black letters Petty Cash Voucher!

I am told that there are some people, even intelligent ones, who cannot read a novel and give a coherent account of its plot. A movie reader must possess this slight ability. In addition, the reader must bring to the narration of each plot as much enthusiasm as though she or he had not encountered the same plot in the last five novels read. The reader must be equally polite to all novels—a story by May Christie, that unconscious Daisy Ashford of English lady novelists, must be treated with as much respect as a novel by Jacob Wassermann.

Finally a reader must be able to express herself in language that a director can understand. I was once called to task because in a synopsis of a college novel I, following the author's example, referred to a fraternity man as a society man. To a director, I was told, a society man means one thing—a person in full-dress clothes.

At the end of each synopsis the movie reader is allowed one inch of space in which to pass on the picture possibilities of the novel read. An inch is too much. For how, when plots are so similar and the most convincing story can be made absurd or the most absurd story convincing in the filming, is a reader, far away from Hollywood, competent to judge of the picture qualities of any given novel. I recently read a crime story in which the hero by means of a spray containing a potent chemical, the very touch of which was death, went about killing off men for whom he did not particularly care and nearly ending the life of an innocent maid with a gift of beautiful but poison-treated pearls. Even with my vague notion of what is wanted for the movie public, I felt safe in saying that this would not do for the children, however much their parents might enjoy it. But as a rule, removed as I am from the whims of actresses, the "flops" of pictures which must stand as warnings, the activities of other companies, my views on the picture possibilities of a story are worthless.

Why then, since the pay is poor, the work largely drudgery, and my services to the game (or the art) of little value, do I continue to be a movie reader? For the simple reason that I like to read. Ten years ago, in my youth, I read everything. Not only the aristocracy of books but the great unwashed as well—crime stories, trashy love stories, Saturday Evening Post stories. Latterly, influenced somewhat by my book-reviewing friends, I had become rather snobbish in my reading. The movies have restored my equilibrium. A scenario-editorial office is the most truly democratic library I have ever entered. It is a literary grab-bag into which one puts one's hands and one day draws out Ethel M. Dell and the next day Aldous Huxley; one day, Pirandello and another, Peter B. Kyne.

Frequently the novels are read in the raw—the movie reader is given the author's manuscript or the galley proofs or the unbound volume rushed over post haste from the publisher. All undressed, as it were, without a jacket, without blurbs, without book reviews to enhance it, that is the time, if ever, for a novel to be judged on its merits.

There is, for instance, the matter of the English lady novelists. By a lady novelist I mean the type of novelist of which A. S. M. Hutchinson is the supreme example. (Many men are lady novelists, though the class, particularly in England, is largely female.) They are forever solving problems. Somewhere in Chekhov's correspondence he writes to a friend—to Maxim Gorki, I believe—concerning the solution of a question and the correct setting of a question in a novel or play: "The latter alone is obligatory for the artist. In 'Anna Karenina' not a single problem is solved. But it satisfies completely because all the problems are set correctly." The English lady novelist, since she is incapable of profound thought about the problems she tackles, cannot possibly set her questions correctly. When she gets into a hole she brings in a vicar, or a layman who should have been a vicar. He either converts or is converted and, presto, a burning question is solved!

American novelists who write for the popular magazines are fortunately free of this preoccupation with problems. They set out rather to write a "strong" love story. What they have to say of love is unimportant. What they possess of literary background is negligible. But "the great open spaces" of America do something to redeem them. Here is a person who does know what it means to be lost in a snowstorm in the Canadian Rockies. Here is another who has lived through a forest fire. And a third who has been brought up in a part of the country where corn and cattle are more important (and really more interesting) than people. The jaded movie reader traveling up and down in the subway is suddenly storm tossed in a fishing schooner off Cape Cod. When she gets to her typewriter and starts to make a synopsis of the story she probably forgotten both characters and plot. But the schooner or the corn country or the Rockies sticks in her mind long after the supposedly "strong" part of the story has vanished from memory.

The movie reader, dealing with even the "significant" novels long before they are reviewed or lectured about, has an excellent vantage point from which to judge professional comment as it comes along. This year John Masefield wrote an adventure story called "Odtaa." Now "Odtaa" on numerous counts failed to be more than a fair story. Yet most of the reviewers, who read one adventure story to a movie reader's fifty, hailed it as a masterpiece. When they had finished describing it as a remarkable adventure story they began on its poetic qualities and lyric fervor. In behalf of unknown Tom Smith and John Jones whose adventure stories come and go without a word of notice from the reviewers, I must confess that I found as much lyric fervor in their novels as in Masefield's and considerably better construction, suspense, and ingenuity of incident.

Recently Arthur Schnitzler's "Beatrice," new to America, though it was written some thirteen years ago, was published here. Since the novel deals with the erotic problems of a middle-aged woman the reviewing seems to have been turned over chiefly to young men. The result was that a second-rate novel that is no more like Schnitzler at his best than Schnitzler is like Zane Grey was heralded as a "penetrating analysis" of the soul of a woman, "a work of compelling truth."

Of these thousands of short stories and novels read in the course of a year (over five thousand were read in the office I know most about, the titles including works in foreign languages as well as in English) only about twenty-five are purchased. Despite the fanfare that goes with a movie sale, the novels and stories purchased represent such a tiny proportion of the total number written that it is hardly worth a writer's while (especially if he has not a celebrated name to sell) to concern himself very much with what he imagines the movies "want."

What happens to the material once it is purchased is another matter. The vicious are made virtuous (virtue now, more than ever, is a commodity that is priceless in the movies), the virtuous are altered out of all semblance to the selves that once lived in the pages of a book. But at least it is a hopeful sign that the large motion-picture concerns plow the entire field of current fiction (and even paying out petty cash for the plowing, the job costs money) in an endeavor to turn up new and fresh material. The literati may sneer at the movies; the movies don't sneer at the literati. If an author meets their needs of the moment the captains of the industry care not whether he be alive or dead, whether he be German, American, or Hottentot, whether his name be Ibáñez or Sabatini, or Sholom Asch or Oliver Onions.

And so I read them all—from the featherweight opus written by a frivolous American flapper to the powerful soul-searching of a sad Scandinavian. Perhaps I am not an ant; perhaps I am that figure beloved of the movies—Cinderella sitting by the embers. But the prospect of ever becoming a princess would fill me with horror. For being a cynical Cinderella, I know that movie princesses must work like horses—while I read peacefully by the fire, ragged, ignored, pettily paid, but infinitely amused.

The Key to European Peace

By PHILIP SNOWDEN

London, August 19

EUROPEAN peace depends upon permanent good relations between Germany and France. The framers of the Locarno Pact realized that fact. For centuries these two great European nations have been at war or in a state of armed peace. French anxiety at the menace of a powerful, progressive, and energetic Germany is easily understood. The desire of France for security against the possible aggression of her neighbor, superior in population, in education, and in industry, has become an inherited obsession. To safeguard herself against this menace France has sought European alliances, which have divided the Continent into hostile combinations.

This has created an intolerable situation. Although the other Continental nations have their antagonisms and jealousies and ambitions, Franco-German relations have mainly dominated European policy and diplomacy. Great Britain has been drawn into this net and in the last two centuries has on many occasions been involved in wars in which she had no direct interest, but which primarily arose from Franco-German hostility. Even America, far removed geographically from the scene of these international jealousies, could not escape from participation in the age-long quarrels of France and Germany.

Sensible people have begun to realize the folly of this [illegible] writer has said, is a game from which both sides rise the losers. The Great War gave no victory. It left all the European belligerents more or less ruined financially and industrially. The Locarno Pact was an effort to give France that sense of security which would turn her thoughts and energies from military preparations to economic and commercial development. Under peaceful and confident relations, France and Germany, owing to their contiguity, should naturally have close commercial relationships. In the heavy industries this is particularly the case, owing to the natural disposition of coal and ores. Intimate international interests in trade are one of the best means of promoting friendly political relations.

That fact is being appreciated by the great commercial magnates of France and Germany, as well as by politicians publicists, and diplomatists. A very important and very promising movement in the direction of establishing better relations between the two countries was made recently. Meetings have taken place in Paris and Berlin at which a number of eminent industrialists, politicians, and diplomatists gathered to consider steps for removing all unjustifiable causes for suspicion between the two countries.

The entry of Germany into the League of Nations, which now seems to be assured in the course of the next few weeks, should effect a great change in the relations of Germany, not only to France but to all the European countries within the League. Germany will then have the full opportunity to bring her grievances before the League Council. There are a number of important matters which will demand early consideration. One of these is the continued maintenance of troops in the remaining occupied Rhineland zone. The conditions of good international relations cannot exist as long as part of Germany is occupied by foreign troops. The Locarno Pact fully recognized this fact and made provisions for the gradual reduction of the area and the strength of the occupation. But this has not been done. On the contrary, there are some 7,000 or 8,000 more troops in the area than there were in September last. Natural resentment is caused by the extra requisitions of quarters in the Rhineland, and as long as there are actually more troops in the present occupied area there will be substantial grounds for this resentment. Feeling in Germany is strong on this matter, and on its early satisfactory settlement depends to a great extent whether the Locarno Pact realizes expectations, and whether Germany's entry into the League of Nations fulfils the high hopes which are entertained.

Beyond this question lies the problem of the Dawes scheme. Little is said in public on this subject, but wherever politicians, industrialists, economists, and financiers meet the future of the scheme is discussed. Nobody in any country really believes that the Dawes Plan can be permanently maintained with advantage even to the recipients of the proceeds of the plan. But, on the other hand, it is realized that the time has not come to agitate for a revision. The plan has only just begun to work, and it is too early to form definite conclusions as to the measure of success it may achieve. But apart from the question whether it can give reparations without grave economic reactions, there is the psychological effect upon the German people of having an alien body controlling its economic life. The question of the inter-Allied debts is poisoning the relations among the Allies in the late war, and the effect of the Dawes payments is precisely similar.

Perhaps few things could do more to promote good relations between France and Germany, and among all the countries who were belligerents in the late war, than an early cleaning of the slate of all war debts and reparations. Such a settlement would leave France at least as well off as she is likely to be if she pays her annuities under the Anglo-French and the Franco-American agreements and continues to receive the Dawes annuities. But by cleaning the slate, France's resentment at having to pay annuities for two generations to her late allies and Germany's resentment at having her financial and industrial affairs controlled by foreigners would both be removed. A new and pleasant atmosphere would be created in both France and Germany, which would greatly help to promote a feeling of freedom and good will.

These are some of the problems for the statesmanship of the League of Nations when Germany becomes a full member. They are difficult, and it would be unwise to press them with undue haste. War-time feelings are subsiding and a spirit of reconciliation is at work. This new spirit has many difficulties to encounter and to overcome. France and Germany, with the help of Great Britain, can make the conditions of a peaceful Europe. The conflict of centuries between France and Germany can be ended by the realization by both countries of a community of interests which can only be promoted by mutual good faith.

Robert Graves*

By EDWIN MUIR

MR. GRAVES is one of the most puzzling figures in contemporary literature. He is conspicuously honest, yet he is often evasive; he is bold—and suddenly cautious; he is more dogmatic than any other contemporary poet, and perhaps more really skeptical at the same time. And it is in his poems of conflict that he is most skeptical; in his poems of escape that he is most daring. The poems in "Country Sentiment," which he describes himself as poems of escape, are admirably sincere; they [illegible] the reality of things more concretely than most of the later poetry, concerned with more exciting problems. Their sincerity, moreover, is of a very rare kind. For it takes far less courage of mind, as modern psychology tells us, to face external realities than it takes to recognize the realities within us, especially where these are unconscious realities becoming conscious, as they are in "Country Sentiment." Like everybody else the poet must, of course, adapt himself to the world around him. To know what one's environment is and to relate oneself to that is a utilitarian activity which cannot be avoided, but its achievement is not the work of poetry but of common sense. Approaching reality directly in this way, we are confronted with the conscious mind on the raw fact; harmony, therefore, cannot result, but only a compromise. Where Mr. Graves's poetry fails, as where a great deal of modern poetry fails, is where we have this bare confrontation of the conscious mind and the raw reality. The identity of the seer with the thing seen, the subjective-objective unity of vision, is not attained; and this condition is only a stage toward its attainment; poetry in embryo, not poetry born. And though it is desirable that the modern world should find expression in poetry, that will never be done by one who sets out, whatever his repugnance, to do so. It will only be done when a poet finds the modern world within himself, when not merely the outward, conscious adaptation to it has been made but the inner, unconscious one as well. This is, indeed, a platitude; but a number of modern theories of poetry ignore it and dogmatize as if it were not there. Mr. Graves does not do so; his observations on the function and aim of poetry are always enlightened and often true; but his practice is tending more and less to conform to his best theory. In the second section of "Whipperyjoint" and in "Dead Despair Hall" he has no longer the integral approach to the theme which we find in his earlier poetry. He no longer attacks the problem with all his faculties, finding a resolution on the various planes of the mind, as he has said poetry should; he attacks it only with his intellect, enlisting the imagination, if at all, as a supernumerary. He does not reveal convictions and intuitions; he treats general ideas which, we feel, have not been assimilated to his poetic nature and are perhaps alien to it. The will to adaptation is in his later work, rather than the living act of adaptation, and all that a will of this kind can give the poet is a compromise, not a reconciling vision of life, not a resolution.

And it is for a similar reason that Mr. Graves seems to be out in his later poetry and in his criticism. His criticism is very illuminating both for what it contains and for what it tells us about himself. He is an out-and-out relativist. What is good poetry to one man he claims is bad poetry to another; what this age finds significant a later one will find meaningless. Bad poetry is poetry which does not [illegible] or clarify our subconscious conflicts; but it may ease or clarify the conflicts of another generation, and then it will become good poetry. The theory is consistent, but so are most theories of criticism; the important thing is to find out what by means of it the author wishes to prove. For problems of this kind are never resolved; their terms are only changed from time to time by the action of fresh intelligences. In what way has Mr. Graves's candid and unconventional intelligence changed them? In two ways chiefly: by casting doubt on the supreme utterances of poetry, for no poetry can be supreme which is good in one age and bad in another; and by making the criterion of poetry very largely a utilitarian one. Nothing could show more clearly Mr. Graves's compromising temper. For when a man becomes convinced that compromise is essential he will in time come to prefer the second-best to the best, or at any rate the good to the surpassing, recognizing that for his purposes the former is the more effective. Moreover compromise and a utilitarian preoccupation go together, the criterion of every compromise being essentially its usefulness. Nothing would be gained by controverting Mr. Graves's theories. They are a stimulating addition to critical thought; they emphasize factors which literary criticism almost always ignores, factors at present of the first importance.

The question is whether Mr. Graves has emphasized them in the right way. To take an extreme example, even if in certain ages Shakespeare has been a bad poet (not touching their particular conflicts) there is still a vast difference between him, in any age, and a bad poet like Martin Tupper. And it is for differences as important as this that Mr. Graves's critical theory does not provide. The psychological effect of poetry is so important to him that as a theorist he has an eye for very little else. "For the poet," he says, "the writing of poetry accomplishes a certain end, irrespective of whether the poem ever finds another reader but himself; it enables him to be rid of the conflicts between his sub-personalities. And for the reader, the reading of poetry performs a similar service; it acts for him as a physician of his mental disorders." As far as it goes this is no doubt true; but the poet may rid himself of his subconscious conflicts in an infinity of ways, and on various planes, and as important as his release is the manner in which he effects it. For to rid oneself of a conflict is to be in a different state, and the quality of that state is not a matter of indifference. Yet to Mr. Graves sometimes it seems to be indifferent what the state is so long as the conflict has been removed. "Francis Thompson's Sister Songs and Lear's Nonsense Rhymes," he says, "are apparently the same sort of escape from the same sort of conflict; strange that Lear is treated less seriously. And who will say that the foolery in Edward Lear is less worthy of our tragic imagination than the terrible foolery at the crisis of King Lear?" The only thing that can be said in reply to this is that by the foolery in "King Lear" our conflicts are released into an infinitely greater world than they are by Edward Lear's nonsense verses. Although both help to rid us of our conflicts, they move us in completely different ways and with vastly different power. Nonsense verse does give our conflicts a certain relief. It presents us with a lively picture of the utter unintelligibility of our subconscious war, and the resignation to that unintelligibility loosens our tensions for a time. The mood of nonsense and the mood of mystery are alike in so far as they are evoked by things which seem unintelligible; the great difference between them is that while the one is a giving way to meaninglessness, the other is an attempt to impose meaning upon it. Not even to the curative psychologist concerned only to release the pressure of a conflict in the subconscious mind can these modes of relief appear of equal importance; to a poet interested in the positive temper of the soul it is quite impossible to see how they can.

* [illegible] have appeared on D. H. Lawrence, Edith Sitwell, Lytton Strachey, T. S. Eliot, James Joyce, Stephen Hudson, Aldous Huxley, and Virginia Woolf.

It is when we come to Mr. Graves's later poetry that we see some of the bad effects of this curiously pragmatic evaluation of the act of poetic expression. The change is decisively marked in "Whipperginny," and the preface to the volume tells us that the author was aware of it. The first part of the book, he says, continues the mood of "Pier Glass," "aggressive and disciplinary, rather than escapist." "But in most of the later pieces," he adds, "will be found evidences of greater detachment in the poet and the appearance of a new series of problems in religion, psychology, and philosophy no less exacting than their predecessors, but, it may be said, of less emotional intensity."

In this later poetry and in some which Mr. Graves has written since we are conscious that each poem is a theme chosen. We admire the manner in which the poet's mind deals with it; but subject and mind are not fused; and it is not an experience that is registered, but a hypothesis. Nor is that the worst, for we are often aware that the poetry is performing a set psychological function. The [illegible] is too apparent. Certain of the poems in "Whipperginny," like The Technique of Contentment, for instance, and The Land and The Sea, are simply hypothetical statements of the general conditions of psychological conflict about which the poet is clarifying his mind. But in resolving our subconscious conflicts poetry does not inform us of them, as psychoanalysis does; its operation is different, on the various planes of the psyche, and not, as in psychoanalysis, on the one which gives the key to the others: its effect is a harmonizing of the mind, rather than a clarifying of it. When Mr. Graves informs us in his poetry of the subconscious conflicts, therefore, he is forcing the natural growth of poetry with his intellect, and forcing it for a utilitarian purpose, that the effects of poetry might be enjoyed. In a process such as this the impulses of the unconscious are given a ready-made shape before they appear; the poet is prepared for them, and therefore against them, in advance; and the result is that they never achieve an organic expression, but only a schematized one. They are categories by the time Mr. Graves handles them, rather than energies. The only way one can mark the difference between

> Across two counties he can hear,
> And catch your words before you speak.
> The woodlouse or the maggot's weak
> Clamor rings in his sad ear,

from "Pier Glass," and

> Let us live upright, yet with care consider > Whether, in living thus, we do not err, from "Whipperginny," is by saying that the first contains potentially all that is in the second, and contains as well something more. And when one compares the much earlier In the Wilderness with the recent The Clipped Stater the discrepancy is still greater. In the Wilderness is not one of Mr. Graves's best poems, it is too inconclusive; but the difference between > Basilisk, cockatrice,

> Flocked to his homilies,
> With mail of dread device,
> With monstrous barbéd slings,
> With eager dragon eyes;
> Great rats on leather wings,
> And poor blind broken things,
> Foul in their miseries

and

> Then Finity is true Godhead's final test,
> Nor does it shear the grandeur from Free Being;
> "I must fulfil myself by self-destruction."
> The curious phrase renews his conquering zest is definite and striking. It is the difference between a state imagined and a state hypothecated and only dipped in the imagination to be given an intellectual convincingness. The first passage has the immediacy of reality, the second has not. The Clipped Stater is a floating fancy thrown off by the inconstant mind; it has no necessity; it may or may not be true. The question is not whether it is poetry. It is a question rather of the relative value of two kinds of work which Mr. Graves has produced and still continues to produce side by side. In literary criticism nothing can be proved; the only thing that one can say is that by poetry like In the Wilderness something is done that by The Clipped Stater is not done at all; that the first is real; the second, not certainly so; that they are consequently of different worth.

The interesting thing about Mr. Graves is that with such an effective equipment for compromise he sometimes deserts it and leads an attack on his own defenses. Nothing could be more different from the temporizing relativity of the critical books and the stifling compromise of Mock Beggar Hall than an occasional poem like The Rock Below. "Where speedwell grows and violets grow" the poet plucks up the flowers and finds stumps of thorn beneath. These come up and he sets a rosebush where they had been.

> Love has pleasure in my roses
> For a summer since

But the roots of the rosebush turn on stone, so he tears it up and far beneath strikes on the rock, "jarring hatefully." But "up the rock shall start."

> Now from the deep and frightful pit
> Shoots forth the spiring phoenix-tree
> Long despaired in this bleak land,
> Holds the air with boughs, with bland
> Fragrance welcome to the bee,
> With fruits of immortality.

The contradiction in Mr. Graves's poetry is fundamental.

On the one hand we have the consistent relativism of his later poetry; on the other a determination to dig down until his mind produces "fruits of immortality." There is the mass of his busy, temporizing, hypothetical verse, verse which seems to say: "This may be true, or it may not"; there are a few poems which leave no room for the relative or for questions of this kind. Lost Love and A Lover Since Childhood have this incontestable seriousness; some of the poems at the beginning of "Country Sentiment" have it in a higher degree than any Mr. Graves has written since. In these, and still more clearly in poems like In the Wilderness and The Rock Below, Mr. Graves shows himself to be an original poet. In his later pseudo-philosophical poetry the thought, while lively and full of idiosyncrasy, is never very original; the supposititious form in which it is advanced makes it appear far more profound than it is in reality. It may be that Mr. Graves's excursion into philosophy will deepen his mind, and that later he will return with fuller powers to the kind of poetry which he seems so inevitably equipped to write.

The Agricultural Recovery

By LOUIS H. BEAN

THE demand for farm relief which rose in the Wheat and Hog Belts in 1923 and in the Corn Belt in 1925 is likely to sweep the Cotton Belt in 1927. Low wheat and hog prices of 1923 produced the McNary-Haugen Bill, defeated by Congress in 1924; the low corn prices of 1925 produced the bills turned down in 1926; and if the present low price of cotton continues—as the prospect of another abundant crop this fall indicates—cotton growers will join their case with that of the Western farmers.

Divorced from political passion, what do statistics show? Is agriculture recovering? Is it keeping pace with industry?

The usual measure of farm progress or regress is the trend of the prices on the farm for farm products. But prices alone do not take into account the volume and costs of production; the farmer's net income and its exchange value in terms of the things he has to buy are of greater significance. But prices are important and play the dominant role in the farmer's state of mind. Let us study them.

In 1919-1920 both agricultural and non-agricultural prices reached approximately parallel post-war peaks (240 per cent of the pre-war level); but since then the two groups have followed different courses. By 1921 agricultural prices had dropped from the 1919-1920 level of 240 to 116 (16 per cent above pre-war prices), while non-agricultural prices fell only to 160 (60 per cent above pre-war prices). During the severest period of the depression the farmer could get at his local markets only 16 per cent more than the pre-war price for a unit of his product, while producers of industrial commodities received at the wholesale markets 60 per cent more than they did before the war. Today, despite five years of gradual improvement in the average of farm prices, they are still only 39 per cent above pre-war prices, while prices of other products stand 60 per cent above that level, which means that in pre-war terms a dollar's worth of farm products will today buy only 87 cents' worth of city-made goods.

While average farm prices have advanced from an index of 116 in 1921 to one of 139 in June, 1926, the gain has not been shared equally. Some products have made gains and lost them again; others, whose prices have only recently advanced, fear that the gains are only temporary. First came the recovery in the sheep and wool prices in 1922, induced by short supplies. But the relatively advantageous price-level so stimulated production that their next major movement will inevitably be downward. On the heels of the recovery in wool prices came a quick recovery in cotton prices, following short crops in 1921 and 1922. This recovery was lost after the bumper crop of 1925, and the prospect of another large crop in 1926 means a continued low level. Within the past two years the price of cotton has dropped from 35 cents to 16.

Corn and wheat improved in 1924, two years after cotton, prices being stimulated by a short domestic corn crop and a short foreign wheat crop. But the high price of corn (in 1924 above a dollar on the farm, the farmers, of course, expecting the good times to continue) dropped within a year to pre-war levels of 60 cents or less, as a result of the large crop in 1925 and the fact that there were fewer hogs on the farms to be fed. Wheat prices did not emerge from the depression until a world shortage occurred in 1924. The domestic shortage of 1926 enabled wheat growers to obtain satisfactory prices, but a return of both domestic and foreign supplies to normal levels this year has again reduced the prices to producers.

Hog prices, like those of wheat, were slow to emerge from the depression, but for more than a year and a half they have been profitable to producers. Those hog producers who, because of low prices, sold out in 1923-1924 deprived themselves of the profitable prices of 1924-1925; and those who this year, noting the low corn prices, are feeding hogs for market, expecting to obtain in 1927 as high hog prices as prevail today, are also due for a disappointment. If farmers as a group respond to these high prices in their usual way, they will soon market enough hogs to lower prices again.

So the general farm price recovery, insufficient as it is, is not only incomplete but in part temporary. As a matter of fact, during the past year the average of farmers' prices dropped from an index of 152 in August, 1925, to 139 in July, 1926.

But the story of agricultural recovery is not completely told in schedules of prices. Farmers are less self-sufficient than they used to be, buying from other industries goods and services for both the farm and the farm home, and agricultural progress has to be considered in terms of net income rather than in terms of price. The farm recovery has been greater in terms of gross income than of net; during the past year gross income per farm amounted to 80 per cent of that in 1919-1920, but net income only to 70 per cent—and these incomes were considerably larger than the very low earnings during the years of the severest depression. Even with this improvement, the average net income per farm (amounting to $879 in 1925-1926, compared with $1,246 in 1919-1920) has not been sufficient for the past six years to give the average farmer a commercial interest return on his depreciated investment and an [illegible] for his own and his family's labor and management.

Costs of production have been relatively inflexible. In 1925, for instance, the agricultural industry as a whole paid in costs for the products and services of other industries nearly 3.1 billion dollars, compared with 3.3 billion in 1919. Taxes in 1925 were greater than in 1919; interest on mort- and other indebtedness only slightly less. The sum total of all costs of production (including taxes, labor, rent, interest on debts, feed, fertilizer, etc.) was only 10 per cent lower in 1925 than in 1919, while gross income was down 20 per cent. This means that a greater portion of the average farmer's gross income is eaten up by costs (55 per cent in 1925, 49 per cent seven years ago); and a smaller part is left for his living exp-

Lower costs of living have not helped the farmer much. Even when adjusted for the changes in living costs since 1919 for the country as a whole, the average farmer's net income of $879 in 1925-1926 could buy only about 80 per cent of the goods and services which his income of $1,246 bought in 1919-1920. [illegible] to maintain his standard of living before the depression.

The Present Industrial Prosperity

If city dwellers had fared no better than the farmers, the latter would need no special sympathy. But the fact is that the non-farming population for which data are available—those who derive their living from wages and profits of industry—[illegible] not only maintained the standards of living of 1919 but has exceeded them.

Factory wage earners, who in number and dependents constitute about as large a section of our population as do those engaged in agriculture, have for the past three years enjoyed money wages equal to those earned in 1919-1920, with costs of living lower than before the depression. Their money wages have enabled factory employees not only to maintain their 1919 buying power but to exceed it by about 16 per cent. The comparison with the similar figures for agriculture is striking:

Year	Relative purchasing power of: Net income per [illegible]	Wages per employed [illegible]
	Per cent	Per cent
[illegible]	100	100
[illegible]21	[illegible]	102
[illegible]	[illegible]	101
[illegible]	[illegible]	112
[illegible]24	70	115
1924-25	81	116
[illegible]	[illegible]	116

The buying power of farm incomes fell during the depression below half of the 1919 level, and has since [illegible] only to 81 per cent; the buying power of those actually employed in factories in no year fell below that of 1919 and during the past three years of virtually full em- [illegible] 16 per cent higher. [illegible] in the distribution of the national income amounting to 30 per cent in favor of those employed in non-agricultural industries and at the expense of the farmer.

Corporation incomes, as reported to the United States Treasury Department, have gained even more. The net incomes of corporations (after payment of federal income taxes) may be taken as a measure of the economic welfare of those who derive their incomes from interest and dividends on their investments in industrial enterprises. In 1919, for instance, corporations reporting to the Treasury Department showed net incomes, after paying profits and income taxes, amounting to more than six billion dollars. The agricultural industry in that year earned as net income on the farm operators' investment and management 3 billion dollars. By 1923 the corporations had recovered from the depression sufficiently to show a net income of more than 5 billion dollars, roughly 85 per cent of their earnings of 1919; but in the same year the earnings on [illegible]ricultural capital were only a half billion dollars—roughly 20 per cent of their 1919 earnings. For 1925 corporation income-tax returns will undoubtedly show a total net income close to 6 billion dollars.[1] Agricultural net income amounted last year to a little more than a billion dollars. Thus while the earnings of corporate enterprises are about equal to those of the prosperous year 1919, agriculture has reached only one-third of its 1919 earnings. This large difference must not be taken at face value, in view of the considerable deflation that has taken place in the current values of agricultural investment and the possible increase in corporate investment. The earnings should perhaps be expressed as rates earned on investment. When so expressed for 1923, the only year when comparable data are available, it appears that the farming industry, according to the Department of Agriculture, earned approximately 3.3 per cent on investment, including reward for management, while corporations earned an average of 11.0 per cent.[2]

Why shouldn't the farmers howl?

Who's Who in Wisconsin

By BEVIER ROBINSON

Racine, Wisconsin, August 24

WISCONSIN'S primary election on September 7 is now only two weeks away; the office-seekers are making their final appeals to the voters, who have appeared somewhat unresponsive throughout the campaign. Probably not more than 50 per cent of those qualified to vote will take the trouble to do so. The political atmosphere is filled with accusations, insinuations, and recriminations, cries for lower taxes and demands for fewer State commissions.

Chief interest centers in the Blaine-Lenroot Senatorial contest. In past elections the Republican nomination for this office has been equivalent to election. This year prohibition, farm relief, the Esch-Cummins Act, and the Newberry Case have been discussed, but the big battle has been on the question of the World Court. Mr. Lenroot, who was the Administration leader during the fight for the World Court, declares he is proud of the stand he took. Blaine is bitterly attacking Lenroot for his support of the court, which, he declares, is only a scheme of the international bankers to make more secure their large investments in [1] [illegible] The monthly review of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York for June, 1926, [illegible] than in 1924, when all [illegible] amounted to 5.5 billion dollars.

[2] [illegible] income of all corporations for 1923 reported as 5,750 million dollars, [illegible] and [illegible] of others 2,[illegible] total of 8,250 on a capital investment of 193 billion dollars at the beginning of 1923, as recently estimated by the Federal Trade Commission.

Europe and to preserve the ill-gotten gains of the victorious nations. Mr. Lenroot has challenged the Governor to debate the World Court question and other campaign issues, but so far Mr. Blaine has refused to accept his challenges. Both Lenroot and Blaine have proved themselves good campaigners and have stumped the State from Beloit to Superior and from La Crosse to Milwaukee. Lenroot's daughter, Mrs. Black, and Mrs. Blaine are taking an active part in the campaign, and the Blaines are being compared to the Fergusons of Texas. It is even suggested that Mrs. Blaine writes her husband's speeches, as Mrs. Ferguson does for Ma.

On the question of prohibition neither Governor Blaine nor Senator Lenroot has taken an open stand. Both have refrained from discussing the question. The Woman's Christian Temperance Union and the Anti-Saloon League are said to have indorsed Lenroot, who has announced, however, that he approves of a referendum in which the people would petition Congress to modify the Volstead Act so as to permit the manufacture and sale of 2.75 per cent beer. Blaine, formerly dry, is supposed to be wet and has received the indorsement of the national vice-president of the Association Against Prohibition.

The question of farm relief has played little part in the present campaign. Diversified farming has to a great extent solved the farmers' difficulties in Wisconsin. Crops here are usually good and there are ready markets. Most of the farmers are prosperous and contented. Senator La Follette has been touring the State asking the farmers to repudiate Lenroot because he voted for the Esch-Cummins Act, which returned the railroads to their private owners and which, he charges, has taken millions from the State in increased freight rates.

The newspapers are fighting Blaine to the limit. Were one to judge the outcome of the Senatorial fight by the attitude of the press Blaine stands little show in his battle for Lenroot's seat. With one exception every daily newspaper in Wisconsin is supporting Lenroot. The press contends that taxes have alarmingly increased since Blaine has been Governor. It also asserts that Blaine has created numerous offices as rewards to his political supporters. It is charged that factories are leaving the State because of excessive taxes. The State officials who are backing Governor Blaine are spoken of in the press as the "Madison Ring." If the Governor wins the nomination it will reveal how small an influence the press exerts in determining the politics of Wisconsin. The large manufacturing and business interests in general are opposing the La Follette-Blaine-Ekern ticket.

This year several prominent Progressives have deserted the La Follette ranks. Congressman Schafer of Milwaukee is supporting Lenroot. The Secretary of State, Mr. Zimmerman, is seeking the Republican nomination for Governor and is opposing the Blaine-La Follette candidate, Mr. Ekern.

The outcome of the election is uncertain, with odds favoring the La Follette slate. During his many years in office Robert M. La Follette, Sr., built up a large personal following and, though dead, he exerts a profound influence over the voters. Lenroot is not popular among the farmers and workers. His strength lies in the cities among the business men and professional classes. He will receive the votes of all those who support the Coolidge Administration. The 50,000 members of the railroad brotherhoods in Wisconsin have announced their support of Blaine. He will also get the major portion of the wet vote, as well as the votes of the large German and Scandinavian population, which tends toward radicalism and which vigorously opposes the World Court.

Campaign expenditures are mounting and may reach astonishing proportions before the primary election day, September 7. The Lenroot supporters have been spending most of the money. The La Follette forces have had little to spend and have been forced to take collections to defray the expenses of the various campaign meetings. Milwaukee is deluged with campaign literature and every effort is going to be made before election day to defeat the La Follette forces. But such efforts will probably be unsuccessful.

In the Driftway

FROM a young woman, recently graduated from college, comes an addition to the Valentino obituary literature:

> Apart from the mere vastness of the popular interest, there seems to be a special quality about the emotion to which the public has been stirred by the passing of this man. It is not a public emotion; it has the poignancy of intimate acquaintance. He was a romantic lover, the embodiment of an adolescent dream, but there have been greater lovers who have been less deeply mourned. Valentino was more real than the heroes of song and story for whom young maidens used to weep, more real even than living figures on the stage. The silver screen brings its heroes closer to the audience than heroes have ever been. It presents its figures in intimate detail. The throngs who flocked to see Valentino in New York and in New Zealand, the shopgirls in factory towns and the undergraduates in college towns knew everything about him but his voice. They knew his physical aspect as though he had been the personal lover of each of them, and that which they knew has suffered dissolution.

THIS seems to be a point of view sufficiently interesting to be worth passing on, whether or not it is entirely waterproof. The Drifter has no pet theory in regard to the secret of Valentino's popularity, but he has some doubt of its genuineness and still more of its durability. There is no denying that Valentino was the idol of thousands—yes, millions—of both sexes in their late 'teens and early twenties. Yet to the Drifter it seemed that the popularity of Valentino increased vastly the moment he was reported to be ill and still more when word came of his death. Wasn't much of the apparent interest and emotion merely the result of the tremendous blare of publicity that the newspapers created? These agencies for catering to the public taste have learned how to sharpen that taste in order to cater to it. Within recent years they have devoted more and more attention to the details of the death and burial of any widely prominent man. Recall Mr. Bryan and President Harding as instances.

THUS it seems to the Drifter that in a sensible measure the popularity of Valentino was a sudden and artificial creation; it was a mass or herd attitude rather than an individual one. It was a temporary emotion inspired to no small extent during Valentino's last illness by that tremendous publicity engine, the modern newspaper. It remains to be seen how long Valentino will be remembered.

Will his pictures live after him as, say, the phonograph records of Caruso's voice have survived?

* * * * *

NEVERTHELESS, the career and still more the amazing demonstration in connection with the cutting short of that career is something for a historian or a philosopher to ponder over. It shows as no facts or figures can the appalling reach and grip of the motion picture. It is also a reminder that although reason is supposed to be that which distinguishes man from other animals we are still hardly affected at all by an appeal to it as compared with one to our emotions. Charles W. Eliot gave ninety-two years of intellectual achievement to his country. Dying almost at the same time as Rudolph Valentino, his career was all but forgotten beside that of the motion-picture actor of thirty-one whose appeal was to the emotions at their strongest—or weakest?—point, the thirst for romance.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

How to Have Honest Elections

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The trouble seems to be not with Pennsylvania but with our election system. I suggest that we wipe out the present expensive method of electing officials with booths, ballots, committees, counters, checkers, primaries, conventions, etc., and instead have our prominent, successful, and aspiring citizens send sealed bids to a central bureau stating their offer for the office they desire. This would be a source of income to the state; it is democratic in that all would share in the money whereas now only a relatively few of the voters receive anything for their votes; it would put men in office in direct ratio to their capacities. The wealthiest and therefore the most capable would be able to buy the Presidency, Senatorships, etc., while the less well to do and therefore less capable, but still wealthy and capable, would get the [illegible] and aldermanic

Detroit, Michigan, August 1 ETHAN E. EDLOFF

Mexico and the Church

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Permit me to register my amazement at the fact that your periodical should publish "The Mexican Church Goes on Strike," appearing in your issue for August 18.

Quite possibly Carleton Beals, being in the benighted land of Mexico, particularly in the city of the so-called Quiquillity prevailing there, namely, in Mexico City, had not heard of the statement lately made by the Mexican Government in regard to Monsignor Caruana, Apostolic Delegate. Might not The Nation, however, have had a little more regard for the good name of its American citizen friends and the editor blindly accepted

It is very distasteful for people who have broad vision to be forced to wade through old hoary, benighted, bigoted, and oft-refuted slanders in their search for authentic facts regarding events of current interest. I feel that I have to make an apology for placing the August 18 issue in our reading-room. It is a near insult to the intelligence of our patrons.

HENRY H. REGNET, S.J.,
Librarian, St. Louis University

St. Louis, August 19

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Mexico no longer wishes to tolerate the tyranny, the landlordism, the educational and political hegemony of the Roman church. One of the objects of the Eucharistic Congress in the United States was to bring pressure to bear on Mexico through a show of strength and influence.

At the time when the patriotic guns at Lexington and Concord signaled the dawn of modern democracy, almost all the nations, states, and colonies of the world were blighted by a union of church and state, and as a result persecution born of intolerant dogmatic theology and unreasoning bigotry cursed the world. The history of Christian Europe for hundreds of years constituted one of the most cruel, dark, and bloody pages in the annals of mankind. Whatever dogmatic creed or faith became dominant, persecution of dissenters followed.

Mexico is trying to separate the church from the state and do away with religious schools. Where the government is pledged to divorce of church and state, education should be secular or free from all taint of creedal theology. Religious schools tend to fan the flame of narrow sectarian spirit and to keep alive the religious bigotry that has been a source of discord and a menace to the most sacred rights of the individual.

Newark, New Jersey, August 14 A. J. PETTY

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In The Nation for August 18 Carleton Beals writes about "The Mexican Church on Strike." But it is the Catholic church in Mexico that is on strike—there is no Mexican church any more than there is an American church.

New York, August 23 MULLIGAN MACSHANE

De Valera's Position

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: For more than ten years I have been a constant reader of The Nation, and so far as I have had any news on foreign affairs they have been founded principally on the information gathered from the different distinguished contributors to your paper. Particularly have I followed the news stories of H. W. Nevinson, and while I do not always agree with his opinions or deductions, I did not for a moment doubt his truthfulness.

But in his article on Ireland in a recent Nation I read that Mr. De Valera proposed that he and his followers should take the oath of allegiance in order that they should have representation in the Dail and Senate of the Free State. I cannot conceive how Mr. Nevinson can make such a statement after visiting Ireland. Mr. De Valera, even the opposition press admits, parted from Miss MacSwiney because of his intention to enter the Free State Dail and Senate, when the oath of allegiance was abolished. His present campaign is an effort to convince the electors of Ireland that the oath should be abolished, and if he succeeds and his followers form a majority of those elected to the Dail, then he will enter without the oath.

One other statement of Mr. Nevinson's deserves notice. He says that the learning of Irish would be a burden on the Protestants. I suppose learning is a burden to most people, but why should Irish burden the Protestants more than the Catholics? As a Protestant I resent the implication of stupidity.

St. Paul, Minnesota, August 12 R. BROWN

Religion and Evolution

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Evolution is the ally, and not the enemy of religion. I believe that the religion of the future will be founded upon science. If no divine revelation had ever reached us, the scientific facts and teachings of evolution would be sufficient to prove the existence of a wise, eternal, and beneficent force (which we call "God"), a constantly working intelligence, moving ever forward and upward, with a definite aim and intention; and that aim and intention was, quite clearly and undeniably, the production of the human race upon the earth.

Los Angeles, July 2 BERTRAND SHADWELL

Books and Art

Words for a Young Woman Who Wanted to Die

By [illegible]

Death falls from the air, unwise the first Crow of the young cockerel, bloody the grass while the scared hawk rises
Angry, unsated; her helpless brood will starve
Withered and dry and dead where the cool wind [illegible]
The straw of the nest on the mountain.

God is a hunter unsure, why does death neither hasten nor wait
There where the maimed fox crawls in the brambles
Moaning to earth? . . . There is not
Death enough in the world, men say, we shall judge
Life, we shall choose, we have hands, we can wield
Pistol and knife and rope, we are free, we have souls, we desire
Riches and love and peace, we shall poison the fierce
Sane cruelty of life with the mind's
Sick fevers; we breathe, eat, sleep, only to botch
Being with consciousness, we are the incommensurable
Idiots of the universe, creatures of God's decadence, life's Last epilogue. . . . God, what empty echoes ring when man, the denier, steps
Falsely from his part, struts, poses and declaims—oh, God what lying trumpets blare
His curtain!

First Glance

AMERICAN university presses are for the most part feeble affairs, contenting themselves year in and year out with the publication of researches done on the campus by Ph.D.'s who will never be heard of again. It is a pity, for while these presses can hardly hope to lead in the production of a creative literature, they have it in their power to become central distributors of important and attractive information. There are exceptions, of course, in varying degrees—California, Wisconsin, Chicago, North Carolina, Princeton, Columbia, Harvard, and Yale coming readily to mind. And it must be said that two of these have recently been active to excellent effect.

The Yale Press, aiming at popularity with its "Chronicles of America," its moving pictures, and now its "Pageant of America," has gained rather than lost in dignity, since the enterprises in question have been ably directed. Three new volumes of the "Pageant" are at hand, and I am more than ever impressed by the possibilities of the scheme—which is to give in pictures and captions under pictures the social history of white men on the American continent. The possibilities are not always realized, for good reasons or for bad. Stanley Thomas Williams, for instance, in compiling the volume called "The American Spirit in Letters," suffered from the circumstance that literary history cannot be told in pictures. Portraits of authors notoriously tell little about their books, and even the very best views of their birthplaces tell nothing at all. This is not so true of the minor authors of a faded day [illegible] marked by Gail period in much the same way as the [illegible]. So Mr. Williams succeeds better with Thomas Bailey Aldrich than he does with Melville, to each of whom he gives two pages; he can make a fine showing with Irving in twelve pages; and, because rural New England is more picturesque than the democratic universe, he must lavish six pages on Whittier against four for Whitman. Many of the illustrations are charming and valuable, but the history as such is inevitably superficial. Talbot Faulkner Hamlin's "The American Spirit in Architecture" labors, naturally, under no such handicap. Flat reproductions of buildings and monuments may not tell everything, but they tell in an instant more than words could tell in years; and they are necessary. Mr. Hamlin's text, too, is more critical than that of Mr. Williams. With a fine feeling for detail he traces the forward and backward plunges of architectural taste in America from the first log house, through the colonial generations, the classical revival, the awful seventies, and the ambitious nineties, to the last wonderful creation of Bertram Goodhue. Quite as moving a story is to be read in Malcolm Keir's "The Epic of Industry," which, making short work of the simple days before the industrial revolution, comes on down to the bewildering age of coal, oil, electricity, iron, and steel in which we live. Here are the machines we talk so much about and so seldom see. Here is America blindly trying her strength. Here too is something, though not much, of the war between owner and worker in mill and mine. Here, perhaps, is the most famous tale of them all.

The University of North Carolina Press, in those volumes of its Social Study Series which are devoted to the Negro, is attempting American history on a totally different scale though with equally rich results. Messrs. Odum and Johnson, who opened the series last year with "The Negro and his Songs," follow now with "Negro Workaday Songs" ($3), a minute inquiry into the blues which beyond count multiply each year in the South as singing Negroes celebrate the wanderings, the loves, the labors, the sins, and the woes of their ancient race. Still another volume, "Folk Beliefs of the Southern Negro," by Newbell Niles Puckett ($5), exhaustively explores the world of superstition, bringing back several thousand specific beliefs for the information of anthropologists and the entertainment of lay observers. And more volumes are promised—the well of this subject having no bottom. No series, North or South, deserves better encouragement.

MARK VAN DOREN

Two Stages of Historical Science

The Historian and Historical Evidence. By Allen Johnson. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.

The Theory of History. By Frederick J. Teggart. Yale University Press. $2.50.

EVERY type of historian—"reconstructive" or "new"—is likely to assent to the proposition that he must first have the facts concerning human activity in the past if he is to proceed with either casual narrative or cultural synthesis. Hence all historians will welcome the clear introduction to the fundamental assumptions and underlying methods of historical research which has been executed by Professor Johnson. We have had a number of books on phases of this subject by such writers as Droysen, Bernheim, Wolff, Feder, Langlois and Seignobos, George, Fling, Vincent, and Mace, but they have been either too advanced or too specialized to constitute adequate guidance for the beginner in the academic study of history or for the intelligent general reader who desired to acquaint himself with the criteria involved in assessing the credibility of historical works. Professor Johnson has succeeded admirably in providing just such a comprehensive but elementary manual as we have needed. He deals with such subjects as the sources of historical information, the assumptions and methods of historical criticism, and the assessment and exploitation of historical evidence with maturity of judgment, catholicity of viewpoint, and clarity of statement. The most novel, and one of the most valuable, features of the volume is a relatively long chapter on the evolution of historical method.

While Professor Johnson has been in his professional career a "respectable" narrative and biographical historian, he has been a thoughtful and tolerant practitioner of his craft and has not been unaware of the progress made in the "new" or synthetic and interpretative history. In the last chapter of the present treatise—that on The Use of Hypotheses—he refers to many suggestive aspects of the new history without indignation, and often with tentative approval. Even the Freudian psychology, as an important phase of the technique of the historical biographer, does not floor him. He actually grants that it may have much value when used with scientific and reasonable restraint. Few sober adherents to the gospel of cultural and institutional history could well object to the wisdom embodied in the closing paragraph of the book:

> Historians owe much to the social sciences, no doubt, but the obligation is reciprocal. The social sciences were founded on data formulated by historical research, and they cannot remain indifferent to the critical processes by which that material was obtained. There are cogent reasons for believing, moreover, that historians will continue to furnish data which political scientists, anthropologists, economists, and sociologists will need increasingly. It may well be that historians need a wider point of view—perhaps new points of view—and that they would profit by tests the hypotheses suggested by the social sciences; but more than ever this must weigh evidence with meticulous care. The more daring and the more promising the hypothesis, the greater the obligation to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth.

The professional activities of Professor Teggart have covered the two most widely separated extremes of historical work, namely, the compilation of library catalogues of historical sources and an exposition of historical theory. The latter has been his real love, however, and he has been almost our only important writer on the "pure" theory of history. His first work in this field, entitled "Prolegomena to History," compared the scientific and historical methods, denounced the superficiality and irrelevance of the literary historians, indicated the inadequacy of the philosophical and logical approach to historical materials, and pointed out the dangers in basing the premises of historical science upon the dogmas of evolutionary biology. The book contained much suggestive material, but was diffuse and discursive, and it showed little contact with contemporary work toward the improvement of historical thought and writing. The present book is in many ways an expansion and rearrangement of the "Prolegomena." Professor Teggart's second book, "The Processes of History," endeavored to illustrate the factors and processes of cultural and institutional development. The contentions of the work were sound, but the generalizations were of the obvious and self-evident sort and had been well known and generally accepted by most up-to-date historians for a generation. It would have been an admirable work for the conventional historians who are innocent of the theory of the new history, but few of them have ever heard of it, much less read it.

The fundamental purpose of Professor Teggart's third book is to provide a science of social change. One of the most persistent obstacles to the development of such a science has been the domination of the historical field by the conventional or narrative historian.

At the same time, many of the cultural and institutional historians have also failed to construct a true science of social transformation, because they have normally been the victims either of the Comtean dogma of inevitable progress through definite stages of development or of the Darwinian dogma of orderly, uniform, and continuous social and cultural evolution. What is really needed is a truly inductive and empirical study of the actual processes of social change, divorced from adherence to any particular dogma concerning social genesis. This procedure was initiated by Hume and Turgot and rediscovered independently, so we are informed by the author, by Frederick John Teggart in 1918.

With the basic theses of the book the reviewer is in entire agreement. He differs only with respect to Professor Teggart's insistence upon their uniqueness and originality and upon his own claim to their discovery, acceptance, and application. They had been the working hypotheses of many progressive historians long before Professor Teggart had written a line on the subject. He apparently insists upon playing a lone hand. Less than twenty pages are devoted to the work of the modern synthetic and interpretative historians, Robinson, Cheyney, and Burr being selected as the examples, and these historians are condemned for not having received the fulness of the vision of the Hume-Turgot-Teggart trinity. Professor Teggart is much like Francis Bacon, who wrote eloquently in support of the scientific method, but produced only his feeble "Sylva Sylvarum," denounced Copernicus and Gilbert, and ignored Bruno, Kepler, Galileo, and Harvey.

HARRY ELMER BARNES

The Time of Woman

The Time of Man. By Elizabeth Madox Roberts. The Viking Press. $2.50.

PENELOPE waited at home, eternally weaving by day and unraveling by night, keeping her husband's house, protecting his interests, setting herself apart for him, sure, strong, faithful. In Miss Roberts's lyric tale of a heroic woman, Penelope accompanies her man wherever he must go, strengthens him, protects him, mothers him as well as his children. The story of Ellen Chesser, raised among Kentucky poor whites and remaining one of them, is a story of life lived near the ground, among the rocks, without comfort or permanence. Half gipsy-travelers, picking their way along muddy roads, tenant farmers giving their shares to the owner before they can have a bit for themselves, women worn with child-bearing, men bent with plowing, children scrawny with poor food and cold and insufficient clothing. A sorry lot, and yet, seen through sympathetic eyes, not unlovely.

Miss Roberts is slow in getting her story under way, allowing herself to drift off into details that are confusing because of their multiplicity. Her child, Ellen, weary with the melancholy of childhood, yearning to be back with the gipsy woman who could weave fairy tales for her of a little house and a garden and flowers growing and one's own calf and chickens, seems remote from Ellen, the comforter, the home-maker, bearing her children without flinching or weakness. But if there is a break between the first third of the novel and the rest, the end rises to a dramatic force that is wholly admirable. Ellen and her husband have at last found a place that suits them, they see clearly the possibility that they may own their little farm; and to make a speedy end to this dreaming, the neighbors come in to lynch Jasper for a crime that he did not commit, the echo of one that he was once accused of committing. It is Ellen, his wife, who saves him from the hands of the mob, Ellen by her sharp tongue, by her fearlessness, by her standing firm and refusing to give an inch of ground. And it is Ellen, when the mob has ridden away, who lifts him up, who washes his wounds, who cares for him the days that he must lie in b[illegible]. It is Ellen who protects him from the curious gaze of the children. It is Ellen who goes with him, children and all, flying out under the moon to find another dwelling place.

The feel of the earth, the smell of animals, the sound of the wind blowing, the countless voices of the farm and [illegible] of the fields are obedient to Miss Roberts's will. She has an extraordinary ear: "The rocks fell where she laid them with a faint, flat sound. The mill began to [illegible] with a high thin crying sound that became low and dull as the liquid beat upon the foam. . . ." And her eye is no less sharp. She must believe that she ought to write less than she hears and sees to make her reality [illegible] in the right direction. If she is occasionally confused and verbose, she can also make her young heroine say: "I'm old. I'm so old I'm about done with liven. . . . I'm old and old and old. I've been in life a long, long time. . . ." Thus youth speaks at the age of sixteen, if not always in such poetic language. "And the house fixed up, the shutters mended and the porch don't leak. To sit on a Saturday when the work is done. A vine up over the chimney. . . ." This is Ellen, on the night before her marriage. "He knowed you best, Jasper, best of all. He knowed Hen and Nannie and Joe and Dick, but he knowed you the best and liked you first." Ellen, with her dead baby on her knees.

A book that is somehow realistic although written in poetic language, that is beautiful though it deals with dirt and poverty and ugliness. A saga of the heroic woman, living near the earth.

DOROTHY GRAFFE

Whither Mr. Beebe?

The Arcturus Adventure. By William Beebe. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $6.

LIKE "Galapagos" "The Arcturus Adventure" is exciting reading. The story of a [illegible] through the Sargasso Sea, of a volcano pouring lava into a boiling sea, of hours spent under water in a diver's helmet watching sharks feed about a scientist's bare legs, of dredging in the Hudson's deep-sea gorge—greater than the Grand Canyon, wilder than the South Pole, and only a hundred miles from the Woolworth Building—could hardly not be exciting; and the man who planned these adventures can hardly not be interesting.

Yet William Beebe is in a little danger of being spoiled. He has learned that he is an interesting man who does exciting things; and the poison of self-consciousness threatens to make of him a showman exhibiting himself. Now, there is nothing more difficult for a scientist to do than to write about his work for the general public, and little that is more important. The fraternity of research men—most of whom seem unable to express themselves in simple, comprehensible English—sneers a unanimous sneer at the "popularizer." He is regarded as akin to the doctor who sins the sin of advertising. It isn't clubby. And the result too often is that the public is left to pick its crumbs of science from the newspaper headlines. William Beebe long ago took the risk of crossing the frontier that separates the scientist from the artist in words. His first efforts in literature—"The Log of the Sun" (1906), for [illegible]—were ghastly—full of quotations from the poets and observations about the hand of God in nature. But much of the writing that came out of his Galapagos laboratory broke away from the dead clichés of literary tradition and had the vivid quality which only close observation of intensely lived experience can give. His gift is reporting, not philosophizing. In "Galapagos," a glorious story of a pleasing [illegible], he arrived. In "The Arcturus Adventure" he seems determinedly penitent of that arrival.

Burroughs in his earlier years, Muir, Thoreau wrote in response to an inner creative necessity—not because editors and publishers had told them their experiences might make [illegible] reading. Thoreau's stories of the Maine wilderness, Muir's of his nibble in the Gulf Stream, have a timeless and universal quality that maintains them at higher peaks of American literature. Beebe has had greater adventures than any of these; he has a keenness of the senses and a zest for primitive living which even Muir could hardly rival; but somehow he seems to write like a salesman or a lecturer and [illegible] of a sufficiently [illegible] audience which has paid $3 a head to see it. It isn't good enough. It isn't good enough for William Beebe, who remains one of the rare human scientists capable of writing for laymen.

LOUIS S. GANNETT

Swan Song?

A Mirror to France. By Ford Madox Ford. [illegible] $2.50.

> Here then is presented to you a picture more than curious of how to be happy—of people intensely interested in the problem of how to be happy—of people who intend to remain children to deal with small annoyances, of people with abstract theories of living who intend to retain concrete means of living but to serve it at last, of a people of some culture who get enough pleasure out of their culture to remain a people of some culture, of a people whose poorest farmer has seen personally [illegible] in order that one member of the family may practice an art or indulge in abstract thought; and of a people less represented by its governments [illegible] any other people [illegible]

THIS book then is an impressionistic account of a love affair carried on with a whole people. As the author states, its importance is greater than is immediately apparent; but unfortunately that importance lies in a different direction from the one he would have us believe. For with all the sturdy Toryism that insists on transforming the loved object that passes into a sempiternal reality, Mr. Ford cannot convince us, ingratiating though his argument may be, that his France where flourish "chivalric generosity, frugality, pure thought, and the arts" is not now subject to corrosion by the white-tiled bathroom civilization. What Mr. Ford terms the "real French" may be very imperfectly represented by their governments, but, like those who touch pitch, they must be inevitably defiled by the merest contact with a bureaucracy which since the armistice has steeped France in the mire of two wars and which refuses to forget its national hatreds when other countries have relinquished theirs in sheer fatigue. Mr. Ford's enthusiasms, gracious, supply recorded, make the heart ache for a vanishing glory; and all his forensic vigor has but a summatory and historical value. To him it is a hymn of joy that he sings; but to those who know that the most tenaciously rooted trees are subject to blight and dry rot, it has the forlorn ring of a requiem.

CLIFTON P. FADIMAN

Inside Looking On

Readings in Trade Unionism. By David J. Saposs. With the Collaboration of Bertha Tigay Saposs. George H. Doran Company. $2.

Left Wing Unionism. By David J. Saposs. International Publishers. $1.60.

NO one is better fitted to throw light into the corners of social development than one who is by [illegible] and analyst of the movement he interprets. Few social institutions are fortunate enough to possess within their ranks men who can remain active on the inside even as they stand off and look on. The American labor movement possesses such a scientist-member in Mr. Saposs. His rich and varied experience as worker, student, and teacher is apparent in these two volumes. Long years of field work, numerous interviews with trade-union members and leaders, intimate observation of union activities, minute study of documentary sources, obviously lie behind them. Obviously, too, they are first products of a mill crowded with the grist for further production. Perhaps that is why even the beginnings which they constitute present so rounded a picture of one phase of the life going on within the labor movement of the United States.

Taken singly they yield an important insight into trade-union life; taken together they contribute in addition an intimate understanding of a characteristic and continuing chapter in American labor development. For many years now the American Federation of Labor has represented majority unionism in the United States. Minority unions came and went—the I. W. W., the Workers' International Industrial Union, [illegible] remained.

[illegible] attack. Yet, just because of its preoccupation with the affairs [illegible] fers the materials for the first authentic portrait of the A. F. of L. by itself. Here officials of the [illegible], on collective bargaining, on organization techniques, strikes, injunctions, political action on every [illegible] material for a self-portrait. They [illegible] Left Wing Unionism."

[illegible] tried; today the Communists are its [illegible] developed varying methods of battle; [illegible] and "boring from within." [illegible] of political methods in the American labor move-[illegible]

[illegible] a time-honored method of reform. The Socialists tried it before [illegible] Today their old-time militancy has dis-[illegible] in an anxiety to work with the existing union officialdom; the cloak of their militancy has passed on to the Communists. These new radicals have attempted sturdily, according to Mr. Saposs, to wrest the labor movement from the "deadening influence of an old and fossilized leadership." Mr. Saposs analyzes boring from within into its two dominant types: the [illegible] on propaganda and the one that relies on militancy. The Communists, embracing militancy, have discovered its limitations. They have been effectively driven from many of the more important unions, expelled, isolated, forced to work under cover. Dual unionism may thus be given its trial in time, willy-nilly.

Such an analysis cannot but prove suggestive to practical unionists and also to students of labor. One could wish, however, that Mr. Saposs's analysis of left-wing unionism had been a little fuller, a little more rounded. Surely it may be asked what part American conditions played in the slow progress of labor radicalism; what influence the disappearance of the frontier, the triumph of large-scale industry and mass production, the cessation of immigration from Europe, the new "welfare" tactics of employers, the spread of the "company-union" movement—what influence such forces will have on the future of American labor radicalism. Perhaps Mr. Saposs will take up some of these pressing and unanswered questions in his next.

SYLVIA KOPALD

Auld Lang Syne

The Worship of Nature. By Sir James George Frazer. Volume I. The Macmillan Company. $4.

VOLUME I of Sir James's Gifford Lectures for 1924 and 1925, to be followed, no doubt, by volume II and, not improbably, by volume III; the whole ending in years to come to be condensed into an abridged edition—a portly tome of some seven or eight hundred pages. The thing is almost cosmic in its proportions and regularity.

I remember the late Joseph Jacobs was wont to review encyclopedias. Men of his talents and inclinations should be reviewing Frazer. They would be kept busy. But one might as well give an abstract of a dictionary! The same length: 572 closely printed pages! The same elaborate, quaintly old-fashioned footnotes, with no abbreviations or ibids. The same amazing erudition—no language or author or sheet, however remote or obscure, is safe from Sir James's curiosity. The same preconditioned survey method: the worship of the sky—in general, among the Vedic Indians, among the ancient Iranians, Greeks, Romans, Babylonians, Assyrians, in China, Korea, and so on and on ad infinitum, with the earth as a limit. And also the same schoolboy perfection of diction, grammatically impeccable, [illegible] with [illegible] balance of its cadences.

And yet, some years ago, the news of a fresh volume from Frazer's pen used to kindle my curiosity and arouse expectations of things to come. For, in those days, when Frazer had [illegible] Andrew Lang [illegible] for each one of Frazer's arguments a quotation to balance (and usually contradict) one of his quotations, an anecdote for each one of his theories, and then a better one of his own! And with what grace did that romantic mystery [illegible] demolish what his rival had built up with such consummate [illegible] equipment! Frazer wrote "The Magic Art" (first two harbingers of the Golden Bough library)—Andrew Lang answered with "The Making of Religion" and "Magic and Religion." Frazer published his early essays on [illegible]—Lang was also there with "Myth, Ritual and Religion" and "The Secret of the Totem." Frazer, flying to the ancient Semites upon [illegible] "Taboo and Taboo and Taboo" on four volumes—and Lang answered in an encyclopedic article, the article on "Totemism" in the 11th edition of the Britannica (the one in the 9th edition was Frazer's).

It was a curious combat this. Frazer used bricks, Lang diamonds. With infinite patience Frazer heaped his bricks brought from all corners of the globe into skyscraping Babels, only to have them reduced to ruins by a well-aimed thrust. Andrew Lang is dead. Frazer—now Sir James—still produces hecatombs of books. But my curiosity is no longer kindled nor is there anticipation of things about to happen. No Frazer should outlive his Andrew Lang.

ALEXANDER GOLDENWEISER

Books in Brief

Concerning Parents. A Symposium on Present Day Parenthood. The New Republic, Inc. $1.

This handy paper-covered volume contains the addresses made at the Conference on Modern Parenthood held last fall by the Child Study Association of America. The relations of parents and children in the light of modern psychology are discussed by Dr. Beatrice Hinkle, Dr. Elton G. Mayo, Leta Hollingsworth, and a score of others. Their almost entire unanimity—only one essay in the volume being pitched in the old moralistic key—is a tribute to the authority which scientific conceptions have gained in this field.

The Plague Pamphlets of Thomas Dekker. Edited by F. P. Wilson. Oxford University Press. $3.

The fame of Thomas Dekker's pamphlets describing the rogues and cut-purses, gallants and gulls of early Stuart London has somewhat obscured the excellences of another series of pamphlets from the same practiced pen. Mr. Wilson's edition gathers into one compact and admirably printed little volume six tracts inspired by the terrible epidemics of bubonic plague in London in 1603 and 1625. Of these six pieces only three have previously been reprinted and only two have been included among Dekker's works. These two are "The Wonderful Years" and "A Rod for Run-awayes." A third piece, "The Meeting of Gallants," has been printed before, though without ascription to any author. Mr. Wilson gives evidence for attributing it to Dekker, but admits that it may be by that "T. M." who wrote "The Blacke Book," and who may well have been Thomas Middleton. The remaining three pamphlets are here reprinted for the first time. Of these "Newes from Graves-end" is by far the most interesting. That it is by Dekker is hardly open to question in view of the evidence of thought and style summarized by Mr. Wilson. In eloquence and vividness its prose matches the best of Dekker's acknowledged work and some of the verse is worthy of his reputation as a lyric poet. "London Looke Backe" and "The Blacke Rod" are the slightest of these productions and in them the instinct to exhort and to edify is more powerful than the desire, so strong in Dekker's earlier years, to depict actual conditions faithfully and realistically. Nevertheless the series of "Plague Pamphlets" would not have been complete without these pieces; and that they are by Dekker seems certain.

Social Cleavages in Texas. A Study of the Proposed Division of the State. By Weston J. McConnell. Columbia University Press. $3.

Dr. McConnell has made an important, although admittedly only a restricted, contribution to a subject which has received all too little attention from American historians, that, namely, of regional political geography and its social reactions. It will be recalled that the joint resolution of Congress under which Texas was admitted to the Union provided, among other things, that not exceeding four States "of convenient size," in addition to the State of Texas, might be formed "out of the territory thereof" and entitled to admission in accordance with the terms of the federal Constitution. Although the country at large appears to have taken little note of it, not a decade has passed since Texas was received in which a more or less energetic agitation of the question of division has not been carried on, and Dr. McConnell is of the opinion that in spite of the failure to use the permission which Congress extended, the provision of the joint resolution is still constitutionally valid and may be availed of whenever the people of the State so desire. The reasons for the repeated agitation of the subject are to be found, as Dr. McConnell shows, in the vast and unwieldy size of the present State, the long distances, in some cases more than 600 miles, which must be traveled to reach the capital, the marked physiographical differences which the area of the State presents, the diverse character of the population, sharp clashing of economic and political interests both during and after the slavery period, and pronounced irritation over sectional influences in State legislation. In the face of such striking contrasts State government seems to have an almost impossible problem, and Dr. McConnell's careful study leaves the impression that the demand for division will continue and that a cutting up of the present area into States which shall recognize the inherent physical and social diversity is ultimately to be expected.

State Rights in the Confederacy. By Frank Lawrence Owsley. The University of Chicago Press. $2.50.

Professor Owsley is not the first to suggest that the collapse of the Confederacy was due to internal rather than external causes, but no one has pointed out so convincingly the part which a practical application of the State rights doctrine played in the downfall. Instead of supporting loyally the Confederate Government, the States appear to have systematically obstructed it, and the obstruction was its undoing. A study of the records shows that the States weakened the Confederate armies by maintaining troops of their own, withdrawing thousands of men and great quantities of arms from Confederate service for use in State defense, insisting upon exercising control over the troops in various ways after they had left the State, and impeding the impressment of supplies until the impressment system broke down. "North Carolina had forty cotton mills, and did not allow the Confederate Government a yard of cloth from them for any except North Carolina troops during the entire war." The same policy of obstruction was extended to the blockade, conscription, and the suspension of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus which Professor Owsley regards as necessary. The book, which is thoroughly documented, is one to be reckoned with by whoever shall next undertake to write a history of the Civil War on its political or economic side.

Fundamental Thoughts in Economics. By Gustav Cassel. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $1.50.

Four lectures, delivered at the University of London, in which Professor Cassel sought to embody the significant elements of his contributions to economic theory. They are marked by clarity of exposition and marred by an unnecessary dogmatism.

The Southern Plantation Overseer as Revealed in His Letters. By John Spencer Bassett. Smith College Press.

The plantation overseer has been presented to the American imagination chiefly as the inevitable villain in the romances of the ante-bellum South. Indicted by friend and foe of this social order—witness Mrs. Stowe and Mr. Page—for fiendishness of personal conduct, he has been charged also with mismanagement and swindling which contributed to the precariousness of agricultural effort under the slavery regime. In the present volume facts are brought out which rob the overseer of certain dramatic values but reestablish him as a member of the human family. Professor Bassett bases his study upon a single estate the Mississippi plantation of James K. Polk, between 1833 and 1858. With notable skill in weaving parts into the whole he has used a series of letters, written by overseers or concerning overseers, to construct a complete plantation history. Primary emphasis is upon the half-dozen officials who in this quarter of a century supervised Polk's plantation business. The individual letters are edited with illuminating comment and excellent chapters of introduction and of summary extend to the general slave-holding area the inferences drawn from the single plantation. The service of the book is larger than to delineate a fairly conspicuous figure of the plantation economy. The letters, together with the author's interpretation, throw frequent incidental gleams upon such aspects of the life of the period as the economic structure, the problems of slave control, and the social psychology of both races. No student of the plantation epoch can neglect this comprehensive and lucid study.

Art

Words of Cheer for Worms

SECRET societies, as every one knows, are institutions existing essentially for the purpose of keeping people out of them. And the professions, with their dark lore and dazzling words, have, from without as from within, much the same glamor of esotericity. Wherefore the poor layman, convicted and convinced of unworth by his inability to understand and still more to speak the language of the elect, penitently strives to atone for the sin of existing at all by practicing a worm-like humility. He feasts on contempt, fattens on insult, and glories but in passing these on to others less wormy as yet than himself.

But the limit of what even the wormiest of worms will stand has been passed by some of the lower priests of modern art. Laymen, standing out of the tall grass of technical difficulties in which the painter has to work, and free also from the critic's debauching need of writing oftener and faster than he can possibly think, are here and there beginning to suspect that just because of this they themselves are not less well but better placed than painter and critic to judge of the aesthetic worth of works of art. For the professionals, praise too often praises but the painter's success in a difficult stunt and obviously success in this sense need nowise carry with it aesthetic worth.

The danger of thus mistaking issues may be illustrated by the rediscovery in modern times of the peculiar aesthetic worth of "form," particularly in the sense of volume, and of composition of volumes in depth. Realization of the beauty of form in space has given us numberless bowls of apples and acres of bulging buttocks and billowing breasts—in which we find plastic form and composition ad nauseam, but, alas, often also abounding and wanton ugliness of line, of surface textures, of color, and of subject-matter.

But to say this is to wave the red rag, and at once comes the bull! Subject-matter, we are told, belongs to the "anecdotage" of painting, and our criticism of line and texture is damned as the sign of a cheap and vulgar love of prettiness. If the demand for beauty is admitted at all, we are told at any rate that beauty springs purely from form; that beyond question the form is in the buttocks; and that if we do not see the beauty it is either because we poor worms are yet form-blind or else because ours is still that low level of culture at which the nude is but the naked. And if, perhaps, we happen never to have heard of "form" and of "composition"; or if, having heard of them, we are yet guiltily conscious that our incapacity to discern them and their coy charms may all unawares have caused us to cut them dead when we meet them—if that is indeed our inner case, we then wiggle a little under the lash and feel duly abashed; and the next time we cling virtuously to the calming catchwords and show what good little wormlets we have got to be.

But, on the other hand, it is also just possible that we may be quite aesthetically vertebrate. Formgefühl may long have been our own pet form of aesthetic spasm, and we may be well able to appreciate the composition of a picture without being personally conducted through it and having our noses rubbed upon the formally fragrant spots. If this be our case, laymen though we be so far as goes the handling of abraces and of brush, we shall tell our self-appointed critic that if we are not so excited about form as he is it is only because we are not in respect of it quite so nouveau riche as himself nor aesthetically so easily satisfied; and that when he proclaims form to be the sole source of aesthetic worth he makes of his own crippled gifts or narrow taste a flag and wigwam to the world the fact that he suffers from aesthetic hemiopia. But whether he knows it or not, forms as representation make to beauty a contribution quite distinct in kind from that which they make as composition; and therefore, if they are representative at all, forms cannot without disaster be used in art as if they were abstract.

It is possible, of course, either out of inborn cussedness or under the misguidance of professional amateur-theorists, to train oneself to unconsciousness of the aesthetic values that spring from the nature of the represented objects, the values, namely, called by Mr. Santayana the "expression" of the objects. But such perverse training no more conduces to the fullest appreciation of the beauty of a work than would holding one's nose to the fullest appreciation of the flavor of one's food. We may further insist that beside form, color, and "expression" the texture of surfaces is yet another factor of beauty. And we may thus have occasion to chide our friend for having failed, perhaps, to paint the flesh that he pictures, but instead, by means of the figure, merely insinuated that flesh rather than plaster or putty was what he meant—as wanton a case of the turning of painting to the telling of a story as can well be found.

So ashamed have some painters and critics become of the blindness of other times to the aesthetic importance of form that they have unawares fallen into what the psychoanalysts call overcorrection, and are now unable to find beauty in anything but form. And this was the easier because this matter of the perception of form really furnishes an ideal chance naively to cultivate the thrilling belief that one belongs to the narrow elect of the enlightened. For truly, of the various factors of beauty, form is the most difficult to discern, and if one has once learned to perceive and prize one such thing that the many do not see, the temptation cannot then be withstood to believe the many all wholly blind and oneself omnivident.

C. J. DUCASSE

CONFERENCE

How Shall We Wage Peace?

A Conference to Discuss Methods of Fellowship Action

at the Hotel Plimpton, Watch Hill, R. I.
September 9, 10, 11, 12, 1926

The aim of the Conference is to pool the experience of those who are working for a friendly coordinated society and to develop an effective technique of action.

Four groups will consider ways of working: I Through Writing, Pamphlets, etc.; II Through Education; III Through Personal Action in Situations of Conflict; IV Through Established Organizations.

Among those who will act as leaders are Bruno Lasker, John Nevin Sayre, Norman Thomas, Wilbur K. Thomas, Maud Richards, Roger Baldwin, Agnes Pollock Cooper, Amy Woods, Dr. G. Normil Sylvain, Thomas Q. Harrison, James Meyers, S. M. Cooney, John F. Vorhis, George I. Collins, Paul Jones.

Conference Fee $2.00
Board and Room $4.00 per day

To get the full program and to make reservations write to

THE FELLOWSHIP OF RECONCILIATION
383 Bible House, Astor Place
New York City

International Relations Section

South Tyrol Again

By L. O. N.

IT is said that the peace treaties have created six Alsace-Lorraines in Europe. None of these, however, has become such a grave menace to the peace of the world as South Tyrol, now under the heel of a government which does not appear to care an iota what the world thinks about it. South Tyrol, a country inhabited, according to the recent official Italian census, 95 per cent by Germans and 5 per cent by Italians, has no other help left but public opinion. And the latter is weak indeed in present-day Europe.

The conditions under which the South Tyrolese have lived since the establishment of the Fascist dictatorship are too well known to render it necessary to enumerate them all. Yet some features of Italy's policy toward its new and "redeemed" province are worth recalling. A petition which all the Tyrolese and the Ladinian communities of the annexed province sent as a last desperate effort in February, 1919, to Woodrow Wilson, the man chiefly responsible for the handing over of South Tyrol to its most bitter enemy, gives the background for the present situation:

> And now our home with its thousand-year-old history and civilization, our people with their inbred love of freedom must become Italian? A cry of pain sounds through the whole land at the thought.
>
> It cannot, it must not be that the name of South Tyrol shall be wiped out of history after a brilliant past of a thousand years, and that the free sons of this mountain country shall be forced under a foreign yoke, robbed of their language, their art, and their civilization.
>
> In this decisive hour for us, the whole people turns to you, Mr. President, asking you to be the protector of our people. You coined the great phrase "self-determination of the peoples." You proclaimed world reconciliation. Do not allow more than 200,000 people to be deprived of their national rights.
>
> You, as an American, as a follower of your hero of liberty, George Washington, will understand that liberty is the highest possession of a people and that a free people prefer to perish than to suffer the shame of bondage.
>
> For the Italians, South Tyrol is but a tract of land. For us, it is our home.
>
> This plea is carried over ice-covered mountains to you. Be the just judge for our nationality and our country. Give liberty to South Tyrol as you gave it to others, and the people of South Tyrol will honor your name from generation to generation as the savior of their home.

Wilson never replied to this S O S. Six months later the Austrian Government sent a note to the Allied Powers, who were then meeting in Paris, in which it made a last formal protest against cutting South Tyrol off from its other half. In their reply the Powers said:

> The Allied and Associated Powers are of the opinion that the frontier between Italy and Austria as it was presented to the Austrian delegation in the conditions of peace does not allow of any alteration.
>
> It is clearly to be seen from the declarations made by the Italian Premier in the Parliament at Rome that the Italian Government intends to follow a very liberal policy in its relations with its new subjects of German race as regards language, cultural and economic interests.

How Italy kept her vow is now known. It is sufficient to quote Signor Mussolini himself:

> I saw the danger in South Tyrol; everything had a German character there, officials, teachers, the clergy, the post office, and the railways. Only German was spoken. I have now changed things: I have introduced a zone thirty kilometers wide along the Austrian frontier where people are allowed to settle only by special permission. The Italian language is compulsory in the whole province; all post office officials and railway employees are Italians; Italian families are established everywhere; we intend to send 1,000 families of former soldiers into the land to colonize it. The country must become Italian.

Mussolini has succeeded, at least externally, in his policy. He has had the use of the name of the country strictly forbidden. The name comes from the castle Tyrol, which, awkwardly enough for Mussolini, lies in South Tyrol itself, and was even used by Dante in his Inferno. All the South Tyrolese dailies have been suppressed, all the Tyrolese schools and kindergartens have been closed, and the teaching of the native language, even in private, is prohibited. (And this while a royal decree of January 31, 1924, permits the erection of schools and the teaching of Arabic in Cyrenaica and Tripolitania, two Italian colonies in Africa.)

Italian is the only language that may be used in the law courts. In the churches even prayers must be made only in Italian, although the people in general do not speak this language.

Far more serious is the effect of the Italian school law. The results of Italian education, which is notorious for its low standards, are pitiful. According to official Italian statistics (published in the Corriere della Sera of February 12, 1926) the population of Sardinia is 49 per cent illiterate. In reality the percentage of illiteracy is far higher in some parts of Italy. South Tyrol, on the other hand, had practically no illiterates before the war. But the situation has changed. In 1926, although it was still at the head of the Italian provinces, South Tyrol was 2 per cent illiterate already and there is little doubt that the figure will rise rapidly. The Italian teachers, who in general have little education themselves, cannot make themselves understood by the Tyrolese children. A number of children are taught in so-called "catacomb" schools, in back rooms and other hidden places, but successful education is impossible under such conditions.

Another of the recent laws for South Tyrol concerns family names, which can be changed at the discretion of the authorities to Italian names—re-Italianized, as Mussolini calls it. This law is the first of its kind in history.

All efforts to change the present regime in South Tyrol have so far failed. In his recent speech on South Tyrol Mussolini boasted:

> I declare with absolute certainty that the Italian policy in South Tyrol will not be altered by a hair's breadth. With cold calculation, according to plan and in Fascist style, we shall put our legislation into effect in South Tyrol. We will make this province Italian.

In the same speech he said that the Germans in South Tyrol represent no national minority, but an ethnic relic!

The situation is constantly aggravated by acts of provocation on the part of the new governors. In July the King of Italy was in Bozen, the heart of German South Tyrol, to erect a monument to a certain Cesare Battisti. This man was born in Trient (now Trento) and never had anything to do with Tyrol. He was prosecuted in what was then Austria for criminal fraud. During the war he deserted in the firing line and was captured later and shot under martial law. Although his wife and son protested against the exploitation of his memory for political purposes, the Italian authorities are erecting a monument to him on the foundation where a war memorial to the Tyrolese soldiers who fell in the war had already been begun. Tyrolese school children were forced to collect money for the monument and 100,000 lire were taken from the city funds of Bozen.

The future of South Tyrol is dark, but whatever changes Fascism may effect there, it must be remembered that while laws change, nations live eternally. The present risorgimento of Italy, admirable as it may look to the outsider and admirable as it is in one way, will never legitimatize the possession of South Tyrol. Today South Tyrol is the cancer of Europe, and if one were to name now the probable causes of the next war the Tyrolese situation would take a chief place among them.

Abyssinia Appeals to the League

SINCE Abyssinia became a member of the League of Nations, she has remained undisturbed in her inland state, surrounded by British, French, and Italian territories. Recently she received notes from Great Britain and Italy, announcing that they had decided to take certain concessions in her territory. Great Britain has long desired to control the waters of the Blue Nile for the irrigation of her Sudan cotton fields by a dam at the headwaters of the river, which happened to be Lake Tsana in Abyssinia. In return Italy would be permitted to build a railway across Abyssinia connecting her territories of Eritrea and Somaliland. This they had arranged between them, without consulting Abyssinia. The Abyssinian Government turned to the League, with the note reprinted below from the Manchester Guardian Weekly for August 6.

Our Government recently received from the British and Italian Governments identical notes informing it that these Governments had arrived at an agreement to support each other with a view of obtaining a concession for the British Government to undertake the conservancy of waters of our Lake Tsana and for the Italian Government to construct a railway through our empire. We have been profoundly moved by the conclusion of this agreement, arrived at without our being consulted or informed, and by the action of the two Governments in sending us a joint notification.

In the first place, on our admission to the League we were told that all nations were to be on a footing of equality within the League, and that their independence was to be universally respected, since the purpose of the League is to establish and maintain peace among men in accordance with the will of God. We were not told that certain members of the League might make a separate agreement to impose their views on another member even if the latter considered those views incompatible with its national interests. Secondly, one of the subjects covered by the agreement had already been discussed between the British Government and our own, and the fact that no conclusion had yet been reached was due to reasons of whose nature and importance we were fully aware. We had, however, never given any definite reply.

We cannot help thinking, therefore, that in agreeing to support each other in these matters, and in giving us joint notification of that agreement, the two Governments are endeavoring to exert pressure on us in order to induce us to comply with their demands prematurely, without leaving any time for reflection or consideration for our people's needs.

The people of Abyssinia are anxious to do right, and we have every intention of guiding them along the path of improvement and progress, but throughout their history they have seldom met with foreigners who did not desire to possess themselves of Abyssinian territory and to destroy their independence. With God's help, and thanks to the courage of our soldiers, we have always—come what might—stood proud and free upon our native mountains. For this reason prudence is needed when we have to convince our people that foreigners who wish to establish themselves for economic reasons in our country or on the frontiers between it and their possessions are genuinely innocent of concealed political aims, and we doubt whether agreements and joint representations such as those now in question are the best means of instilling that conviction.

Nor must it be forgotten that we have only recently been introduced to modern civilization and that our history, glorious though it be, has not prepared us for ready adjustment to conditions which are often quite beyond the range of our experience. Nature herself has never gone forward by sudden bounds, and no country has been metamorphosed in a night. With our well-known eagerness for progress, given time and the friendly advice of countries whose geographical position has enabled them to outdistance us in the race, we shall be able to secure gradual but continual improvements, which will make Abyssinia great in the future as she has been throughout the past, but if we try to go too fast accidents may happen. We should like to hear from members of the League whether they think it right that means of pressure should be exerted upon us which they themselves would doubtless never accept.

We have the honor to bring to the notice of all states members of the League correspondence which we received in order that they may decide whether that correspondence is compatible with the independence of our country, inasmuch as it includes a stipulation that part of our empire is to be allotted to the economic influence of a given Power. We cannot but realize that economic influence and political influence are very closely bound up together, and it is our duty to protest most strongly against an agreement which, in our view, conflicts with the essential principles of the League of Nations.

The British reply, which was read in Parliament by Sir Austen Chamberlain, the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, is also reprinted from the Manchester Guardian Weekly.

There is nothing in the Anglo-Italian notes to suggest coercion or the exercise of pressure on the Abyssinian Government. Sir Austen Chamberlain has stated in Parliament that the agreement was certainly not to be used and could not be used for the purpose of coercing the Abyssinian Government. He believed the agreement to be in the interests of all three parties, but added that, of course, the Abyssinian Government had a perfect right to judge of what was in the interests of Abyssinia. His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires was instructed by telegram on July 14 to bring this statement to the knowledge of Ras Tafari. As to the suggestion that the British and Italian Governments are trying to force the Abyssinian Government to yield to their requests in a hurry and without being afforded time for reflection and study of the requirements of the Abyssinian people, I am to point out that in notes exchanged between the British Minister at Addis Ababa and the Abyssinian Government on March 18, 1902, the Emperor Menelik confirmed an oral undertaking given some days previously.

Since the date of this undertaking, which shows that twenty-four years ago the Emperor Menelik contemplated the construction by the British Government of a barrage at Tsana, His Majesty's Government on several occasions made specific proposals in regard to this work, the full effect of which it is now possible to foretell as the result of detailed observations which have been carried out by scientific missions dispatched to the lake with the consent and assistance of the Abyssinian Government.

In these circumstances his Majesty's Government feel that they cannot fairly be charged with proceeding, in regard to Lake Tsana, with undue precipitancy. In the penultimate paragraph of their protest the Abyssinian Government inquire whether the Anglo-Italian notes can be regarded as compatible with the independence of Abyssinia, especially when these notes state that a portion of Abyssinia will be reserved to the economic influence of a particular Power. Sir Austen Chamberlain desires to emphasize that the Anglo-Italian notes do not recognize any part of Abyssinia to Italian economic influence. His Britannic Majesty's Government, so far as they are concerned and under certain conditions, recognize an exclusive Italian economic influence in the west of Abyssinia and in the whole territory to be crossed by the above-mentioned railway joining Eritrea and Italian Somaliland. This recognition cannot affect the rights of third parties or bind the Government of Abyssinia. It imposes no obligation on anyone except the British Government, who in return for the Italian undertaking in regard to Lake Tsana engage not to compete or to support competition with Italian enterprise in the regions specified. Sir Austen Chamberlain will be happy to repeat these explanations and assurances to Abyssinia in the presence of the Council at its meeting when it takes into consideration the note addressed to you by the Government of Abyssinia.

Contributors to This Issue

HENDRIK W. VAN LOON, author of "The Story of Mankind" and "Tolerance," takes a snapshot of the universe once a week for The Nation.

LEWIS S. GANNETT, associate editor of The Nation, recently spent six months in the Orient to get a closer understanding of conditions there.

RICHARD DE BRISAY is a member of the staff of the Canadian Forum.

RUTH SAPIN has contributed short stories and articles to various periodicals.

PHILIP SNOWDEN, Chancellor of the Exchequer in the late Labor Government of England, is a frequent contributor to The Nation.

EDWIN MUIR is the author of "We Moderns" and "First Poems."

LOUIS H. BEAN is an agricultural economist in the United States Department of Agriculture.

BEVIER ROBINSON is a graduate of Stanford University and a teacher of political science who has been spending the summer in Wisconsin.

JAMES RORTY won The Nation's poetry prize in 1921.

HARRY ELMER BARNES is the author of "History and Social Intelligence" and other books.

DOROTHY GRAFFE'S first novel, "Strangers," will be published this autumn.

CLIFTON P. FADIMAN is an instructor in the Ethical Culture School, New York City.

SYLVIA KOPALD received her doctor's degree from Columbia University. She is the author of "Rebellion in Labor Unions."

ALEXANDER GOLDENWEISER, professor of anthropology at the New School for Social Research, is the author of "Early Civilization."

C. J. DUCASSE is a member of the department of philosophy at the University of Washington.

The Nation's

Fall Book Number

October 13, 1926

THE TRAINING SCHOOL FOR JEWISH SOCIAL WORK offers a fifteen months' course of study in Jewish Family Case Work, Child Care, Community Centers, Federations and Health Centers.

The course is open to graduates of colleges of recognized standing. Several tuition scholarships and maintenance fellowships are available to especially qualified students.

Social workers who are not college graduates will be given special consideration in the preparation of courses of study suitable to their individual needs.

THE FALL QUARTER BEGINS OCTOBER 5, 1926

For further information address the Director

THE TRAINING SCHOOL FOR JEWISH SOCIAL WORK

(Initiated by the National Conference of Jewish Social Service)

210 West 91st Street, New York City

The Bedford Barrow Co-operative Apartments

in Greenwich Village

35 Apartments. 28 Sold, 7 for Sale

Third Year of Successful Operation

Rooms 3-4-5
Monthly charges
$63.25 to $73.95

Initial Investment
$1,405 to $2,000

CO-OPERATIVE HOME-OWNERSHIP

Will Reduce Your Rent Burden to Cost of Upkeep

Consumers' Co-Operative Housing Association, Inc.

64 Barrow Street Walker 7394

CALL WEEK DAYS 1 TO 6 P. M.

accept nothing but

Non Depressant
non-Habit Forming

In Convenient
Aluminum Boxes

At every drug store

Midol
for HEADACHE

GENERAL DRUG CO., - 94 N. Moore Street, New York

Telephoning over a ray of light

Building on the Telephone Principle

Forty years ago Alexander Graham Bell discovered the principle of the telephone. His first telephone employed wire as the connecting path over which words passed. Soon came later he used a beam of light instead of wire to carry speech between telephone instruments.

Today, both wire and wireless telephony are employed on every hand in the service of the nation. Wire telephony, with its thousands of central offices, its complex switchboards and millions of miles of wire, supplies the facilities, carrying for the American people 70,000,000 conversations every day. Wireless telephony is broadcasting entertainment and carrying important information to the remotest regions.

But new applications of the telephone principle are still being found. In the loud speaker, in the deaf set, the electrical stethoscope, the improved phonograph, the telephone principle has been adapted by the Bell Telephone Laboratories to the uses of the physician, the public speaker and the musician. The scientific research and engineering skill, which enable America to lead the world in telephone service, are also bringing forth from the telephone principle other devices of great usefulness.

AMERICAN TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH COMPANY
AND ASSOCIATED COMPANIES

BELL SYSTEM

IN ITS SEMI-CENTENNIAL YEAR THE BELL SYSTEM LOOKS FORWARD TO CONTINUED PROGRESS IN TELEPHONE COMMUNICATION

REAL ESTATE

We [illegible] W. 109th St., N. Y. City.

ANY CHANGE OF ADDRESS

should be mailed to our Subscription Department at least two weeks before it is to become effective. This will insure uninterrupted delivery of The Nation to you. Be sure to send both old and new addresses and remember the exact date upon which you desire the change made.

SUBSCRIPTION DEPARTMENT
The Nation
20 Vesey Street New York, N. Y.

ADULT CAMPS AND VACATION PLACES

ECHO LAKE TAVERN

THIRD SEASON
Set among famous scenes of Adirondack beauty
5 miles above Lake George
Equipped with every known acility for comfort and sports. Reservations strictly limited to 125 campers.
Rates: $30 per week.
Modern sanitation in each log cabin.
Round Trip, New York to Lake George, $12.28
Address
TAVERN, WARRENSBURG, N. Y., or
Phone Wisconsin 3754-2164
LOLA BARISH MOE NUDELL

INDIAN HEAD CAMP
ON
ECHO LAKE
$28.50 per week
Under rate $5.00
Adults only
Land and Water Sports. Safe Beach
WATCH FOR THE INDIAN HEAD
WONDER CAMP OF THE ADIRONDACKS
P. O. Box 114, Warrensburg, N. Y.
N. Y. Central to Lake George or Day or Night Boat to Albany and train to Lake George. Indian Head car will await you. Send for booklet. City address, R. Helfant, 885 Broad Avenue, Bronx, N. Y. Tel. Melrose 1821

THE STUDENTS' CAMP
OLIVEREA, VIA BIG INDIAN, N. Y.
In the heart of the Catskills
Situated in a beautiful mountain hollow. Bathing, tennis, hikes and sports. A fine place for Labor Day week-end.
At present there are a group of twenty young men and women here, teachers, students, musicians and writers.
For those desiring intimate contact with nature as well as congenial intellectual companionship.
$20 per week. Vegetarian meals. Camp is reached by Hudson River Day Line to Kingston, connecting for trains to Big Indian. Send reservations to Walter Siegmeister.

THE LLOYD, Bellport, L. I.
On South Bay. Open June 23d
Cool, Comfortable, Charming
Regular guests and week-end parties.

Your Fall Problems

If you want to rent a house or an apartment or if you have one to rent or sell, advertise in the classified section of The Nation, read by honest landlords and desirable tenants. Rates on application. Special three-time rate. Dept. F. P., The Nation.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXIII NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 15, 1926 No. 3193

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS

EDITORIALS:

Germany Enters the League

Coolidge Heads Among the Mediocrity

Dumping Chem

Who's What?

MODERN TRAFFIC. By Heodel Wellem van Loon

"I BELIEVE IN FREE SPEECH, BUT ..." By Hamilton Allen

BARON BANANA IN PUERTO PARRICO. By Carleton Beals

LAND OF THE FREE. By Arthur Garfield

IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter

CORRESPONDENCE

BOOKS AND DRAMA:

Comparative Religions. By Owen Mears

A Challenge to Liberalism. By Louis Fischer

A Misunderstood Man. By Raymond A. Preston

A Neighbor's Novel. By Mary R

Peter and Caesar. By James Fuller

The Dumpling Queen. By Ruth Hale

An Immigration Source Book. By Jane Perry Clark

Books in Brief

Drama: Potemkin. By Ernestine Evans

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:

Whose Sincere Will Rules

No Means for Peking!

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor: FREDA KIRCHWEY

Literary Editor: MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors:

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: No. 38 South Dearborn Street. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London W. C. 1, England.

PROSPERITY? YES! The Internal Revenue Bureau produces fabulous figures of growing wealth. But, unfortunately for prosperity as a campaign slogan, it is prosperity for the few. Some 400,000 corporations made returns; 1,200 of these record profits of more than $5,000,000 in 1926—more profit than all the other 398,000 put together. One little group of 168 corporations made more than $13,500,000 each in the last fiscal year. The Aluminum Company of America is not named, but doubtless it is one of the 168. No wonder Mr. Mellon and Mr. Insull and other directors of the 168 are willing and able to write out checks for mere tens of thousands wherever a Coolidge-prosperity candidate is threatened with defeat. No wonder Calvin is satisfied, and the Presidential spokesman announces that he will not ask Congress to place any curb on the trusts. America is the richest country in the world, with bigger and better billionaires than ever in its history; why shouldn't we be proud of them and proud to let them rule us?

THE DISCUSSIONS AT GENEVA, as we go to press, indicate an extraordinary and unexpected desire to conciliate the United States and obtain its adhesion to the World Court in spite of reservations on our part which are in effect amendments. Such objection as has been publicly voiced against our reservations has come mainly from the lesser nations. The representatives of the larger countries have been making every effort to devise a method whereby the United States may be taken in, reservations and all, before our Senate has a chance to debate the question again and perhaps decline to enter the World Court on any basis. It remains to be seen, of course, whether this country will make any important use of the tribunal. While our present attitude toward foreign affairs persists, the chances are in the negative. Whereas we once led the world in the effort to settle international disputes through arbitration, we have latterly adopted a policy of laying down the law and demanding compliance. The field of most of our present and prospective disputes is Latin America, but we want no international arbitration there. Instead we stand upon an utter misinterpretation of the Monroe Doctrine (which was intended to safeguard the independence of small nations) and assert our "right" to rule the roost.

NEWTON BAKER evidently does not plan an immediate return to political life. Otherwise he would not have blurted out the various uncomfortably true things which he had to say about the inter-Allied debts. Mr. Coolidge's Spokesman naturally seized upon the statement with gusto, and expressed the hope that the Democrats would make debt-cancelation an issue in the campaign. They will hardly make so colossal a blunder; but those of us who are not seeking political office may continue to point out that the Administration debt-policy is one of the most magnificent exhibits of the modern technique of kidding the people which it has ever been our privilege to witness. The debt agreements were negotiated under a Congressional resolution which required the commission to demand payment in full, and on their faces carry payment of the principal, though with interest rates so low as to amount to heavy cancelation. Congress was fooled into ratifying them upon this illusory form of accounting; but no sooner had Congress signed on the dotted line than the Administration officials began bombarding the newspapers with new account-sheets, demonstrating that we were not really squeezing the European nations at all but were extremely generous. In fact, though we have scaled down the tables, we are still asking all the European countries to pledge their future taxpayers for sixty-two years in order to pay these debts.

"ONLY ONE THING seems quite certain," Mr. Baker says. "The generation in Germany which did not cause the war will not mortgage itself and its children for two-thirds of a century." Bankers, at least, are beginning to realize the idiocy of the Versailles program and the exaggerated hopes of even the Dawes revision. But, Mr. Baker says, America is applying the "same fallacious and disastrous methods to our Allies." We are asking them to pledge future generations to pay our war-time loans. The British settlement he regards as a "magnificent disaster" because it set a precedent which less firmly bulwarked countries can never follow. And he thinks the time ripe for a general reconsideration, in which we should cancel the Allied debts to us, they cancel their war debts to one another, and in turn "release some part of the burdens imposed upon Germany." In time the world will probably come to something like that; Mr. Mellon and Mr. Hoover doubtless have it in the backs of their heads and doubtless have let their European friends know it; but no man out to get votes in this fall's election is likely to dare talk such common sense. Neither Democrats nor Republicans like to face the fact that the war was a colossal failure, and that neither the money spent in it nor the lives lost in it can ever be recovered. Even the ideals are reported missing.

"AS YOU LIKE IT" is the motto of the political dopesters in commenting on the results of the California primaries. If you like Hiram Johnson and detest the World Court you observe that his candidate won the nomination for Governor, which carries control of the State organization, and that the candidate whom he supported for the Senatorial list, together with the independent Dry who was also anti-court, polled more votes than Senator Shortridge, the pro-Coolidge, pro-court aspirant. On the other hand, if you like the Court and Mr. Coolidge, and hate Hiram, you can point out—and do—that Senator Shortridge did win, despite the ferocious attacks made upon him by the doughty junior Senator. The fact is that the primary showed Hiram Johnson regaining some of his lost grip. The defeat of Judge Busick, the Sacramento injunction-judge, is another hopeful sign. The Democratic primary results were as open to mixed interpretations. Mr. McAdoo and his friends charged that Mr. Dockweiler, candidate for the Senatorial nomination, and Mr. Wardell, [illegible] for the gubernatorial race, were Smith men, part of a plot to deliver California into the hands of Tammany Hall. Well, Mr. Dockweiler lost by a narrow margin, and, by an even smaller margin, Mr. Wardell won. And what does that prove? Chiefly, it seems to us, that Mr. McAdoo, while he can probably have California's vote at the 1928 convention, does not rule the faithful of his home State with too sure a rod, and that the fabulous popularity of "Al" in Eastern cities is spreading to the West.

THE PASSION FOR PEACE has made itself heard again, this time in a manifesto which denounces compulsory military service and asks the League of Nations to abolish the practice in all countries "as a first step toward true disarmament." It is signed by illustrious names from many countries and many fields of achievement: there are British Labor men like Philip Snowden and Arthur Ponsonby, scientists like Einstein, philosophers like Bertrand Russell, Romain Rolland and H. G. Wells; there are German military men who have seen a new light; there are Gandhi of India and Unamuno of Spain and Viscountess Margueritte of France—liberals of every description, but few in a position of political power. Which proves that the lovers of peace are still lovers of peace, and that the rest of the world is not much changed. In this country the manifesto partakes of the academic, since we are emphatically not League members. But, although we do not have compulsory military service in time of peace, we still have what is as bad, compulsory military training in many of our colleges and public high schools. Against that American peace-lovers must fight their principal battle.

CANTON'S RUSSIAN-TRAINED SOLDIERS have swept rapidly northward to the Yangtze River in Central China, attacking Wu Pei-fu, [illegible] American favorite, in his headquarters at Wuchang. Thus China stages another of its kaleidoscopic upsets. At the moment when Chang Tso-lin, Japan's friend, has succeeded in persuading Moscow to recall its too effective ambassador, Karakhan, and immediately after the northern Nationalist army had retreated from its stronghold in the Nankow Pass, the tide turns in the middle west of China. The "Reds," a year ago masters only of Canton (which, to be sure, has the population of Great Britain), now control half of the continent-nation. With Wuchang, too, goes control of the great Hanyang arsenal. Success in China always brings new foes in its wake; and most military shifts are as fleeting as a thunderstorm; sometimes, however, they express a popular feeling that outweighs money and munitions. Wu and Chang "lost face" because of their foreign support; Canton has gained because its armies fought for a nationalist idea rather than for a general's reputation. Significantly the British have landed marines in Canton just when Canton's armies are pressing Wu Pei-fu.

DIFFERENCES IN THE RANKS of the Russian Communist Party are no menace to the stability of the Bolshevik Government, but they reflect a significant stage in the development of the revolution. It would be oversimplication yet almost true to say that the Kamenev-Zinoviev-Trotzky Opposition wishes at all costs to industrialize the country quickly, whereas the Stalin Administration, although agreeing that a larger and stronger proletariat is the best safeguard of the revolution, argues that the peasant is already paying enough in the form of higher prices for manufactured goods, and cannot be forced to carry any more of the expense of the proletariat's tuition. The fact is that industry is advancing very rapidly and production is increasing. Last year alone 400,000 new workers were absorbed by industry. But even so this progress has not kept pace with the prosperity of the villages. The purchasing power of the mujik is probably twice as high this year as last. Harvests have been good and the coming crop may be the best in years. Bread prices in Russia, however, are higher than those of the world market, and the government, which is the sole exporter, therefore cannot afford to buy up the village's surplus. The peasant, furthermore, wants goods in exchange for his grain, but the city cannot supply him with as large a volume of factory products as he could buy. To import the goods deficit would interfere with home industrialization, and might, if grain exports were limited because of price variations, cause inflation.

THE STALIN MAJORITY is attempting to cut the Gordian knot by slashing city prices and introducing a rigid regime of economy in the state and industrial apparatus. Such measures are calculated to yield cheaper goods to the village and thus to placate the peasant. But they threaten to rob the proletariat of some of the benefits which the revolution brought it. This is the vicious circle which may not be overcome for years. In a country where the proletariat is in power but where the peasantry is the basis of the entire economy there must be an incessant tug of war. The present Opposition would make small concessions to the peasantry. The Administration feels that the situation demands larger concessions. During the next few years policy will probably depend on almost seasonal conditions, on the nature of the harvest, on the level of prices in Russia and abroad, on the credits Moscow can obtain, on the increase in individual working-class productivity. If, as is predicted, the autumn brings Trotzky his chance to acquire greater weight in the party councils, this may lead to a slight shift of policy; but Stalin, Rykov, and Bucharin are too strongly entrenched to be removed, nor is it likely that economic developments will permit any radical departure from their policy.

THE BRITISH COAL MINERS have been slowly beaten to the ground by superior economic force. In the approaching negotiations in London they face the probability of reduced wages and lengthened hours with a complete abandonment of their reorganization program. In fact, they have authorized their leaders to settle for anything so long as a national agreement is secured, and it is not certain that the coal-owners will concede this much. The Government cannot or will not compel the coal-owners to yield an inch. Meanwhile the miners' resistance is breaking and 30,000 have gone back to work in the Midlands. This is an ominous sign in any British strike. The Tory die-hards are gleeful, feeling that they are teaching "those Reds" a lesson. Fortunately the rest of the British people are learning the lesson too and Labor continues to gain in the bye-elections.

THE PRINCE OF WALES is first-page copy—when he falls off a horse, flies to Paris, goes swimming, or dances with a pretty girl. But when the heir to the British throne contributes to the relief of miners' wives and children and boldly states his opposition to a decision-by-starvation the fact does not seem to be big news. When Ellen Wilkinson, M.P., mentioned it in the course of a plea for help for the miners her American audiences simply disbelieved her. The item, concealed under a headline reading Continues Grip on British Coal in the New York Times of May 30, escaped even the editors of The Nation. The Prince sent the Somersetshire Coalfields Distress Committee £10, with a note saying that

> His Royal Highness necessarily cannot take sides in any dispute, but we all owe a debt to the miners in the past, and everyone must feel sympathy for the wives and children in their hour of distress. Besides, it would not be a satisfactory end to any dispute that one side should be forced to give in on account of the suffering of their dependents.

Will the Prince's American admirers, who followed him into the shops to buy socks and neckties just like his, copy him in this?

ANOTHER EXPLOSION OF LABOR discontent in the textile industry started in the large Manville-Jenckes mill, north of Pawtucket, Rhode Island, when the loom-fixers of the United Textile Workers went on strike because the company employed certain non-union loom-fixers. The strike spread like a prairie fire. Twelve hundred workers at Woonsocket, employed by the same company, walked out in sympathy. At Manville where the strike started a report was spread that strike-breakers were coming in armored cars. Strikers gathered in a mob, smashed a thousand windows, and tried to burn the mill. State police, deputy sheriffs, and militia arrived with two machine guns and poison gas; they fought a pitched battle with the strikers and their sympathizers in which five persons were wounded. The strike was settled by a compromise through the intervention of Governor Pothier. The loom-fixer most objected to was given other employment in the mill. The methods of these Rhode Island strikers were deplorable but their strike had one remarkable feature. It was entirely a strike for the union; no wage question was involved. Such loyalty to the United Textile Workers is a hopeful sign in an industry which needs organization more than any other.

RICKSHAS ARE GOING OUT in Japan—the motor age is coming in. Ten years ago in Japan 118,904 of these two-wheeled, man-power gigs were licensed; today fewer than 85,000. In Osaka, the greatest industrial city, the number has been almost cut in half. Horse-drawn carts just hold their own; but the motor vehicle is coming with a rush. Ten years ago there were 24 motor trucks in all Japan, today there are more than 6,000; the number of pleasure cars has leaped from 681 to 15,000. Inter-city buses have already appeared on Japanese roads. Thus the Orient sweeps into the mechanical age. It was only fifty years ago that the first ricksha appeared, its jog-trot speed destined to drive out the slow walk of the sedan chairs, kago, and norimona; now a running man is already too slow.

THE GIGANTIC NOVEL in at least two volumes with which Mr. Wells has been threatening England appears, upon the publication of its first part, to have made a sensation among London readers. This is not merely, we hear, because "The World of William Clissold" mentions a number of living persons by name—Bernard Shaw, Conan Doyle, Dean Inge, Sydney Webb, and Lord Balfour—but because Mr. Wells has packed into the book his whole philosophy as it now stands. How it will stand months hence another novel may be required to show. At any rate here is the spectacle of one of the most restless of modern minds pouring itself into one more huge mold. It is a sign, perhaps, of the times that no mold lasts very long; it certainly is a sign of Mr. Wells that he must redefine almost every year his concept of revolution. He has lost, it seems, a great deal of his faith in the multitude; his emphasis now is upon the few who are capable of bringing about a revolution rather than upon the many who will simply stand alongside and perhaps join in the loud crying. His asperity has grown; his capacity for hatred has come to flower. And still he wants his revolution. The definition of it which we shall find in the novel when it comes to America should be interesting.

EMILY HOBHOUSE is dead. Her relation to the Anglo-Boer War of 1899-1902 was that of Florence Nightingale to the Crimean War. South Africa will never forget her work in the concentration camps, where Boer women and children, driven thither after their homes had been burned and their provisions looted, died like flies. In Brandfort the monthly death-rate for children multiplied by twelve reached the ghastly figure of 1,918 per 1,000, and in Bloemfontein the monthly death-rate for women similarly multiplied produced an annual figure of 1,554 per 1,000. Miss Hobhouse did what she could to remedy conditions, faced the wrath of a war-drunken England, and dared to publish the facts. There are farms in the Transvaal, in the northern Cape Colony, and in the Orange Free State where the mention of her name is still accompanied by a reverent raising of the hat.

Germany Enters the League

EIGHT years after the Armistice Germany has at last gone through the formal ceremony of readoption into the family of nations. She has been admitted to permanent membership in the Council of the League of Nations, along with Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan. By that act she, who was forced by browbeating ultimatums to sign the false Peace of Versailles and the subsequent series of impossible agreements, is recognized as an equal by the Great Powers of the world. Europe and the League grow in moral stature as a result.

Diplomacy had to turn somersaults and diplomats to pen miracles of compromise clauses in order to achieve this result, and the details of the process of admission were still unsettled when this issue of The Nation went to press. Apparently the total membership of the Council is to be increased from eleven to fourteen. Five seats will be permanently assigned to the "Great Powers"; the other nine members will be elected in batches of three, for three-year terms; three—and only three—of the nine may, by a two-thirds vote of the Assembly, be declared eligible for re-election. The scheme was to provide reeligibility as a sop for Brazil, Spain, and Poland, the three hold-up nations which in March dissolved the pleasant haze of the "Locarno spirit" by demanding permanent seats or nothing. Brazil, however, sulkily retired from the League after the March fiasco, and Spain in early September withdrew her delegates from Geneva following the failure of her spectacular attempt to blackmail France and England into giving her a free hand in Tangier in return for good behavior in the League. (What effect Spain's even more recent dabbling in military revolution will have on her international fortunes remains to be seen.) These two may, as a result of their diplomatic pettishness, lose even their semi-permanent seats.

Austen Chamberlain, British Foreign Minister, and Aristide Briand, French Foreign Minister, although largely responsible for the failures of March, deserve high praise—along with Lord Robert Cecil, who "found the formula"—for standing firm through the midsummer and rescuing the tossing craft of the League. Had Germany not been admitted on fair terms in this recent attempt the League might as well have dissolved. These two men, representing the greatest Powers of the old world, had it in their hands to crush the League or keep it. In the end, they kept it. They risked the secession of three nations, two of them closely allied to their own countries, but they kept the League. Yet in so doing, they revealed again the fragile nature of this over-praised and over-feared world-state. The fateful decisions were not made in the council-halls of Geneva, but in the tete-a-tetes of the foreign ministers of France and England. The revelation is significant; it should not be forgotten.

There were hints, before the League sessions, of a Mediterranean block, which was to threaten Franco-British hegemony. But Mussolini, while he can bluster safely at home, lacks allies abroad, and his imperial ambitions have no lure for Spain. The much-heralded Italian-Spanish treaty was forgotten the moment Spain suggested that Tangier, where Italy has a shadowy claim, be made exclusively Spanish. Will Germany, as a permanent member of the League Council, provide the balance-wheel which Europe needs and offset Franco-British hegemony? That, too, remains to be seen, and one of the most interesting tests will come in the work of the Mandates Commission.

In European affairs the League has functioned with a measure of success. It abdicated in Vilna, twirled its thumbs in the Sarre, and stultified itself at Corfu, but in a dozen minor disputes it has provided a machinery of reconciliation, and it has been a serviceable clearing-house of miscellaneous information. Its conception, however, was more grandiose. It was to be the carrier of the world's conscience. It was to provide machinery by which the backward people of the earth—in particular, the inhabitants of the former German and Turkish colonies—could be led gently into the sweetness and light of modern civilization. Now, there were a few small nations which took that ideal seriously. And the Permanent Mandates Commission of the League has, in fact, provided a sounding-board for colonial protestants—patriots, we called them in 1776—which did not previously exist. But the rules of the game made the sounding-board feeble. Protests could be received from anybody, but they must be transmitted to the mandataries, the objects of the protest, for comment before report was made; the protestants could not be heard in person; and as a result, the protest was always smothered.

In the midst of the hullabaloo about Spain and Poland and Brazil and Germany the Permanent Mandates Commission came forward with a modest request. It did not get much space in the papers, but, in view of the fact that the French, as agents of the League's good-will, have been massacring Syrian men, women, and children for months, it deserved it. The Permanent Mandates Commission asked that it be permitted to hear witnesses in person. Austen Chamberlain frowned at it through his monocle, and said "No." Aristide Briand smiled and said "No." Belgium and South Africa, which also administer former German colonies as mandataries, also said "No." Japan discreetly did not speak. But therein was revealed the essential, fundamental canker in the League's soul. It was born as an ideal perverted to serve Versailles imperialism and it has never recovered from that stigma. The little nations of Europe have valiantly striven to convert it toward the ideal, the admission of Germany marks an appreciable step in that direction; but the canker remains.

What the League does about its Mandates Commission, then, will indicate the direction of its evolution. Will it turn backward and make of itself a comfortable machine by which the Great Powers of Western Europe regulate Europe and their imperial world? Or will the pressure of the war-time neutrals, which have been the real heroes of every session of the League, make of this mandate system a real improvement over the ancient brutalities of colonial administration?

In two other respects the League marks its own provincialism. It is an organ of the Western World, and the representation accorded Asia is trifling. China, which includes a quarter of the human race, was not accorded the courtesy, in the scramble for seats, that was granted Poland. And, most important of all, the League still, and of its own will, excludes Soviet Russia.

Dunning China

CHINA has virtually no government at all, and has difficulty in financing what little government she has. The near-Government of Peking, casting about for possible sources of revenue, recently noted that the so-called Ninth Year Domestic Loan would be extinguished in 1927, and that consequently the interest hitherto paid on it each year out of the customs receipts would be available as security for a new loan. Accordingly arrangements were made to float such a new loan with Chinese bankers, and there were great rejoicings in the bosoms of the teachers and other civil servants who have long gone without salaries.

Enter Uncle Sam! On August 25 the United States Minister, Mr. MacMurray, acting as a sort of errand-boy for the international bankers of the entire world (the British and French and other governments let him take the odium by delivering his note first, then followed with similar missives), informed the Ministry of Foreign Affairs that he had learned of the loan proposals, adding that in these circumstances > the Legation finds it necessary to remind the Chinese authorities once again of the unfulfilled liabilities in respect of the arrears of service of the Chinese governmental obligations due to American citizens and companies. The list is long and should be well known. It includes the Hukuang Railway loan; also loans made by the Continental Trust and Savings Bank, the Pacific Development Corporation, the Riggs National Bank, and Munsey Trust Company.

>
> Other accounts which are entirely in arrears are also due to the following American creditors: American International Corporation; American Locomotive Company; American Metals Company; American Trading Company; Anderson, Mayer and Co., Ltd.; Ault and Wiborg China Co.; Baldwin Locomotive Works; China-America Trading Co.; China Electric Co.; Fearon, Daniel and Co.; Fowler and Co.; W. W. Fraser and Co.; General American Car Co.; Robert Dollar Co.; United States Steel Products Co.; Wilkinson and Co.

After stating that compensation is also due many other American firms for looting outrages committed by military and bandits, Mr. MacMurray continued:

> The Legation would also remind the Chinese authorities that under the terms of the agreements for many of the American obligations the Chinese Government engaged, in the event of a pledge becoming ineffective, to provide from other sources the sums necessary for payment of principal and interest. The Legation must therefore point out to the Chinese authorities that these debts to American citizens and organizations are thus entitled to an automatic priority over debts subsequently contracted respecting the use of any customs surplus funds which may become available as a result of the retirement of loans hitherto secured on customs revenues.

What does this verbiage mean? It means that the United States is informing the faltering Chinese Government that as fast as it discovers any possible new sources of revenue with which to support its feeble existence the American Government, associated with the governments of the other creditor nations, will insist that it turn over those resources to pay the debts owed to the firm of J. P. Morgan and Co., holders of Hukuang bonds, the American International Corporation, and the rest of the long list. It amounts to saying to China:

> Let your teachers starve, close your schools, abandon your attempts at flood control; let your ancient palaces and temples go for lack of care; close your law courts and abandon your prisons; give up your embassies and ministries in foreign countries—all to the end that what can be squeezed out of your country is due to us, and you must pay us first, before you indulge in these luxuries. You have signed the bonds, and we demand the letter of the law.

The Chinese are past masters of diplomatic evasion, and they will not reply defiantly, but it is hardly possible that they will accept such a humiliating doctrine. The loans may all have been valid loans, made in good faith, but in this chaotic period of gestation in which a new China is being born many foreign loans will have to go, for a time at least, unpaid. No Chinese Government can accept the Powers' demands. Either the Powers, America leading, have made fools of themselves once again by demanding what they know they will not get, or they must enforce their demands with their gunboats. Since the customs are collected under foreign supervision, in the coast ports, it is still possible for the foreign Powers to maintain control of these essential revenues. But for how long? Can anyone, recalling that Canton has boycotted British goods now for more than a year, recalling the Boxer outbreak of violent anti-foreignism in 1900 and the sudden outburst of nationalist passion in the summer of 1925, think that the Powers can in the long run succeed in such a policy?

Cleaning House Among the Miners

FRANK FARRINGTON, for twelve years president of the Illinois district of the United Mine Workers, has gone over to the employers. Exposed by President John L. Lewis of the union, he was suspended from office for signing a contract to become "labor counsel" for Illinois's largest coal company at a salary of $25,000 a year. When the exposure came Farrington was in Europe, sent by the American Federation of Labor to unveil a memorial room to Samuel Gompers at Geneva and to act as delegate at the British Trades Union Congress. Thus passes from the labor world a picturesque and all-too-typical figure. Frank Farrington started life in an Illinois coal mine at the age of nine and never went to school. He was a bold fighter, a shrewd political manipulator, a powerful orator—and he was for sale.

Purity in labor leadership would be surprising in the State of Herrin and Frank Smith; Farrington played the Illinois game in the Illinois manner. He rewarded his friends and crushed his enemies, if not by fair means then by foul. His lieutenants were notoriously crooked. Elections were bought and sold, fake ballots were manufactured, expense accounts became a scandal. The left wing of the union under Communist influence was not spotless and certainly not always wise, but its case against the union machine was excellent. The fight between the union factions culminated in the case of the Zeigler miners.

Zeigler is a little mining town in the south of Illinois ten miles from Herrin, an imperfect blending of Klansmen, Lithuanians, Poles, bootleggers, gun-toters, and representatives of the absentee mine-owners. It is the center of some of the world's largest mines. Behind the clouded windows of half-a-hundred empty stores booze is sold as brazenly as in New Jersey—and girls are upstairs. Elections are marvels of financial mathematics; everything is allowable so long as the "squeeze" of 25 per cent is forthcoming. The story of the organization of the miners in this district has been an epic of machine guns.

Zeigler has been a center of anti-Farrington strength. Headed by Henry Corbishley, the left wing captured the union local, elected Corbishley local president, and would have elected him sub-district president in an honest election. The quarrel within the union came to a head when a Farrington official, D. B. Cobb, appeared at a Zeigler meeting and announced the removal of the local officers for calling a "wild-cat strike." Technically Cobb was right, but in the eyes of the Zeigler miners he was a usurper kept in power by the Farrington machine. The meeting was adjourned in an uproar and a free-for-all fight resulted in the death of one left-wing miner and the beating up of Cobb. The whole strength of the Farrington machine was immediately thrown behind the prosecution of the rebels. No one was indicted for killing the left-wing miner, but twenty miners, mostly of foreign birth, were rounded up and accused of pummeling Cobb. Eight of them were convicted by an all-American farmer jury, and seven, including Corbishley, are now under sentence of from one to fourteen years in the Illinois penitentiary for assault with intent to murder. Their appeal comes before the Illinois Supreme Court in November—if they can raise the necessary funds. While some of these left-wing miners are probably guilty of assault, the case against their leaders has all the earmarks of a frame-up.

Behind the Farrington scandal and the Zeigler prosecution are certain ugly questions that miners in all parts of the country are asking. How did John L. Lewis get possession of the contract between Farrington and the Peabody Coal Company which resulted in the ousting of Farrington? Did the mine-owners buy up Farrington and then expose him in order to get rid of him? If so, why? Can it be that they prefer Lewis to Farrington in the coming fight in the coal fields? Certainly Farrington is not worth $25,000 to any coal company as a "labor counsel." And a comparison of the administrative record of Farrington and Lewis is in favor of Farrington. Farrington at least kept his district solidly unionized and he was effective in winning wage increases for the miners. The Illinois Miner under the direction of Oscar Ameringer has been an exceptionally good labor weekly, but it is now in danger of destruction by Lewis because it has occasionally criticized him. Lewis's record as international president has been marked by badly conducted strikes, the complete destruction of the union in West Virginia and Kentucky, and indifference to the nationalization program. The national membership has fallen below 300,000, and many of the districts are shadow organizations. It is not surprising that some of the mine-owners want Lewis reelected and want his candidate Sneed to replace Farrington.

The approaching crisis of April, 1927, when the Jacksonville agreement, which established the present union scale in the union soft-coal field , expires, will demand a cleaner and finer leadership than the present administration of the United Mine Workers has shown. There is need of plain speaking by all those who honor the mine workers and believe in their union. The non-union coal fields are expanding; the operators will welcome a strike; trumpet-tongued platitudes will not save the situation. The only hope seems to lie in the fight of John Brophy, president of District No. 2 of the union, for Lewis's position. His progressive platform and his personal integrity are worthy of the brave men who made the miners' union great. He is determined to clean house in the union.

Who's What?

ONE hardly looks for either wit or style in "Who's Who." Even though the notices are generally written by the subject himself they are usually as impersonal as a tombstone. Mr. A. A. Milne is no less grave than Dean Inge himself. Max Beerbohm as devoid of wit as a London Lord Mayor. Moreover the most famous are not necessarily the most communicative. Your American, accustomed to measure fame by inches of free publicity, is rather inclined to detail his distinctions at full length, so that Nicholas Murray Butler, for example, informs an eager world just when and where he received each of the twenty-four honorary degrees whose symbols decorate his name and gives accurate information besides concerning the eight decorations he is entitled to wear and the fifteen societies of which he is a member. Your Britisher, on the other hand, led by an instinct of reserve which inclines him to regard all biography as essentially indecent, is likely to stop with the titles of his works and a few dates. In general, "Who's Who" is not exciting reading.

There are signs, however, that the younger generation is going to change all that. Perhaps Shaw started it when he inserted "Recreations: anything but sport," and certainly he was followed by Ezra Pound who put "the public taste" in the same place. It remained, however, for the exuberant young Sitwells to go further in this as in various other directions than anyone else. Apparently they inherited the tendency from their father, Sir George, who dares to boast in a socialistic age that he "owns about 6,000 acres" and records "captured a spirit at the headquarters of the Spiritualists, London, 1880." Edith and Sacheverell are still more chatty. Under "Education" the former records "in early youth took an intense dislike to simplicity, morris dancing, a sense of humor, and every form of sport except reviewer-baiting; and has continued these distastes ever since." The latter, after mentioning that he attended both Eton and Oxford, adds with unobtrusive bitterness "mainly self-educated" and then continues:

> Has traveled extensively in search of civilization; visited Fiume to see D'Annunzio, Dec., 1920; in early life avoided games and sought work; now tends more and more to avoid work and seek recreation; has intense interest in the arts. Recreations: catching that rara avis the London motor-omnibus, listening-in, and Mr. J. C. Squire. Telegraphic Address: Sitwellismus, London.

Incidentally, neither gives the date of his birth, although Sacheverell permits himself to confide coyly that he was born "towards 1900."

What grave compilers think of such flippancy we are not prepared to say—we are not even sure they know a joke when they see it—but we are inclined to suspect that a hatred for Mr. Squire is more significant than President Butler's possession of a "Grand Cross, Order of St. Sava, 1st Class (Serbia)." Why should "Who's Who" not become "Celebrities Self Revealed"?

Modern Traffic

"I Believe in Free Speech, But—"

By HARBOR ALLEN

IN the name of American traditions no State outside of California is today doing more to suppress American traditions than is Massachusetts. Ex-Mayor Curley of Boston began the pastime of suppression by closing Ku Klux Klan halls on the pretext that fire, health, or building regulations had not been complied with. Brockton took the next step by arresting Anthony Bimba, a Lithuanian editor from Brooklyn, on charges of sedition and blasphemy. The latter charge, based on a Puritan law 229 years old, sent reporters scurrying to Brockton for feature stories and put Anthony Bimba on the front page of metropolitan dailies. On the eve of Bimba's trial in February, a meeting of protest was planned in Boston. The Mayor ordered that no licensed hall in the city be permitted to open its doors to a meeting in sympathy with Bimba. Hall owners who defied his edict were threatened with revocation of licenses. A few days later Scott Nearing was forbidden to speak on the recognition of Russia because City Hall officials feared "the gathering might develop into a meeting of Bimba sympathizers."

A group of prominent citizens, annoyed by the continuance under Mayor Nichols of a policy instituted by Mayor Curley, protested in a vigorous letter against interference with constitutional rights:

> Within the past few years a practice has grown up among city officials of preventing proposed public meetings in Boston, which, because of their supposed purpose or their sponsors, have not met with official approval. . . . We had assumed that when you became mayor this arbitrary interference with free speech and free assemblage would cease. We have therefore been surprised and disturbed that, during your recent absence in New York City, other cases of interference with public meetings have occurred.
>
> None of us who present this matter to you are doing so because of any special interest in common with those who have been injured by action of the city. We are, however, greatly interested in the maintenance of our constitutional rights of free speech and we are deeply concerned over the arbitrary actions of city officials. . . . To prevent meetings by such methods as threatening hall owners or by deliberately hunting for technical violations of the building code, is neither fair nor straightforward and does great injury to the reputation of the city. We appeal to you as mayor of Boston to place yourself on record as opposed to any further interference by city officials with the right of free speech and free assemblage.

The signers waited in vain for a letter from the Mayor. One of them eventually called at the City Hall and was told that the Mayor would "shortly reply." Meanwhile, grown impatient, the American Civil Liberties Union and a committee of citizens rented the auditorium and planned, in defiance of the officials, to hold a free-speech test meeting on May 17, inviting Bimba as one of the speakers. A Constitutional Rights Committee was appointed and applied to the Old South Association for the use of the historic church as the scene of another protest. In the midst of this deliberation came the Mayor's long belated reply.

And what did the Mayor say? "I believe in free speech, but—" The Mayor hardly considered the Old South Meeting Hall a nice place in which to "start a row." In short, he declared that he would continue the policy of ex-Mayor Curley.

Despite this dictum, however, the Old South Meeting House Association decided to hold a free-speech meeting of its own. Dean Roscoe Pound of the Harvard Law School, Dr. Samuel M. Crothers, and others spoke, and all of them gave the Mayor his due. "Bulldozer," "a worse tyrant than George III," "George III never dared tell people where they could meet and what they could say," "administrative lawlessness"; these were phrases hurled at the Mayor and his actions. Though some of the dust in Boston has been laid by this refreshing shower, the question of free speech is not yet solved. Mayor Nichols still holds the City Hall fortresses and the threat of revoked licenses still hovers over the heads of unwary hall-owners.

Three young Portuguese in Fall River have meanwhile become the center of another free-speech controversy. Diamintino Texeira, Antonio Perreira, and Antonio da Costa are philosophical anarchists. In a Portuguese periodical, circulated among the Portuguese workers of Fall River, they have been attacking the corruption of the church and the state. Arrested on the complaint of more orthodox compatriots of the community, they were charged first with blasphemy and sedition, later with violating the Volstead Act. Both charges failed to hold water, and the three men were turned over to immigration officials. They are now, according to Fall River papers, awaiting deportation "for publishing a radical magazine."

To protest this bit of high-handed procedure, the International Labor Defense sent up its Boston representative to arrange a defense meeting. When, together with Henry Wadsworth Longfellow Dana of Cambridge, a grandson of the poet, he arrived at the hall, he found the lights out, the doors barred, and several burly policemen on guard. "See the chief," advised the guardians of the law. "He'll give you the dope." A spirited argument between Chief of Police Martin Feeney and Professor Dana followed. No sir, the chief would allow no such meeting. He knew these radicals. They would criticize the authorities. He would have a tough job "clearing out the hall" as he had had on previous occasions. Besides "they don't allow meetings like that in other States"—witness New Jersey. There was no meeting that night.

The American Civil Liberties Union has now joined hands with the International Labor Defense in arranging a test meeting in Fall River. Hard on the heels of this announcement comes an amazing new development. "Police ban meetings in Fall River?" Chief Feeney has declared "No such thing!" The hall, he explains, was locked when the speakers arrived "because the rental had been revoked." Having "no official business with the American Civil Liberties Union," he refuses to comment upon the telegrams of protest sent to him by the union.

At Lawrence petitions from the United Front Committee of Textile Workers for permits to hold open-air meetings were refused by City Marshal O'Brien and Director of Safety Carr. No reason was given. The United Front Committee felt that it had been unjustly treated, especially since "numerous panhandlers, fakers, and Indian patent-medicine vendors" had been seen "using the streets regularly without molestation." It was charged that the meetings were prohibited by the police because Lawrence mill owners are opposed to the spread of left-wing unionism among the workers.

Again the American Civil Liberties Union sent Professor Dana to aid in the staging of a test meeting. The first speaker, Fred Beal, secretary of the United Front Committee, was arrested as he stepped from the platform. Professor Dana, who read the Declaration of Independence and commented on free speech, was detained by police, and alternately threatened with arrest and ordered to leave town. "Do you want to be arrested?" he was asked. "I don't want to be arrested, but I insist that the same treatment be accorded all the speakers," he replied. Eventually he was released on the promise that he would appear in court should he be summoned. Mr. Beal was fined $20 for "disturbing the peace and violating a city ordinance." "I have always thought," said District Judge Jeremiah J. Mahoney, as he imposed sentence, "that we had a reasonable amount of liberty in this country. I find that we have much more here than they have abroad." Mr. Beal's case has been appealed.

"A reasonable amount of liberty." In other words, the new American tradition: "I believe in free speech, but—" Have faith in Massachusetts!

Baron Banana in Puerto Barrios

By CARLETON BEALS

ALL night long the little two-masted schooner of Don Francisco Beltran ran before the stiff breeze and scattering rain from Puerto Cortez in Honduras to Puerto Barrios in Guatemala—banana ports of the terrifically hot northern coast of Central America. Late the previous afternoon I had scrambled across the female- and parrot-littered deck of a tramp Mexican steamer loaded with mules, and dropped down upon the low-lying deck of Don Francisco's schooner—La Esperanza. At the orders of the willowy blond English captain—"from the Islands"—the "standing Mutt and Flying Jeff" were hoisted, and we tacked away from the low dirty shore of Puerto Cortez, feif of the Standard Fruit Company of New Orleans. We stood near the steering-wheel getting acquainted, three of us, ducking the sweep of the main-sail boom: I, Don Francisco (or, as he soon became, Don Pancho), and Dona Isabela, my fellow traveler, a lean, tawny, middle-aged Guatemalan woman addicted to corn-husk cigarettes and gold-circle earrings. The heat-dancing shore, shacks, warehouses, silvered sands fell away into haze; the waves spanked against the prow; a shark's fin sliced through the water. Night fell swift and cool; the "nigger" was lit in the wheel-box; phosphorescence quivered through the black waters; and I lay down on a piece of sail-cloth to stare up at the dagger-like tropic stars until the rain drove me down into the stuffy cabin where sprawled four nondescript barefoot sailors, Don Pancho, and Dona Isabela. I finally went to sleep, water from the deck dripping near my left ear, and an occasional gigantic cockroach scuttling over my neck.

Rose and mauve dawn on the beautiful Amatique Gulf. And then the sun, snarling like a yellow dragon over the Espiritu Santo Mountains. While we rode at anchor near the United Fruit Company pier, waiting for the port officials to let us go ashore, Don Pancho bewailed the evils of the lands where fate had cast him. Above all he damned the people, the base mixture of Indian, Negro, and Spanish blood ruining Honduras, the same thing now coming to pass in the banana country of Guatemala, the sad day coming when Central America would be entirely Hispanic-African. He ended his tirade with the typical Spanish vainglorious boasting of the prowess of his own pure race, from the days when the intrepid Pedro Alvarado had brought culture at the point of the sword to the highlands of Guatemala, down to the present time when he himself drove his schooner in the teeth of tropic typhoons with petty cargoes of maize and sisal and fruit all the way from Colon to the Bahamas. His courage and dignity and self-discipline never for a single moment would he slacken to the easy-going standards of the half-breed lands he despised yet exploited.

Puerto Barrios and its inhabitants accounted for his sentiments of superiority. Here are all the unmasked crudities of the feverish race of modern times to wrench forth raw materials. In Puerto Barrios Baron Banana rules supreme; and he rules rough-shod with little regard for the beauty or happiness of his people. Although to the initiated Baron Banana goes by the aristocratic cognomen of Musa sapientum, and President Orellana calls him Guatemala's Golden Prince, he is the most plebeian of the whole family of platanos. The Spanish, with satiric flair, have given him the phallic label "Fig of Adam." But abroad, in the United States, Baron Banana struts in fine attire. Fruit salads at banquets, banana splits in small-town confectioners' shops, banana brandy for jaded Village flappers, dances to the tune of "Yes, we have no bananas," proclaim the importance that this single tropic fruit has acquired in the diet and imagination of the United States. Bananas, and more bananas! The United Fruit Company and its lesser competitors can hardly keep pace. Their engineers go slashing through the jungles; their railroads reach out iron fingers; their smallpox-yellow clapboard buildings, hotels, bunkhouses, stores, offices, hospitals, warehouses spring up like monstrous fungi beside a hundred streams and marshes, in the heart of mangrove forests, and on a dozen lowering shores. The big green stems of fruit are cut from the trees, loaded on to mattresses in the jungle, and run down to a dozen ports, banana people dressing and strutting over the sleepers of the track. Down to Puerto Barrios, which on the older maps is not even mentioned.

Puerto Barrios, boom banana port, epitomizes the haste and cruelty and bleeding rawness of the process. Back in the jungles the drive and jangle of the banana industry shrink in the face of vegetation so vast. The constant nerve-racking struggle to push back the monstrous tangled trees, to clear out the jungles with their reeking perfumes, poisonous insects, dangerous beasts, terrible fevers—this struggle is tragic yet puny in its relative inadequacy. But in Puerto Barrios the conglomerate ugliness of raw-product exploitation is spewed forth into the torrid sunlight. Here the smallpox-yellow buildings are not overshadowed by the [illegible] blue, brooding ocean.

We felt on that first morning, when we left La Esperanza and the immigration, customs, and police officials behind us, and straggled through the blazing heat to find refuge on the wide piazzas of Captain Grace's Hotel, that the Government of Guatemala had suddenly ceased to exist. Baron Banana was in control, ordering his reefers in the train-yards, overseeing the typewriters clicking in the smallpox-yellow buildings, accepting company fichas in the stores. The only open evidence of President Orellana's interest in Baron Banana's exportation of "yellow gold" [illegible] barracks in the rear of the town. Hence at intervals came the snarl of bugles and drums whose rhythm and melody repeatedly broke down into Indian surliness.

Yes, Puerto Barrios is an achievement in ugliness in a natural setting of beauty. Puerto Barrios is the only place I know where people put water-closets in their front yards. In the cool of the day I often wandered out through the hodgepodge town, built on a pestiferous marsh reeking with spilled petroleum, out along the twisted paths where are massed in utter promiscuity the blue and yellow shacks of Negroes and Indians and Chinese. Boards and gunny-sacking, banana and palm leaves, river cane, sheet-iron, and rags have gone into the making. Picking my way through the slime and excrement and swarms of naked, mud-smeared children—white, yellow, black; kinky-haired, straight-haired, curly-haired; round-eyed, pig-eyed, slant-[illegible] out on the walk fronting the foot-high breakwater, and there saw the curve of the shore and the line of tall, gaunt cocoanut palms broken by an interminable row of spider-leg piers stretching out to cubbyhole closets set about four feet above high tide. This is Puerto Barrios' highest word in aesthetics!

Here human life swarms without apparent meaning. Yet not without song, not without color. A group thumping the marimba. A half-dressed couple behind a [illegible] window dancing the rumba. A Gargantuan Negro pair, enormously paunched; he in white spats, patent leather, waistcoat, and derby hat; she in white satin and carrying a pink sunshade. In a corner under a mango tree, a Belitzian weaving a fish trap out of river cane—"don't be so good this here, sah, as bamboo, but c'n catch any fish mahn a pound. Some weeks ah makes goin' on fifteen quid, yas sah." At a turn a Chinese, shirt-tail out, staring forlornly at the sea beyond the toilet. And here, crossing the foot-bridge of a little creek, shaded by bread-fruit trees—which help make life not too onerous—the town broke down into Indian xacales with thatched roofs. In this rag-tail port Baron Banana has dumped the lost sons of five continents, made them his groveling subjects—that banana sulfis may be. Here are great Negroes from Jamaica, never looking for a job, but a "position" or "emplawment"; mysterious Orientals smoking long pipes; alert Japanese; white girls, ex-prostitutes or dopes, now content to marry the trash of the world; broken beachcombers and vagabonds; the taciturn Indians from the highlands; sailors of every breed, within and without the law. Marimbas quiver through the hot night air; piano-players rattle jazz in the cantinas and gambling joints; a hundred cast-offs carouse with black women, who laugh coarsely, flaunting ample breasts and fat hips.

From Puerto Barrios I rode second class up to Quirigua, jammed in with sweating humanity—vast families sprawling over the backless wooden benches. Bananas travel on fiber mattresses; men and women travel on boards or lie like pigs on the filthy floor and swelter at a dozen stations while the train loads bananas.

Quirigua is a shop center for the banana company. More smallpox-yellow houses above long sweeping green lawns. A concrete hospital managed by a malaria specialist. Not a room was vacant in the company hotel, run by a grumpy Catholic priest. At the hospital, too, I was told "Full up, come back at ten and if no one is dragged in with a broken head before then I'll chance putting you up in Number 4, our emergency room." It was suggested I try the next village, Los Amates. So I toiled through the sun for two and a half miles along the tracks running through the jungles and the plantations. Los Amates is a straggling thatched-roof Indian pueblo with more smallpox-yellow on the company store. But no place to sleep except in the two "houses," the most pretentious clapboard edifices in the town (also painted smallpox yellow), where the employees of the company on Saturday nights bestow money and maudlin caresses on mulatto and Indian girls—more toll of the tropics and the frontier. I was forced to sleep that night in a chair on the porch of the company hotel. Accommodations can't keep pace with company expansion.

The next morning I caught the first banana train out past the Quirigua ruins—one of the most notable remnants of Maya-Quiche culture along with the destroyed cities of Copwan and Palemke, Chitzen Itza, Uxmal, Mayapan, and a hundred others scattered from Yucatan and Campeche down through Chiapas and Guatemala to Honduras. Dropping from the reefer, I avoided the usual traveled path and cut straight through the banana fields, steaming with the odor of over-ripe fruit, to a half obliterated track through the jungle by the side of a tiny stream gurgling invisible beneath mammoth leaves. Lizards, insects, snakes started from under my feet. Macaws and parakeets screamed from the depths. Overhead was a solid lacing of branches and vines, enormous cedars, zapotes, cacaos, rubber-trees with fluted trunks, dragon trees. From the branches streamed long parasites of brilliant hues. In every cleft of branch and trunk crowded myriads of scarlet and yellow plants. From the super-moist vegetation came long wisps of steam, sucked forth by the terrific heat. Nauseating perfumes were wafted over me in waves. I hurried on to the small Lagoon of the Idols, the scene, perhaps, of ancient ablutions, rituals, and sacrifices, and reached a wide space reclaimed from the wilderness.

Quirigua is not so obviously impressive as the ruins of Teotihuacan, Mitla, or Chitzen Itza, yet this open space between prominent shattered platforms with lofty carved monoliths standing in gigantesque solemnity retains the atmosphere of ancient grandeur. I found little difficulty in recreating pictures of the ancient pageants and ceremonies, the great processions of nobles and sacerdotes wearing robes woven of the emerald and red feathers of the quetzal, that glorious bird, now emblem of the Guatemalan people, that in the beginning, after the great flood, sprang forth as a symbol of power and beauty—"a flying water lily"—from the crest of a mammoth guayacan tree.

The old stones of Quirigua tell of the ancient emotional and intellectual striving after god and the mysteries, the seeking for Nirvana. The faces depicted on the various columns and monoliths, though of diverse types, reveal strength, nobility, even brutal will. Here is one: flat, bold forehead; flat, broad nose; large, round, protruding eyes; square ears; massive, protruding lower lip with expressive simplicity of representation, a calm, almost bitter realism, set off by the grotesque background and formalized carvings of toads, lizards, and tigers.

I found myself rushing from stone to stone in a fever of discovery, from the great frightening turtle to the legless, handless woman; to the huge stone twelve feet in diameter, with its snarling tiger and fringe of six emblematic figures above a base of small circles. I hurried up the platforms over crumbling stairs. The old teocalli have fallen; the old thrones have vanished; there remain but broken fragments, mysterious niches, carved lintels, great door-slabs. Descending ancient steps, I became absorbed in a representation of human fertility, a woman with features more delicate, nose thinner, ears not square but formed by three concentric circles; and all about her the engraving of the beautiful leaves of the conte. Capably she supports a child by a shoulder thumb and plays forth with the same calm command that the artist gave her two thousand years before.

But my haste had been injudicious. I suddenly discovered myself on the verge of sunstroke. I managed to get to shade and in my need for air ripped off my shirt, heedless of the myriad insects. Not a leaf moved; the sun blazed and shimmered; I lay there unable even to lift my hand to fan myself with my sun-helmet. Supreme admiration welled in me then for those young engineers of the United Fruit Company who carry their surveying outfits under the beating sun and hack their way foot by foot through marsh and jungle defying venomous animals and dangerous diseases; an admiration for the genius that drove railroads through such a country of fever and heat. Likewise, a supreme admiration for those older carvers of stone who cleared this site beside the Motagua River and cast up these symbols of power and hope. In easy stages I again crossed the open field past the tall monoliths toward the banana railroad, stopping to rest once where some person better acclimated than myself had built a palm-leaf shelter on high ground away from the jungle and its reptiles. And so I left the capital of an ancient empire behind me. A gasoline motor hurled me back to the smallpox-yellow town of Quirigua where the newer Baron Banana lords it over a newer empire, riding his iron steed of modern progress, breaking the jungle with his iron fingers.

Land of the Free

By ARTHUR GLEASON

[The following story by Arthur Gleason provides a vivid commentary on the glimpses of his life by Helen Hayes Gleason, printed in issues of The Nation for August 4, 18, and September 1. The Land of the Free has not been previously published.]

WHEN Miriam McAllister flashed into Caronia I knew there would be trouble. That head of red hair and gift of bold speech were a plume and an ensign round which the industrial battle rocked. And that night in Caronia she stood over the smoky torches on the tailpiece of the wagon and spoke the words that condemned her. Fifteen thousand workers of Caronia were out on strike. Orators at a dozen corners were barking in the raucous street voice which at a little distance sounds like the cry of a wild creature in the night. But the mightiest crowd of all—five thousand persons at least, men said—was gathered round the cart where Miriam McAllister stood on high over the torches and the shouting. She was bareheaded as always when she spoke to the people. Her deep far-carrying voice rolled out over the closely packed thousands in the city square. If she had been no speaker at all, the spectacle of her would have drawn a crowd to any cart-box in America. That sun-tanned face, brown as any Indian's; the sturdy body, sturdy and yet slim; the powerful thrust of the right arm in gesture, the great red tie on her breast, symbol of her faith, and, crowning all, that sudden shocking red of the hair, bright in the wind-driven flame of the smelly kerosene torches—these things were a sign that alone would have arrested the attention of idle strangers.

But Miriam McAllister was agitator and speaker, a figure known to the workers of the East. Staunch Scot, descendant of a long line of Covenanters, she had inherited with the pure iron-tinctured blood a logical mind, which demanded a creed of certitude in the drifting world of change. And having found her creed, as a true daughter of her line she was making it prevail. What had been stern Presbyterianism in her ancestors had become "labor" with her. The same immaculate unity held her mind which had been in the tidy strong minds of her forebears for over three centuries. Her statements might leave much of the landscape untouched, but what they aimed at they hit.

Caronia is an American city of the latter-day sort. Thirty nationalities are crowded inside its "Hook"—Ukrainians, Poles, Slovaks, samples from all East Europe. The little gains they had made in wages had come to them because they had rebelled. One more fight, they thought, and perhaps they would cross the line from bitterness to plenty. So the streets swayed with them. This was the third strike in three years. Both sides knew it was final. Special policemen and workers alike had been killed. Months before, the strike had burst into a flame of passion and flame of guns. Then it had waned away and died, but that first flare had slain nine men and crippled half a hundred. A few more months of unrest and the living fire came through again, and seven men were shot dead in the city streets, and fifty more carried bloody marks to their tenement homes. That fierceness, too, had passed for a little time. But now this third and greatest strike of all was at its height. And at the moment of crisis, Miriam McAllister had been called to stir the men to fresh hope and long endurance.

It was strange to come to her from the muttering and whispering of the streets, the restless hurried people, the dark night over them. For that last evening in Caronia she was as I had always known her—alone and apart, for all the huddled crowd at her feet, and full of that stillness which long living with nature gives. That final scene of all was for me only the gathering together in sharper focus of a hundred groups and places where I had seen her, and she was always the same—always the free spirit whom it was good for us to know. Why must men trap a free thing?

She was coming to the end of her talk, and I saw the plain-clothes men exchange a nod and begin to elbow themselves toward her platform.

"The bulls are here," shouted a worker at my right.

"Of course they are here," answered Miriam. "They always come to hear me speak. I want them to get this, and I want your masters at the works to get it. We demand an eight-hour day and a living wage. Is there one of them, sitting in their swivel chairs, would send his son to clean a still? Is there one of them would burn his life out in a temperature of 250 degrees? You men are white-haired at forty. You grub the coke out of a hell-hole, while your masters take the air in a motor-car. If what you now get is the best they will give you, the life of a slave and the death of a pauper, pull down the American flag from every pole in Caronia. Until this wrong is righted, you are men without a country, and your flag is the rag of a class, not of free men."

Simultaneously from every part of the throng big broad-shouldered men, the plain-clothes squad and the special deputies, shoved in to the platform. "Here, you, come with us," said their leader, touching Miriam on the shoulder.

A murmuring spread like sudden wind over the crowd. The thousands, moved by one impulse, surged toward the little group in the torchlight. "Kill them," called one and another.

The squad drew their revolvers and faced the crowd. Miriam stepped to the edge of the platform and raised her hand for silence.

"Listen, men," she said, "I'll go with them tonight to the lock-up. I'll be out in the morning. They have nothing on me. Go home. You'll be killed if you fight it. The crowd is planted with their men. Go home."

Her listeners murmured and shuffled. They stood watching and brooding. Then slowly they turned and went home. I waited and saw the group of detectives lead Miriam away to jail.

That night the streets were noisy with drunken men, and they were not the workers of Caronia. A small army was in the city, men sworn in for special police service, and flush of money. They drank and shouted, and in the small of the night a shot rang out on a dark street and one of the drunken official rioters was wounded to death by a revolver bullet.

II

The sun was climbing the sky-line as I came home to New York, full of anxious thought for all that had happened and what must follow. It was useless to try to sleep. Instead, I drew the lounge to the western window where I could look across the river and see the light clouds of the Palisades answer the colors of the East. How often I had wondered at that false dawn in the West, with none of the mounting joy of the morning which it reflected. It was like the evening flush over the same rock hills which I had seen on the day I first met Miriam. My mind went back over the years, and every little thing was clear.

Seven years ago; she was a woman in her young thirties, then. She lived in the upper stretches of the Bronx, where she had bought a small wooden house and two city lots in the earlier days when the Bronx was a mixture of market garden and grazing ground for goats. Shortly after a bitter experience as a girl in the factory a tiny competence was left her by a relative in the old country, and with this she had become a peasant proprietor. She tended her garden, raised chickens, and kept house for a group of working girls. As the years brought the northward push of the New York population, she could have realized a neat sum on her investment. But that would have robbed her of three values better than money. For the little home was in easy reach of the city crowds where she had her work each evening. The place itself gave her the out-door life she craved. And, best of all, it was near the open water. In half an hour she could cycle to Pelham Bay. On the green bank, over the shore, her canoe was locked to the stump of a tree in front of a tiny tent. That was where the real trip began, which she sometimes shared with me.

We paddled north for a bit till we came to "a little and a lone green" island that lay off New Rochelle. No excursions came that way. It was our very own, unbuilt upon, well out in Long Island Sound. We looked across the miles of water to the North Shore of Long Island itself—a thin white line of sand banked with dim green forest growth. Through all the hours of a long summer day we sat in bathing suits and let the sun reach down to bless us. When the water called, we ran to the rocks on the farther edge of the island and dived off into the Sound which, lifted by tides from the Atlantic, is as salt as the sea itself.

Miriam carried a rhythm in her motions. Runners and swimmers have it. She was a swimmer, with a full-reaching overarm stroke. Only years of swimming give that effortless ease, where the motion becomes as natural as walking, a thrusting forward and a recovery, in perfect time with the breathing, which merely comes and goes as when the body lies asleep.

What she communicated to me was not by talk, and in answer to her some inmost inhabitant of me seemed to say, "Why, of course. This is what I have been searching for." Coming through with the tide on gentle water is a companionship with more than friends, for there are no walls of division, and the creature is finally at home in his world. One yields his temperament, that torment of the modern, to the sunshine. For each his way of escape: by mountain-path and jungle trail and the sweet meadows. For me, the path of the waters lying lazy in the sun. And it was Miriam who taught me.

Once as we stood on the rocks looking over to Long Island, Miriam said: "Some day I'm going to swim across. Will you come?"

"I'm afraid it's too far for me," I replied. "It must be all of six miles."

"They tell me it's seven," she answered. "But that's only half the real distance. The tide would carry us another seven miles."

"Too far for me," I said, "I'd never make it."

"Perhaps I couldn't," she admitted, "but some day I'm going to try."

That day had never come. Well, there was small chance of its coming this summer, with the affair in Caronia breaking so badly. So I mused as I sat at the window, thinking back over the years of companionship. I knew too well the issues in the Caronia strike to think that Miriam would come off lightly from challenging the concentrated power in that city. I had warned her against going, telling her the fight was outside of her State, the labor forces unorganized, defeat certain. And now the thing had fallen just as I had feared. I knew, too, that this was no street-corner excitement, a journey to police court, a five-dollar fine, and release. Twenty million dollars of American money were mobilized for a grim last fight against "the foreigners" and "the demagogues." And in that fight Miriam had become the lonely outpost leader whom they had overborne and meant to crush.

I still saw her as she stood when they led her away—bareheaded and unafraid in the wind-driven flame of the torches. And then that picture faded in a brighter light, and I saw her as I have so often seen her—bareheaded in the sunshine, alone and happy, driving her canoe up the salt Sound and playing in the water that stretched from our little island to the great island yonder, seven miles away.

III

Events now moved so swiftly and with such hidden power of control that all we who fought for Miriam's liberty were dazed. The bail under which Miriam was detained was placed at an impossible figure, twenty-five thousand dollars. It revealed the atmosphere in which she would be tried. The indictments were rapidly shaped. She was charged with speaking treasonably against the flag and the government and with inciting men to wilful murder. The mysterious death of the drunken deputy was being staged as both the background and the inevitable result of her dangerous activities. Sixteen deaths had come, said her enemies, from the interference of agitators in a peaceful, prosperous working community, and now the seventeenth murder had been committed on the very night of a treasonable speech by a woman demagogue. The newspapers of three States thundered. Justice must be swiftly done and an end made of undesirable citizens and dangerous disturbers. It was expedient that someone should suffer.

It was in that evil temper of the public mind that Miriam came to trial. I had known from the moment she uttered them the words that would condemn her.

Did she or did she not say those words? It came down to that in the judge's mind, or at least in the official judicial department of his mind. There were a dozen state witnesses to testify that she had said those words. For that matter, her own people, the workers, five thousand of them, had heard her say them. It was in vain that her lawyer, the keen Oscar Levitt, perhaps the best brain in the labor movement, pointed out she had said that, but not just that. He urged that the tearing out and segregation of a single sentence would condemn every revolutionary from Kropotkin to Walt Whitman to penal servitude.

"And a good job, too," muttered the public prosecutor.

"Why, even the blameless reactionaries of the Union Club would qualify for Atlanta," Levitt went on, "if you chopped up their thought, in the rare moments when they think."

Miriam had asked that she be permitted to make a statement. The prison pallor had somehow struck through even her deep brown color. Her face was weary and grave, and her eyes were those of a hunted and netted creature.

"Men," she said, "don't send me to prison. I just can't go to prison. All I've ever done is to tell the people how to get free. That doesn't seem a very wicked thing, now that you hear me say it, does it? If once the people unite and act together, they can live like men, without fear or sin or sadness.

"I have nothing against your flag. What I said was that no decent flag ought to float over a human wrong. Wash the blood-spots out of your flag before you wave it in our faces."

The judge rapped loudly on his bench.

"The prisoner is injuring her own case," he said. "I warn her."

"These are the things I have said for a lifetime," Miriam went on. "Every night on the street-corners of New York, in the halls, wherever men would listen, I have preached this society of brothers. Why do you jail me now? And even if you kill me so, remember you never really touched me. It was only my body you broke among you. You'll never catch me. Suddenly I'll be back where I belong. If it's only the dust of me that is carried from your prison, that dust will be found by the rain and it will climb toward the sun. But I think something else of me, too, will go down the wind."

The judge gave his charge. Only one verdict was possible from his interpretation of the law. The jury was led out and locked up. We sat silent, we her friends, in the buzzing courtroom. An air of victory was on the state's counsel. The jury returned in record time. Their verdict was guilty.

The judge summoned the prisoner. He gave her twenty years. It was a hideous sentence, the uttermost penalty of the law. A cry that was half a sob came from Miriam. It was the only time I have ever seen her moved to the breaking-point.

IV

The next two days and nights were heavy with despair for me. I knew there was no hope in appeal. I knew that prison would break Miriam's spirit, would kill the thing she was.

On the third night I did not sleep at all till long past midnight, and then only fell into a troubled dreaming which finally centered itself about bells, bells that were forever ringing. Would they never cease their whining insistence? Slowly they burrowed through to my conscious mind, and I woke to know that the electric bell of my flat was buzzing continuously. I put on a dressing-gown, turned up the light in my hall, and threw open the door. A veiled figure stood before me.

"I've come for my swim," she said.

"Miriam," I whispered, "in God's name—you here!"

"Shut the door," she said. "Hurry and get dressed. At the change of guards they'll know. By seven o'clock at the latest they'll know. The turnkey tonight was a 'comrade.' He left the door unlocked. They were going to transfer me today to the new prison and then there was no hope."

She pointed to her hat and veil: "See, I've hidden my hair. Now, hurry, and we'll be off. It's only two hours to daylight."

I dressed and ran to the corner garage. I had their best car at my door in ten minutes. Miriam was waiting in the entry. We sped north with the sense of a presence behind us, closing in.

Then for a mile over the dusty paths and through the wet, heavy grass we ran as I had not run since boyhood. We unlocked the canoe, carried it to the water's edge and tumbled in, and still the world around us slept. The water was smooth and silent through which we churned.

Our own little island was waiting, green and solitary and all-welcoming, as we beached on the crisp sand. We were safe. No one could come to us except by the waterway, and we should know it while they were far off.

"At last," cried Miriam.

Her voice, so calm in my long memory of her, was tremulous, with little catches of eagerness.

"Free at last," she repeated, "and forever."

"Forever," I muttered. "A few hours, Miriam, at most."

She only smiled.

Almost in another instant, it seemed, we were ready for the water, so fast we raced against the unseen presence that was always drawing closer.

She stepped to the high flat rock that jutted out over deep water. That was the signal for a long carrying dive that would send the swimmer well on his way. We cut the water clean, and swam toward the sun which was slowly rising over the Long Island shore.

"This is the time we go across," she called to me.

Straight on we went for many minutes.

"How the tide drags," I said.

"It is pulling down to sea," she answered.

We swam a full two miles out. She never varied her stroke, the long-reaching overarm, with the strong pull through. Unwinded and easy she swam.

"I can't make it, Miriam," I said, at last. "I'm getting tired."

"Then it's goodby for a little while," she answered.

Wearily I turned back, and came in, very slowly. At last I dragged myself up the shale and stood on the highest of the rocks.

The light was on the waters. I could swear I saw that little vivid head. It was here, it was there, it was at a dozen points on the flashing surface. Was it only a sparkle of sun on the ripple out of that sea of light?

Second Song

By LOUISE BOGAN

I said out of sleeping—
Passion, farewell.
Take from my keeping
Bauble and shell,

Black salt, black provender.
Tender your store
To a new pensioner,
To me no more.

In the Driftway

WEARY of Suzanne and Trudy and the motherly Mrs. Corson, of Valentino and Prosecutor Simpson, the Drifter is thinking of retiring to a newspaperless world and studying the history of vegetables. The seed catalogues and the horticultural guides which he finds in his friends' libraries are woefully deficient; they yield no lore or learning. There are treatises on gastronomy and solemn tomes on agriculture; but the Drifter wants to know who brought the first Brussels sprout to America, and when; who first tamed the wild carrot and the succulent pea; the adventures of Indian corn around the world; how and when the tomato lost its earlier cognomen of "love apple"; what vegetables, besides parsnips and turnips, were known to the Romans; and what garden things came with the first settlers to America.

* * * * *

TIMOTHY DWIGHT, reporting on New England more than a century ago, listed the vegetables commonly cultivated in Yankee gardens. The stern disciples of God seem to have been better eaters than their sermons would attest. They cultivated artichokes, asparagus, endive, celery, cauliflower, and other fruits and vegetables which the Drifter had supposed of later date. Thomas Jefferson, when President, kept a careful record of the green vegetables available in the capital markets—and he includes in his list "sprouts" and Lima beans, missing from the New England list. What were these "sprouts"? The Drifter wants to know. And did the fat Lima beans come to the North later than to the South? What is the truth in the story on which the Drifter was brought up that tomatoes were long regarded as ornamental but poisonous? Both Timothy and Thomas record them in their edible kitchen lists. Timothy Dwight, when president of Yale College, grew four kinds of melons in his back yard, and distinguished the cantaloup from the muskmelon; and he seeded his corn in twelve successive plantings so as to have fresh ears every day from mid-July to mid-November. The Drifter doubts if President Hadley or President Angell has paid such fine attention to the higher things of life. Obviously there are gaps in the vaunted progress of modern education.

* * * * *

MAIZE, tomatoes, potatoes, several kinds of squash and gourds and beans, the Drifter has been told, we owe to the American Indians. Most of them made their way to our part of North America by a circuitous route, from South America to Europe and back across the ocean. The tomato, indeed, owed its earlier name to a misunderstanding of a geographical name, for "love apple" came from the French "pomme d'amour," which in turn was a mistranslation of the Italian "pomo dei Mori," "apple of the Moors," recalling that the tomato reached Italy from New Spain via Old Spain and Morocco. But now, the Drifter reads, explorers find "Indian corn" grown for food in the remote aboriginal villages of Yunnan, close to Tibet. Can it be that this vegetable, like so many of the flowering shrubs and trees of the old New England gardens, is in its ultimate origin another Chinese? And will the botanically minded ethnologists find in it another evidence of the Asiatic origin of the American Indian?

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

The Worm Turns

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: We college presidents are grateful when any one shows some knowledge of what our problems actually are. You have in the article Must Colleges Be Treadmills? referred to some of the sentimental vagaries of Dr. J. F. Kirkpatrick and his kind. You quite rightly say that "a body of scholars who do not know their own minds is a dangerous aggregation to turn loose with money to spend." You might have gone further and declared that it is a dangerous group to turn loose with the younger minds of potential scholars to manipulate at will.

What higher education in this country needs is not more freedom, but more brains. Can anyone point to a single instance where a faculty, after reasonable research, has recommended a policy rationally thought out and logically consistent and has found itself vetoed by the holding corporation? I know of none. Anyone who has ever sat in a collegiate faculty meeting will groan at the memory of cautious tedium, tedium largely due to the members being such specialists and so wholly devoid of general educational theory as to render mutual constructive effort next to impossible. The college presidents whom I know sing Te Deum laudamus at every sign of faculty thought about educational problems, theory, or practice. So do the trustees.

There is not a faculty in America that could be hired to take over the management of its college, for the simple reason that if it did the brethren would either have to economize or raise a great deal of money. Our boards of trustees are not so much administrators of large endowments as industrious beggars of funds which the teachers need and demand. There is no college without a deficit and a program of development. The professors know this perfectly well. Even Dr. Kirkpatrick and the smart young men must know it. That is what makes all this pity for the regimented pedagogue unreal and fantastic. If one could find, say, fifty American scholars willing to raise their own salaries and the money for their research or else starve in penury for the sake of academic freedom, the situation would seem different. It is not that there are lacking fifty honest scholars. It is, rather, that the honest scholars know they are already as free as the general intelligence of the profession justifies their being—and perhaps a bit more so.

Bernard Iddings Bell,
President, St. Stephen's College

Annandale-on-Hudson, N. Y., August 24

Remarkabler Yet

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In your issue of the 11th you say: "The remarkable and most disgraceful fact about the Republican Senatorial primaries in Illinois is the amount contributed in behalf of public-utility interests." You are wrong, I think. There is something remarkabler yet. That is the claim heralded by the press and leaders of organized labor that the nomination of Frank L. Smith was a victory for labor and a defeat for Coolidge. Was it?

Mena, Arkansas, August 18 Covington Hall

Religion in the Medical Schools

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: You comment on the fact that Loyola College of Medicine refused admission to a well-prepared applicant professing agnosticism. Even many non-Catholic medical colleges, such as Louisville, Marquette, Buffalo, and others want to know the religious affiliation and church membership of their applicants. Their attitude shows why professional training of any sort should be carried on by the State rather than by private educational institutions receiving most of their financial support from denominational groups. Non-Catholic medical colleges would probably refuse admission to any applicant who stated that more religion was to be found outside than inside the church. Why, then, do they ask questions in any way connected with the pursuit of medical studies?

New York, August 8 S. Michels

The Peace Department, 1821

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Some time a hundred years ago, when our government was waging war on the Seminole Indians, Dr. Benjamin Rush suggested the organization of a Peace Department in the federal government. Mr. Kirby Page could probably find suggestive details in the comments of the Friend of Peace (Vol. II, Boston, 1821) on this proposal. The Secretary of Peace was to be a man "perfectly free from all the absurd and vulgar European prejudices upon the subject of government." He was to head an efficient machine for spreading peace propaganda, a machine which was to keep its fingers on every public school in the country. The offices of the new Department of Peace were to be frescoed with appropriate designs. At the same time the offices of the War Department were to be redecorated with "a woeful group of figures, representing scenes of desolation" under the caption "National Glory." On the door-plates of the bureaus of the Secretary of War were to be such inscriptions as "An office for creating speculators, stock-jobbers, and bankrupts; an office for creating poverty and for the destruction of liberty and happiness."

Northampton, Massachusetts, July 22 M. Certi

"Singing Jailbirds"

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The enclosed is a copy of a letter just received from Ellen Wilkinson, M. P. I wonder if you would publish it and give me an opportunity to point out to your readers that there is an American Labor Play waiting for production. Unless I am greatly mistaken it is also waiting for review in The Nation.

Pasadena, Cal., August 24 Upton Sinclair

Dear Mr. Sinclair: I have been telling every group of American Lefts that they simply must produce "Singing Jailbirds." In London J. F. Horrabin, the editor of the Plebs, our Independent working-class educational monthly, organized the reading of the play, with a group of the lads from the Labor College. Horrabin was "Red" Adams. We tried it out first in a comparatively small hall, the proceeds going to the Miners' Relief. Although there was no attempt at scenery, and although every part was read, the play created an immense impression. Some of our hardest "left-wing" cynics had moist eyes. We had a record collection, and since then it has been done in much larger places.

Some Labor leaders present at the first reading left the hall determined to do more for our own class-war prisoners. We have a good few left after the General Strike.

New York City, August 20 Ellen Wilkinson

"Dry"

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: It is a mistake to call Judge J. E. Martineau, the Democratic nominee for Governor, a "Wet." The judge was accused by his opponent of being what is called in Arkansas a "drinking man." This accusation was, fortunately, disproved, and both candidates for the Democratic nomination were vociferously "Dry," during the campaign. Everybody, alas! is "Dry" in Arkansas, although our total consumption of moonshine compares favorably with that of any other State.

Little Rock, Ark., Aug. 27 Paul C. Snodgress

Books and Drama

Comparative Religions

By OWEN MEARS

Chen So-lin sits in the Methodist Chapel—
He sits on a hard pine board, unrelenting, ugly.
The chapel is a high gray box around him,
Beamed with a muddy brown. The altar
Arches in wood of reddish ochre—and the pulpit
Juts pugnacious—aloof—unattached.
The windows are a leaded, whitish glass
Quite thick enough to catch and kill the light
That pressedly throws them. High and shrill
The choir leads a hymn with nasal pitch,
The congregation drags a note or two—
An earnest higher purpose leads them on.
The minister (the offering secure)
Arises to his place and reads his text.
An hour and a half he reads his theme—
A technical discussion of the translation
Of the original Hebrew of a certain word
In a particular verse of a given chapter
Of Isaiah.

Chen So-lin sits in the Methodist Chapel
But his being revolts from the orthodox grayness.
Taking his soul he flees up to the mountains
Over the brown plain with pulsating rivers—
Up the steep slopes, golden fair with persimmons—
Up to the mountains of pine tree and cedar—
Up toward the Heaven's intense blue whose calmness
Tells him that beauty and God can't be separate.
Here hides the temple with its dull red wall,
Court after court rises upward toward the hills.
Stone-paved, moss green, and golden with the sun,
The temples, goldpolished, gleam dazzling bright—
Their borders, blue and green and red and gold,
Are blended to a whole of which each part
Sings harmony with sunset and with trees.
The temple, dim and cool and pillared tall,
Is lit with flickering candles whose faint light
Enfolds with soft caress the eternal calm.
The ineffable solicitude and peace
That sit aloft with Buddha, lotus-throned.
In the distance sounds the note of brazen gongs,
The minor chanting of the temple priests.
Tells they are
Kneels on the flame silk cushion, and his hand,
Ready with love and fire and
Ignites his bit of incense at the shrine.

Chen So-lin sits in the M
The minister is saying the Benediction.
Brother Johnson grips him by the hand.
"Wasn't it a splendid service?" he asks with conviction.
Chen So-lin's eyes smile serene with their memori
"Splendid," he said, and went out to the sunlight.

A Challenge to Liberalism

The End of Laissez Faire. By John Maynard Keynes. London: The Hogarth Press. 3s.

TODAY we find J. M. Keynes admitting that laissez faire, the first commandment of Liberalism, is now little more than a shell and a name. And Professor Clay, one of the finest flowers of British Liberalism, writes: "Laissez faire frees the individual from legal obstructions to the exercise of initiative. By neglecting the inequalities which this freeing of initiative necessarily created it at the same time relinquished him to the new unofficial servitude to the rich consumer and to the mechanical organization of production. The problem of modern society is to rehabilitate the individual." Both Keynes and Clay are disappointed with the results of the doctrine.

It is important to note, in an analysis of this highly significant statement by Henry Clay, that he is speaking of two individuals: one who benefits by laissez faire and the other whom it abandons to the slavery of the "rich consumer and the mechanical organization of production"—read Capitalism. The buyers of luxuries and the owners of the mechanical organization of production are one class and the individuals who serve them another. The problem, then, is the rehabilitation not of an undefined mass of individuals but of the victim of this "new unofficial servitude." Mr. Keynes too realizes that the end of laissez faire, of which the fall of the great party of Asquith and Lloyd George is only one manifestation, confronts every Liberal—industrial, commercial, and financial, as well as intellectual—with the necessity of making a choice in favor of some "opponent proposal." Of the two alternatives, "Protectionism," that is, state aid for capitalism, and Marxian Socialism or Communism, the former strikes Mr. Keynes as "at least plausible, and the forces making for its popularity are nothing to wonder at," whereas Marxism is abhorrent to his mind. However, though he leans toward Protectionism, he rejects it too, for the time being, one is inclined to think, in favor of a middle-of-the-road proposal. He suggests a unit of control and organization "somewhere between the individual and the modern state"—in other words, "semi-autonomous bodies within the state" such as the Bank of England, the Port of London Authority, and "even perhaps the Railway Companies." This is Mr. Keynes's solution. He recognizes that capitalism in the last thirty years has been the irrevocable undoing of liberal industrialism and trade. And, forced to select between Capitalism buttressed by the state and Socialism, he temporizes and offers a mongrel product which he christens "State Socialism." If the Bank of England, the British railroads, and the ordinary big banks and big insurance companies of which Mr. Keynes speaks are forms of State Socialism, then he is right. One suspects, however, that Mr. Keynes has made his decision in favor of modern Capitalism, but cannot yet bring himself to admit it.

At all events, Sir Alfred Mond, formerly a pillar of British Liberalism, has gone over to the Tories with a number of his fellows, while many of his old party friends are joining hands with Labor. This may in the end be Lloyd George's fate also. The point is that in England, where Liberalism is not of the parlor variety but rather a matter of living everyday life, of definite economic policy, Liberals who hitherto stood on the neutral fulcrum of the seesaw are now compelled to go to one of the ends of the board, to Die-Hard Capitalism or to pro-Socialism. This is a challenge to Liberals the world over.

In economic life Liberalism is dead. We have trusts and chain stores instead of free competition, protectionist tariffs and customs barriers instead of free trade; but more important still, there is frank governmental intercession on behalf of Capitalism. Baldwin openly sides with the mine owners and makes possible the eight-hour day, Mussolini decrees the nine-hour day; sugar, fruit, and oil companies invariably touch a sympathetic chord in the United States Navy and State Department. All over Europe states are subsidizing industry and commerce, and international trusts are growing up to limit production and fix prices. Nor are these accidental or passing phenomena. They seem to be imperative measures for the support of Capitalism in what may be an extremely prolonged period of "relative stability."

With Liberalism gone out of the world of business, can it maintain itself in the life of the social individual? With the state mobilized for Capitalism, can democracy be real?

LOUIS FISCHER

A Misunderstood Man

The Life of William Godwin. By Ford K. Brown. E. P. Dutton and Company. $6.

WILLIAM GODWIN is not the subject of a biography every year. It was to be hoped that when a successor to Mr. Kegan Paul's volumes was published it not only would gather together much of the available though scattered information on Godwin's relations with his contemporaries but would contain some elucidation of the curiously varied ways in which they regarded him, and would add to our knowledge of his tangled private affairs. Godwin was, during a part of his life, one of the most notorious of men, the subject of innumerable references in the letters and diaries of the time. Among his acquaintances were many of the most striking and important literary and political men of two generations. Yet he remains a somewhat inscrutable person. It is not difficult to understand that he aroused respect and admiration for his works in the same individuals by whom he was laughed at and despised for his personal stiffness and arrogance. But the heart of the man is a mystery, and calls for interpretation. The supposed discrepancy between his preaching and his practice accounts in part for his treatment at the hands both of his contemporaries and of later writers, and is largely due to a misunderstanding of his doctrine; to read "Political Justice" and some of the later essays disposes of it. Other wrong notions are the result of political prejudice. But there remain points that careful investigation might clear up, and which, once ascertained, would make clearer our knowledge of certain of his contemporaries as well. What was wanted, in short, was a biography that would perform for Godwin somewhat the service that was performed for Hazlitt by Mr. Howe's recent biography.

Mr. Brown's work does not completely satisfy these requirements. He has been obliged to draw extensively upon Mr. Paul's volumes, since, as he says, some of the documents to which Mr. Paul had access have disappeared. He also draws upon the letters of Coleridge, Southey, and Lamb, and upon other less familiar sources; the book contains little that is new. Unfortunately Mr. Brown's method of quotation is unscholarly; slight alterations in diction and arrangement are made without notice, and the defect is too prevalent for one to suppose that he has had the privilege of using original documents in each case. Exact sources are seldom indicated. There are also inaccuracies in dates, not always a trifling matter in biography. These defects prevent the work's being authoritative.

It does, however, serve the useful purpose of collecting reminiscences of Godwin not unknown but not before assembled. There is a good account of the controversy with Malthus and an excellent one of Godwin's relations with Tooke. Perhaps the most valuable part of the book is that on Francis Place, who attempted to set Godwin's financial affairs in order and finally gave up in despair. We are given no satisfactory explanation of what became of Godwin's not inconsiderable income, but the matter of Godwin's borrowing is well handled, with some mitigation of the traditional accounts of the extent and the manner of it. Something is done, too, to destroy the myth that Godwin was "a cold-blooded monster of superhuman impassivity," though his emotions are vindicated at the expense of Mary Shelley's veracity. The sensitiveness of Godwin's heart is implied in his relations with his parents, between mother. It is to be wished that Mr. Brown had found space for one of her characteristic letters to her aunt (the single long quotation is not altogether representative).

Godwin wrote in the Enquirer: "In judging the past conduct, particularly of others, he that is not liberal and indulgent is not just." This is especially applicable to Godwin himself. In so many respects he stood apart from his time, by very nature he was bound to such an extent to be misunderstood both then and afterwards, that only by offsetting the prejudice against him can the truth be manifested. It was easy in the first quarter of the nineteenth century, and it has been easy since, to defame an unconventional, noble mind. Mr. Brown, by presenting the facts objectively, has been liberal and indulgent in comparison with those who have sneered at Godwin as the propounder of an impossible and obnoxious system and the writer of deservedly dead novels. By doing so he has added his name to those of Mr. Paul and Mr. Brailsford as a dealer in justice. Though his work is scarcely valuable for those who already are familiar with Godwin, it makes a good introduction to him for that larger number of readers who are not.

RAYMOND A. PRESTON

A Neighbor's Novel

His Son's Wife. By Dorothy Canfield. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

THERE are some novelists through whose minds, like strangely colored windows, one looks into a new world. Dorothy Canfield is not one of these. Her sympathetic gaze is fixed upon the neighbors. Her power lies largely in the friendly familiarity of the people and places of her books and her skill in evoking experiences which might have been ours. As her interest transcends mere gossip and the collector's delight in assembling human oddities, she wants to know how the forces which animate her people ebb and flow with the tides of the world beyond their hills, and then to explain to that wider circle the engaging and lovable discoveries which she has made. She is more anxious to tell something than to say something.

If one may judge from "Her Son's Wife" and the preceding novel, "The Home-maker," the ray of understanding which recently has illumined Dorothy Canfield's well-loved New England scene is the newer psychology and its teaching of the interaction of mind and body. Like the earlier book, "Her Son's Wife" offers a psychiatric solution to an apparently insoluble problem in personal relationships. Mary Bascomb realizes that she must find some way to free the family from the childish tyranny of Lottie, the pretty, vulgar daughter-in-law whom Ralph married in a moment of impulse and contrition. She encourages, then fosters, then all but enforces the invalidism to which Lottie is inclined as a means of getting sympathy and attention. While Lottie is kept in her room and bed, Lottie's husband and child may escape from the clutter and quarreling and cheapness which emanate from her. In evolving the pragmatic rule of life which alone can reconcile Mary's highly organized self-centered universe with the helpless floundering of childish little Lottie, Mary comes to see how her own self-pity and self-righteousness have corroded her spirit and eaten into Ralph's integrity. She abandons her rigid accounting of faults and virtues to accept people for what they are and what they may be, and, in accepting them, loves them—loves even Lottie.

In this story Dorothy Canfield walks a narrow and difficult path between didacticism and sentimentality. In the large she avoids both; Mary Bascomb is not merely a New England symbol used to point a moral but a real and evolving personality. It is safe to predict that "Her Son's Wife" will be used to illustrate many a sermon on the old truth that she who loses her life will find it. It does exemplify that gospel—but in the modern rather than the Puritanical understanding. Mary Bascomb succeeds not because of her sacrifice of personal ambitions but because she sees and accepts her fundamental desire—to save the grandchild from the wreckage of the parents—and in working for this scraps egotistic idealizations and moralisms so that she may understand each opposed [illegible] which will serve her end.

Dorothy Canfield has the gift of the story-teller. Her sympathy and her vitality fuse into integrity with her story the temptations to teach and to show which lurk in the New England background. She has become a real educator—as opposed to a mere propagandist—in the art and rationale of neighborliness.

MARY ROSS

Peter and Cæsar

The Pope. By Jean Carrère. Henry Holt and Company. $3.50.

IT is a question open to serious doubt whether any Catholic traveler through the late unlamented Papal States—meaning, of course, a traveler not directly dependent upon pontifical favors—ever wrote a book extolling the administration of the Papal principality. This much is certain: no nineteenth-century celebrity of any great renown, Catholic or Protestant, after his sojourn in the Papal States, ever went on record as a eulogist of the Vatican considered as a center of secular sovereignty—as long as that sovereignty existed. Even Macaulay—a fervent admirer of the Papacy viewed as a perdurable historic institution—had nothing but contempt for its domestic statecraft. His private letters—like those of the historian Gregorovius, of Margaret Fuller, and of innumerable other eye-witnesses of Roman misgovernment—are full of curious sidelights upon one of the worst governments that ever carried on. Its posthumous reputation, however, among devoted Catholics is not founded upon any of its true characteristics while alive. It is with commonwealths as with men: the worst among them, when martyred, will find their apologists among enthusiastic souls—as if a violent death, no matter how incurred, were quite as meritorious a performance as a useful life.

The secular reign of Roman priestcraft, after centuries of heaped abuse and tyranny, died a violent death in 1870—and of this death it has been living in the glorifying wish-dreams of a great many Catholic enthusiasts ever since. We cannot recollect among their hosts a single one equal to Jean Carrère in fervor, eloquence, and skill of mutilating history. If you can imagine a compound of Loyola and Podsnap you have the literary physiognomy of Jean Carrère, at least as it is on view here. Like Loyola he has the power to conjure up any unreal historical pageantry which can shed glamor upon his Romanist doctrine; like Podsnap he has the amazing gift of waving away any inconvenient fact that may stare him broadly in the face.

The main pillars of his dream-concept of papal history are two types of his own invention—an immortal Chief-Lama, called Peter, being a continuous portrait of all the Popes that ever reigned, and an equally stable fixture in the annals of Western civilization, representing a supreme secular power, whom he calls Cæsar. According to Jean Carrère, the pacts and conflicts of these two perennial potentates are the central fact of Occidental history. Where did Peter get his warrant of spiritual supremacy? The author, despite his Catholic fervor, refrains from answering the question with the angry retort of Charles the Fifth when quizzed by the ambassador of Henry the Eighth: "It's too late in the day to argue dabo tibi claves." On the contrary, he devotes an initial chapter of sermonizing exposition to the choice of Christ, arranging and exhibiting to best advantage all the scriptural corner-stones of the doctrine of Roman supremacy with a skill inspired by faith. The book is about as perfect an expression of retrospective Romanist views upon history as can well be imagined. It is brief, entertainingly written, and excellently Englished. For all these reasons it deserves to be recommended to students of Romanist perspectives.

JAMES FUCHS

The Dangerous Queen

The Fugger News-Letters: 1568-1605, Second Series. Edited by Victor von Klarwill. Translated by L. S. R. Byrne. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $6.

THE first series of Fugger News-Letters contained reports, by the best journalists of the day, of a wide variety of events—wars and witch-burnings, miracles and assassinations. The new series, while perhaps less entertaining, is of far more value to historical students. The editor has extracted from the Fugger archives in the Vienna State Library the more important letters referring to England under Queen Elizabeth. They are dated from all parts of Europe and show very conclusively the tremendous and, from the point of view of the old order, sinister influence that Elizabeth had on the Europe of her time.

The Fuggers were the greatest bankers of the day. They supplied monarchs, including the twice-bankrupt Philip II of Spain, with the means to carry on wars. They were thus devoted to the cause of Catholicism and regarded Elizabeth as a menace to property and religion. Evidently their correspondents had instructions to keep a close eye on "this Queen," as she is frequently called in the letters, and to report any activities of the English which might affect, directly or indirectly, the fortunes of the House. The English Court seems indeed to have occupied a position somewhat analogous to that of the Third International to-day. It stirred up heresy and sedition in various parts of Europe. It encouraged adventurers to make piratical raids on the lawful property of the King of Spain. It even negotiated with the infidel Turk for assistance against that monarch. No wonder good Catholic statesmen and bankers were in a perpetual state of rage and alarm, and eager for any news that could be gleaned as to the Queen's impending moves!

Fugger reporters seem to have listened to rumors as readily as do some of their professional descendants. Elizabeth was constantly reported assassinated or dead from natural causes. In one respect, however, they showed their inferiority. There are scarcely any atrocity stories in these letters, and none of the correspondents seem to have been bright enough to discover that Protestantism was equivalent to free love—or worse.

KEITH HUTCHISON

An Immigration Source-Book

[illegible] of the Immigration Problem. By Edith Abbott. The University of Chicago Press. $4.50.

NOWHERE more than in matters pertaining to immigration has fact been so lopped or stretched to fit the Procrustean bed of propaganda. The time has come for undertaking dispassionate inquiry and survey of the varied materials offered by the experience of the United States in dealing with the manifold problems arising in the development of an immigration policy; it is strange that thus far so little has been done. Miss Abbott, realizing the importance of immigration as one of the outstanding facts of American national life, has rendered pioneer service by publishing two source-books of immigration material.

The first volume, devoted to a collection of documents and case-records which throw light on many legal, social, and historical phases of the subject, is now supplemented by a second volume, which is the outgrowth of material once intended for the first. This second volume should perhaps precede the first, for it is filled with documents discussing the general questions relating to immigration and therefore basic to more technical discussion. Presenting as it does a bird's eye view throughout the years of American life previous to 1882, when the first federal immigration legislation was passed, it gives a sense of the richness of this much-neglected field.

Miss Abbott allows reprints of material long inaccessible and little known to tell their own story, adding only introductory notes to each section. Since the various documents naturally overlap, she shows the line between differing phases of immigration to be a fluid one. In general, however, she has stuck to her classifications. Throughout the whole runs the perennial question as to whether emigration is a remedy for overpopulation. Lord John Russell maintained that the number of persons removed from a locality was never so large as to produce an effect on the population and thus to increase wages. And ever throughout the documents runs the cry of the handloom weavers and the Irish after the potato famine, so thankful for opportunity for work that they emigrated at their own or the parish's expense and then wrote back with joy of the opportunities for work for even miles of six years. Whether or no emigration proved a solution, the steady stream went on. As district after district of the country opened up in response to the westward urge, letters went back telling of opportunities for work and homes in the new land; even States alluringly held forth the possibilities they offered. In 1853 the State of Wisconsin distributed and sent abroad nearly 30,000 pamphlets describing its attractions. Small wonder that numbers came ever increasingly, that Ireland had "hand-bills placarded on every corner, tree and pump and public place in the city of Dublin and for fifty miles in the surrounding country, stating in substance that the people were fools not to leave the country."

Constantly comes the realization that American policy in regard to immigration has been hit-or-miss and has involved the same mistakes over and over again. The obloquy we cast on Southern Europeans today but repeats our attitude toward Irish and Germans. "Everywhere in the United States the Irish-born part of the population is only tolerated by the native Americans as what has been termed 'a serviceable nuisance'; it is a population of foreigners and outcasts, exceedingly valuable as a mass of labor which gives productiveness to capital in a country where the natives dislike work for hire, but socially despised, and in so many ways ill-treated, that practically it does not enjoy that equality of rights which is the boast of American democracy." That was written in 1847, and only eight years later we hear that the "German in America is a complete stranger . . . the German in America is despised as an alien. . . . Only in places where the Germans are in the majority does the newly arrived immigrant find, after all the hardships of the journey, an endurable existence."

The papers of the Know-Nothing Party might have furnished much of the testimony before the Senate and House Committees on Immigration of the 69th Congress. We learn in 1856 "that most of the grog shops in the city are kept by unnaturalized foreigners"; we now hear that the bootleggers are all foreigners; in either case the possibility of ascertaining the facts is remote. We still are told that "immigration is bringing the most important institutions of the land into danger" (1850), or that "the danger of foreign influences threatens the gradual destruction of our national institutions" (1845). On the other hand, in 1855 it was felt that "the powerful position of America has given its inhabitants a conceit which is expressed not only in foreign relations but toward everything foreign coming into the country."

The book gives the other side of the medal too, since it shows the long struggle to keep other countries from dumping their paupers and criminals upon us, and the gradual realization that the problem was too vast a one for the separate States to control. Today, as in 1851, "there is no subject of which a morally unsolid view is more commonly taken than that of immigration"; but such volumes as Miss Abbott's lead the way in showing that immigration is neither all black nor all white. Nor is it a problem of one country alone, for it leaves its mark on the country of emigration, the lands of transit, and the places of destination.

The issue is not without its dignity. If you had been gone to Texas in 1857 you would have been welcomed by a figure in blue flannel shirt and pendent beard, quoting Tacitus, having in one hand a long pipe, in the other a bowie knife; Madonnas upon log walls; coffee in tin cups upon Dresden saucers; barrels for seats; to hear a Beethoven symphony on the grand piano; 'My wife made these pantaloons, and my stockings grew in the field yonder'; a fowling-piece that cost $300, and a saddle that cost $5; a book-case half filled with classics, half with sweet potatoes." JANE PERRY CLARK

Books in Brief

Free Negro Heads of Families in the United States in [illegible]. By C. G. Woodson. Washington, D. C. The Associated Publishers. $5.

Free Negro Owners of Slaves in the United States in [illegible]. By C. G. Woodson. Washington, D. C. The Associated Publishers. $1.

Taking the census of 1830 as representing the peak development of the free Negro population prior to the repressive measures of 1840-59 against this particular class, the editor of the Journal of Negro History has compiled a documented report from the original manuscript schedules of the Census records, listing family heads of the nearly half-million who enjoyed freeman's status at that time. Apart from its startling revelation of the size and distribution of an almost-forgotten element of the Negro population, the study makes available important material for the further study of economic and social conditions both of the Negroes themselves and of the general community. From this survey much material was gained for Dr. Woodson's study entitled "The Beginnings of the Miscegenation of the Whites and Blacks," since the marital relations and color of persons listed were in most cases indicated; and the second of the above listed volumes, a somewhat startling list of over four thousand free Negro owners of slaves, is a direct by-product of the main bit of research. Here is another exhumed chapter of American history. While a great majority of Negro slaveholders were benevolent purchasers of the "freedom" of their wives and relatives, protecting them from a harder slavery by this technical legal ownership, many were, as a matter of fact, plantation owners and exploiting slaveholders after the general fashion of the South. Dry as the terse records are, they bear more of the actual facts and anomalies of the slave regime than many shelves of controversial literature.

Sins of Science. By Scudder Klyce. Boston: Marshall Jones Company. $3.

The author, with a humility most becoming to one solving the riddle of the universe, admits that he may have committed a petty blunder here and there in the solution, but says he has grown unshakably certain that he now knows the fundamental truth. It has fallen to his sad lot to protect us, and especially our children, "against the positive viciousness of scientific materialism or agnosticism." For his sacrificial boldness in assuming this modest role he asserts that he has been dubbed "a damned philosopher by the scientists" (possibly as the result of John Dewey's introduction of sanction to Klyce's latest book, "Universe") and "a damned scientist by the philosophers." The first allegation may possibly be true, though it is doubtful; but it is highly improbable that even a philosopher would accuse Mr. Klyce of being a scientist. He writes challenging letters to scientists—Richards and Millikan, for example—and then distorts their replies beyond recognition by reading his own philosophical interpretations into their scientific responses. Thus Richards's atoms acquire absoluteness, Millikan's electron attains divinity, and Russell's space-time becomes "absolute free space." The reader's salvation is conditioned by his willingness to embrace the doctrine of Mr. Klyce that "The Related Many Equals the One." Mathematicians, biologists, physicists, and psychiatrists may alike peruse the contents of this book, but only one of the groups mentioned will thoroughly understand it.

Friends of Mr. Sweeney. By Elmer Davis. Robert M. McBride and Company. $2.

"An editor," said Rixey, "is a man who can explain molecules to an expert on mining, and explain mining to an expert on molecules, and make each of them think he knows what he's talking about." Elmer Davis crams a lot of soundly observed satire on the highbrows of his profession into a frothy story of a plodding sub-editor who discovered tiger women, bubbling bottles, and burglarious bandits in one adventurous night.

The Story of Durham. By William Kenneth Boyd. Duke University Press. $5.

Durham, North Carolina, is bourgeois and middle class and gloats over the fact. Professor Boyd tells of Indian settlements, of sturdy pioneers, and of General Sherman's negotiations which led to the military surrender of the Confederacy. These are interesting but irrelevant. They might as well have happened on another planet. They have nothing to do with the sign of Bull Durham and the epic of the cigarette. The Civil War increased the demand for tobacco. It was a crop which lent itself to the newer agricultural conditions of the South. Durham lay in a district which produced one of the best grades. The markets had been in Virginia. There was a prejudice against the North Carolina crop. A group of manufacturers decided to start producing tobacco products at home. They began one of the world's greatest advertising campaigns. Durham became the tobacco capital of the world.

Drama

Potemkin

THE Film Arts Guild and the Russian organization, Sovkino, have given a private showing of the Russian film, "Armored Cruiser, Prince Potemkin," to three hundred invited guests. The picture is for sale in America. Max Reinhardt and Douglas Fairbanks unite in saying that it is great art, the best motion picture either has ever seen. Already it has had, as well, a tremendous commercial success in Germany despite defeats in certain German cities by political censorship. Will Hays, who seems never to forget that the average mental age of the American public is fourteen years, and is so very careful lest the movies help mature us, was not present on Tuesday. There is no final word therefore as to whether the picture is to become a legend among the cognoscenti, or be the sensation of the movies this year.

In making the picture Director Eisenstein used members of the Moscow Art Theater and hundreds of non-professional actors from the Proletcult (Organization for Proletarian Culture). The story, based on the official report in the Admiralty files of the Czar, and on the recollections of eye-witnesses and participants, describes the revolt of the sailors of the armored cruiser "Potemkin" of the Black Sea fleet outside the harbor of Odessa during the 1905 Revolution, the demonstrations of the common people at the tent-bier of the sailor who led it, the attack on the mourners and revolutionists by the Cossacks, and finally the escape of the cruiser "Potemkin" with the connivance of comrades on the other cruisers of the fleet to the Rumanian port of Constanza. Here is epic material, full of pity, terror, and truth.

Someone muttered in the audience "This is some news-reel." There could be no higher praise for the reality conveyed. So it was, indicating at last in which direction the art of the movies is to lie, if the screen is to be something more than a vehicle for exploiting the personalities of stars and a distractor of the public gaze from public and private conflicts. There was no star in the picture, unless perhaps the cruiser itself, or the sailors, or the masses of Odessa. Certainly not the sailor who rose to give command and who died in the fighting. The eyes of the audience beheld, sensed, understood all that happened on those significant three days. Captions were few and simple, muted down, whispered directions to those who have forgotten history. The continuity halts nowhere for explanations. The eye but followed as the ear might hearken to a tune. The sailors, at work, asleep in hammocks in sultry and cramped quarters, waking, going to their decks and engines, to roll call, grumbling about the rotted meat. The doctor, looking at the meat through his glasses. Nests of wriggling maggots. The doctor says the meat is good, to wash it off in salted water. The sailors know that in the prison camps of Japan their comrades are better fed. The commander of the cruiser will have none of grumbling. It smacks of mutiny. He commands the firing squad. . . . Sail-cloth is thrown over the malcontents. "Fire!" "Fire!!" . . . "Fire!!! . . . But comrade will not fire upon comrade, and the revolt has come. Words convey but feebly the tremendous impression of being everywhere at once which the all-seeing camera was able to give.

This was more than news-reel. The camera, like some holy invisible, watched and recorded. Of all this population that Director Eisenstein commanded, not one lingered before the camera. Life was the thing—masses of men, sweating at the furnaces, at mess, fighting; faces, arms, legs, engines, thermometers, the big guns with nostrils scenting danger, the restless flow of the common people of Odessa across the narrow file of the breakwater to where the dead sailor lay in common state; the faces of the mourners, the student and revolutionist exhorters; the crowd in panic—things like these have never been seen so well in life or theater before. Nor has machinery, monster and servant in the modern world, been so emotionally comprehended, or the relations between those who physically manipulate it and those who own it been so dramatized.

The audience was divided between those who were nervous and puzzled by the social conflict which was the theme of the film, and those who were deeply moved not only by the revolutionary theme but by the revolution in movie technique bringing in its wake a vision of the new developments in the one art the machine age can call its own. Whether the public sees this picture or not, it will before long experience the influence of the new technique, the use of masses, the feeling for motion and machinery, a new swiftness and naturalness. Director Eisenstein, when he has finished the picture he is now making in Moscow, a film concerned with cattle-breeding and cream separators, I am told, will spend six months in Hollywood. He has been granted leave of absence by the Soviet Government to direct one picture for United Artists.

ERNESTINE EVANS

LECTURES

SCOTT NEARING

Just back from England, will lecture on

The General Strike

At NEW STAR CASINO, 107th St. and Park Ave.

SUNDAY AFTERNOON, SEPT. 19, at 2 P. M.

Auspices Workers' School Admission 75c.

SCOTT NEARING

Now in London for the British Trade Union Congress, will lecture upon his return on

"THE CRISIS IN BRITISH IMPERIALISM"

at the

Community Church, 34th St. and Park Ave., N. Y. City

MONDAY EVENING, SEPT. 20, 1926, at 8:15 P. M. TICKETS 75c.

International Relations Section

Where Slavery Still Rules

PORTUGAL'S African Slave States, an article in this section of The Nation for March 10, described the Ross-Cramer report on the exploitation of native labor in the Portuguese colonies in Africa, and the item-by-item answer to the report given on behalf of the Portuguese Government by Alfonso Augusto da Costa, which virtually caused Viscount Cecil's Geneva Slavery Protocol to be still-born. The following articles, translated from papers issued in Lisbon, Portugal, and Angola, Portuguese West Africa, reveal the abject, if more or less intermittent, slavery of the natives to the white overlords of the land.

A Government administrator declared that the Government considers all natives its property. This is borne out by the Forced Labor Law of January, 1925, requiring all employers of native labor to contract for it with the Government. An early draft of this law was printed in The Nation for August 27, 1921, as a translation from the Jornal de Benguela, from which come also some of the excerpts printed below. The agreement discussed between Angola and São Tomé has been signed. Its terms have not been published, but they are not likely to differ greatly from those mentioned in the article translated from A Batalha for November 10, 1925. A Batalha is owned and operated by the Confederação General de Trabalho, the Portuguese labor movement, a syndicalist organization which does not countenance the use of armed force.

The native tax several times mentioned in these articles (the collection of which seems to be the principal function of the Government) has the effect of driving the natives from the cultivation of their own land to work for the planters and the large enterprises as well as to finance the Government. The tax amounts to four-fifths of all the Colony's direct taxation. The natives pay in this way 40,000,000 escudos ($1,600,000) annually. In return they receive the right to work for the white men at the daily wage of 80 centavos (3 cents). The annual tax is 80 escudos, so that the tax represents one hundred days of work. It is commonly levied on males from 14 or 15 up, but a correspondent of The Nation has in his possession a photograph showing children between 7 and 13 years of age with their sénhas (tax assessments).

At the present time natives in the out-station villages of a certain mission are being punished by the local government because some of them were so indiscreet as to give some facts to Edward A. Ross when he was there. The officials can only create inconveniences for the European missionaries, but the natives are made to suffer.

These articles are no special indictment against the Portuguese. A similar system is in vogue in certain French colonies and in some British areas in Africa. Some of the worst exploiters of the native in Angola are non-Portuguese (American) companies. The Angola Petroleum Company, a Sinclair concern, would not permit Mr. Ross to visit its works, and grave charges have been made against it.

Contract Labor in Angola

A Batalha (Lisbon) in its issue of May 13 published an article signed Correia da Sousa, from which we quote:

A contract has been signed between the Government of Angola and the General Construction Company which should have been denominated The Death Pact. According to its terms the company, as party of the second part, has the right to recruit so many hundred Africans for its service, using them according to the customary conditions laid down in the testamento negro. The company exploits its worse than slaves in exchange for an insignificant remuneration and a deficient supply of food deprived of nutritive properties. The work is violent and continuous, whether the burning sun suffocates and bakes the chattels or the rain precipitates itself upon them in great torrents.

Three men's work must be borne by one, although the contrary is true of the food and wages, for five do not get what one should have. And if one does not step quickly, the actual violence of the whip (látego) carries out the threat of its constant presence. The black, the poor Negro, has no right to feel indisposed, to say that he is unable, that he is sick. He may have intestinal dysentery or malignant sores. He may be anemic or jaundiced, or afflicted with pneumonia or malaria. If he dies—a Negro dies, a dog. Just one beast less. . . .

Starved, sick, only when their strength is completely exhausted, only when even the whip brandished brutally over their wasted bodies can no longer force them to rise—only then, carried on a stretcher or assisted by their companions in slavery and misfortune, are they taken to the hospital. Some die on the way, others in the vestibule of the Lodging for Public Employees, whence, of those who reach the hospital, a large percentage go on to the public cemetery.

Some who are able to walk flee from the hospital to be free from the boss who tortures them. Among these there are not a few who run away so that they can take the pieces of clothing with which they are furnished on the day in which they enter the hospital. Not a few times some of those who flee are found dead in the high grass, where the last bit of strength had abandoned them.

Lodged under the vilest of unhygienic conditions, starved, sick, abused by excessive work, and by all physical and moral tortures, with hardly a rag to hide their genital organs, their bodies exposed to the inexorable rigors of the weather, the life of these unfortunates is a cycle of martyrdom.

If we consult the register of the admission of patients to the Central Hospital of Loanda, we shall have occasion to see that the diagnosis of a large number of native workmen is inanition. The larger part of this contingent of hunger victims comes from the General Construction Company and from the railways.

"They kill them by starvation. . . . When they come to the hospital they already have the death rattle in the throat." So said the chief of the health services of Angola, Coronel Dr. João Gomes Delgado, Jr., referring to the frightful proportion of deaths from among the employees of the General Construction Company and the railways.

That is why the governor at that time, the rude militarist Miguel de Almeida Santos, was, it is alleged, attacked by the journalists, who demanded that he take precautions to oblige those whose responsibility was so great to respect the life of the native laborer.

The chief of the health services, observing that the inter-hospital death figures were extraordinarily augmented by the "serviçais" (contract laborers) of the company, and in order that the precautions urgently required by such an excessive mortality might be taken, ordered statistics prepared. The disease-cause of the deaths in question was inanition. Upon examining the books containing the obituary registers, it was found that in the short space of less than three months almost two hundred had died of hunger.

What precautions then, what restraining measures did the governor take? None. The unfortunates continued to enter the hospital by the tens and the dozens per day, going there starved, already in the agonies of death.

And the members of the company became rich. Civilization and Progress. . . . Poor unhappy slaves.

Slavery in São Tomé

From the same paper's issue of November 18, 1925, we quote the following:

The roceiros (plantation owners) of São Tomé, generously sacrificing their "legitimate interests," offer to each Negro the salary of fifty escudos [about two dollars] per month. Not content with this stupendous prodigality they offer to repatriate him at the end of three years if he wishes. They will give him a blanket when he embarks, and—supreme philanthropy—they will even feed the minor children who may accompany him. . . .

Fifty escudos a month cannot be considered a wage. No white man, however deplorable his economic condition, would accept it, to say nothing of the accompanying long hours which invite tuberculosis. . . . Further, the Negro never has the fifty escudos in his possession . . . and, even more, he continues to owe them [the roceiros] money. It is slavery without disguise.

Local criticism in Portuguese East Africa is voiced by Antonio Augusto Dias in the Jornal de Benguela of May 7, 1926:

We do not yet know whether in Loanda official attention has been given to the supply of labor to São Tomé. We do not know whether the methods used will be studied and approved here in the colony, whether its bases have already been assented to by the home Government and the roceiros. . . .

It still remains unknown whether the period of contract will be for more than two years with optional renewals, in order to guarantee the necessary number of laborers. . . .

We find in the Provincia de Angola [a Loanda paper], in an article signed by the director, various pertinent considerations.

The illustrious writer finds the number of able-bodied men insignificant, according to the official charts, which show the Negro population of Angola at between five and six millions. These numbers are more than exaggerated. There are completely deserted regions whose populations were decimated by hunger, by sleeping sickness, and by smallpox. There may be fewer than three million native inhabitants today. We must realize that the official data coming from the enrolment for the hut-tax and purporting to represent heads of families are not absolutely true. In the majority of cases the unit represents a single individual. Many of these are not yet truly adults and many others cannot be used in agricultural services because they are already of advanced age. . . . The greater number [of the inhabitants] are women and children.

The article ends by raising two important points. The law of human liberty demands their fulfilment. They are: (1) Repatriation compulsorily assured; (2) voluntary contracts, without possibility of deception.

The first could be guaranteed in the agreement to be drawn up between the two colonies, if Angola could exact the fulfilment of such a clause. The second depends on the free will of the native, in desiring to go to those islands. It is true today the native is so worn down by working on the roads and giving his services far from home that he hardly has any fixed habitation, and would, perhaps, not be reluctant to emigrate, in the belief that there is no difference between one place and another.

That the natives are well treated and have medical assistance in São Tomé we have no doubt. There would have been similar assistance in Angola (some private agricultural enterprises do have it as an exception), but the Government, one may say, has abandoned the project. . . . Preventive vaccination for smallpox should be compulsory, and sleeping sickness reduced to the minimum by the extinction of the tsetse fly

The AMERICAN SENATE

By Lindsay Rogers

[illegible] Publication of [illegible] investigations above all, election expenditures such as these have brought forcibly to mind the constant importance of the Senate. This illuminating book traces the powers of the Senate from those designed by the Constitution to those very different powers enjoyed today, and illustrates the problems of the voter with respect to these most powerful representatives.

[illegible]

GOVERNMENT OWNED CORPORATIONS

By Harold A. Van Dorn
Columbia University

This book traces the growth and analyzes the possibilities of such administrative agencies as the Federal Land Banks, the Emergency Fleet Corporation, the War Finance Corporation, etc. $3.00

CRIME AND THE CRIMINAL

By Pliny A. Pat[illegible]
[illegible]

The development of criminological theory and procedure, penal and reform methods, are here fully discussed. There are chapters on the physical and psychological conditions of criminality and of the child criminal. $3.00

ALFRED A. KNOPF, 730 Fifth Ave., New York

BORZOI BOOKS

THE NEW LEADERSHIP IN INDUSTRY

By SAM A. LEWISOHN

MR. LEWISOHN, from experience as well as from study, concludes that industrial unrest is largely due to failure to train managers, although the responsibilities of the man who organizes the man-power of a business are fully as important as those of the one who secures its finances. $2.00

E. P. DUTTON & CO., 681 Fifth Ave., New York

accept nothing but

Non Depressant nor Habit Forming

In Convenient Aluminum Boxes

At every drug store

Midol for HEADACHE

GENERAL DRUG CO., - 94 N. Moore Street, New York

OUTWITTING MIDDLE AGE

by Dr. Carl Ramus

"Aging [illegible] can be largely prevented," says Dr. Ramus. In [illegible] he tells how the vitality of youth may be conserved well into the latter years of life. $2.00

WHITE WATERS AND BLACK

by Gordon MacCreagh

An [illegible] account of eight [illegible] wandering through the jungles of the upper Amazon. Great adventures, savage loveliness, and humorous human nature. Fully illustrated. $4.00

EAST OF SIAM

by Harry Franck

Fourth and concluding book to record Mr. Franck's long and intimate sojourn in Eastern Asia. A richly colored, tremendously informative and delightful story of French Indo-China, picturing priest and peasant, courtier and courtesan. No other traveler can equal Mr. Franck's all-seeing eye, his understanding of alien peoples. Fully illustrated. $3.50

LINCOLN'S Parentage and Childhood

by Louis A. Warren

A wealth of new information on the Lincoln, Hanks and [illegible] families, unearthed from forgotten public records. Lincoln's heredity and background, with picture of a whole [illegible] generation. Illustrated. $3.50

BILL NYE: His Own Life Story

Continuity by Frank Wilson Nye

Life story of the great American humorous philosopher, of whom John Dewey said no man did more to banish ignorance and superstition. Arranged from unpublished manuscripts by his son. Many caricatures and illustrations. $4.00

THE NEGRO In American Life

by Jerome Dowd

History of the black race, an analysis of its present social-[illegible] [illegible] and a projection of its future in the nation. The result of a quarter century of thorough research. By the Professor of Sociology at the University of Oklahoma. $5.00

THE HOUSE OF SIMPLICITY

by Ethel Davis Seal

A practical and exceedingly informative book on interior decoration. Comfortable and attractive homes at minimum cost. Overflowing with wise suggestions and concrete illustrations. By the author of "Furnishing the little House." Illus. $2.50

THE CENTURY CO.
Publishers of Enduring Books

When writing to advertisers, please mention The Nation.

and by the abandonment of those regions where such extinction may prove impossible. No native should be allowed to go to work in regions other from that where he lives, unless there first be provided adequate housing arrangements, and unless he be furnished with appropriate clothing. Finally, we should look after him not only as representing one of the resources of the Colony but, first and foremost, because it is a humanitarian duty which civilization puts upon us.

The same issue of the Jornal states that:

The active Commercial Association of Bihé (Associação Comercial), which is headed by our dear friend, Senhor António da Fonseca Santos, who is an able and earnest defender of the interests of the Plateau, sent to Loanda the following opinion on native labor which we reproduce with pleasure, and with which we fully agree:

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of Your Excellency's circular concerning the agreement which is being sought with São Tomé for the supply of native labor.

This association cannot fail to support Your Excellency's attitude, since it has been declaring for years that the population has decreased in this and in other neighboring districts to such a point that the planters of Bihé have found themselves forced to reduce their areas under cultivation, while some have had to abandon agriculture completely.

In the year which just closed this district had already ceased to produce sufficient wheat for its own consumption; and in the year now beginning, for the same reason, the sowings have been so reduced that the harvest will not yield half the required amount. And thus we shall turn to Australia in search of our bread, paying in gold which costs us such great sacrifices. And thus for want of workers!

Of [illegible] São Tomé which took the best of the population by the hundreds and thousands per year—never to return. After [illegible] of the railways of Benguela of Lourenço and of Mossamedes which took from us in the last years more than 20,000 blacks—who also stayed away, some of them were victims of sleeping sickness. Later there were the mines of Katanga and the diamond mines which provoked a formidable exodus with the glitter of their gold and the illusion of fantastic promises. There are also the methods by which in the past years the authorities made up the tax-rolls and secured the payment of the native tax, and the way in which they have recruited labor for road work. These factors also augmented the exodus. Thus, sir, is the district of Bihé reduced almost entirely to women, children, and unfit. . . .

No Money for Peking!

MR. EUGENE CHEN, Acting Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Canton (South China) Government, on July 14 handed to the American Consul for transmission to the Minister at Peking a note concluding as follows:

None is so blind as to fail to see that the present phantom government in Peking is a creation of a brace of medieval militarists and a bunch of Mandarin statesboys and states-coolies whose obvious purpose is to grab the proceeds of whatever tariff doles and loans America and the other Powers may be willing to grant in order to maintain a status quo that conflicts with every vital interest of Nationalist China.

Any payment of tariff moneys to Wu Pei-fu and Chang Tso-lin must necessarily mean that America and the other interested Powers—through the machinery of the unified, British-controlled Chinese Maritime Customs—will be (a) paying national revenues collected throughout the whole of China to two transient usurpers of detached pieces of Chinese territory, and (b) subsidizing these two militarists to continue the prosecution of civil war against the Kuominchun and Canton, who are the two modern arms of Nationalist China, and thus assist militarism to dominate and flourish in China. And specifically it will mean that America and the other Powers will be collecting the increased customs revenues of Canton and handing the same to the medieval Wu and the ex-bandit Chang in order to enable them the better to fight and attempt to destroy the greatest center of Chinese Nationalist thought and activity, which is Canton.

I have to add that any loan or loans to be contracted by the agents of Wu and Chang on the security of the promised surtaxes shall not be recognized by the Nationalist Government. And I have the honor deliberately to warn America and the other interested governments that Chinese repudiation of any such loan or loans may conceivably create a situation rendering it imperative for the principle of repudiation to be extended to other loans contracted in the interests of reaction and militarists and mandarin exploitation and plunder.

Canton, July 14 CHEN YU-JEN

Contributors to This Issue

HENDRIK W. VAN LOON is the author of "The Story of Mankind" and "Tolerance."

HARBOR ALLEN is publicity director of the Civil Liberties Union.

CARLETON BEALS is in Mexico, where he has been for several years studying political and social institutions.

ARTHUR GLEASON, one of the most courageous liberals of his day, was known both here and in England for his articles on labor.

LOUIS FISCHER, who has been The Nation's correspondent in Moscow, is now in Berlin.

RAYMOND A. PRESTON has taught courses in the literature of Godwin's period at Brown University and Washington and Jefferson College.

MARY ROSS is associate editor of the Survey.

JAMES FUCHS is known as a writer for the liberal and radical press.

KEITH HUTCHISON is a young Englishman connected with the London office of the New York Herald Tribune.

JANE PERRY CLARK is secretary of the International Migration Service.

ERNESTINE EVANS spent the greater part of last year in Russia.

STUDENT WORKER CONTEST
First prize $100 Second prize $50 Third prize $25
For particulars address
The Nation 20 Vesey Street New York, N. Y.

NOW IS THE MOST BEAUTIFUL TIME OF THE YEAR FOR A VACATION IN THE BERKSHIRE HILLS.
COME for a weekend, a week, or a month to Western View Farm. [illegible] time of the year is this spot so gloriously beautiful or so [illegible] as in September and October.
Splendid heating equipment in the house augmented by roaring log fires.
Booklet and illustrated literature on request
Edward G. Ohmer, Western View Farm
Telephone—New Milford 430 New Milford, Conn.

AURORA HEALTH FARM Mendham Road MORRISTOWN NEW JERSEY
(Not a sanitarium; not a boarding-house
Beautiful country; elevation 700 ft.; only one hour from New York. Open all year. Suitable for those requiring diet, electro- and hydro-therapy [illegible] for rest and convalescence. Personal medical supervision. Homelike atmosphere. No bed-ridden, contagious or mental cases.
ROBERT SCHULMAN, M. D., Medical Director.
ARTHUR HERSHFIELD, M. D., Associate Physician.
Telephone—MORRISTOWN 1 8 2 0.

A MOSCOW DIARY A graphic human-interest story of the life of the people in Soviet Russia today, by Anna [illegible] Cloth, $1.00 postpaid. Ask for book catalog.
CHARLES H. KERR & CO. 341 East Ohio Street, Chicago

REAL HARRIS HOMESPUNS Direct from the Makers at Manufacturer's Price
Suit Lengths Cut to Order. Price $2.00 per Yard. Postage Paid
NEWALL, 150 Stornoway, Scotland. Write for patterns stating shades desired

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXIII NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 1926 No. 3194

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS

EDITORIALS:

The Political Year

The Golden Egg

Was Jesus a Myth?

THE LATEST AMENDMENT TO THE DECALOGUE. By H. van Loon

SACCO-VANZETTI—A FEDERAL LYNCHING.

New Light on an Old Story. By Thomas O'Connor

Paving the Way. By Arthur Warner

The Red Raids. By Robert W. Dunn

THE EMOTIONAL NATURE OF THE CHINESE. By Pearl S. Buck

THE LOST ART OF PROFANITY. By John Nicholas Beffel

IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Dean

CORRESPONDENCE

BOOKS, ART, PLAYS:

Poems. By Louise Dauner

First Glance. By Mark Van Doren

The United States of Europe. By William MacDonald

Add Americana. By B. H. Haggin

History by Eyewitness. By Drew Pearson

Books in Brief

Art. By Van Wyck Brooks

Drama. Square of the Hypotenuse. By Joseph Wood Krutch

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:

Abyssinia Appeals to the League. By J. M. Kenworthy

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MANAGING EDITOR LITERARY EDITOR

FREDA KIRCHWEY MARK VAN DOREN

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

JOHN A. HOPSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, ADVERTISING MANAGER

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; in Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: No. 30 South Dearborn Street. European Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Victoria Street, London W. C. 1, England.

SACCO AND VANZETTI have been in prison for more than six years; for more than five years they have stood convicted of an unusually brutal and commercial-minded murder. Yet there is a wide belief, amounting almost to certainty among impartial persons who have studied the case, that these two idealistic—even if mistaken—Italian radicals could not have committed the crime and that their trial and conviction was a monstrous perversion of justice possible only because of the wild hysteria against aliens and Reds with which the American atmosphere was surcharged in 1920 and 1921. The five years that have intervened since the conviction of these men have been filled with a continuous attempt to obtain a new trial—so far fruitless. We hope that will not be the outcome of the latest argument, begun before Judge Webster Thayer on September 13. This application is based upon new evidence, including the confession of Celestino F. Madeiros, and affidavits from Department of Justice agents showing that that branch of the federal government worked to "railroad" two innocent men to the electric chair. If, in the cooler atmosphere of 1926 Sacco and Vanzetti are unable to obtain a new trial, belief in their innocence will not be lessened, but the judicial machinery of Massachusetts will stand convicted of unwillingness to right a mistake even though it cost two human lives.

TWO MONTHS AFTER the conviction of these hitherto obscure Italian radicals The Nation presented their story (September 28, 1921) in an article entitled Sacco-Vanzetti—A Reasonable Doubt. It has since commented many times upon the case and rejoices that the New York World, with its fine flair for exposing injustice, has lately been giving splendid publicity to the effort to obtain a new trial. In the present issue we set forth the story of Sacco and Vanzetti in the light of recent disclosures and with a perspective of half a dozen years. All this, as our articles show, tends to fix responsibility more and more upon the Department of Justice under A. Mitchell Palmer not only for creating the hysterical state of mind that convicted Sacco and Vanzetti but also for having actually instigated the prosecution in order to cover up the scandal of the hounding to his death of Andrea Salsedo. With this in mind William G. Thompson, counsel for the condemned men, several months ago asked the Department of Justice to give him access to its files on the case. The request would seem more than reasonable, but so far it has gone unanswered. Why? What is the Department of Justice trying to cover up?

HARRY DAUGHERTY, the first American cabinet officer to be on trial, with his co-defendant, Thomas W. Miller, once Alien Property Custodian, has heard Emory R. Buckner outline the Government's case against them. The indictment alleges that the defendants defrauded the Government of their "honest, unbiased, and unprejudiced services" while in office; the charge in plain English is that Mr. Daugherty and Colonel Miller accepted in September, 1921, at least part of a bribe of $391,000 to effect quickly and painlessly the transfer of seven million dollars' worth of war-impounded securities of the German-owned American Metal Company to the Société Suisse pour Valeurs de Métaux. The transaction was put through and the money paid by Richard Merton, German financier, actively interested in both companies, who was Mr. Buckner's first witness for the prosecution. Mr. Merton was in a great hurry to have his claim settled; he feared that to engage a lawyer would be a lengthy process and would in addition be too costly; he was glad, therefore, to discover certain obliging persons representing the Alien Property Custodian's office, who could put through his claim in seventy-two hours after he presented the proper papers, and he was only too happy to pay to the late John T. King, acting presumably for Colonel Miller, a retainer of $50,000 in addition to the 5 per cent "bonus" of $391,000 when the transfer was made.

MR. MERTON, OF COURSE, did not concern himself with what became of the "bonus," but Mr. Buckner did. To his own satisfaction he has traced part of it to Mr. Daugherty and Colonel Miller; an item of some $22,000 cannot be finally located, but was deposited in the account of Mr. Daugherty, of his brother, or of his intimate friend, Jess Smith, now dead. Mr. Buckner says that he cannot trace the deposit with more accuracy than this because Harry Daugherty destroyed the ledger sheets of the bank for that particular day. This, of course, is unfortunate for Mr. Daugherty. If the Government should prove that he received a mere twenty-odd thousand dollars on the deal it would be more unfortunate still, for who got the rest? And if $50,000 of the sum paid by Mr. Merton to Colonel Miller should be traced to the latter's personal account by means of the numbers of the bonds, as Mr. Buckner promises it will be, how very cruel that will be! An ordinary hold-up man who accumulates fifty thousand dollars sometimes finds himself spending twenty or thirty years in jail as a result. The maximum punishment for Mr. Daugherty's and Colonel Miller's offense is two years in jail or $10,000 fine; and if they had had the foresight to demand $100,000 in nice, anonymous cash, delivered, say, in a black bag, they might today be pursuing their ordinary occupations, untroubled by annoying lawsuits and expensive criminal lawyers. What a majestic thing is the law!

ENGLAND IS WAGING two private wars in China—one in South China, at Canton, the other in the heart of China, on the Yangtze River. Canton has been boycotting British goods because British troops killed Chinese in Canton in June, 1925, and the boycott has well nigh ruined the great commercial fortress which the British have built at Hongkong. (They stole that rocky island from China in the First Opium War, eighty years ago.) Now the British have announced that the pickets who enforced the boycott will be treated as pirates, and have landed troops to protect the docks and force the Chinese to accept British manufactures. The Chinese troops are watching from the buildings on the other side of the Bund—and no man can tell if or when their patience will end. But when it does end, the cables will report British heroism, as they did from the Upper Yangtze, and the Chinese will complain of British bullying. British gunboats have also got into trouble on the Yangtze at Wanhsien, twelve hundred miles from the sea. No treaty gives them any right in those waters—only force and the tradition that the Yangtze is a British "sphere of influence." A British steamer nosed its way into the midst of a local war, capsizing a sampan loaded with Chinese troops. A dozen Chinese, apparently, were killed, and the Chinese held the British responsible. They seized two British merchant ships and took six British officers prisoner. Thereupon three British warships went into action, rescuing five of the six officers but leaving the ships in Chinese hands. Seven men wearing His Majesty's uniform lost their lives in the process. They were brave; perhaps they were heroic.

THIS HEROISM LOSES its glamor when seen through Chinese eyes. What business had British warships a thousand miles in the interior of China? The British gunboats concluded the "heroic" episode by bombarding the defenseless city of Wanhsien—"effectively," the cables say, estimating that as a result there are five thousand fewer men and women and children to munch rice in that miserable city. And now the cables burn with stories of protest meetings called by the foreigners in Shanghai and Hankow, demanding "strong" action! The British Government has ordered the flagship of its Asiatic squadron, with a prince of the royal blood aboard, to Hankow, 600 miles from the sea; and the United States has concentrated five warships at that same far-off city, with a dangerous if traditional sense of the necessity for solidarity among the foreigners. Fortunately, the British cannot quite decide against whom to vent their wrath. Yang Sen, whose men dared match bullets with the British, is a sort of bandit-subordinate of Wu Pei-fu, hitherto dear to British hearts, and Wu has just been chased out of Hankow and away from the Yangtze River by the Cantonese. The Cantonese can hardly be held responsible for the acts of their enemies; Wu is far in the interior; and the Peking "Government" has no power over anyone. So British wrath is at a loss for a victim. There is just one way to keep the foreign Powers from inextricably involving themselves in China's civil wars; and that is for their intrusive sloops and gunboats and auxiliary merchantmen to head full-steam for the open sea. They cannot help; they have already done colossal harm. Is there no decency left in our vaunted white civilization?

THE FIFTH ATTEMPT at the assassination of Premier Mussolini brings even more magnificent results than the other four. An unknown young man hurls a bomb; bomb breaks glass in the duce's car; chauffeur steps on gas; bomb falls to ground; eight bystanders receive slight wounds from explosion; duce commands car to be stopped, sticks head out of broken window, demands all details of what has happened, inquires after victims in hospital, sends condolences to relatives, appears in person before shouting thousands, and makes a fiery speech, punctuated by yells of Viva! Viva il Duce! "As I have abolished strikes, I intend absolutely to stop periodical attempts against my life. . . . I am firmly determined, if necessary, to reestablish capital punishment. . . . Excessive and culpable tolerance of plotters beyond our frontiers cannot any longer be tolerated. . . ." This is admirable strategy; by it Mussolini utters a not too veiled threat to France, changes criminal procedure, and proceeds "with characteristic Fascist determination and method," and not a soul in Italy dares say him nay—out loud. A dramatic scene like this is vastly superior to the tactics of the Spanish Primo de Rivera, who can think of nothing better than to conduct a plebiscite in which persons in favor of the present government may vote yes and those opposed may stay at home and vote nothing. It is reported that Spanish women, "apparently above 18 years of age," who are permitted to vote for the first time, are having a lot of fun exercising the franchise, and that disaffected persons who do not care for de Rivera are voting anyway because that seems safer. This is a handsome method of establishing popular government, but it pales beside the melodrama carried through so well in Italy.

PUBLICITY PAYS; exposure pays; and the greatest governments in the world feel it worth while to heed the imponderables. The curiously phrased notes recently composed by the British and Italians in explanation of their course in Abyssinia give new faith to the disillusioned. Abyssinia, it will be recalled, is the only remaining truly independent country in Africa; Liberia is really an American ward, and the limited "independence" granted Egypt will hardly be counted real by anyone recalling British action in the Stack incident. As the memory of the resounding Italian defeat at Adowa in 1896 grows dimmer, Italian eagerness to end Abyssinian independence waxes keener. Italy, however, needs foreign support. Now, England and Italy have had their little difficulties in Asia Minor and on the borders of Italy's other African colonies, and, as Commander Kenworthy points out elsewhere in this issue, "independent" Abyssinia seemed a good place to make mutual concessions. Since neither Power had any rights there whatever, concessions would cost nothing. But the deal was too bare-faced; it stank. France objected; British Liberals protested; Abyssinia complained to the League of Nations, and the League forwarded the complaint to the guilty parties. They have replied with touching innocence. They were, it seems, "misunderstood"; they intended merely to "coordinate" their economic interests without in any way prejudicing the freedom of action of Abyssinia, and their agreements were subject to Abyssinian approval. In other words, they were not merely misunderstood; they did not mean anything at all in the first place. As the Manchester Guardian says:

> A secret agreement is meaningless unless it is intended to have results. Not only has this one failed to produce results, but its secrecy has been broken, and two Great Powers have been forced to declare publicly that so far from expecting results to follow none were ever contemplated.

MAJOR GENERAL CLARENCE R. EDWARDS, retired, commander of the Twenty-sixth Division in the World War, has faith in the youth of America. He has just said as much, and more, to an American Legion Convention in Niagara Falls:

> I believe our youth is the most idealistic of any youth in the world, and when a crisis approaches has a greater and more accurate vision than their elders. . . . Having much faith in the idealism of our youth I am not scared to the point of surrender at this insidious poison that is being injected into the minds of the youth of this country . . . this internationalism, this brotherly love, this "no more war," "outlaw war," "peace and freedom," and "industrial democracy."

In addition to this touching faith in the young men and women of America, the general thinks it would be nice if before the next war sets in a law were passed drafting every citizen and every branch of industry into war service. "Pass this law," he says optimistically, "and no nation or combination of nations will dare to challenge us if we learn to appreciate and develop the idealism of our youth." Thus the professional soldier speaks. The general, however, added a note of sober truth to his remarks: "I don't know," he told the Legionnaires, "of any lot of men better acquainted with hot air and gas than you. . . ." The general ought to know.

WHAT IS A FLAG? What is this fetish-worship that brings millions of children to attention every morning, mumbling a form of words before an idol made of cloth? A day may come when these symbols of nationalism will seem as much child's play to us as they would to a visitor from Mars. Meanwhile South Africa is seething with a sort of religious war of flags. The Nationalists want a flag of their own, recognizing their independent status; the old Britons roar that never, never, never will they desert the Union Jack. Already King George's whiskers have vanished from the stamps, replaced by springboks and old Dutch sailing-ships and orange trees; and the Dutch language has appeared beside English even upon the sacred silver coins. The British colonials—always more British than the British of England—foam with rage, and break up the Nationalist meetings. "I'll tell you what it is to be patriotic in Durban," a labor leader shouted at a Natal audience that was interrupting speakers with boos and "Rule, Britannia" and shouts of "God bless the Prince of Wales." "It's to buy an American motor car and put in front of it a Union Jack made in Germany."

FOR THE FIRST TIME since the war an international congress of philosophers is being held. It is a sad comment upon modern scholarship that the war mobilized even that elite which is supposed to devote itself in academic quiet to the serene processes of thought. The historians and scientists, with a few honorable exceptions, revised their texts, threw mud at the enemy, and descended into the streets to make four-minute speeches full of dishonest piffle. Even the philosophers proved human. Eucken and Wundt and Alois Riehl were among the famous ninety-three Germans who signed a manifesto about things of which they could not possibly know anything; in America even Royce and Dewey and Santayana got out war philosophies. And even after the war was over the scientists felt that patriotism forbade them to meet with their German colleagues. Today Hindus, Frenchmen, Germans, Japanese, English, and Americans meet as equals in the old Harvard Yard. Are they really less provincial than when they met amicably in those far-off days before the war?

HARDER THAN SWIMMING THE CHANNEL these days it is to keep up with the record for Channel swimming. As we go to press Georges Michel, the intrepid French baker, holds the championship with a time of eleven hours, five minutes, but there is no telling how soon this will be reduced to ten hours or less. M. Michel is reported a strong but not a swift swimmer; if a really fast performer should appear he might breakfast comfortably in Gris Nez and arrive in Dover not more than a few minutes late for lunch, thus avoiding the tiresome business of snatching, on the fin, so to speak, a bite held out by a friend in a rowboat. Speaking of nourishment, there is M. Michel's recipe for Channel-crossing: he not only sustained himself solely on sugar soaked in cognac but his first act on landing was to run for a double whiskey and soda. Is it not whiskey that shortens life, weakens man's physique, makes his organs ineffective and his muscles flabby? How much nicer if M. Michel had performed his feat on a glass of milk and a bottle of sarsaparilla! But of course the Channel is wet, so that the Frenchman was breaking no laws, and anyway, didn't our Trudy swim across on a perfectly constitutional beef steak?

THE FIRST THREE NUMBERS of the New Criterion, a British quarterly edited by T. S. Eliot, seem to establish this journal as the most interesting clearing-house of literary ideas that we now have. It represents an attitude without precedent in England and almost incomprehensible in America; it is at once revolutionary and traditional. It is revolutionary with respect to the current romantic decadence, being without the messianic special plea so familiar and disastrous to intellectual order in America; yet it attempts the definition of a continuous Greco-Roman culture as a principle of unity in Western civilization, of which, some of us notwithstanding, we are an extension. Its critical method is rationalism and it demurs from sentimentally absolute values; it has the perspicacity to see that diverse expressions of a living order, such as those of Gertrude Stein and the late T. E. Hulme, may participate in the same discipline. Americans will observe with interest this effort toward an ordering of the modern spirit.

The Political Zoo

ANOTHER batch of primaries has rushed across the headlines like a comet, and now the political analysts are filling the inside pages with their sage interpretations. Fortunately for the analysts, some of whom are hired by Republicans and some by Democrats, some of whom write for Dry papers and some for Wet, there were enough primaries and enough varying results to satisfy everybody. The net result is a jumble of cross-currents, and an honest forecast can hardly predict more than "Cloudy, with uncertain breezes and varying temperatures."

In Wisconsin Senator Lenroot, with all the Administration support behind him, could not stand against the La Follette influence, and lost the Senatorial nomination to Governor John J. Blaine. But Fred R. Zimmermann, a handshaking politician who had grown up as a disciple of La Follette and loudly advertised his long friendship with the old chief, was able to defeat Herman Ekern, the State Attorney General, who was the real La Follette choice, for the nomination for Governor. The Coolidge Republicans deserted their own candidate and flocked to help Zimmermann in his attack upon the "Madison ring"—meaning the stalwarts who stood by La Follette principles. The result gives little substantial comfort to anyone. Blaine's certain election will add one to the insurgent list in the Senate, but he is not a disciple of the old crusading type; and the staunch Progressives have lost something of their grip on the party machinery in Wisconsin.

In New Hampshire Senator Moses, independent conservative, who fought the Administration on the World Court issue, defeated Robert P. Bass, Dry, pro-World Court, and Roosevelt Progressive. In Massachusetts and Arizona Senators Butler and Cameron won the Republican renominations without opposition. and Senator Oddie had small difficulty in Nevada; but in all three States the Republican stalwarts face real fights against the Democrats in November. In Georgia Representative Upshaw, prize orator of the Anti-Saloon League, was defeated—by a man who insists that he is as Dry as Upshaw.

There is no tidal wave discernible in these results, although they confirm the result long predicted—that the Coolidge Republicans will lose control of the next Senate and perhaps of the House. There were fifty-five nominal Republicans in the last Senate, but four of these—La Follette, Norris, Frazier, and Nye—formed a Progressive Republican Opposition of their own; and Borah, Howell, Norbeck, Couzens, and Hiram Johnson were certainly not to be counted upon. In the next Senate Brookhart and Blaine will be added to this powerful little insurgent group; and half a dozen Democrats threaten to defeat sitting Republicans. Ex-Senator David Walsh in Massachusetts is waging effective war against the President's crony, Mr. Butler, who singularly lacks capacity for making other friends; the Dry revolt against Senator Wadsworth in New York State threatens his career; Arizona, Oklahoma, Maryland, Nevada, and even Oregon are today in the doubtful column. Even if Pennsylvania and Illinois soddenly elect the Republicans in whose behalf so many millions were misspent, it is unlikely that the Senate which sniffed so long at Newberry will seat these men whose expenses so overshadow his.

But what if the Senate does turn against the President? What will it stand for? There is plenty of latent discontent in the country, but it is not focussed. Outside of the great cities the wet-and-dry issue does not excite the masses of the voters. The good old tariff leaves the 1926 citizen unexcited. The World Court, hard as it has been ridden by the professional interpreters, is scarcely a vivid national issue. A generation that has seen the corporations withstand a score of deadly thrusts no longer answers to the old battle-cries, and the exposures of vast corruption have been so widespread that they have left the country numb rather than indignant, and uncertain where to look for a remedy.

The Democrats appear to the ordinary voter simply as the Outs who want to get in. They have dickered and dealed on petty sectional lines, stultifying themselves by bargaining with Mr. Mellon to support his millionaire income-tax theories, and failing to convince the country of the sincerity of their interest in the people's cause. The party did not give Senator Walsh effective support in his attack on the oil leases, or follow up Senator Wheeler's exposure of the Ohio gang in Washington. In every real economic battle —Muscle Shoals, farm relief, the sugar tariff, railroad regulation, and all the rest—they have left leadership to the overworked Republican insurgents.

Why, in these circumstances, should any reasonably disillusioned citizen be excited by the prevailing winds of national politics? What if politicians themselves have tired of the canny little Yankee who gives out such diverse statements through his Official Spokesman at Paul Smith's; they offer the voter in exchange only a Lowden or a Longworth, men who may be able to round up the delegates at a convention but are as impotent to stir voters as a James N. Cox or a John W. Davis. On the Democratic side there is always "Al" Smith. But what does "Al" Smith stand for? It would be a healthy thing if this country could squelch the Klan spirit by electing a Catholic to the Presidency, but membership in a religious minority which has suffered persecution is hardly sufficient credentials for the Presidency. Governor Smith has the indispensable quality of personality; he has proved executive ability; but where does he stand on any national issue of importance? No one knows. The campaign for his nomination is being waged on personality, and on personality and religion alone. They are not enough.

The country is politically apathetic. Both Republican and Democratic parties shelter whole zoos of political specimens, but not within or without either of them is there a clear-cut issue to fire the country. Labor, too easily depressed by the results of 1924, has abdicated its task of political leadership. The farmers have not yet learned the lesson of organization. Individuals stand aghast and perplexed as they watch the growing control of the country's life by the vast corporations centering in Wall Street. But so long as corporation control provides the relatively comfortable material basis of existence which still exists in America, effective political revolt seems unlikely. And we should like to feel surer than we do that the necessary study was being carried on to make eventual revolt intelligent and effective.

Was Jesus a Myth?

THE publication in America of Georg Brandes's "Jesus: A Myth," contending that no such person as Jesus ever lived and that He is as completely a myth as Hercules or Prometheus, has already produced newspaper headlines. Yet this theory, far from being new, belongs to the childhood of biblical criticism. The roots from which it developed go back at least a century and a half; its fully developed form is some fifty years old; and it is, indeed, one of the most immediately obvious solutions of the difficulties which the study of the growth of Christianity involves.

As everybody knows, the New Testament is extremely unsatisfactory as a series of historical documents. That it remained for so many centuries unquestioned is due chiefly to the fact that the great age of the Church occupied a period before the development of the most elementary principles of historical criticism. Centuries which were accustomed to believe that a certain barbarous summary of the Iliad was written by an eye-witness of the Trojan war and accepted in all good faith the forged Donation of Constantine were not likely to criticize the fundamental documents supporting their faith. Even Luther definitely declared his lack of interest in the harmonizing of the four Gospels.

As far back as 1782 the German scholar Karl Friedrich Bahrdt developed the theory that Jesus was a more or less passive tool in the hands of a secret order among the Essenes who used Him as the means whereby they might detach the Jewish people from their somewhat materialistic conception of the function of the Messiah, and when, some three-quarters of a century later, Bruno Bauer was seeking for some explanation of the absence of any strictly contemporary evidence of the existence of Jesus he gave this theory of the secret society a new development. Boldly moving the date of the Gospels forward to the second century, he declared that the myth of Jesus was invented out of whole cloth about the time of Nero. Various heathen philosophers, notably Seneca, had, so he argued, developed the ethics of Christianity but had failed to popularize their ideas, so they deliberately invented the figure of Jesus in order to add the charm of an heroic personage and the sanction of the supernatural.

Such theories solve certain historic difficulties but they are a little less credible than the most naive supernaturalism. Like those rationalistic explanations of the miracles which make Jesus a sort of Houdini who was, besides, remarkably favored by chance in the perpetration of deceptions, they demand more credulity than the miracles themselves and remind one of the taunt hurled at a famous rationalist by one of the faithful who said "He will believe anything, provided only it is not in the Bible." Myths are not so much the result of deliberate fabrication as of a process by which tales are gradually adorned as they pass from mouth to mouth. If Jesus is a myth He was not deliberately invented by any benevolent secret society but grew, instead, by slow stages out of the needs of men.

Doubtless the majority of competent scholars, Christian or skeptic, would agree that the Jesus of tradition is not identical with the Jesus of history. To most, however, it will seem probable that however great the proportion of myth there was, nevertheless, some historic figure about whom myths could crystallize. There is not, at present, any convincing contemporary evidence of His existence. Should the recently discovered translation of Josephus, containing the reference to Jesus which has generally been supposed to be a late interpolation, really be as old as it is said to be, we should at last have an almost conclusive proof of the historicity of Jesus.

The Golden Egg

THANKS to the recent reappointment of Henry H. Glassie to the United States Tariff Commission, that body can continue unhampered its investigation of the relative costs of producing eggs in this country and China. The President has announced the reappointment "temporarily," although he is aware of the widespread opposition to it in Congress. Senator Weller, Republican, as well as Senator Bruce, Democrat, representing Maryland, Mr. Glassie's State, are openly opposed to him. There can be no hope of a confirmation.

It may seem strange that Mr. Coolidge has flown thus in the face of a Senatorial rejection; but two other of his appointees now cling to their jobs by a toehold so precarious that there is grave doubt as to the legality of their votes. These are Commissioners Edward B. Brossard and Sherman J. Lowell. Comptroller General McCarl has ruled that they can draw no salaries for their present labors unless they are confirmed by the Senate, which refused at its last session to confirm them. Unless it does act favorably, there will be a legal question as to the validity of their official acts; and with Commissioner Glassie's place unfilled there would be only three sound and unclouded votes—which is not a majority of the commission—on eggs.

Mr. Glassie's vote is valid, although Congress passed a special act to disqualify him from voting in the sugar case because Mrs. Glassie's family owned a sugar plantation and mill. Mr. Glassie is a Democrat by official label, but not by tariff affiliations. He may be counted upon to assist in acting on President Coolidge's statement that "the American farmer must not be undersold at home by . . . Chinese eggs"; and this is important at a time when the farmer vote must be conciliated. Under the so-called flexible provision of the tariff law, the President is empowered to increase the rate on eggs by 50 per cent if he sees fit.

An egg fit for the breakfast table now retails at five cents or more, and consumers may question whether this is too little to pay, but then, the consumer does not see, as does the poultryman, the Yellow Peril of the egg question. During the last fiscal year we imported, almost wholly from China, nearly one one-hundredth as many eggs in the shell as we exported: 275,892 dozen, to be exact, as against 27,930,637 dozen exported. Our imports, however, are chiefly of eggs dried or frozen, and are figured by the pound. Even so, taken all together, the imports do not equal the exports, and they are an insignificant part of the total home production, which runs toward two billion dozen a year.

One does not get a picture, from these figures, of an industry throttled by competition and waddling toward its grave. But the Tariff Commission, as soon as it has determined the average cost of production of an egg in this country, is going to investigate average costs over the vast area of China. Most men would say it could not be done, but we may depend upon the Commissioners, picked by Calvin Coolidge, to accomplish the impossible. They are there to tend the goose which lays the golden egg.

The Latest Amendment to the Decalogue

Drawn by Hendrik van Loon

Sacco-Vanzetti—A Federal Lynching

New Light on an Old Story

By THOMAS O'CONNOR

ON December 24, 1919, at about 7:30 a. m. three employees of the L. Q. White Shoe Company of Bridgewater, Massachusetts, were riding on a motor truck carrying a strong box containing a $30,000 payroll. They were met by an armed man standing in the street close to an automobile which contained three other men. The bandit fired and the fire was returned. The bandit jumped into the car, which sped down a side street. The truck went on, its driver in a state of collapse but the payroll intact.

On April 15, 1920, at about 3 p. m. the paymaster and guard of the Slater and Morrill Company, shoe manufacturers, in South Braintree, Massachusetts, were carrying a payroll of about $16,000 from the company's office to its lower factory through the main street. They were met by two men armed with revolvers. The two shoe-company employees were shot and killed. As the murder was committed a touring car drew up, the murderers threw the money boxes into it, jumped in, and the automobile was driven away.

These two crimes were among a series of daring payroll robberies, store holdups, and bank robberies which terrorized the inhabitants of industrial towns in eastern Massachusetts in the fall of 1919 and the winter of 1920.

Captain William H. Proctor, head of the State police, took charge of the investigation of the South Braintree murder. After two or three weeks of sifting of clues the police were still at sea.

In the intervals between their discouraging pursuit of bandits the local police were called upon to assist the Boston office of the Federal Department of Justice in arresting anarchists and other radicals in the game of chasing the Reds, devised by Attorney-General A. Mitchell Palmer to head off a revolution and incidentally to win the Presidency for Mr. Palmer as a reward for saving America from the Bolsheviki. The Red raids began on January 3, 1920.

Spying on Radicals

One of the accommodating local police officers was Chief Michael E. Stewart of Bridgewater. On January 3, 1920, in the early hours of the morning Department of Justice agents from Boston, with the Bridgewater police, descended upon Bridgewater, routed four bewildered Lithuanians out of their beds, and arrested them as Russian Reds. It was this introduction into the work of spying upon, arresting, and catechising radicals which was to lead Stewart, a small-town policeman, into a blunder which resulted in the conspiracy to send Sacco and Vanzetti to the electric chair.

Having enlisted the aid of Chief Stewart, the Boston office of the Department of Justice next called for his assistance in locating one Coacci, a radical, distributor of the radical paper of one Galliani of Lynn, and friend, as it later turned out, of Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti. Coacci lived in the same house in West Bridgewater with Boda and Orciani, also friends of Sacco and Vanzetti. Stewart had been supplied by Boston and West with the catechism for anarchists, and he asked Coacci: "Are you a citizen or an alien? Are you an anarchist? Opposed to any organized government? Believe in force or violence to overthrow this form of government? Have you assassinated any high officials of this country?" To this last Coacci answered: "Not yet."

On April 16 Stewart was asked by the Department of Justice to look up Coacci, who had not appeared for a hearing. His excuse was that his wife was about to have a baby. Stewart, with a Department of Justice agent and Officer Lawton of West Bridgewater, found Coacci in the middle of the room in a little house near the Johnson garage. He had his trunk packed and was about to leave. They suggested that his wife go with him, but she wished to have her baby on shore. Coacci, it appeared, insisted on leaving at once. He was deported from Ellis Island on April 18.

Chief Stewart Pricks Up His Ears

Echoes of the Bridgewater crime in December, which had died down, were reawakened in Chief Stewart's ears when it appeared a day or two after the South Braintree holdup that both crimes were probably the work of the same gang. He began making inquiries in Cochesset, a little section in West Bridgewater, to learn if there was an Italian there who owned a car. He found one. His name was Boda. Boda lived with Coacci. Stewart remembered that he had arrested Coacci as an anarchist. Coacci was a man of mystery—a newcomer, with strange-looking Italian friends. The friends were Sacco, Vanzetti, and Orciani.

Some evil genius gave Chief Stewart an inspiration. He found that Coacci had worked at the L. Q. White Shoe Company in Bridgewater a few days before the attempted holdup of the payroll of that company and later at the Slater and Morrill factory until within a few days of the South Braintree robbery. The plot presented itself: Coacci had "skipped with the swag," under cover of his deportation. Boda, owner of the car, a small Overland, was the leader of the gang, and the unknown Italians coming under cover of night were the confederates.

Stewart found Boda. He asked him about his car. Boda told him the car had been taken to the Johnson garage the day before. Then Stewart got the information from Johnson that Boda had come about having the car fixed on the day before, or the day of, the South Braintree robbery. Stewart warned Johnson not to let Boda have the car; to telephone the police when anybody came for it.

While Stewart waited for the payroll bandits, what were Sacco and Vanzetti doing? Sacco was working in the shop of the Three-K shoe factory at Stoughton. Vanzetti was peddling fish in Plymouth. In their spare time they were circulating among their radical friends, attending meetings, and advising one another of the activities of the Department of Justice agents who were making a reign of terror among the Italian radicals as a part of A. Mitchell Palmer's little party.

Andrea Salsedo and Robert Elia, both Italians, printed an anarchist paper in New York. Vanzetti wrote articles for the paper. Salsedo and Elia were arrested by Department of Justice agents in March and held prisoners in the offices of Chief William J. Flynn, head of the Division of Information, in the Park Row Building. Salsedo smuggled two letters out to Vanzetti. On receipt of the first letter Vanzetti sent money and on receipt of the second got up a meeting of Italian radicals at the Italian Naturalization Club in East Boston, on April 25. He told the story of Salsedo and was selected to go to New York to help him. Vanzetti went and came back about May 1; he reported at a second meeting, on May 2, attended by Boda. He said that Walter Nelles, a lawyer, advised that the Department of Justice agents were to make raids on their homes and arrest them. It was decided at that meeting to get Boda's car, notify the various "friends," and gather and conceal the radical literature. Sacco, Vanzetti, Boda, and Orciani were to meet at Johnson's garage in West Bridgewater the night of May 5.

Salsedo Falls to His Death

Salsedo was released from his strange prison in the Park Row building on May 3; his body came tumbling down fourteen stories to the street. Next day Vanzetti read of what had happened. He and Sacco prepared a poster announcing a meeting to be held in Brockton, a few miles away, on May 9. He finished writing the poster on the street car on the way to Bridgewater to meet Boda and Orciani.

So the four worried Italians appeared in West Bridgewater on the night of May 5, looking for Boda's car "to hide the literature and to notify the friends against the federal police." They presented themselves at the Johnson house—and sprung the trap set by Stewart. Johnson halted Boda with the warning that there was no 1920 number plate on the car. While Johnson kept them there arguing Mrs. Johnson went to a neighbor's house "to get some milk," and telephoned the police. When Mrs. Johnson came out after some ten minutes Sacco and Vanzetti became suspicious. They walked off to take the street car to Brockton. Boda and Orciani went off in Orciani's motorcycle. When the street car reached Brockton a police officer boarded it and arrested Sacco and Vanzetti. Orciani was arrested the next day. Boda was never seen again. He had had enough.

At the police station Sacco and Vanzetti were found to be carrying loaded revolvers and two or three shotgun shells were found on Vanzetti. To the police and to the District Attorney they told lies—where they got their weapons, what they were doing, and what they intended to do on the night of their arrest. In the trial these lies weighed heavily against them. They were the basis of the Commonwealth's assertion that they had exhibited a "consciousness of guilt." Later that night Stewart himself, now become master detective of payroll bandits and local inquisitor for A. Mitchell Palmer, came and questioned them. He found on Vanzetti the notice of the meeting to be held in Brockton on May 9, with Vanzetti set down for a speaker.

Finding his supposed payroll bandit a radical, Stewart got out his anarchist catechism: Are you a citizen? Are you an anarchist? Do you believe in the overthrow of this form of government by force or violence? To the question on anarchism Vanzetti answered mildly, and considering his predicament not unreasonably: "I like things a little different." To the "force or violence" question he answered: "If necessary." Sacco shared the same experience.

When Orciani was arrested the following day he was similarly catechized. He lied to the police also. He told them he did not know Sacco, whereas Sacco had affirmed his affection for his friend Orciani. Yet in the end—and despite the fact that witnesses "identified" him—he was released because it had been found he had been at work both on the day of the Bridgewater crime and on the day of the South Braintree murder.

When the police set about to get Sacco, Vanzetti, and Orciani identified, all usual procedure went by the board. The victims were not lined up to see if the witnesses could pick them out of a crowd. They were placed on exhibition in the station and witnesses came in and looked them over. Sacco's hair was rumpled, he was told to crouch down, to extend his arm as if shooting at somebody, his hat on and off—all to force a likeness to a bandit. Yet even then some of the witnesses did not identify them. The police forgot to take the names of those who declined to identify. As it was, in the murder trial there were more identification witnesses for the defense than for the State, despite the trickery of the prosecution.

The district attorney, having Sacco, Vanzetti, and Orciani on his hands, had to adopt the fantastic theory of Stewart, the Bridgewater policeman—and adopt Stewart with it, for only he could apply it to the realities. Accordingly, Stewart secured a leave of absence from the town of Bridgewater and became the chief investigator for the Commonwealth. Captain Proctor, head of the State Police, a man of thirty years' experience in hundreds of murder and robbery crimes, warned the prosecuting officials that he believed they had the wrong men—and stepped out.

The State's Theory

The State's theory of the crimes, as Frederick G. Katzmann, the prosecuting attorney, finally smoothed out the messages which Stewart had received from the spirit world, was as follows: The little house of Coacci, the radical and friend of Sacco, Vanzetti, and the others, near the Johnson garage, was the bandit headquarters. Boda was the leader of the gang. He was a salesman, knew the roads, and had a car. That at the time of the crime the car could not run mattered little. The four Italians had come back to Bridgewater to make a get-away. Coacci was the fifth man. There had been five bandits in the South Braintree crime. Boda disappeared after he found that Sacco, Vanzetti, and Orciani had been arrested. Coacci had taken the payroll with him to Italy in his trunk when the federal Government deported him from New York City three days after the South Braintree robbery. Coacci had worked for a short time at the White shoe factory in Bridgewater, prior to the attempted holdup of the payroll there, and also had worked at the Slater and Morrill shoe factory in South Braintree up to within a few days of the robbery at that place. Sacco worked in a shoe factory in Stoughton. Boda had been seen riding in a Buick car (the bandit car was a Buick) some weeks earlier and "waved his head" to a neighbor.

It was found that Sacco had been at work on the day of the Bridgewater crime, and the prosecution decided not to charge him with participation in that. Vanzetti stood alone as the defendant in the Bridgewater case, although there were four bandits in the holdup. The government's theory was beginning to leak. Sacco was held for the South Braintree crime because it was found that he was not at work on that day. He said he went to Boston to obtain a passport for Italy—and offered to prove it. He had been at work every other day that winter and spring. Vanzetti was his own employer. He could not give himself a certificate that he had been at work. His word was not taken as to his whereabouts, nor was the word of the greater part of the Italian colony in North Plymouth.

What about Coacci, the man who "skipped with the swag"? Immediately upon the arrest of the three Italians the police, with the help of Department of Justice agents, sought to catch Coacci, as soon as he landed on the Italian shore. They located Coacci, intercepted his trunk, had it taken back to America. The trunk was broken open and found to contain nothing except Coacci's own belongings. Yet in the face of all this the prosecuting attorney told the jury in the murder trial at Dedham a year and a half later that Coacci escaped to Italy with the swag.

Vanzetti's First Trial

After the fishy identifications of Vanzetti in connection with the Bridgewater crime and the rejection of witnesses who would not identify him Vanzetti was placed on trial. The trial was "staged" at Plymouth in June and it "ran" for a week. The outcome was a conviction, followed on August 16, 1920, by a sentence from Judge Webster Thayer of twelve to fifteen years in State prison for assault with intent to rob.

Fred H. Moore, a California lawyer, who became chief counsel after Vanzetti's Plymouth trial, had been one of the defending lawyers for Ettor and Giovannitti, leaders of the Lawrence strike of 1912, when they were tried on a charge of constructive murder. The trial of Sacco and Vanzetti at Dedham for the payroll robbery and murders at South Braintree began on May 31, 1921, and ended on July 14, when the jury, after five hours' absence from the courtroom, brought in a verdict of guilty of murder in the first degree against each defendant.

On the opening day of the trial the front entrance of the county courthouse at Dedham was guarded by an iron gate, behind which stood policemen and deputy sheriffs. They opened the gate, admitting only one man at a time. There was a big crowd around the courthouse, made up almost entirely of the 250 men who had been summoned as prospective jurors. Each of them, as he passed through the gate, was "frisked" for a concealed weapon. Newspaper men were felt over for guns for the first time in their career. Throughout the trial a squad of policemen, with riot guns at the ready, stood on the courthouse steps, guarding the place against "the anarchists." Troops of the State police patrol, on horseback, paraded about the otherwise quiet little town. Arrangements for guarding the courthouse were made by the State police in cooperation with the Department of Justice, the latter under the direction of William J. Burns, whose machinery had been taken over bodily when Harry M. Daugherty came in for his hectic term as Attorney-General.

The Parade of the Police

Sacco and Vanzetti were lodged in the county jail at Dedham, some two blocks from the courthouse. They were taken to the courthouse in the morning in the midst of a crowd of deputy sheriffs; they were taken back at noon the same way. A squad of twenty-eight men brought them back in the afternoon and took them away at night. All through the trial this march was made four times a day, through the public streets. Though the number of police was after a time reduced, there were never fewer than sixteen officers with the two defendants.

The panel of 250 jurors was exhausted without securing the required twelve good men and true, and a second panel of 250 was summoned and questioned without filling the box; a special panel was called and finally the deputies were sent out into the "highways and byways." Protest was vainly made by counsel for the defendants in regard to the manner in which the final lot of jurors was secured.

Before the trial opened every person who could read a newspaper knew that "Vanzetti, convicted holdup man, goes on trial today for murder." The agreement, made in the trial, that if the defense would not introduce character witnesses for Vanzetti the State would not refer to his conviction at Plymouth, was consequently a one-sided deal.

Moore began his task in a friendly atmosphere, but it was not long before Judge Thayer and he were locking horns. Hardly a day went by that Moore and the court did not get into a wrangle in the midst of which the jury would be excused. Moore's unfamiliarity with Massachusetts practice added to his troubles. His aggressiveness, his long black hair, his somewhat dark visage, his dour manner, together with his open espousal of the radicalism of the defendants, did not tend to put him on a good footing in that tight little New England town. At a lunch-table of newspaper men reporting the trial Judge Thayer declared: "I will show them that no damn long-haired anarchist from California can come to Massachusetts and run this court."

The newspaper men reporting the trial were drawn into the battle between Moore and the court. According to Frank Sibley of the Boston Globe, Judge Thayer spoke to a group of reporters during a recess. Sibley reports the conversation as follows: "I think," said the Judge, "that I am entitled to have printed a statement in the Boston papers to the effect that this trial is being fairly and impartially conducted."

"To this nobody replied," according to Sibley, "whereupon Judge Thayer addressed one of the reporters by name. 'What do you say?' he asked. 'Is this trial being fairly and impartially conducted?' The reporter addressed replied emphatically: 'We have never seen anything like it.'"

Sacco Tells All

In planning the defense, Moore decided to face the whole truth, radicalism and all, and trust to the ultimate fairness of the judge and jury. The prosecution seized upon that attitude and capitalized it. The personal records of Sacco and Vanzetti, their participation in strikes and radical meetings, their visit to Mexico to avoid getting into the war, their attachment to supposedly anarchistic groups, the revelations of Chief Stewart and his anarchist catechism, all were constantly kept before the jury—and the public. Sacco took the stand in his own defense. The prosecution asked him little about the murder, but plied him with a maze of questions covering his philosophy of life, why he was against war, his attitude toward America, what he thought of Harvard College. In addition Sacco was egged into making a "soap-box" speech in the course of which he avowed his atheism. Forgotten was the question whether the defendants at the bar, under the evidence strictly related to the case, were of the band of five who killed the two shoe-company employees and ran off with the payroll. In the words of the foreman of the jury, a former chief of police of Quincy: "Damn them, they ought to hang anyway."

The case was no longer the Commonwealth vs. Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti; it became the Commonwealth vs. the Anarchists.

Out of the mass of testimony—there were more than 160 witnesses, the majority of them called by the defense—there emerged for the State five persons who definitely placed Sacco in South Braintree on April 15. They were Mary Splaine, Frances Devlin, Louis Pelser, Carlos E. Goodridge, Lola Andrews. Each was contradicted by other eye-witnesses called by the defense.

Miss Splaine, who had long been an employee of the Slater and Morrill Shoe Company, had begun her active interest in catching the criminals by charging that two employees of the shoe factory plotted the robbery and murder. Before Sacco and Vanzetti had been arrested she identified as one of the bandits the picture of Anthony Palmisano, known as Tony the Wop, who, it turned out, was in jail in Buffalo at the time. At the preliminary hearing in Quincy she refused to identify Sacco positively, but eighteen months later she swore that Sacco was one of the men she saw.

Carlos E. Goodridge, whose real name was Erastus Corning Whitney, had a criminal record in New York and had been in prison. There was a complaint against him in the local court for larceny. This complaint had been placed on file shortly before the Sacco-Vanzetti trial began. In vain the defense counsel sought to be allowed to show that the situation offered a motive which might have induced Goodridge to testify for the State.

Lola Andrews was believed by the defense to be at the mercy of the prosecution. Her testimony was contradicted by the woman who walked with her near the bandit car. Mrs. Andrews later gave the defense an affidavit which Moore used in a motion for a new trial, repudiating her testimony, but the State forced her to recant the recantation.

Captain Proctor's Testimony

After the Dedham trial Captain Proctor of the State Police, a firearms expert, who had at the outset told the State of his doubts as to Sacco and Vanzetti, gave the defense an affidavit in which he explained how he had made an "agreement" with the prosecution that he would testify that it was in his opinion "consistent" that the No. 3 bullet which killed Berardelli could be fired from the gun found on Sacco. Captain Proctor said that he warned the prosecution that he would not testify that the bullet came from Sacco's gun. The arrangement had been made to save the State's face, fool the defense and the jury, and keep Captain Proctor a government witness. To others than the defense counsel Captain Proctor, who has since died, said that the State had the wrong men.

When in 1924 Moore, broken by the case and sick at heart, stepped out, the friends of Sacco and Vanzetti pleaded with William G. Thompson to take up the battle for the two men. Mr. Thompson has been for years an outstanding figure of the bar in Massachusetts. He is chairman of the grievance committee of the Bar Association and takes the responsibilities of the legal profession seriously. Also, he is independent and takes his own stand on any issue. A member of the Union Club, moderately rich, conservative, the interests of large trusts and wealthy clients in his keeping, he is the antithesis of his humble clients in outer respects. But while expressing his emphatic and impatient disagreement with their political and economic views, he has displayed a certain sympathy with the idealism which has been the mainspring of their activities, and the charge of payroll robbery and murder he regards as a question of elementary justice.

The true story behind the Sacco-Vanzetti case may be contained in the files of the Department of Justice and in the knowledge of certain men there at the time of the Palmer Red raids. According to the affidavit of one Weyand, a former Department of Justice agent, at one time the department had ten under-cover men working on the Sacco-Vanzetti case. What were they doing? Were they helping to get them convicted to cover up the Salsedo case; to "get somebody" for the Wall Street bomb explosion of September, 1920; or were they trying to "get" them as anarchists anyway? Some of these under-cover men were on the Sacco-Vanzetti Defense Committee, collecting money, some of which they put in their own pockets.

Some two months ago the Department of Justice was requested to open its record files in the Sacco-Vanzetti case and to direct employees who might have knowledge of it to tell frankly what they knew. Mr. Thompson finally appealed to Senator Butler, who in turn urged Attorney-General Sargent to grant the request. Mr. Sargent was understood to have agreed to do so and to have taken it up with the Boston office, but nothing came of it. Most unfortunately the request, made in writing, is still slumbering in the files of the Department of Justice at Washington. A remnant of Palmer and his gang is still in the department. Who is sitting on the lid?

Paving the Way

By ARTHUR WARNER

IF Sacco and Vanzetti are innocent workingmen, how does it happen that before their conviction for the murer at South Braintree Vanzetti had been found guilty of an attempted robbery at Bridgewater? With any one man there may be a single miscarriage of justice, but there can hardly be two.

This, in substance, is a doubt often voiced among those who have interested themselves in the case of the two Italians, even on the part of those to whom the whole course of the murder trial appears as a farce and a frame-up. It is a natural doubt, growing out of the fact that the first conviction of Vanzetti has received no adequate attention on the part of his friends and defenders, who have been preoccupied with the subsequent trial for murder. Even Fred H. Moore, when he took up the murder case at the instance of a defense committee, failed to move for a new trial for Vanzetti on the Bridgewater charges within the one-year limit prescribed by law, thus making it impossible to reopen the case.

No, a miscarriage of justice is not likely to happen twice to the same man if it be in different parts of the country, on different charges, and at different times. But it is more than likely to happen in any one neighborhood and at a given time, especially when that time is one of hysteria and there is a widespread community desire to get rid of a particular man or group of men. Vanzetti's trial at Plymouth was not, in fact, a separate one from the subsequent proceedings against him and Sacco at Dedham. It was a prelude to it, and it will take much more explaining than has so far been forthcoming from the judicial machinery of the Norfolk-Plymouth district of Massachusetts to clear itself of the definite charge made by Vanzetti and his counsel that his trial at Plymouth was a deliberate attempt to injure him and Sacco in the murder case then pending. Let it be recalled that Sacco and Vanzetti were arrested in May, 1920, for a payroll robbery and murder at South Braintree. Between then and their trial in the summer of 1921 Vanzetti was tried, and convicted of an attempted payroll robbery which had taken place in December, 1919, in Bridgewater. The New York World pointed out in its recent series of articles on the Sacco-Vanzetti case that it is contrary to judicial procedure in Massachusetts and elsewhere to try a man for a lesser offense when capital charges are pending against him. It is also to be recalled that the judge and the prosecuting attorney were the same men who later acted those roles in the murder trial at Dedham. Without question the police would have tried to pin the Bridgewater crime on Sacco also but for the fact that he was able to show that he had been at work at the time.

A few days after the arrest of Sacco and Vanzetti some friends of the latter visited him one night. With them came John H. Vahey, a lawyer. A Brockton attorney had already been retained, but Vanzetti was induced to make a change and was represented by Mr. Vahey and James H. Graham in his trial on charges of having taken part in the attempted holdup in Bridgewater. The latter crime, it should be remembered, took place more than four months previous to the arrest of Sacco and Vanzetti. The police had not been able to bring anybody to trial for it, but the arrest of the two Italians for a similar offense naturally suggested the possibility of making good by fastening the earlier crime upon one or both of them. Vanzetti wanted to take the stand in his own defense, but was not allowed to do so by his counsel. A foreman of the Plymouth Cordage Company was permitted to serve on the jury, although a few years previous Vanzetti had been the leader of a strike against the firm. He was the only striker, he has said, whom the company refused to reinstate.

Vanzetti's defense was an alibi supported by a score of Italian witnesses who said they had bought eels from him on the day of the crime, Christmas eve, 1919. Conviction was based primarily upon the word of four persons who claimed to identify him as taking part in the attempted robbery in Bridgewater. The paymaster involved did not make a positive identification. He left the employ of the company soon after and the opinion has been expressed among his fellows that his going had something to do with his failure to be more certain. Mrs. Georgina F. Brooks, identifying Vanzetti, said that she saw a man at the wheel of an automobile who looked severely at her. A few minutes later she was at the railroad station, some 200 yards away, and she heard shots. She claimed to have seen the firing. She could not have done so. There are houses in the way. But this impossibility was not explained to the jury. The identification of Vanzetti as the man at the wheel of the automobile was further upset by the prosecuting attorney's later admission that the prisoner did not know how to drive a car.

Maynard Freeman Shaw, fourteen years old, said in describing the criminal whom he identified as Vanzetti: "I knew he was a foreigner because he ran like a foreigner." On cross-examination the following colloquy took place between Vanzetti's counsel and young Shaw:

Q. You could tell he was a foreigner by the way he ran? A. Yes.

Q. What sort of a fellow was he? A. Nation?

Q. Yes. A. He was a European.

Q. What? A. Italy or Russia.

Q. Which was it, Italy or Russia? A. There I can't say exactly.

Q. Does an Italian or a Russian run differently from a Swede or a Norwegian? A. Yes.

Q. What is the difference? A. Unsteady.

Q. Both the Italians and Russians run unsteadily? A. As far as that goes, I don't know.

Q. Don't know how a Swede runs, do you? A. No.

Q. Does a Swede run cross-legged? A. No.

Q. You don't want to have this jury think, do you, that you can tell what the nationality of this man was by the way he ran? Do you want them to believe that? A. Yes, I do.

Q. Now, what nationality did he belong to? A. I believe the first thing that came into my mind was that he was an Italian or a Russian. I would not say; he might be a Mexican for what I know. I would not say he was an Alaskan or an African.

Q. You eliminate the African? A. Yes.

Q. He was either a Russian or an Italian or a Greek or a Brazilian or Mexican, either one of these? A. Yes.

Q. Or a Jap? A. Might be.

Q. Would you say that he might be a Jap? A. No.

Q. You would not say that he was a Jap or a Chinaman or an African—these three are eliminated absolutely, are they? A. Yes; nor an American.

Q. I think four now are eliminated. He might be a member of any other nationality on the face of the globe? A. Yes.

Q. You only got a fleeting glance at him? A. Yes.

Q. You were 150 feet from him all the time? A. I came a little nearer to get behind a tree; about five feet nearer.

The Red Raids

By ROBERT W. DUNN

A. MITCHELL PALMER—perhaps you have forgotten the name. This man was Attorney-General of the United States under Woodrow Wilson. He was also aspirant for the Democratic nomination for President in 1920. He was smoother, handsomer, but essentially the same type of man as Harry M. Daugherty. Perhaps you have forgotten what Mr. Palmer did to American constitutional liberties. Then consult the "Report Upon the Illegal Practices of the United States Department of Justice" issued by twelve distinguished lawyers in May, 1920. It says of Mr. Palmer:

> Wholesale arrests both of aliens and citizens have been made without warrant or any [illegible] of law; men and women have been jailed and held incomunicado without access of friends or counsel; homes have been entered without search-warrant and property seized and removed; other property has been wantonly destroyed; workingmen and workingwomen suspected of radical views have been shamefully abused and mistreated.

More than that. The report accuses Mr. Palmer of planting agents provocateur in workingmen's organizations to facilitate his wholesale and merciless raids and arrests. He also flooded the nation with lying propaganda against radicals for the purpose of justifying his illegal acts and inflaming public opinion. He intimidated, terrorized, finger-printed, persecuted. His agents resorted to torture, brutality, and third degree in their campaign of illegal violence. Louis F. Post, Assistant Secretary of Labor from 1913 to 1921, describes all this in his book "The Deportations Delirium of 1920."

It was Mr. Palmer who carried out the illegal raids of 1919 and 1920 described in Mr. Post's book. In the January, 1920, raids Mr. Palmer arrested more than 3,000 citizens and aliens for the purpose of catching a few aliens guilty of membership in working-class organizations holding radical views. And it may be recalled to the reader of short memory that in all these nationwide raids on alleged "dangerous reds" Mr. Palmer's men found a number of stage guns used for amateur theatricals and the famous four iron balls which were placed in a pail of water and were never heard of again after their publicity value as "suspected bombs" had been adequately exploited.

In extenuation of Mr. Palmer, the "fighting Quaker," it is said that he was actually seized with a delirium of Red-baiting. In fact, he was worked into such a frenzy by radical spooks that he rushed to Congress for funds, exclaiming:

> We have received so many notices and gotten so much information that it has almost come to be accepted as a fact that on a certain day in the future, which we have been advised of, there will be a . . . revolution, a proposition to rise up and destroy the Government, at one fell swoop.

The good sentinels of the American Defense Society and the National Security League echoed his shriek of revolution. The money was voted by Congress, nearly $3,000,000 of it in one year. But it was appropriated only for the "detection and prosecution of crimes against the United States." This did not include the terrorization and deportation of aliens, a function reserved to the Department of Labor. Yet it was for this very purpose that Mr. Palmer expended the taxpayers' money.

In cooperation with him and his adjunct William J. Flynn, Chief of the Division of Information of the Department of Justice, worked a number of industrial detective agencies as well as some heads of the employment, "welfare," and secret-service departments of such corporations as the American Woolen Company and the United States Steel Corporation. Palmer's agents assisted these open-shop concerns in arresting coal, steel, and textile strikers in 1919. They in turn placed their own undercover agents at his disposal in his "head-hunting jamboree" of 1919 and 1920.

Many of these private industrial spies were placed on the Palmer payroll as special agents. Some, like the undercover men of the Sherman Service—America's leading labor-spy corporation—had been exempted from the draft during the war and continued to perform favors for the Government thereafter. In fact, Sherman had a working agreement with the Department of Justice in the New England district and boasted in his sales literature of his role in the anti-Red campaign. In several instances "emissaries" of this service staged secret raids on radical headquarters and turned over the documentary booty to the Department of Justice. In the textile and shoe towns of New England, where Palmer conducted some of his illegal raids, these private spies were particularly active. They assisted Mr. Palmer to build up his card catalogue of 200,000 "agitators" and "ultra-radicals." The distinguished Attorney-General referred to them as "moral rats."

This background of unbridled Red hysteria stirred up by the Attorney-General and the labor spy agencies must be fully appreciated by those who would understand the Sacco and Vanzetti case. For what were these two men doing at the time of their arrest? They were, on the advice of counsel, engaged in hiding harmless anarchist tracts which, in the eyes of Mr. Palmer, were seditious. They were also arranging for a protest meeting against the mysterious murder of Andrea Salsedo, a friend and fellow countryman.

Who was Salsedo? One of the aliens picked up unlawfully by Department of Justice agents in New York City. If subject to deportation, he should have been arrested by an immigration official of the Department of Labor. Instead he was taken into custody by the Department of Justice and held without even the knowledge of the Department of Labor. He was given no hearing or examination, such as the law requires, before an immigration official. He was subjected to the third degree by agents then connected with the Department of Justice in New York.

After being held incomunicado for two months—a common procedure in those days—Salsedo's body fell from the fourteenth-story window of the Department of Justice office in Park Row on the morning of May 3, 1920. To this day his friends know nothing of the physical and mental torture which led to this homicide, except what was contained in a deposition by a fellow prisoner, Robert Elia, who asserted that Salsedo had been tortured to the verge of insanity in an effort to extract "confessions."

Immediately after the death of Salsedo Elia was rushed to Ellis Island and placed in the custody of Department of Labor officials, where he and Salsedo should have been lodged upon their arrest. The Department of Justice then demanded his speedy deportation and refused to cooperate with State officials in prosecuting him for the alleged offense for which he had been arrested. Such a trial would have permitted his story of the Salsedo affair to reach the public. He was immediately deported and has since died in Italy.

Vanzetti had been in touch with Salsedo and upon receiving news of his death prepared a handbill for a meeting at which he himself was to speak in Brockton on May 9 to protest against the murder of Salsedo. The copy for this announcement was found on Sacco when he and Vanzetti were arrested. The contents were certainly communicated to the Boston agent of the Department of Justice. Which leads to this question: Were Sacco and Vanzetti held as suspects and charged with the South Braintree payroll murders in order to help cover up the Salsedo affair? It must be remembered that on that date the Department of Justice was already on the defensive in certain quarters and that United States Circuit Judge George W. Anderson had already condemned it unsparingly in the hearing on habeas corpus held for some of the deportees in Boston. He had said: "A mob is a mob whether made up of Government officials acting under instructions from the Department of Justice or of criminals and loafers of the vicious classes."

The Department of Justice obviously wanted to hush up the Salsedo affair. Sacco and Vanzetti, on their way to arrange a public meeting to protest the murder of Salsedo, were certainly not the sort of persons A. Mitchell Palmer desired to see out of prison in May, 1920.

The Emotional Nature of the Chinese

BY PEARL S. BUCK

ONE of the most difficult adjustments the people of the Western nations have ever had to face is the adjustment to the new Chinese. He is freed at last from his inherited inhibitions and is showing himself for the emotional being he is, with, of course, a certain temporary addition of war psychology.

The citizens of the West have for a long time taken the Chinese as a matter of course. To most of them in imagination he is still the impassive, unemotional, yellow Oriental, with a stealthy step, an impenetrable face, and a swinging queue. The queue has long been obsolete. The impassivity is now gone. So is the unemotionalism. We shall have to throw away this old picture; relegate it to the attics of history. Certainly it has no reality in the present.

Of course, to the person really acquainted with the Chinese, old and new, this unemotionalism has always been a myth. They are and have always been one of the most emotional races in the world. That is why now, when the old repressive bonds of their civilization, welded by Confucius thousands of years ago, are breaking apart, we see this natural capacity for emotion exhibiting itself, and it is frightening in its intensity.

The present attitude of the young Chinese toward their country, for instance, is often emotion amounting to frenzy. There is in it the hysteria and religious devotion of a self-martyr. They are capable, many of these young persons, of letting their own blood as a wild sacrifice to the only god they worship—love of country. Patriotism, so-called, has laid hold of the imaginations and emotions of some of the younger students to such an extent that they are wholly unable to use their reasoning powers. What constitutes patriotism, in what way their country can best be served in reality, these things are impossible to dwell upon now in China. Youth demands an instant outlet for its exaltation. Suffering is welcomed, even courted; the weight of emotional energy must be discharged.

I do not intend to discuss the proper and natural reaction of the Chinese to the treatment they have received from the West. Personally, I am wholly on their side. They have the right of it, in the main, beyond discussion. What I am interested in is the emergence of the real Chinese, at last, out of the trappings which their civilization has placed upon them for so long; the real Chinese, whom so few have ever seen. Yet they have been there all these centuries, sensitive, restrained, ardent, and romantic beyond the imagination of the prosaic Westerner.

For the men and women of the West have certainly an exceedingly cold emotional life in comparison to these men and women in China. The Western people are colder by nature, and with the passing of youth the brief bright moment is gone. In the Chinese emotion is potent their whole life long. Moreover, for centuries the Western peoples, and by these I mean primarily those of the white race, have had normal outlets for their emotions; there has been no system of ethics, no book of manners, detailed, rigid, and inflexible, bearing down against the individual, forbidding all original expression. This has tended to allow any surplus of emotionalism to be carried off naturally.

But in the history of China we have had a condition wholly contrary; we have a people far more emotional than the Westerner by nature, a people naturally richer in appreciation of the emotional aspects of life, a people of high intensity to whom all or nearly all possibility of emotional expression has been denied for centuries. They have been dammed up, and now the dam is broken and the flood is alarming. It may take centuries for this to subside to anything like normal.

I am well aware that in maintaining such a thesis as this I am contradicting to their faces many "old Chinese hands," who contemptuously expect to see the present excitement quiet down again and impassivity and apparent apathy return. One may as well expect to see the queues come back. For the barriers, builded by ages as they were, were nevertheless artificial. What the West has to make up its mind to is that this Chinese we have now is the real Chinese, and he is the Chinese the world is going to have in the future.

One might, of course, give any amount of evidence that the Chinese is by nature an emotional person. Take, for instance, the ancient and not infrequent custom of killing oneself after an insult, preferably on the doorstep of the individual by whom one has been insulted. Several explanations of this have been made; among others, the superstition that the ghost would haunt the enemy, that the Chinese do not value human life and die easily, that there is little sense of individualism, and so on. There is, undoubtedly, some truth in all of these. But the essence of the thing is that when one is a Chinese gentleman and has been insulted tradition denies the possibility of revenge by laying hold of the offender, and so, like a child rending its own clothes and biting its own flesh in futile anger, emotion turns upon the man himself.

And anger in the Chinese has a wildness of which the people of the West know little. I have seen an angry American; I have seen him curse and snort and swear. I have never seen him capable of the pitiless, inhuman madness of the Chinese, whose anger seizes him and makes him as helpless as a branch tossed in the wind—unless he is a gentleman, and then you may see it all in his eyes for one terrible moment; then his lids are dropped and his hands shake a little, his voice comes with controlled softness and he bows. He bides his time and he never forgets.

Only, it is becoming the fashion not to drop lids over angry eyes, not to restrain clenched hands, and not to bow where friendship is not meant. All the years of enforced restraint are behind that anger now.

I have heard an angry woman on a Chinese street scream out her fury from dawn till dark, until her face is the face of an insane person and her voice is utterly gone. They have an affection of the throat, a constriction of the muscles, which they call "the anger disease," and it comes from nothing but unbridled rage. True, it is nearly always found in the lower classes. Until now, the upper classes have restrained themselves according to custom.

For many years I have taught young men and women in China. I have seen young people in other countries; I have seen them in love and they have it badly enough, some of them. But I watch my Chinese boys and girls with twice the anxiety. I have seen a boy sicken and die of love for a girl he had seen but once and whose name he never knew; I have known boys and girls to commit suicide because of despair over some matrimonial arrangement. They commit suicide with the most horrifying ease.

One may see this terrifying capacity for feeling in the Chinese love poetry, a feeling which has with it too often an edge of despair. The emphasis is all the more marked in that it is put into delicate, restrained words almost devoid of physical allusions, yet breathing a power as final as death itself.

The Chinese have until now been a people possessed by quietism. An imposed fatalistic turn of mind, inevitable from their religions and philosophy, has rendered them seemingly impassive, and even indifferent. Now, with the breakdown of the old forms of Buddhism and the reassertion of nationalism, always latent, fatalism is fast disappearing and they are beginning to form a determination to wrest their fate from the hands of heaven and mold it nearer to their heart's desire. It is, undoubtedly, true that the present situation aggravates their high emotional state. This crisis of fever and madness must wear away to some extent.

But there will remain a person new to many of us, a person who will be exceedingly easily hurt (as he has always been in reality), a person whose sword will now fly from its scabbard at the slightest breath of insult where before it remained sheathed, not in cowardice or from insensitivity but from the restraint of dignity. It will take a good many years of sincere friendliness and honest, disinterested treatment on the part of other nations to convince him that the world is not waiting to devour him.

At such a time as this, then, when the pent-up emotionalism of centuries has been released, it is absurd that we should demand an ability to judge any situation impartially. It is not in the power of the Chinese, certainly not of the young Chinese—and he is in the ascendancy in China just now—to see any side but his own. It is inevitable and a wholly natural result of his state of mind. Judicial investigations only increase his indignation. He is profoundly skeptical of conferences. Any appeals or demands to reform himself first and talk about foreign aggression afterward simply infuriate him further.

Many younger Chinese apparently believe that if China were a sovereign nation with all her rights restored, she would automatically become strong, quiet, and prosperous. The source of all evils, from foot-binding and concubines to cigarette-smoking and the movies, is to be found in the unequal treaties. Nothing will change this conviction short of giving up the unequal treaties and letting the truth show itself.

And in the long run it will be worth it to everyone. Aside from the moral question involved, which makes it the only honorable thing for the Western nations to return to China what has been all too often unlawfully seized, the fact remains that it is really the only solution to the situation now in China. Until China has no excuse to turn her attention to anyone except herself, until she has no one except herself to blame for her condition, this emotionalism now rampant will not cease to express itself in chauvinism and in an actual willingness to shed blood. Once the immediate cause of irritation can be removed, there is hope that this intensity of nature, common to the Chinese people, may turn upon itself and really force some sort of order out of chaos.

The Lost Art of Profanity

By JOHN NICHOLAS BEFFEL

SOME writers in the metropolitan press have been lamenting the decline of profanity, the passing of old-time brimstone language, of Trojan and trooper talk. Nobody has a profane vocabulary any more, there is no variety in oaths, nothing unique, no artistry, no sparkle. Everybody uses the same words in swearing.

This indisputable fact is of course chargeable to the universal trend toward standardization in the United States. We are victims of the machine. We have become a nation of copy-cats, with the same commonplace newspapers everywhere, the same movies, the same parroted phrases issuing from every throat. Chains of drug stores, groceries, filling stations, waffle parlors, lunchrooms, beauty dens. Cities all alike. Originality faces starvation. Artists get no encouragement. Emotion is at a low ebb. Passion is gone from us.

Laurence Stallings and Maxwell Anderson in their play "What Price Glory?" exemplify the appalling standardization of profanity in this republic. Most of the actors play the role of marines in the late war. In every scene, amid tense battle action and during lulls in the fighting, there is a plethora of swearing and there are interpolations of obscenity. But the dingy speech lacks variety, as the speech of marines lacks it in everyday life. Over and over the actors use the same oaths; they take a handful of profane idioms and beat them to the thinness of a blanket in a junction-town hotel. It is dull reality; to have lent imagination to the profanity in "What Price Glory?", to have made it anywhere unique would have belied the truth.

The impotency of our modern epithet-makers was brought to our doorstep by the vain effort to make popular the coined word "scofflaw" to denote one who tramples heedlessly upon the Volstead Act. Try uttering "scofflaw" aloud. How much force can you put into it? How far can you throw it? It is akin to a ball of cotton thrown at an infant's head; its component letters are too soft, too yielding; they can hurt no one.

Memories of the old days have the mantle of illusion about them. The difference between the profanity of earlier times and that now prevailing was quite as much one of emotional values as of vocabulary. Men gave freer vent to their feelings then. True, there were individuals who found diversion in building up a great repertoire of swear-words, who delighted in the admiration of listeners. They livened the mining towns, the railroad camps, the cattle ranches. There were more of such men to the 100,000 population than now, but even then they stood out as a small minority.

I remember a man of unassuming appearance named Marryat, who captained a double span of white mules which pulled the State boat, a repair barge, up and down the length of the Illinois and Michigan canal. We kids would watch him when he was starting from our town with a boat heavily loaded with dredged mud. He was a marvel to listen to. There was a whip in his hand, but he rarely utilized it. He didn't need to, for he had a voice and unfailing vocal energy. His store of unprintable words was not large, but he constantly varied his combinations, and he put tonal force into them. An oath would strike just behind the ears of the forward off mule like the crack of a lash; another would fall upon a near kicker with the thud of a club. Marryat got work out of those beasts. But one day, while trying to recover a lost clay pipe, he fell between a dredge and the canal bank and was crushed to death. We were saddened. The town was lonesome without him.

When I was thirteen I worked in a newspaper office for the most impressive cusser I have ever met. For sheer originality I have never heard of his equal. His name was Absalom Bixby. He had a penchant for eating fried onions dipped in mustard at midnight, and he weighed ninety-two pounds with his clothes on, but there was a tradition among the older members of the staff that when Bixby got mad he had a habit of throwing monkey-wrenches and hatchets at those who offended him. They pointed to a jagged slit in a door panel, obviously made by a hatchet blade, and a deep dent in the base of the Gordon press where the sharp corner of a big wrench had dug in.

But Bixby had such a command of profanity that he had no need of assaulting anybody with iron weapons. I discovered this on the day when I locked up a type-form too tightly and broke a Gordon chase. Absalom happened to be at my elbow. Instantly he began excoriating me. His words came like a rain of metal—of lead slugs, brass rules, bolts, nuts, steel bars. They smoked and emitted odors—like gunpowder that has been shot off before. It took him ten minutes to run down and during this angry fusillade he uttered scarcely a word that was in the dictionary or that was used in the speech of ordinary folk. His words were of no known language; he had invented them for his own devices. But there was no misunderstanding their meaning.

Twice afterward I ignited Bixby's ire—when I blew up the stove with gasoline and when I amused myself by singing while inking the Ideal press when the weekly edition of the Bumble Bee was being run off. Each occasion produced a host of new exotic words. The room shook with the roar. Once a picture of Queen Victoria fell from the wall. Bixby turned and glared at the interruption, but kept up his assault. To these onslaughts I could offer no defense. It would have been like trying to push a tornado out of a window after it had come into one's house.

Those who fear that epithet-making as an art will completely die out in this country can find some reason for hope in the intelligent efforts of one playwright to keep it alive. I refer to Eugene O'Neill. In the stokehold scene in "The Hairy Ape" he gives an excellent portrayal of black-gang speech on a steamship. Using words and phrases that in most communities are not yet under any legal ban, O'Neill brought together a powerfully convincing composite of sordid speech, of talk that is sodden and begrimed. In Philadelphia this language was too much for the sensibilities of the police, who compelled the producers to eliminate many of the most vivid effects in the play. Even the word "hell" was barred. In Detroit, too, much of the dialogue in "The Hairy Ape" had to be toned down.

Carl Sandburg often achieves the effect of profanity in his poems without being technically profane. Consciously or not, he does it by the steady, skilful massing of crash-words, words that contain elements of harshness—acridity, iron, grime, rust, stench, impact. In his lines To a Contemporary Bunkshooter he answers Billy Sunday with as much force as Sunday ever generated in all his tabernacle acrobatics and hysteria. Contempt for the furniture-breaking evangelist gushes out like a stream from a hydraulic washer in a gold mine. When that poem appeared in the old Masses the postal authorities held up the magazine for two days before they could determine that Sandburg's poem violated no law.

One commentator wonders what contribution women eventually will make to profanity. There is little to hope from them in this field. Women—sober women—who essay to swear are self-conscious about it; they handle their words gingerly. Years ago, when Chicago was a wide-open town, I did hear women swear in such manner that no one could deny their art. Drunken women. One doesn't see quite the same kind anywhere now; the tribe has gone the way of the Indian and the buffalo.

Particularly do I remember one woman to whom I listened at a First Ward Ball, a gigantic social event in the demi-world, which dyed one night of each year a deep red. That gathering was staged in the Coliseum, a hall with a capacity of 11,000 persons if all were sitting down. This woman had been a beauty, and her clothes were all new and costly; plumes adorned her, as they adorn a fire-horse at an annual tournament. But there were heavy lines under her eyes. Her feelings had been injured, her social status ignored—so she explained to all who might hear.

Her specific grievance was that a particular alderman had failed to invite her to sit in his box. Ten or twelve other women were within its confines, drinking at the alderman's expense. And she had been left out. She held on to the railing of another box near by and explained the alleged treason in meticulous detail. Brannigan had explicitly promised to send her an invitation. He hadn't done it, and he was a no-good. She told the crowd what her own name was—a fancy one. Pansy Ethel Woodward will approximate it. Curses poured from her lips in a torrent. Alderman Brannigan's family were upstarts, rent-dodgers, meat-stealers, fly-by-nights. He was a snake-in-the-grass, an alley dog, a robber of blind beggars and crippled orphans, a gutter-bird.

Pansy's speech was heard by a thousand dancers and drinkers, by all who could press near, and by the alderman himself, who gave a high-sign to two policemen. The "cops" fought their way through the reluctant listeners, who had no desire to see Pansy silenced. And Pansy was not silenced. Long after the "cops" laid hold of her she kept up her tirade. They had to drag her out of the hall, and they were scratched and bitten in the process. Pansy was the best part of the show.

In those years I knew another woman who was a wonder with profane talk. A sober woman withal. She was advance agent for a road show, and used to come into the newspaper offices in the cities, sit on a desk with her plump legs swinging beneath, and tell stories of the mud-lots to the reporters. Born in a circus tent, she had been on the road all her life, living in a rough world, a world of give-and-take. She had a husky voice and had no consciousness of femininity, and she was universally liked.

I remember one story she told about a Minnesota judge who was trying a man accused of stealing a grandfather's clock, about a mysterious package the judge found on his doorstep in the night, and what he said when he opened it in his library. It was an anecdote rife with suspense, and the quoted language of the judge had all the warmth of a blast furnace and all the vivacity of a wild horse which is being shod by an absent-minded blacksmith. The fact that the judge was a prominent member of a moral secret society known as the Guardians of Purity lent contrast to the tale. After he had opened the mysterious package he went down into the cellar, got an ax, and smashed a grand piano into flinders. She made us see the judge during every moment of the incident which so embarrassed and enraged him. The tale might have come out of the "Decameron"; yet the teller spoke without the slightest self-consciousness.

That woman, as a raconteur of racy episodes, is no more. Several years later a train wreck smashed up the road-show, killing and injuring many of the performers. She was on that train and was badly hurt. In a hospital close to death, she got religion. And all of the dark-night words and stories she had picked up from association with klems and snares and menagerie men, from living in cheap hotels, from the race-track crowd in New Orleans, where she had spent her winters, were blotted from her repertory. After her recovery from the accident she quit the road and went to Missouri with a sister to engage in mushroom-growing.

There was a man once in Peoria who was a master cusser. He drew wages as an express agent, but tuned zithers and repaired alarm clocks on the side. He was called into court as a co-defendant in a suit over some lost gold-plated jewelry.

"Do you swear——?" the court clerk asked him.

"Do I swear?" the express agent roared. "Do I swear? You bet your lying, thieving father's life I do—upside down sideways, backwards, crosswise, day and night, Sundays and holidays. You listen to me, Bo! I'll show you some swearing. . . ." And then he proceeded to smoke and sizzle and scorch the atmosphere for several consecutive minutes.

In the Driftway

IT must have been the wraith of a scent he caught the other day of one of the sun-burned slopes of Central Park in New York City that whipped the Drifter's thoughts a thousand miles and several years westward, where as passionate a sun was distilling homely essences over the wide, pale-gold spaces of a threshing ring's activities. Even without the Drifter's sagacious discerning organ, you could not have missed the sweet hot perfume of those oats shocks. The harvest sun extracted it forcibly and the effulgence rolled over, broke round, and smothered you like surf. There was no wind. The sky was an unfeeling blue, filmed over with that white haze that means rain before the change in the moon. The men worked swiftly, without a word, and until the fretful snort of the rapacious harvester began there was only Keats's "noiseless noise."

* * * * *

THE sweating horses had a teeming, friendly smell. They flicked their tails, pointed their ears, and rubbed their noses on each other's streaming flanks in the most successful attempt the Drifter has ever seen of achieving philosophical equanimity. He achieved but little that day in waiting for the shadows to shorten and the bell to clang forth over the wash basin on the warped hickory bench outside the kitchen door. He loses it completely in the recollection. For he had caught an emanation from that same kitchen door, and by its potency saw whole hams, clove-stuck and sugar-rubbed, simmering rosily in their milk bath! Divine odor! Most ineffable of smells! Led on by it, he saw in anticipation—can see today—that profligate board surrounded by the cheerfully perspiring "ring," their hair slicked down with rain water above faces burnt beet-red.

* * * * *

THE Drifter smells the drying leaves of the branches the women folk waved slowly over the table, shooing away the crazed flies with one hand, with the other passing and repassing the aroma-giving dishes. Great platters of young frys with their richly browned crusts, old hen with steaming schooners of dumplings and gravy and saffron noodles. Sweet corn piled high like cordwood. Long, juicy pole beans, flavored with a hunk of bacon, and a mild crisp Bermuda waiting to be chopped into them. No fol-de-rol salads, but sliced, bleeding-red tomatoes, eaten with pepper and salt; cold slaw that crunched between the molars; snowdrifts of cottage cheese. And the spreads. The Drifter met a cosmopolitan lady once who did not know what a spread was. He wishes she had seen that table—peach butter, plum butter, apple sauce tanged with nutmeg, quivering cranberry jelly, wild grape jelly, blackberry jam, apple jelly into which a rose geranium leaf had been dropped. And the pies, with cream the color of old ivory to pour over them. The cakes with their perilous layers. . . . The Drifter could distinguish each of them with his eyes shut, though he would not know Coty's L'Origan from Caron's Narcisse Noir.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

"Professor Sam, Militarist"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have personal knowledge that the United States Government is not trying to "Balkanize South America" by "callously drifting into military arrangements which destroy our claim of impartiality." Your statement that "we are helping Brazil, but not her greatest potential enemy, Argentina," is based on misinformation. For almost two years I was connected with Argentine-American naval relations as secretary to the Naval Attaché to the Argentine Embassy in Washington, Commander R. A. Vago. During this period the United States Navy Department actively cooperated with us and with the Argentine Naval Commission in New York in the work of modernization of Argentina's two largest battleships, the Rivadavia and the Moreno, at an expenditure of $10,000,000. This assistance, it is true, was not rendered on Argentine soil, but only for the very practical reason that the ships in question were originally built in this country and were therefore sent back to the docks of the Fore River Shipbuilding Company at Quincy, Massachusetts, in the thought that greater facilities for the work were available there.

I have toiled for countless hours over the translation of the requests for information and advice transmitted to us for presentation to the United States Navy Department by the Argentine Ministry of Marine. Rear Admiral Henry H. Hough, then Chief of the Naval Intelligence Division, was ever quick to respond and eager to suggest, at the instance of his technical divisions, the latest improvements in the science of naval warfare for adoption on the Argentine ships. In addition to this, Argentine naval students were granted entry into the Naval Academy at Annapolis, and data were furnished for the improvement of Argentine naval aviation.

Why should we not supply the desired and formally requested instruction personnel to the Brazilian and Peruvian navies and technical assistance to the Argentines? Should we rather permit our European competitors for Latin-American markets to establish the bonds of good feeling that are thus created? Nations are nothing more than trading companies which must establish mutually satisfactory relations with each other in order to buy and sell without begrudging reluctance or bitterness. The American naval policy toward South America—which no more discriminates than does a merchant as between customers of any sort who have the money to pay—is thus a brilliant stroke of commercial good sense. We should not think for a moment of relenting our activities in the growing markets to the south, toward which all but the prejudiced know that we have only frankly commercial and not imperialistic designs. We do not desire to disrupt and conquer easily, as is alleged, but rather to unite and sell easily.

Washington, D. C., September 4 IRVING GORDON

That Armistice Pledge

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Is it true that when Germany accepted the terms of the armistice—making herself defenseless—it was conditioned on the promise of President Wilson and our allies that she should have a peace based on the well-known Fourteen Points?

As I have never seen this denied, I have so far believed it to be true. Whenever Armistice Day comes around and the people celebrate I do not take part, for shame that a promise made by our President in behalf of the nation stands unfulfilled.

If we can say for our justification only that the President under the Constitution had no right to make any promises, it does not relieve us of the moral obligation to make good the President's word, or to make an effort to this effect.

There is a movement started to make Armistice Day a legal holiday. The point mentioned should be cleared up.

Redlands, Cal., August 28 MAX HENTSCHKE

[In the pre-armistice negotiations President Wilson informed the German Government that the Allies were willing "to make peace with the Government of Germany on the terms of peace laid down in the President's address to Congress of January, 1918 [the 'Fourteen Points'], and the principles enunciated in his subsequent addresses," with reservations only as concerned interpretation of the phrases "freedom of the seas" and "restoration" of invaded territories.—EDITOR THE NATION.]

The Garvey Gospel

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I take this time to thank you for your article for our beloved leader, Marcus Garvey. Not being a Negro, you don't just quite understand our aims. This letter I hope will help you. Garvey taught us six great truths, and it is on these principles our race will stand or fall. First, this is not our country and we are not to remain here and become a part of this nation. Numbers alone will crowd us out in time. Second, we have no constitutional rights. Having been unable to force them in the Constitution—they were put there as a free gift to be withdrawn at will—we have no power to compel their enforcement. Third, politics, religion, and education cannot solve the Negro problem; nothing but a government owned by Negroes will solve it. Fourth, begging and pleading will not get for us what other races have had to use force to obtain. Fifth, Africa is the natural home of black men and will remain so when these countries where white men live become too crowded. It is our duty to carry our education to the native African, teach him the ways of civilization as we know it, and become great men of the world in and among our own people. Sixth, Africa can be redeemed. The alien races will give back Africa as soon as they know all the four hundred million Negroes want it. With the help of the true white men of this country who want to preserve their race in purity we will be able to get a colony in Africa and show the world we are capable of maintaining a government of civilization. These are the ideals that Garvey's followers look to for salvation and, whether Garvey be alive or dead, we will follow them to victory or eternal defeat.

St. Louis, August 8 J. R. DITTO

A Venezuelan Speaks

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In the name of the martyred and silenced people of Venezuela our organization begs you to give space in your periodical for their complaints, that we may thus secure the attention of America, that all humankind may hear it, that magnanimous souls may be moved to come to the help of those who have the undeniable duty and the most decided purpose to break a way toward the light through the jungle of social venality.

Human dignity, a well-conceived Americanism, and the most elemental principles of solidarity constrain every country not to regard with continued indifference the vandalic capers of Juan Vicente Gomez, applauded as they are by a cohort of hired journalists who in no way reflect popular sentiment, because they confound the issues and renounce all dignity for the sake of the despot's favor.

By consent of the National Congress it had been resolved that Juan Vicente Gomez might purchase for the sum of seventeen million bolivars the estates known as "Hatos de El Caura," consisting of more than one hundred square leagues along the Orinoco.

These Gomez acquired for the ridiculous sum of three hundred thousand bolivars; he contrived to plunder Venezuela with his customary procedure, and suggested the scheme to his henchmen in Congress. It was accepted without objection, with the enthusiastic approbation of persons who, through fear or effrontery, sanctioned and continue to sanction the monstrosities of this man who has given free entrance, without precautions and to their huge advantage, to the dangerous magnates of imperialist countries.

Thus he has seized upon whatever the country produces, monopolizing the cattle industry and its derivatives, the mills, navigation, the manufacture of Roman cement, the exploitation of minerals, woods, pearls, cigarettes, transport, etc.—all this to such a degree that a newspaper in San Jose, Costa Rica, edited by Venezuelan exiles, enumerating the number, extent, and other particulars of the properties acquired by Gomez during his dismal predominance, establishes a total of much more than a thousand million bolivars! And yet when he first came into power he was a man of very modest fortune.

We make Pan-Americanism effective by attacking in its very lair all such systematic brigandage. We do not hesitate.

Brooklyn, August 19 MARTIN FEINSTEIN,
English Secretary, the Venezuelan Labor Union

Omitted

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Why, in your article Next Winter in the Theater, did you keep secret the plans of the Lenox Hill Players?

Hard on the heels of Mr. Walter Hampden and Mr. Basil Sidney, there is in preparation a no-star production of "Hamlet." Also we will give Frank Wedekind's "Earth Spirit," Nikolai Gogol's "The Inspector General," and St. John Ervine's "John Ferguson."

New York, August 3 MITCHELL PADRAIC MARCUS

Poems

By S. FOSTER DAMON

Epitaph in a Garden

Here, in the shade of younger leaves,
Now they lie sweetly.
They never lived but as a dream,
Then died completely;

For flowers face no Judgment Day
And risk no Resurrection:
Their part to shake the Naked Void
With rings and ripples of perfection.

Epitaph Upon a Philosopher

The sun, the moon, the stars, the earth
Were all created at my birth,
And now they blur and swim away
Like dreams at the approach of day.
I open, and not close, the eye;
'Tis they are dying, and not I.

Epitaph

I found the answers, then I learned
The riddles you had been;
And deprecated labyrinths
Which we had wandered in.

Now suddenly a silence;
All riddles are outrun:
Though I might touch you, yet you are
Departed past the sun.

First Glance

FEW things arouse my curiosity more than a new book by an interesting poet. There are no straight lines in the careers of poets—they must curve up or down, and the reader, if he can, may share the writer's sense of adventure as the two move together into the dark or light of a new level.

The second of Amy Lowell's three posthumous volumes, "East Wind" (Houghton Mifflin: $2.25), is neither better nor worse than any of the seven volumes which preceded it. It has all of their famous qualities and all of their notorious defects—speed, dexterity, garrulity, and glitter. But its subject-matter is different, and that of any new book by Miss Lowell was likely to be; it represents an extension of her effort to cover a great deal of ground as perfectly as her impetuosity would permit. And it proves that she had it in her to become one of our best narrative poets—with the emphasis on the narrative rather than on the poetry. In "Legends" and "Can Grande's Castle" she labored with a manner. Here she has her hands full with the material of thirteen New England stories. These would have been difficult to tell in any medium, for the problems of their chief characters are problems which the services of psychoanalysis are necessary to make intelligible. That Miss Lowell is not only clear but continuously and simply interesting means that she has removed most of the obstacles between herself and the public; "East Wind" should be her most popular book. It does not mean that she stands any higher as a poet. She probably had gone as far in the direction of art as she would ever go. In the other direction of theme there were no limits upon her energetic mind. She would have continued to entertain us vastly, and I look forward to the collection which still remains to be published.

E. E. Cummings in "is 5" (Boni and Liveright: $2.50) plunges straight ahead along the path he has so indignantly claimed to be his and only his. On he goes, shouting abuse to any little fellow who may stand in his way and lowering his really fine voice to the lyric pitch whenever the proper persons over the hedge incline respectful ears. It is right that he should take his own road, and it is refreshing to hear him on the subject of his far too many competitors.

> let freedom ring
>
> amen. i do however protest, anent the un
> -spontaneous and otherwise scented merde which > greets one (Everywhere Why) as divine poesy per > that and this radically defunct periodical. i would > suggest that certain ideas gestures > rhymes, like Gillette Razor Blades > having been used and reused > to the mystical moment of dullness emphatically are > Not To Be Resharpened.
>

This is amusing and good, and not to be contested. Most of the time Mr. Cummings as satirist is a man to be feared and hence to be enjoyed. I am interested, however, in the very plain signs here that the highway tilts dangerously before him; he may lose his balance and fall flat, or go rolling dangerously down hill. He misses his step at least as often as he hits it, both in his serious work and in his foolery. The extreme of his foolery is meaningless vulgarity; the extreme of his serious work—done too distinctly on the rebound—is sentimentality. He is free now; why should he not consider his pace?

Orrick Johns, who in his time has been something of an experimentalist, settles into simplicity with "Wild Plum" (Macmillan: $1.25), a group of thin lyrics most of which are stale and three or four of which achieve a beautiful brightness. He has undertaken a difficult task—to say old things, and small things, well; he seems not to have known just how difficult this can be. Vachel Lindsay takes to the mountains of the West again in "Going-to-the-Stars" (Appleton: $2). The book is to Mr. Lindsay, evidently, a valuable record of pure moments spent among flowers and stars. To his readers it will say less, since, alas, Mr. Lindsay sings mostly into his own ears these days. The tune of other times is hardly to be heard, though here and there we get sweet quavers of it. Mr. Lindsay, being truly simple, has developed a complicated way of expressing himself. All but inaudible under his symbols, he sings on in happy solitude, renaming all the posies of the world and scratching hieroglyphics on stones which never saw a man. In that solitude we must, it seems, respectfully leave him. Leonard Bacon, meanwhile, cannot be admitted into the company of simple souls. The clever author of "Ulug Beg" and

"Ph.D.'s" attempts in "Animula Vagula" [Harper; $1.50] to shake off his cleverness and pierce to the center of a dark experience he has had. He never arrives with the humble mien that would be fitting. He is ingenious in the way he leads us up to the horror. He says a number of very neat things about it—

> I shall not take my life. It had been taken—but he does not forget that he is writing long enough to give us the thing itself. That, and that only, would have been simplicity.

MARK VAN DOREN

The United States of Europe

Pan-Europe. By Richard N. Coudenhove-Kalergi. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

THIS interesting book, first published in 1923, has now been brought out in an American edition with a rather non-committal introduction by President Butler of Columbia University and a supplementary chapter in which the author sketches the progress of the Pan-European movement during the intervening three years. As the book, although well known in Europe, will probably be new to most American readers, the thesis which it develops may properly be outlined.

Count Kalergi, who is the official head as well as the moving spirit of the Pan-European Union at Vienna, believes that if Europe, meaning thereby the western and central Continental states and their colonial dependencies, is to enjoy peace and independence, its present disunited nationalism must give way to a federation somewhat analogous to the Pan-American Union. In his view, the World War has not only altered fundamentally the relations of the European states to each other but has also relegated them to a place of dangerous inferiority and helplessness in the face of the world Powers. Of the world Powers, the two whose destined expansion is of most serious concern are Russia and Great Britain. Russia, as Count Kalergi sees it, has practically ceased to be a European state, and must henceforth be regarded as the head of a new Asiatic federation. Its influence is already being felt strongly in China, and it is laying the foundations of an accord with Japan. With Germany, however, it has a large community of interest, and if, because of political ambition or some provocation of war, it should decide to try conclusions with the West, its conquering march would not stop until it had reached the Rhine. What was left of Europe after the Russian advance had ceased would be little more than the area over which Rome once exercised control.

Great Britain, on the other hand, although bound to the Continent by many ties, is seen by Count Kalergi as more and more engrossed with imperial concerns, and in particular with the solidification of its interests in the Far East of which the new Singapore base is symbol and seal. Its natural alliance in the future, in spirit if not actually in form, will be with the United States, the world Power from which Europe has economically the most to fear. Between the English-speaking peoples on the one side and the Russian Asiatic federation on the other, western Europe, if it continues to cling to the nationalism and particularism which have been its historical portion, will be overrun if not obliterated. For the moment, Count Kalergi sees the key to the future as held mainly by Germany and France, and upon the success of Germany's efforts to effect a reconciliation with France, and of the efforts of Frenchmen of the Poincaré type to prevent it, hangs the question of whether "the day" shall be hastened or postponed.

The Pan-Europe which Count Kalergi envisages is not, apparently, an organic union, but a loose federation somewhat akin to the former German Zollverein, while embodying on its governing side the American principle of representation of states and population. The first and greatest object, however, is peace. The next war, for which the author believes that the leading nations are all preparing, promises to be an orgy of destruction in comparison with which the World War will seem hardly more than a skirmish. Against such a calamity the League of Nations, whose financial organization and general ineptitude Count Kalergi dissects without mercy, seems to him to afford no protection. The only preventive of war is a European federation, excluding Great Britain and Russia, with security pacts and compulsory arbitration. What shall be added after this consists principally, it would seem, of a modification and unification of customs duties and the encouragement of English as the obvious universal language.

Count Kalergi's analysis of the world situation, with its recognition of something like a destiny which awaits the West, contains a good deal that will remind the reader of Spengler's political philosophy. What has been done since 1923 to spread the idea of a Pan-Europe appears, from the supplementary chapter, to be mainly a propaganda of discussion, and the idea itself is obviously still in the domain of theory. As an exposition of political tendencies, however, and of the grave predicament in which Europe has been left by the blind and perverse framers of the peace treaties, the book is an impressive performance, well worthy of attention whatever one may think of the way in which ultimate salvation may best be attained.

WILLIAM MACDONALD

Add Americana

Jazz. By Paul Whiteman. J. H. Sears and Company. $3.

THIS is a book by a successful American, conscious of his success and fortified, therefore, in his status, wisdom, and wit; talking—not writing—to "just plain folks"; talking faster than any man can think, and with no time, therefore, to do more than send out through his mouth whatever has drifted in through his ear: the homely philosophy, bromidic wise-cracks ("Consistency may be a jewel but most people would rather wear diamonds, even so"), and muddy notions about music that are characteristic of his place and time.

Out of all the dizzy chatter certain truths emerge. "With a very few but important exceptions jazz is not as yet the thing said; it is the manner of saying it." This is true in two senses. Since, in the first place, the thing said—the fundamental plunk-plunk-plunk-plunk of every measure—is utterly invariable, jazz is an art of embellishment, embellishment superimposed for the purpose of concealment on what is itself incapable of change. And since, in the second place—and this is what Mr. Whiteman means—the superimposed melodic embellishments, "with a very few but important exceptions," are poor in quality and restricted in rhythmic variety to a little syncopation, the art of embellishment is mostly an art of orchestration. Mr. Whiteman, on the occasion of his first Aeolian Hall concert in February, 1924, caused considerable befuddlement by his own befuddlement in calling it "An Experiment in Modern Music" intended to demonstrate the beginning of "a new movement in the world's art of music"; for the development which he actually demonstrated was that of a new type of orchestration, which was mostly his work and represented a genius for combining instrumental timbres comparable with that of Berlioz or Stravinsky, as his own orchestra represented a genius comparable with that of Gericke or Stokowski.

But there is a constant and growing demand for change and novelty. "Four years ago a whole chorus could be run through with but one rhythmic idea. Now there must be at least two rhythmic ideas and sometimes more." And new ideas are progressively more difficult to supply. For one thing, then, recourse is had to trick and comedy scoring, even to the cheapest of cheap vaudeville entertainment, a tasteless degradation of instrument and players. But it seems that a more valuable, if less expected, source of help is serious music. Either the theme of a serious composition is taken as the point of departure of a subsequently original jazz composition; or the entire serious composition or a section of it is played—often as a novelty interpolated in a jazz scoring—in fox-trot time, with its melody dislocated, a new rhythmic trick at each half-chorus, low comedy on the high clarinets by Ross Gorman, and so on. The first use is unquestionably legitimate, the second unquestionably not. But, legitimacy aside, one is aghast at the lack of discrimination, the appalling ignorance of musicians who can think of these practices as a continuation of the job left unfinished by the serious composer, and expect Handel to enjoy and respect the use made of his theme in "Yes, We Have No Bananas"; who can, inasmuch as "nine-tenths of modern jazz music . . . is frankly stolen from the masters," chuckle over "lowbrows who say they can't abide classical music and highbrows who squirm when they hear jazz," and not realize that what the first enjoy and the second squirm at is the perversions of the serious compositions, not the originals; who can, therefore, pride themselves on stimulating with the perversions a taste for the originals, and wonder at the inconsistency of "the patrons of music in America who for years have been keeping good music barely alive . . . by artificial stimulation . . . while they lamented the lack of a musical public . . ." and yet do not "rejoice to see music rising like a wave and engulfing America, to see people music-mad."

It is all like that. Perhaps the other idiocies are more familiar: about jazz expressing America, its "composite essence," "fundamental emotion," "place and time"; about its having to create new forms to do it; about art that is too good for the mass being too good for this earth and not standing the test of time, since "beauty is emotion, not intellect—and emotion is universal."

B. H. Haggin

History by Finance

The War Period of American Finance. 1908-1925. By Alexander Dana Noyes. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50.

THIS work is an extension of the author's well-known book called "Forty Years of American Finance." But whereas the former work covered a period in part coincident with the writer's early years and known to him only at second-hand, the present book is the fruit of the mature thought of one of the keenest analysts, and probably the best informed financial writer, in America. Moreover, for a full account of certain needed data the writer has had the first-hand assistance of Messrs. Carter Glass, Bernard Baruch, and Benjamin Strong.

"The War Period," though explicitly an account of American financial and economic conditions during the war and for some years afterward, might almost be regarded as a history, during those years, of our country, written not from a political or military standpoint, still less from the standpoint of a liberal, but from the view of an exceedingly well-informed, well-balanced, and rather conservative financier. The facts are given in such abundance, with such power of choice of the effective rather than the irrelevant, that the reader can readily discern the scene from his own philosophic or economic standpoint by a mere personal reinterpretation. The data are before him. Indeed, from the author's standpoint, it is almost impossible to exaggerate the keenness and breadth of his view. This book stands among the best histories produced by American writers. It is a book for reading first, for attentive study afterward.

It is not to be implied that the present reviewer agrees with Mr. Noyes in certain of his implications in financial history. Criticism of details is inhibited by the author's own statement that he has had, necessarily, to "treat the subject in broad perspective" and by his elaboration of this remark at some length in the preface. It is even possible to assent to the implied idea that the best standpoint from which a nation's activities may be viewed is the standpoint of its financial center. But it is impossible not to call attention to the fact that while in a book of lesser merit the total absence of any allusion to mighty sociological factors which have entered into American life in the years under discussion might be passed more or less unnoticed, in this work, because of its very excellence, one expected that no gross lacuna would appear. Thus, the growing divergences between commercial and industrial leaders on the one hand and financial leaders on the other is mentioned only incidentally in a somewhat contemptuous reference to the Pujo Investigation of 1913. It may fairly be argued that woman suffrage lies outside of the writer's purview, but, in his constant interweaving of political, economic, and massive social factors, the absence of one word (as far as the reviewer has discerned) on the subject of prohibition reveals a positive hiatus in the story of the grain markets. Of this movement itself, its initiation and its present control by the industrial and commercial leaders of the country, there is wanting even a fragment of discussion. It might be noted also that the index is unworthy of the book.

But these and similar matters put aside, Mr. Noyes has written a sketch of the leap of the nation from a debtor's position to holder of the economic hegemony of the world which deserves that rarest of praises when true—the book is really indispensable to him who desires authentic knowledge of the most important economic happenings in the history of civilization.

Drew Bond

Books in Brief

Studies in Public Finance. By Edwin R. A. Seligman. The Macmillan Company. $3.25.

Any book upon taxation and the problems of fiscal science by Professor Seligman must be accorded special recognition. The present volume, a companion and supplementary to the "Essays in Taxation," represents a selection from such of the author's fugitive writings as have a pertinent bearing on contemporary fiscal problems. The most noticeable characteristic of the studies is their lack of academic longwindedness. With the exception of the first and last chapters, on Comparative Tax Burdens in the Twentieth Century and The French Colonial Fiscal System respectively, they are ex parte arguments, terse and cogent. If the reader finds himself in disagreement with any of the conclusions, he must turn back to Professor Seligman's theoretical first premises and content himself with denying the axiomatic quality of these assumptions, for the logical progression from premises to deductions leaves no chink for rebuttal. A criticism may be made against Professor Seligman's approach to one group of problems. Because of his interest in the tax problems of the Eastern States—particularly New York—and his valuable services in an advisory character to the legislatures of these States, he has failed to realize the divergence of fiscal interest between the creditor States where dwell the masters of wealth and the debtor States who view these capitalists as absentee landlords. Very naturally, the first group of States seek to base income taxes on the residence of the taxpayer, while the second group would make the source of his income the base. Professor Seligman's compromise solution of double income taxation turns out, upon analysis, to be a disguised insistence upon the principle of the residence of the taxpayer; it is not surprising that the New York Legislature adopted it, but it will hardly satisfy Wisconsin or the Dakotas.

The Wood-Carver's Art in Ancient Mexico. By Marshall H. Saville. New York: Museum of the American Indian: Heye Foundation. Contributions, Vol. IX. $5.

This handsome volume is a sequence to the author's recent superb monograph on "Turquoise Mosaic Art in Ancient Mexico," also published by the Museum of the American Indian. "Wood carved and painted or gilded," says Professor Saville, "was extensively employed in the interior of houses and temples, in fashioning idols, for various articles of furniture, and for ceremonial and other objects. Highly intricate designs were graved with a delicacy not excelled by the work of any other people of antiquity and certainly equal to the best carved work of ancient Egypt." Owing to the perishable nature of the material few examples remain, but there are enough to emphasize Professor Saville's contention as to the extraordinary skill possessed and the rare beauty of the product. The book is illustrated by fifty-two fine plates showing carved spear-throwers, horizontal and other drums, etc., and by nineteen text figures.

Peary, The Man Who Refused to Fail. By Fitzhugh Green. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $6.

Admiral Peary's whole life was a battle with adverse circumstances that would have defeated many men. This book is specially important, because it presents by a competent hand the story of Peary's early life—not before available—as well as an excellent, condensed record of his endeavors and successes in the field of exploration. A brief introduction by Mrs. Peary puts her valuable approval upon the volume.

Spiritual Values in Adult Education. A Study of a Neglected Aspect. By Basil A. Yeaxlee. Oxford University Press. Two volumes. $8.75.

The first part of this work is a history of the development of adult education in the United States during the nineteenth century; the second is a consideration of the current situation; and the third is a detailed survey of adult education in churches and kindred organizations. For Dr. Yeaxlee the fundamental problem of education is the conservation of religious sentiment. He is almost exclusively occupied with religious organizations as agencies for the education of adults. To one who is more interested in adult education as an independent secular activity than in the possible expansion of the Sunday school, this book is chiefly of interest for the valuable historical material it contains.

Europe and the East. By Norman Dwight Harris. Houghton Mifflin Company. $5.

One would like to give unqualified commendation to a work which brings together such a vast amount of material and presents in such excellent form the elements of the problem of East and West as it affects Turkey, Syria, Persia, India, China, and Japan, to say nothing of minor entities from the Lebanon to the farther isles of the Pacific. It is not the occasional errors that seriously impair its value. These are inevitable in a work of this scope and in the present instance do not destroy the substantial accuracy of the account. But the author, after a masterly statement of the essential problems of each country, offers suggestions for their solution. These suggestions are so simple and off-hand that they amount to hardly more than a restatement of the problem. For example, there is nothing constructive in the suggestion that all that is needed in China is a strong and efficient government. Certainly, but the problem is how to get it and what to do until it arrives. The author's handy prescriptions for the ills of these Asian countries, together with his hearty condemnation of the statesmen who have tried to resolve the resulting issues practically, convey an impression of simplicity which may well be wholly misleading to the uninformed reader.

Sicilian Noon. By Louis Golding. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

This is a first-rate book of travel impressions. The less-frequented Sicilian pathways have not yielded richer artistic material to Samuel Butler or even to George Gissing than they have to Mr. Golding, who substitutes for the fine sweetness of Gissing an occasional stylistic coruscation and brittle unexpectedness of phrase—tricks that too many of the clever young Georgians have stolen from the magician's hat of Aldous Huxley. In other respects this is a volume worthy of being bracketed with "By the Ionian Sea." The amazing accounts of the Palermo marionette performances and the pagan Easter celebrations in that city should be missed by no lover of the humorous or the vitally carnal in literature.

Art

Roy Van Auken Sheldon

IF art is concerned with measure and symmetry, being a sort of music that endeavors for its peculiar ends with line and linear form, mass and recession, then it follows, I suppose, that the key to a kind of subtle movement which the human mind and senses can grasp and take delight in. Without trying to gauge the man who paints, writes, or models by a scale of oddness or rarity, as is often done nowadays, it can be shown that the artist who stands at the other end of triteness and dulness communicates out of the depths of himself a singularity, a something of divergence, which is beautifully human. It is this that he deposits as the enigma of creative personality on the doorsill of his own generation.

If Ruskin responded uniquely to Gothic values and Pater chiefly to the Renaissance, we today have come to realize that even more important than these is what the individual painter or sculptor or architect as such has to say. He does not, to be sure, say a neat word, a clear concept, a glittering fable; but he does express, if he is worth a second glance at all, an emotion, his burgeoning sense of the world, and he voices it in his own unborrowed way.

Random thoughts these, but quite forgivable, I think, when one contemplates the figures, torsos, half-finished studies, and portraits scattered about the Paris studio of the young American sculptor, Roy Van Auken Sheldon. Mr. Sheldon bears the stigmata of his austere training; but the inevitable asceticism imposed by his metier is even more apparent; the outcome of this self-searching eremetism has been that his masters, Bourdelle, Landowsky, and Boucher, have left his hands bare of an encumbering catechism touching the noble art of sculpture. He has talked and worked with these men, and they have whetted his nostalgia for the search. The goal of the search for any artist worth his tubes or clay is, of course, his own nexus with what, if you are a pure ironist, you will style a watchmaker's world.

But you cannot with impunity get very far without music and order in the plastic arts. After admiring the admirable canvas or figure in stone before you, you are borne inescapably to the impulse or forces back of the artist's will to create something beautiful. "Elles sont au milieu de ce monde, comme les monuments d'un autre monde; ou bien comme les exemples, ça et là disseminés, d'une structure et d'une durée qui ne sont pas celles des êtres, mais celles des formes et des lois." And further on in the same dialogue Paul Valéry makes his beloved Socrates say that all these abiding works of art simply tend to conjure up, on the one hand, the naked structure of the world and, on the other, its order and stability. They evoke, moreover, the contours of the spirit of man and its unfettered pursuit of harmony.

Mr. Sheldon, unlike the professional Kunstforscher, has quietly taken to the road, armed with scrip and staff, and if his search is plain in his work it is not overly obtrusive. He schools himself to the classic tradition. The lingering tradition may have to be overridden, you note, but he feels that it would be fatal to ignore or deny it. Thus he inches forward by miniscules, but his growth as an artist, his erect dignity as an artist, is an assured thing. For he is aware that no artist can live by a panacea, a code, a formula, or a theory. Mr. Sheldon knows that you cannot breed unicorns or hippogriffs from tame stable mares. Brancusi has stopped toying with light and reverted to pure mass; Mr. Epstein still leans too heavily on his surfaces, broken like a crinkled sea.

As an example of the best of the sculptor's work I would point unhesitatingly to his head of A. G. Warshawsky, the American painter, which was exhibited at the Autumn Salon. It is, say, classic—but the mind is urged to no vain comparisons. Mr. Sheldon has gleaned ruggedness from the model, but he has also made a vivid discovery which is as startling for the layman as it must have been for the sculptor. The discovery is, in brief, "mobility in rest"; he came upon it, you feel, neither aided nor prompted; and even if this find was knowledgeable to the primitives, for Mr. Sheldon it persists, nevertheless, in being a first-hand discovery. The world moves and it is still: balance and order.

Measure and movement—and music, to refer once again to suggestive words of Paul Valéry—are also discernible in his fine Pallas Athene. In the representation the grace and severity of the goddess merge gradually into the pervading wistfulness, into the shy droop of the naiad. How did these polar qualities creep into the figure, you ask? When an artist envisages measure and movement in things, it follows, doesn't it, that opposites function only as a part of the bigger diapason? Flux and rhythm. To revise the pantheistic law slightly, opposites like good and evil do exist, but only for the sake of the imperative music, the ebb and flow. Mr. Sheldon's penguin, his white bear for a gate-post or for a pool, his numerous dancing figures, his busts and heads, especially his head of Ludwig Lewisohn, bear witness to the sculptor's journey toward self-realization; they reveal no less that he has conquered his medium and that his discoveries must in time lead to other discoveries equally worth while.

If Roy Sheldon holds that all art, and the sculptor's art in particular, is utilitarian, he wishes by these terms merely to have us understand that he intends making his own art so. The young American is an ardent devotee of city-planning because the baffling problem nowadays is what to do with works of sculpture once they are finished. And so we have no difficulty in making out what he means when he boldly says: "Give me the Woolworth Building and I will use it as a pedestal for my Pallas!"

PIERRE LOVING

Drama

Square of the Hypotenuse

NOTHING could be more conventional in the pattern of its plot than "Sour Grapes" (Longacre Theater). A man falls in love with his friend's wife; the unexpected fertility of a former love—that bane of careless lovers and the sure resource of dramatists—neatly disposes of him; and the husband and wife make it up again. Yet, in spite of all this the play is not so banal as might be expected, for the very simplicity of the triangular situation puts the author on his mettle and challenges him to reinvest it with the emotional freshness which in real life it always has.

In itself the triangle is anything or it is nothing—depending upon the characters and the ethos of the people involved. Granted a society dominated by a religious view of marriage, it becomes tragic in its most sinister form with Sin as the soul of the plot; take it down a step to the level of the seriously skeptical and it becomes a problem play not improbably freighted with "social significance"; follow it into the haunts of the more casually sophisticated and it inevitably turns to a comedy which grows lighter and lighter until, in that society devoid of either passions or inhibitions which forms the milieu of the French farce, triviality extinguishes it completely. Adultery is a sin, an experiment, a game, or a banality, depending upon the atmosphere in which it is committed; but it is always, except when it is the last, interesting, if only the atmosphere be definitely created and consistently maintained. In the abstract the triangle is as bare as that famous formula which involves the square of

You Will Enjoy the Theatre More—

—if you read about the fine points of all the plays you see!

AFTER all, the theatre is like golf, bridge, football or any other form of entertainment—the more you know about its fine points the more you enjoy it. That is why the readers of Theatre Arts Monthly find something to give them keen pleasure in nearly every play.

Theatre Arts Monthly is the only magazine in the world today devoted chiefly to explaining just how all of the arts unite in the theatre to serve the one great end of creating human enjoyment, illusion and interest.

Then—for those not in the great theatrical centres, Theatre Arts is their link with the stage—keeping alive the greatest traditions of the past—forecasting developments—criticising current plays—encouraging the Little Theatres in three hundred cities—reviewing the literature of the stage—and casting over all, with its fine illustrations, the glamour that is the Theatre. A record and a prophecy!

If you have never read Theatre Arts Monthly, send for a free sample copy today, using this coupon. Its small subscription price of four dollars a year is the best theatre investment you can make.

THEATRE ARTS MONTHLY

Theatre Arts Monthly, 119 West 57th St., N. Y. C. E-1
Name .....
Address .....
City ..... State .....

Again

THE MODERN QUARTERLY

the only revolutionary critical magazine in America, challenges you to surpass its Fall issue, just off press.

WILL THE FAMILY PASS?
by Ernest Boyd
a provocative topic dealt with by a provocative thinker.

THE AMERICAN LITERARY RADICALS
by V. F. Calverton
an analysis of the literary radicals of America and their listlessness.

DECADENCE AND THE POETRY OF ROBINSON JEFFERS
by Floyd Dell
a study in the effect of the shell-shock of the War upon poetry.

THE NEW UNIONISM
by Benjamin Stolberg
an attack upon the liberal in labor politics.

THE GENIUS OF POE
by Rt. Hon. J. M. Robertson
the most important study of Poe in the last decade.

Other articles by G. V. Plechanov, Arthur Calhoun, Walter Long, Hubert Harrison, Bertram Wolfe, Joseph Vanzler; poems by Genevieve Taggard and E. Merrill Root.

You cannot be up on modern American thought or the developments in radical philosophy and criticism without reading The Modern Quarterly. Subscribe now!

The Modern Quarterly
318-320 N. Exeter St., Baltimore, Md.
I enclose for one year's subscription to The Modern Quarterly $1.50
With The Nation 5.25
With The Newer Spirit, by V. F. Calverton ($2.50) 3.00
Single Copy ..... .50

Name .....
Address .....

the hypotenuse, but reduced to the concrete it has a way of eluding formulae.

"Sour Grapes" manages to engage and to maintain the attention of the spectator because it does just that. The persons involved are rather ordinary people, neither primitively tense enough to convert the situation in which they find themselves into violent tragedy nor relaxed enough to see it as a mere tiresome farce. When the discovery is made the chief regret of the husband and perhaps of the wife too is not that this thing has happened but that they do not feel it more keenly than they do. "I would rather," says he, "have lost you than discover thus that I have lost my love for you"; and so the most unassimilable fact with which they are faced is the fact that love, for no reason at all, loses its rapture. A small but admirable cast, headed by the accomplished Alice Brady, maintains perfectly the requisite tone, and the audience is continuously interested because here, in all probability, is its own emotional common denominator. Here are no heroics beyond its own potentialities and here, on the other hand, are none of the remote conventions of artificial comedy; but here, instead, is the triangle as it may at any time appear in any milieu where there is enough leisure to give fancy opportunity to develop but where the people are not yet wholly disillusioned.

Unfortunately the play is marred by a rather fantastic conclusion for which the general good sense of the author during the course of the piece had not prepared one. In a passage marked by a somewhat desperate intensity the husband and wife decide that if they will only each act out a rapture they do not feel that rapture will be recaptured. Here is the James-Lange theory of the emotions proclaimed with a vengeance and put into practice with a naivete which would leave its original proponents a little abashed. If it is merely our author's way of bringing down the curtain, a more conventional conclusion would have been less annoying; if, as is apparently the case, he takes it with high seriousness it is merely painfully silly.

"Potash and Perlmutter, Detectives" (Ritz Theater) is funny in a manner now sufficiently standardized to call for no comment, although Ludwig Satz, brought from the Yiddish theater to fill the role made famous by the late Barney Bernard, achieves moments—especially those marked by touches of pathos—which are above the level of the text. "If I Was Rich" (Mansfield Theater) is a vernacular comedy much after the manner of "The Fall Guy." It is constantly kept within the limits set for purely commercial comedy, but its dialogue is ingeniously human and it is, all in all, a genuinely diverting piece.

"Castles in the Air" (Selwyn Theater) is an elaborate musical comedy, long on sentiment and a little short on humor, but well produced and sung. It was a huge success in Chicago and will probably repeat that success here.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

LECTURES

RAND SCHOOL
7 E. 15th St.

Lecture Courses Beginning Next Week

ALGERNON LEE
A Socialist View of Human History
Tuesdays, 7 p. m., Sept. 21 to Jan. 18

JOSEPH M. OSMAN
The Psychology of Personality
Tuesdays, 8:30 p. m., Sept. 21 to Jan. 18

SCOTT NEARING
will give his last lecture in New York this year, when he speaks on
"THE CRISIS IN BRITISH IMPERIALISM"
at the
Community Church, 34th St. and Park Ave., N. Y. City
MONDAY EVENING, SEPT. 20, 1926, at 8:15 P. M. TICKETS 75c.

Viking Books

"A wonderful performance. I am humble before it."
—SHERWOOD ANDERSON

THE TIME OF MAN
by Elizabeth Madox Roberts

No prize of thousands of dollars is affixed to this novel; no motion picture rights have been sold or ever will be. Instead it comes to you as a masterpiece of contemporary American literature hailed by Sherwood Anderson, Edward Garnett, Harry Hansen, T. S. Stribling, Joseph Krutch, Robert Morss Lovett and all who have read it. You will find greatness and the thrill of its discovery in this story of Ellen Chesser's life. $2.50

THREE IMPORTANT BOOKS PUBLISHED SEPT. 18TH.

Biography for the Intelligent

MOHAMMED
by R. F. Dibble

A revealing biography of the great prophet of Allah, the statesman, the politician, the lover and the man. R. F. Dibble has written in an informal informative manner for those who would take their legends with a grain of salt and their heroes with a leavening of humanity. $3.00

An Important Discovery

THE TWO SISTERS
by H. E. Bates
Introduction by Edward Garnett

Edward Garnett, the first of the critics to discover Conrad, Galsworthy and W. H. Hudson, sponsors this first novel—a fine study of two women's lives from the pen of a twenty-one year old Englishman. $2.00

TRANSITION
by Edwin Muir

Readers of The Nation will welcome the publication in book form of Mr. Muir's brilliant essays on contemporary literature, many of which have already appeared in these pages. $2.00

30 Irving Place THE VIKING PRESS New York

International Relations Section

Abyssinia Appeals to the League

By J. M. KENWORTHY

IT was hoped that the setting up of the League of Nations would diminish the crimes committed in secret by diplomatists and Foreign Ministers on the plea of serving their own national interests. The Government of Abyssinia, the newest recruit to the League of Nations, is seeking the protection of the Leagu itself against two fellow-members, two supposedly civilized and advanced European Christian Powers, England and Italy to wit, on a charge of aggressive action against a poor, backward, but also Christian, independent state on the mainland of Africa. The British Foreign Minister, Sir Austen Chamberlain, is a man of spotless personal character. In his private dealings he could no more conspire with a neighbor to despoil a poor man than he could rob a church. Yet he has allowed himself to be led by the nose by his own permanent officials at the British Foreign Office and to be hypnotized by Signor Mussolini and the Italian diplomats in this Abyssinian affair. Let it be understood quite clearly that no British Government dare embark on a policy of aggression against Abyssinia by itself if only because British public opinion would not tolerate it. But because more water is needed for the river Nile to serve the purpose of irrigation in Egypt and the Sudan, and because our efforts at the capital of the State of Abyssinia to obtain the necessary concessions for the provision of this extra water had been blocked by the Italians in the old-fashioned manner, the British Foreign Office, headed by Sir Austen Chamberlain himself, has allowed itself to become allied with the most aggressive and imperialistic Power in Europe.

Ever since the eighties of last century the Italians have been seeking, in spite of numerous setbacks, to acquire a recognized protectorate over Abyssinia. Italian policy showed its hand clearly for the first time in 1889 when the Treaty of Uccialli was concluded with King Menelek of Abyssinia by which Italy believed herself to be the "Protector" of Abyssinia. This first step to invasion and annexation alarmed the Abyssinian people and the Italian claim was repudiated. Italy bided her time until 1896 when she invaded Abyssinia only to suffer a crushing military defeat at Adowah. In October of the same year a new treaty of peace was concluded between the Italians and the Abyssinians by which the independence of Abyssinia, or Ethiopia as it is officially styled, was recognized. This, however, was only a step backward in order to leap again. And whenever the forward school has been in the ascendent in the Italian Foreign Office Italy has attempted, sometimes in conjunction with France and England, to interfere with Abyssinian sovereignty.

The history of French relations with Abyssinia has been similar but less aggressive and, therefore, more successful. The French have not attempted military aggression, but, after many efforts, supported in the beginning of the present century by Great Britain and Italy, France obtained a concession to construct a railway line from her port of Jibuti in French Somaliland to the Abyssinian capital. But Britain and Italy received a quid pro quo from the French, of course without the consent of the Abyssinians. In spite of fighting one war against the Abyssinians, when we wisely resisted any attempts at annexation, the British have been solely concerned with the water supply for the Lower Nile.

In its upper reaches the Nile divides itself into two main branches, the Blue and the White Nile. The Blue Nile takes its source at Lake Tsana on Abyssinian soil and flows for some hundreds of miles through the mountain gorges of Abyssinia, afterward joining the White Nile in the Sudan. If the outlet of the Blue Nile from Lake Tsana could be dammed by a great barrage, extra water would be available for irrigation purposes in Egypt and the Sudan. The population of Egypt is growing and undoubtedly more water is required for agricultural purposes, while a great new source of excellent cotton is being exploited in the Sudan by British companies and corporations, and for the purpose of Sudanese cotton growing an almost unlimited supply of water can be utilized.

The French, therefore, so far as Abyssinia is concerned, have been contented by the building of their railway and the developing of a considerable trade with a country as large as France and Germany together and of great potential richness. England's one object is to obtain extra water. But the Italian program and ambitions are quite different. To the north of Abyssinia is the poor, barren Italian colony of Eritrea. To the southeast is another barren, almost desert area, under Italian rule, known as Italian Somaliland. Italy, never having abandoned her program of controlling and even annexing the major portion of Abyssinia, has evolved a plan of joining these two poor colonies by a great trunk railway line passing through Abyssinian territory. The Abyssinians will have none of this project. They regard Italian designs with deep suspicion. Abyssinia being an ancient Christian country converted to the faith at about the same time as Ireland, and before England, is not open to the activities of European religious missionaries. This one-time favored excuse for intervention, therefore, in the protection of missionaries, is not available where Abyssinia is concerned. But railway construction is another favorite weapon of imperialism. Railways need guards and, as in the case of the Russian Railway through Manchuria, control of the weaker power gradually passes into the hands of the owners and guardians of the railway.

But for the outbreak of the great war the economic partition of Abyssinia would have proceeded unchecked. But from 1914 to 1918 there was a hiatus. The great war having come to an end, the British renewed their pressure at the Abyssinian capital for the Lake Tsana irrigation concession. Italy offered her support to Great Britain in return for British assistance in obtaining her railway building concession. Linked up with this request, the Italians asked both the British and the French to recognize an exclusive Italian economic interest in the whole of the west of Abyssinia. This Italian offer was rejected at the time by the British Foreign Office as it was felt to be dangerous to allow any foreign Power to be placed in a position to obtain control of the head waters of the Blue Nile. Let it here be noted that the British objection was not to the Italian penetration into Abyssinia and the infringement of the sovereignty of an independent state but was based only on the ground of the water rights. In 1925

The Training School for Jewish Social Work offers a fifteen months' course of graduate study in Jewish Family Case Work, Child Care, Community Centers, Federations and Health Centers.

The Fall Quarter begins October 4, 1926.

For further information, address the Director.

THE TRAINING SCHOOL for
JEWISH SOCIAL WORK

(Initiated by the National Conference of Jewish Social Service)

210 WEST 91st STREET NEW YORK CITY

accept nothing but

Non Depressant
nor Habit Forming

In Convenient
Aluminum Boxes

At every drug store

Midol
for HEADACHE

GENERAL DRUG CO., - 94 N. Moore Street, New York

NOW IS THE MOST BEAUTIFUL TIME OF THE YEAR FOR A VACATION IN THE BERKSHIRE HILLS.

COME for a week-end, a week, or a month to Western View Farm. At no other time of the year is this spot so glorious, beautiful or so wholesomely invigorating as in September and October.
Splendid heating equipment in the house augmented by roaring log fires.
Booklet and illustrated literature on request

Edward G. Ohmer, Western View Farm
Telephone—New Milford 440 New Milford, Conn.

AURORA HEALTH FARM Mendham Road MORRISTOWN NEW JERSEY
(Not a sanitarium; not a boarding-house)

Beautiful country; elevation 700 ft.; only one hour from New York. Open all year. Suitable for those requiring diet, electro- and hydro-therapy. Ideal for rest and convalescence. Personal medical supervision. Homelike atmosphere. No bed-ridden, contagious or mental cases.

ROBERT SCHULMAN, M. D., Medical Director.
ADOLPH WEISENHOEFER, M. D., Associate Physician.
Telephone—MORRISTOWN 1 8 2 0.

VERY UNUSUAL TRAVEL BOOKS
among the latest publications

FIRE OF DESERT FOLK

DR. FERDINAND OSSENDOWSKI'S brilliant picture of Morrocco as it is to-day. He shows both the gorgeous oriental coloring of the external Morocco and the inner dom... religious, and political life just now internationally i... esting. By the author of "Beasts, Men and Gods."
Illustrated. $3.00

RAINBOW COUNTRIES of CENTRAL AMERICA

WALLACE THOMPSON'S account of Costa Rica, Nicaragua, Honduras, Salvador, and Guatemala, an accessible, interesting, yet neglected wonderland almost at our doors. Illustrated. $5.00

E. P. DUTTON & Co., 681 Fifth Ave., New York

LABOR TEMPLE SCHOOL 14th STREET 2nd AVENUE

Courses by WILL DURANT, 1926-1927

Course 7. Contemporary Literature.
Sundays at 5 p. m.

Sept. 26: The Book of the Month (September The Decline of the West)
Oct. 3: H. L. Mencken and the New Age
Oct. 10: Theodore Dreiser
Oct. 17: Eugene O'Neill
Oct. 24: Sinclair Lewis
Oct. 31: The Book of the Month
Nov. 7: Sherwood Anderson
Nov. 14: James Branch Cabell
Nov. 21: Carl Sandburg
Nov. 28: The Book of the Month
Dec. 5: Anatole France
Dec. 12: Romain Rolland
Dec. 19: Marcel Proust
Dec. 26: The Book of the Month
Jan. 2: Gerhardt Hauptmann
Jan. 9: Mikhail Artzibashev
Jan. 16: Anton Tchekov
Jan. 23: Knut Hamsun
Jan. 30: The Book of the Month
Feb. 6-Mar. 20: Absent on Tour
Mar. 27: The Play of the Season
Apr. 3: Thomas Hardy
Apr. 10: Joseph Conrad
Apr. 17: Bernard Shaw
Apr. 24: The Book of the Month
May 1: H. G. Wells
May 8: Havelock Ellis
May 15: George Moore
May 22: John Galsworthy
May 29: The Book of the Month
June 5: John Masefield
June 12: James Joyce
June 19: D. H. Lawrence
June 26: The Play of the Season

Sg. adm. 25c.; course tickets $5.00. Send for Fall Term Announcement.

Course 8. Contemporary Psychology.
Wednesdays at 8:30 p. m.

Sept. 22: The Status of Psychoanalysis
Sept. 29: Psychoanalysis in America
Oct. 6: Is Education a Fad?
Oct. 13: Experimental Psychology
Oct. 20: The Evolution of Mind
Oct. 27: Our Nerves
Nov. 3: Brain and Mind
Nov. 10: Instinct and Emotion
Nov. 17: Instinct and Property
Nov. 24: Instinct and War
Dec. 1: The Psychology of Laughter and Play
Dec. 8: Social Psychology
Dec. 15: Crowd Psychology
Dec. 22: The Mechanisms of Social Control
Dec. 29: The Nature of Love
Jan. 5: The Psychology of Marriage
Jan. 12: An Analysis of Character
Jan. 19: An Analysis of Intellect
Jan. 26: The Training of the Child
Feb. 2: The Training of the Mind
Mar. 23: DEBATE to be announced
Mar. 30: Psychological Differences of the Sexes
Apr. 6: Psychological Differences of Races and Peoples
Apr. 13: The Industrial Applications of Psychology
Apr. 20: The Commercial Applications of Psychology
Apr. 27: The Mind of the Criminal
May 4: The Nature of Insanity
May 11: The Nature of Genius
May 18: The Psychology of Conservatism
May 25: The Psychology of Radicalism
June 1: The Psychology of Liberalism
June 8: The Psychology of Religion
June 15: The Psychology of Art
June 22: Psychology and Literature

PREPARE FOR WINTER NOW!

You can ensure yourself one evening's pleasant reading a week during the coming winter by devoting it to

The Manchester Guardian
WEEKLY

You will like its freshness of viewpoint coupled with the accuracy of its facts.

It is a store-house of information on international politics, European trends of thought, current English literature, and cultural developments the world over.

The intellectually inclined in more than sixty countries depend on The Manchester Guardian Weekly to keep them furnished with reliable information on all important world happenings and on new trends of thought in various countries.

MAIL THIS COUPON

To The Manchester Guardian Weekly,
220 West 42nd Street,
New York City.

I enclose three dollars for a year's subscription to THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN WEEKLY, to be mailed to me direct from Manchester, England.

Name .....

Address .....

the negotiations between the Italians and the British were resumed. The bargaining went on in secret and the Abyssinian Government was not consulted at all. But in the meantime the French had become thoroughly alarmed, and in 1923 they sponsored Abyssinia's application for membership in the League of Nations. This application was resisted, secretly of course, by the British and Italian governments. But they dare not come out into the open and Abyssinia was admitted to full membership.

Her joining of the League of Nations made not a tittle of difference to Italian policy. Nor did it make any apparent difference in British policy toward Abyssinia. Instead of openly applying for leave to barrage Lake Tsana and agreeing to pay a suitable royalty to the Abyssinian Government, the British Foreign Office attempted to obtain its water-rights by allying itself with the Italian demands.

This was the prime blunder. By December, 1925, the British and Italian governments were in accord. Italy undertook not to interfere in any way with the Nile water; and England not only undertook to support the Italian demand for leave to construct the railway but recognized the exclusive economic dominance of Italy in the west of Abyssinia. Not till June of the present year was the unfortunate Abyssinian Government apprized of this secret agreement. The response of that Government was immediate. A note of protest was dispatched at once to the Secretariat of the League of Nations and the matter has now to be thrashed out before the Council.

And where has this latest example of secret diplomacy led? If Italy wishes to construct her railway she will have to fight her way into the country. Whatever the award of the Council of the League of Nations, the Abyssinians are thoroughly alarmed and will fight to the last before giving in. They are well armed, the country is extremely difficult, the northern and western portions being mountainous, and the inhabitants make good soldiers. A victorious war with Abyssinia, wiping out the memory of Adowah, might suit the Fascist Government of Italy, but the British people will never permit a pound to be spent or a British soldier to be killed in any such unworthy enterprise.

As for the perfectly honest desire of the British to obtain extra water for the Sudan and Egypt, by omitting to bargain for the necessary rights in a straightforward manner we have put back the possibility of obtaining this extra water indefinitely. Once more secret diplomacy has overreached itself. It would not have been difficult to come to an agreement with the Abyssinian Government by fair and open methods. We have now placed formidable obstacles in our way. If Egypt requires the extra water the British Government must retrace its steps, renounce the agreement with Italy, and start over again.* The only alternative is to abandon the attempt to obtain the extra water from the Blue Nile and to carry out similar irrigation schemes on the White Nile. The White Nile lies entirely in British-controlled territory, and many engineers consider it superior to the Blue Nile for irrigation purposes.

*A note of protest sent to the Secretariat of the League by the Abyssinian Government and forwarded to Italy and England by the League has elicited from both governments earnestly denying any intention to exert coercive pressure on Abyssinia. The Italian note, summarized in the Manchester Guardian for August 14, protests that the agreement constitutes "solely an arrangement between the Italian and British governments with a view to coordinating certain of their economic interests, and that any such arrangement is subject to the decision of the Abyssinian Government and to the recognition by the latter that these interests harmonize with those of Abyssinia and promote civil and economic development."—The Editor THE NATION.

Contributors to This Issue

THOMAS O'CONNOR is a Boston newspaper man who became so much interested in the Sacco-Vanzetti case that he obtained a leave of absence early last summer and has devoted his time since to investigations in behalf of the counsel for the defense.

ARTHUR WARNER, an associate editor of The Nation, wrote the article Sacco-Vanzetti—A Reasonable Doubt in the issue of September 28, 1921.

ROBERT W. DUNN is one of the directors of the American Civil Liberties Union.

PEARL S. BUCK comes of an old missionary family, and knows both the old and the new China. Her husband teaches agricultural economics at the University of Nanking.

JOHN NICHOLAS BEFFEL has studied words and idioms in several special fields—in the circus, among thieves, among migratory workers.

THE HONORABLE J. M. KENWORTHY is a lieutenant commander, retired, in the British navy and since 1919 has been a Liberal member of Parliament from Central Hull.

S. FOSTER DAMON is the author of "William Blake."

WILLIAM MACDONALD, formerly associate editor of The Nation, lectures on American history at Yale University.

B. H. HAGGIN is a teacher of music who writes on musical subjects for various publications.

DREW BOND is a writer on financial subjects.

PIERRE LOVING is an art critic who frequently contributes to The Nation and other periodicals.

Glenn Frank

on

Charles W. Eliot

in Next Week's Nation

Your Fall Problems

If you want to rent a house or an apartment or if you have one to rent—or sell, advertise in the classified section of The Nation, read by honest landlords and desirable tenants. Rates on application. Special three-time rate. Dept. F. P., The Nation.

THINKING An Introduction to its HISTORY AND SCIENCE

By FRED CASEY

THIS is the first authorized American edition of a text-book in logic, based on the work of Joseph Dietzgen, which has been exceedingly popular in England. Thinking has for thousands of years been a theological or metaphysical mystery. This book shows how the methods of modern science can be applied to it, and how the process of thinking can thus be improved. Cloth, $1.25 postpaid. We also publish Dietzgen's PHILOSOPHICAL Essays and his POSITIVE OUTCOME OF PHILOSOPHY, each $1.50 postpaid.

CHARLES H. KERR & COMPANY

347 East Ohio Street, Chicago

When writing to advertisers, please mention The Nation

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXIII NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 29, 1926 No. 3195

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS
EDITORIALS
Spokesman, What of the Night?
The Greatest Newspaper in the World
The House on the Prairie
College or Country Club?
THE BIRTH OF A NEW IDEA. By Hendrik van Loon
GEORGE WASHINGTON: THE IMAGE AND THE MAN. By W. E. Woodward
ELIOT: ICONOCLAST AND BUILDER. By Glenn Frank
AT A WORKERS' VACATION CAMP. By Michael Gold
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter
CORRESPONDENCE
BOOKS AND PLAYS:
Dream of the Corn. By Hal Saunders White
Sleight of Hand. By Mortimer J. Adler
The New Asceticism. By Joseph Wood Krutch
Comparative Superstition. By Woodbridge Riley
A Catholic Vicar of Bray. By James Fuchs
Life and Times. By Raymond Weaver
Books in Brief
Drama: Miss Rambeau Enjoys Herself. By Joseph Wood Krutch
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
France in Algeria and Tunisia. By Elizabeth Knowlton
"That Film"

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors
LEWIS S. GANNETT
ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Literary Editor
MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: No. 38 South Dearborn Street. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London W. C. 1, England.

FLORIDA, which has been much in the news for several years, is again on the first pages of the newspapers. First there was the boom, fantastic and almost incredible in some of its aspects; then there was the collapse, tragic for those involved, but not altogether displeasing to a good many others; now there is the hurricane, ferocious in its destruction of life and property, which, not content with its ruin in Florida, swept on westward through Alabama and Mississippi. Whatever opinions citizens of other States may have had of the Florida boom and its sequel, there will be nothing but profound sympathy for the victims of the present disaster, and relief will be quick and generous. Humanity contemplates with a certain self-protecting indifference the fall which follows pride, but when nature strikes us in its dumb, uncontrollable way it unites us as nothing else can in common awe and sorrow. And Florida, of course, will weather the hurricane just as she will the real-estate boom and deflation, as San Francisco did her earthquake and fire. Men are as relentless and unstopable as nature itself.

THE DECADENT FRENCH—where are they? Suzanne swept the women's tennis courts, but Suzanne was Suzanne, superb, unique, beyond frontiers. Georges Michel, however, who plowed across the cold September Channel ahead of British, German, and American records and crawled up onto the British shore shouting "J'ai battu l'Allemand!" with one breath and "Whiskey!" with the next—he was indisputably a product of Gaul. And now the men tennis stars—Lacoste, Cochet, Borotra, and Brugnon—three of whom mowed down all competitors and entered the semi-finals of our national tennis tournament; one of whom, Borotra, downed Johnston and Vincent Richards on successive days and then lost the silver cup to his teammate Lacoste, who had beaten Tilden's conqueror—what are they if not a product of that exhausted post-war France which, with its low birth-rate, its diet of frogs and snails, and its wild, wild ways, was doomed forever? Here, as much as at Verdun, is the spirit of France—a France that takes sport with a laugh, and wins.

WHAT IS ATTORNEY GENERAL SARGENT going to do about Sacco and Vanzetti? The completion of the hearing for a new trial confirms the story of the case presented by The Nation last week in which responsibility for the conviction of two probably innocent men was placed primarily upon the federal Department of Justice. William G. Thompson, counsel for the condemned men, submitted to Judge Webster Thayer affidavits from two former agents of the Department of Justice, Lawrence Letherman and Fred J. Weyand, that the machinery of the federal government had been used to convict Sacco and Vanzetti of murder although it was the opinion of those working on the case that the two Italians were not guilty of the crime charged. The real crime of the two men, in the eyes of the Department of Justice, was that they were aliens and radicals. Because they could not be deported "it was," Letherman swore, "the opinion of the Department of Justice agents here [in Boston] that a conviction of Sacco and Vanzetti for murder would be one way of disposing of them." Letherman added that "the letters and evidence on file in the Boston office would throw a great deal of light on the preparation of the case." A. Mitchell Palmer and not the present Attorney General was responsible for the policy of the Department of Justice in 1920, but unless Mr. Sargent does his best to undo the wrong he makes himself an accomplice in the effort to send two probably innocent men to the electric chair. As Mr. Thompson said: "The government that values secrets more than it values the lives of citizens has become a tyranny."

MR. THOMPSON'S DEMAND for a new trial seems to us impregnable. Dudley P. Ranney, retained by the State of Massachusetts to oppose the application, made a weak defense of the conduct of the prosecution in the case, failing wholly to meet the great issues involved. He made no effort to controvert the charges in the affidavits of Weyand and Letherman. On the contrary he defended the conduct of the federal government and fell back on the lame argument that in revealing the facts Weyand and Letherman had been guilty of a breach of loyalty. Nor can one restrain impatience at finding Mr. Ranney relying on such technicalities in opposing a new trial as that the defense had been guilty of undue delay in making the motion. The fact is that the case against Sacco and Vanzetti is now of no importance compared with the case against the courts of Massachusetts. Mr. Thompson did not exaggerate when he said:

> Do you think that that part of the evidence which tells of the relations between the federal officials in Boston and the prosecution is of such a character that the honor of the Commonwealth can be supported if there is no new trial in this case? . . .
>
> Think what is going to be said about it: The man who does not believe in private property in America is going to be killed whether he commits murder or not! These words are going to ring around the world.

THE ROUT OF THE KLAN in Colorado surprised its most sanguine enemies. Senator Rice W. Means, supported by his fellow-Senator, L. C. Phipps, chairman of the Republican National Senatorial Committee, expected renomination; he lost by 16,000 votes. The Klan candidate for the Republican nomination for Governor was also badly defeated by former Governor O. H. Shoup; and the "radical millionaire," former Governor William E. Sweet, overwhelmed the candidate supported by the Klan and [illegible] for the Democratic nomination for Senator. Today, Colorado is the home of the Klan; the Wizard's office was reckoned as important as the Governor's by those who sought official favors. Only in Indiana did its rule seem firmer. And Colorado has turned against it. This is good news, and it disturbs the regulars in both old parties. But Mr. Means's victor, Charles W. Waterman, has not, as counsel of President Coolidge's Oil Conservation Board, shown insurgent tendencies. Colorado is another evidence of the vigor of local revolts. The State was tired of Klan domination; but those who read a national meaning into the returns fool themselves. The only other primary surprises of last week were the signs of returning Dry strength in the East. Several New York Republican constituencies defeated Wadsworth Wets; and although John Philips Hill, Maryland's histrionic Wet, swept Baltimore, the rural districts assured the renomination of Senator Weller, who is relatively Dry.

CANADA'S ELECTION [illegible] toward the Liberals. The last two elections had been indecisive; even with Progressive support Mackenzie King's majority in the last Parliament was unstable, and when Governor Byng refused an election and called in the Conservative leader, Mr. Meighen could win a majority only [illegible] for his own policies. In the new House the Liberals will have 119 seats, the Conservatives [illegible] the much-divided Progressives 19; Labor holds 3 seats and the Alberta United Farmers their 11. This, then, marks a loss of 25 seats for the Conservatives, chiefly in Western Ontario. The Conservatives won only one prairie seat. But the phalanx of French-Canadian Liberals from Quebec are of very different stuff from the American-minded Liberals of the West. Quebec Liberals are protectionist; the Western farmers are as suspicious of tariffs as their American colleagues south of the frontier. The customs scandals which forced Mr. King's resignation in June faded during the campaign, as the oil scandals faded in our own Presidential campaign, largely because the Liberals were able to find similar ones on the Conservative scutcheon to match their own stains. The constitutional issue played a larger role; the Liberals attacked the Governor General's intervention in domestic politics (see Mr. de Brisay's article in The Nation for September 3) and the Conservatives retorted by accusing the Liberals of being annexationists in disguise. The Liberal gains indicate that Canada will continue along the path of growing independence which her economic interests so plainly mark out for her.

THE BRITISH COAL STRIKE is now in its twentieth week, and it is further from a solution than it was on the first day. The miners have offered to negotiate—but they will not discuss wages, hours, or the substitution of district for national agreements; the owners prefer not to discuss anything, but especially not wages or hours or the substitution of national for district agreements. The owners claim that the men are returning to work in droves, that plenty of coal is being mined, that plenty of coal is being imported, that nobody needs coal anyway, that the country is getting along very well without the miners, and that the miners are on the point of capitulating to every one of the owners' demands. Mr. Cook insists that only 2 per cent of the miners have returned to work; that in the face of grinding hunger and the approach of winter the men are as grimly determined as ever to make this a fight to the finish. Over all this intransigence the Government clucks like a frightened hen. Mr. Baldwin makes proposals; in his absence Mr. Churchill makes proposals. These proposals all begin with the plea to both sides to "get around a table again and discuss matters"; they have nothing to say about reorganization of the industry. Discussion; words; gestures—that is all the Government has to suggest. While the talk flows, miners' children starve; if their fathers were to go back to work on the old wage they would starve only a little less painfully.

POLAND WON [illegible] seat on the League Council which was the price of her assent to Germany's election as a permanent member of the Council. The other nations elected were China, Colombia, Salvador, Chile, Holland, Rumania, Czecho-Slovakia, and Belgium. With all her satellites on the Council France is thus stronger at Geneva than ever before. Meanwhile, as an episode in the new reconciliation, the French and German foreign ministers evaded the newspapermen and had a long, comfortable, private pow-wow. All sorts of hints of vast peace plans have since been dropped. Germany, it appears, is ready to market some billion dollars' worth of Dawes railway bonds, 52 per cent of which would go to France, if France will agree to evacuate the Saar, end military control of the Rhineland, and consent to return Eupen and Malmedy. This may well be the outcome of the mysterious travels of Messrs. Mellon, Morgan, Strong, and Norman, for of course the bonds can be sold only through British and American banks. The plan would release immediate credit for France; and the new industrial energy stimulated by evacuation of the Rhineland might compensate for the extra burden laid on Germany. There, of course, is the crux of the matter: Germany is today prosperous at the top, but how much more grinding can her workers stand?

WITH ADMIRABLE RESTRAINT the French have refused to be stampeded by Mussolini's threats and blustering against them. "The land of France, for whose safety some of our 500,000 war dead fell, has been for years the most hospitable land for all those hatching in their perfidious hearts hatred against Italy"; this is the gist of "orders" issued to the Fascist Party by the incorrigible head of Italy's Government. He is like a small boy calling his neighbors names, sticking out his tongue at them over the back fence. If his neighbors have so far gone quietly about their business, ignoring these outbursts as the outbursts of bad boys ought to be ignored, there is no reason to suppose that this moderation will last forever. The small boy, in time, receives a proper tanning; if his parents are wise, they do the chastising themselves without waiting for the neighbors. But there is no indication that Italy is wise. Instead Mussolini is permitted to go his way. The Capital Punishment Bill is his latest contribution to good government; Italy earned the approbation of intelligent persons when capital punishment was abolished. Mussolini is restoring it—for attempting the life of the King or the head of the government, for revolt against the state, for grave personal crimes—and for those persons conspiring against the welfare of the country. This last covers a multitude of sins, but it may be summed up in one word: for anti-Fascists.

JESSE SMITH, the omnipotent, omniscient Jesse Smith, is again the pivot on which the trial of Harry M. Daugherty for fraudulent conspiracy turns. Never was a suicide more ill-timed than that of Jesse Smith. He had the run of the Department of Justice; he hired and fired without consulting with anybody; he was the god from the machine operating only on an expense account; he lived in the same house with the Attorney General—officials of the Department of Justice have testified to all of these things; and then at the critical moment, when he might have testified, when his word might have saved or damned his friend, he put himself beyond the reach of cross-examination. District Attorney Buckner is attempting, in the present trial of Mr. Daugherty and Colonel Miller, to prove that Daugherty and Jesse Smith came to New York while the claim of the Swiss Metal Company for securities worth $7,000,000 was at stake; he has tried to prove that $25,000 of the retainer of $50,000 paid by Richard Merton to John T. King went as a check to Jesse Smith, that Merton was introduced by King not only to Colonel Miller, Alien Property Custodian, but to Jesse Smith, confidant of the Attorney General. Mr. Buckner also has presented testimony to show that Colonel Miller, while traveling in Pennsylvania, was advised by his secretary of the progress being made by the Swiss claim—and by that claim alone; and finally that Mr. Merton's papers were passed on from the Alien Property Custodian's office to the Attorney General for approval and the claim was settled in three days—surely a record for government settlement of anything!

PRESIDENT COOLIDGE and Secretary Hoover have been filling the papers with their tender concern for the safety and well-being of our rubber industry. The President's attitude was announced after a visit to his summer camp by Harvey Firestone, who told him of the advantages to be derived from large-scale exploitation of Philippine lands for rubber-growing. Mr. Firestone, one gathered, was struggling to make ends meet and without the Philippine rubber land he might go under. Now, as a matter of fact, the net profits of the Firestone Tire and Rubber Company for its last fiscal year were more than a million dollars a month. In 1923 its net was a little more than $6,000,000; in 1925 it was $12,800,000. The B. F. Goodrich Company also showed net profits last year well above a million a month. The Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company had net profits for the year of thirteen and a half millions, while the United States Rubber Company topped the list with the eye-filling net of $17,810,000. It is on behalf of such puny and struggling enterprises that Mr. Hoover raises his whine about foreign monopolies against the United States, arch-monopolist. In the last three years the profits of the rubber-manufacturing industry in this country have doubled. Must Filipinos be deprived of their promised freedom in order to fatten this giant further?

WE NOTE WITH PLEASURE that the councils of the American Legion are no longer unanimous in regard to the proposed reunion in Paris. The reason given by the opponents of the plan—French disapprove [illegible] Americans—is perhaps not of the best, but anything which will prevent the descent of a mob of American revelers upon the already long-suffering Parisians is good enough for the purpose. We do not mean to assert that the members of the Legion are worse than the members of any other miscellaneous group. Their convention will doubtless be no more objectionable than a convention of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks or the United Brotherhood of Underwear Salesmen, but there is no particular reason why this sort of thing—annoying enough to us, who are used to it—should be inflicted upon the French, who are already convinced that Americans are by nature as raucous, rowdy, and absurd as the jollifications which accompany our popular conventions are. If the Legion goes to Paris it will go with a whoop. Its members, off for a holiday and full of the vulgar American idea that Paris is the place where one may do all the things one may not do at home, will be as welcome there as a victorious football team would be at a League of Nations convention at Geneva. Parisians will not be flattered even by the things which are intended as compliments, and if there is one left who still refuses to believe that all Americans are noisy vulgarians a Legion convention will convert him.

THE BODY OF GEORGE VLIDO, a king of the gipsies, has been buried at Trenton, New Jersey, in much the same way that any Christian body would be buried. But last week it lay in state as Romany clay should lie—in a mahogany coffin in a royal tent in a vacant lot somewhere along Rockaway Avenue, Brooklyn. There was nothing unfitting about a vacant lot. Gipsies traditionally die along country lanes, and, if they are kings, wait in pleasant fields to be put away. These days, however, gipsies—in America at any rate—grow fond of populous cities; their lanes are avenues, and their groves are blocks of brick. Their landscape is lined with chimneys, their air is full of smoke. And still their way is their own. Closed within an immemorial world they still walk on—or drive in Fords—through an alien universe the extent and character of which they neither know nor care to learn. The rows of flats and small shops which ran around this vacant lot in Brooklyn might just as well have been rows of trees; the curious persons who crowded up to the tent, and were resented, might just as well have been curious bipeds come out of the forest to gaze in wonder at the first men. The trip to Trenton was through a human landscape, but one that may still have seemed wholly impersonal to those who conducted the body of King George. King George is dead, and his son George will take his place. Who in America knows the age of this line? Who can count back to the first George? Who can recite the new one's royal duties? No man knows, and no stone either.

Spokesman, What of the Night?

ONE MILLION TWO HUNDRED AND NINE THOUSAND SEVEN HUNDRED AND THIRTY-NINE words, a proud telegraph company announced on September 5, had been sent to the newspapers from the President's Adirondack camp. They told what the President was understood to believe, what "official circles" reported, and, most particularly, what the "Presidential spokesman" said the President believed. The sophisticated world knows that the Presidential Spokesman is the President himself. He calls the correspondents into conference and answers their questions. They must not quote him, but they may paraphrase his remarks. Sometimes he mumbles and they cannot hear him well; they have to do the best they can. There was a time when a stenographic record of the sessions was kept. But one day the Spokesman's statements as quoted in the newspapers made trouble; President Coolidge denied that he had said anything of the sort; the indignant correspondents proved by the stenogram that they had cited accurately—and the President, to save his face in future, ordered that no record be kept. And now, day after day, week after week, the President launches millions of words of trial balloons, and the correspondents bear the burden. If the venture goes well, it was accurately reported; if not, the statement was "unauthorized," "inaccurate," "due to faulty reporting." The system is an insult to public intelligence and to the newspaper profession.

A truly independent press would as a body refuse its continued collaboration in this kind of backstairs Presidential oratory; an alert public would demand that the President say what he had to say openly. Sometimes one cannot tell whether the President's ideas wander over the landscape to such an extent that no man could make his words consistent with one another or the correspondents are guilty of incredibly bad reporting. Recently a band of American tourists shepherded by Sherwood Eddy, late of the Y. M. C. A., returning from Moscow were reported to believe "that this country should recognize the Russian Government." The newspapers at once made of the tourists a "commission" and of their first casual utterance a "report." The wires hummed, the correspondents foregathered, and—presumably—the Spokesman spoke. With the following results—all in one day:

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

PAUL SMITH'S, N. Y., Sept. 14.—Indications were given today at the summer White House that the Washington Government would give no special attention to the report of the Sherwood Eddy commission favoring recognition of the Soviet Government. . . . President Coolidge understands, it was said, that the commission . . . has no more, if as much, information on conditions there as has the State Department. There was no indication that the position of the President has changed.

THE UNITED PRESS

PAUL SMITH'S, N. Y., Sept. 14.—Whenever Russia is willing to honor the loans made by the United States to the Kerensky Government the way will be quickly opened for negotiations looking to recognition by this Government. This is the reaction here to the report of the unofficial commission headed by Sherwood Eddy of the Y. M. C. A. . . . The American position toward Soviet Russia has been widely misunderstood. Originally . . . there was objection to the Soviet form of proletarian dictatorship, in addition to the debt question. . . . But gradually the emphasis shifted from the attack on the Soviet form of government to the question of debt repudiation. Internally the Soviet Government is solidly intrenched, according to information here. This Government, however, will not yield in its insistence that the debts be honored, although liberal terms of payment would be granted. . . . Coolidge has been more sympathetic to Borah's position on this question than is generally known.

THE NEW YORK TIMES

PAUL SMITH'S, N. Y., Sept. 13.—The Administration's attitude toward the recognition of Russia has not been modified as a result of the report of the commission headed by Dr. Sherwood Eddy. . . . President Coolidge stated his attitude on Russia in a conference with newspapermen late in 1923. . . . These statements are just as true today as when they were uttered, according to officials here. . . . It was also asserted that American business men who have had big enterprises in Russia are opposed to recognition of Russia until the latter's form of government changes. . . . They do not want to do business with Russia directly while the Soviet system exists.

THE UNIVERSAL SERVICE

PAUL SMITH'S, N. Y., Sept. 13.—A gentler tone toward Russia in the future by the Coolidge Administration was seen today as one of the results of the Sherwood Eddy commission's recommendation of recognition. . . . President Coolidge, having inherited the Hughes policy of alarm, has for two years watched developments there with growing interest. . . . Russia is today doing vastly more business with the United States than under the pre-war regime of the czars. . . . National business leaders . . . complained to the State Department that the absence of even trade relations with Russia has added tremendously to the cost of doing business. . . . They complained that Germany and England were acquiring profitable business which otherwise would fall to the United States.

THE NEW YORK WORLD

WHITE PINE CAMP, N. Y., Sept. 13.—President Coolidge is expected to review his position on recognition of Russia as a result of findings by the Sherwood Eddy commission. . . . It is not believed the report will lead to any immediate change in policy, although it has been felt for some time that the President was moving in the direction of recognition.

THE NEW YORK EVENING POST

PAUL SMITH'S, N. Y., Sept. 14.—Mr. Coolidge has not yet received the report of the Sherwood Eddy commission. . . . The Administration is interested in the findings of such a representative and able body of men . . . but Mr. Coolidge's position . . . has not changed. . . . The Eddy report may result in a softer attitude toward Russia, although the State Department still stands pat on the Hughes principles.

There you have it—clear as mud. The President is opposed to recognition; he is moving toward recognition. The report will have no effect; it will cause the President to review his position. The President's position was clearly stated three years ago; it is widely misunderstood. It is unchanged, and it has considerably changed. The President supports the Hughes policy; he is more sympathetic to Borah's position. The President will pay no attention to the Eddy report because the State Department knows it all; the Administration is interested in the findings of such representative and able men. American business men are opposed to recognition and refuse to trade directly with Soviet Russia; American trade with Soviet Russia has grown enormously and national business leaders complain that non-recognition cuts into their profits. The State Department stands pat on Hughes's principles; the policy has shifted since the days of Hughes. The report will have no result because the Administration will not yield; the report may result in a softer attitude and a gentler tone, a mere nod from Moscow may quickly bring negotiations. . . . Well, anyhow, the President has not seen the report.

And so it goes. The identity of the Spokesman, whether he be "Mr. Paul Smith" or the Man in the Iron Mask, is unimportant. What did he say?

The Greatest Newspaper in the World

THE New York Times has been celebrating its seventy-fifth birthday, and it has a right to be proud, for it has become, under Adolph S. Ochs, the greatest *news*paper in the world. The criticism which The Nation and others have heaped upon it is in a measure a tribute, for it has made itself the standard by which news-gathering is judged. As a record of current history it might be but it is not surpassed. There are newspapers in Japan and France and Great Britain, and tabloids in America, with twice or three times its circulation, but these journals of vast distribution are today amusement-sheets rather than chronicles of the world, and in its chosen field the New York Times has risen steadily to the top. The London Times, which was once indispensable to men who watched history boiling in far-off corners of the earth, has fallen sadly; the Manchester Guardian, a greater force as a maker of world opinion, can hardly compete with the New York Times's world-wide telegraphic news service; and no other American newspaper begins to rival it in amount or quality of daily news. It "covers" the world.

For this preeminence Mr. Ochs, whose genius has also given it its present financial impregnability, is largely responsible. He has hired able executives and given them responsibility. He has made his motto "All the news that's fit to print," and within his lights he has usually lived up to it. But this makes the Times something outside the great tradition of journalism. Mr. Ochs believes in journalistic impersonality; he features no names; his idea of a good book review seems to be a hack summary which expresses no opinion and gives no judgment upon an author's impartiality or success. A good editorial, by the same test, is rather a summary of the background of the daily news than a penetrating analysis or a call to action. The Times, by its own theory, does not attempt to mold history; it pleads no cause and wages no war; it simply reports. The result is that although able men have collaborated in it the Times's editorial page is one of the dullest and most wabbling in America. Dull, because it never knows the passion of an ideal; wabbling, because after a period of impartiality any crisis is sure to find it upon the side of the possessing classes. When the coal strike of 1925 was in the offing the Times printed as editorials excellent analyses of the chaos which made industrial conflict inevitable; when the strike arrived, it forgot its own wisdom and poured denunciation upon the rulers alone. In the 1919 steel strike it was one of the most impassioned Red-hunters; during the war its unfairness to dissenters of every description was notorious. Mr. Ochs's pledge to "invite intelligent discussion from all shades of opinion" went by the board. In any crisis of world moment it can be counted upon to abandon neutrality and expose itself as at heart an organ of property. A paper has a right to be impersonal and conservative, but not to claim impartiality at the same time.

Nor does the Times always reach its goal of impartiality in its news columns. Again and again its dispatches from Paris, Berlin, and Geneva have plainly been molded by editorial policy—sometimes only its policy of printing several accounts of the same events has saved it from the mistakes into which its zealous correspondents would have carried it. Its Russian news was for years a paragon of misinformation, a hodgepodge of rumors from all the refugee capitals of Europe and Asia. That has, in response to criticism, been corrected—today, with Walter Duranty as its Moscow correspondent, the Times has the most reliable Russian news printed in any American daily paper. And in China, which is today, perhaps, the world's chief source of fantastic fables, it has in Thomas F. Millard a singularly penetrating recorder of national moods. Its Philippine news is still a reflection of the mood of the small American community in Manila, and at home the Times seldom of its own initiative discovers that there is a labor side of a strike, although it is readier than other papers to print press releases sent to it by minority or opposition groups.

It is encouraging that such a paper as the Times has forged steadily ahead at the same time that the tabloids are discovering new depths of emotional sensationalism. But just as the "clean" character of its news gives perhaps a false picture of the world in 1926 so its "impartial" political and economic news is distorted. It reflects the rule of America by Big Business, accurately, uncritically, unpenetratingly. There is still a place in journalism for something more.

The House on the Prairie

AMY LOWELL, rather desperately defending her aristocratic contentment with the traditions and establishments of the East, once spoke to this effect: "I, too, have traveled through the Middle West. I have read the novels and poems which come out of Chicago and the flat farms along the Mississippi Valley. I have tried to like that country. And I am forced to declare it hideous. The little towns I saw from the train depressed me terribly, they were so disordered and dull; in one of those meaningless farmhouses I am sure I could never take a breath, let alone compose a line." The bard of Brookline was perhaps the last person in the world to speak with authority upon the inner qualities of Edgar Lee Masters's land, or George Ade's, or Theodore Dreiser's, or Carl Sandburg's, or Vachel Lindsay's, or Willa Cather's, or Sherwood Anderson's. Yet none of her hearers could deny that her taste in externals was good; none but was forced to admit that something out there required defending.

The most affectionate son of the Middle West, returning by motor or train from, say, the pleasant places of

New England, confesses to a bit of disappointment as he surveys the dwellings of his favorite folk in field and village. The larger towns and the cities are much like others in the modern world. Tall, square hotels rise in standard elegance from the edges of asphalt streets, and suburban avenues are lined with stucco, brick, or clapboard creations which in many cases are respectable even if they are not by any definition original. But out in the country our returning son rubs his eyes. He had not remembered that most of the houses there looked too small for their purposes, as now indeed they do. He had supposed, too, that they were built of sufficiently good material, like the hearts of his countrymen. Now he sees that the material was in many cases sadly skimped. The weatherboarding is thin, the porches frail; and the whole structure has a lamentably temporary air. The paint—too seldom white—never got its last and finishing coat; its color, never pleasing, has grown lusterless and drab. As to design, that is almost invariably absent. The façade, the gables, the windows and doors do not complement one another as expressions of an idea; nor is there an idea in any one of these things by itself. The lines are without significance. Dormers are where no dormers should be; a tall, thin gable rises out of a low mass; porches detach themselves from eaves and stand weakly, awkwardly; even when the controlling line is good the eye is likely to be disturbed by a cheap molding or other ornament that runs at cross purposes with the first idea; and the windows are pretty sure to stare blankly at the speeding train. The farm buildings, having all level space in which to dispose themselves, are uninterestingly grouped. Perhaps no trees have been planted. There are trees in the little towns, yet even they do not correct an impression of sprawling—an impression that the village only litters an otherwise ordered landscape.

The returning son is not disappointed in the landscape. There is not only grandeur but charm in flatness; and, of course, the flatness is nowhere unrelieved. Knolls rise here and there; streams wind slowly between rows of oaks and willows; groves of original hardwood, trimmed for cattle and sheep, cast heavy shadows on forty-acre fields of corn and grass. The prairies have always been beautiful, and in spite of what man can do they must remain so. Thus far, however, man has done little to improve them or to set them off. His houses do not fit in; his plantations have not been for the benefit of the eye. The returning son remembers New England, where the hills dominate the roofs and the roofs command the meadows; Maryland and Pennsylvania, where the habitations of farmers, a little stiffer and erecter, have something to say to the fences and trees; England, where man has literally created a landscape of his own; France, Spain, and Italy, where houses seem to grow out of plains and mountains as naturally as forests or wild flowers do. He remembers all these—letting his mind go out to Egypt with its white angles under the sun and to Arabia with its tents like shadows on the sand—and he wishes that his Middle West had not been filled so fast with people who had to have some kind of house, however cheap; that the first generation of builders out there had not practiced in the sickliest period American architecture has thus far known; that the frontier touch were gone; that the owners of Illinois or Indiana land still lived upon it and planned to make it look as if someone with pride lived there. He may not know the reason for his discontent; but he is discontented. How long, he wonders, will it be until the valley lives in style? An American style, of course, and a new one; but one about which books can be written, and one that there will be no doubt or shame about.

College or Country Club?

RECENTLY the colleges—particularly the Eastern ones—have been telling their troubles to the newspapers. Two things, it appears, are worrying them: first, the tendency of athletics to become the chief preoccupation of those youths who are sometimes ironically called "students" and, second, the fact that more people are clamoring for entrance than the colleges can possibly, for their own good, attempt to educate. Various criteria for selection, ranging all the way from the relative attractiveness of the candidates as revealed by their photographs and family trees to rigidly prepared psychological examinations, have been suggested but all have their defects. And yet the double dilemma is much like that which faced the legendary Pullman porter who discovered one morning that he had two pairs of mismated shoes: one need only put the two problems together to find the solution.

If, for example, Harvard really wishes a small and select group of students who are attracted only by the fame of her professors and the opportunities which she offers for the acquirement of learning and culture, then let her simply abolish intercollegiate athletics for four years by way of an experiment. No one can doubt that the immediate result would be the reduction of the freshman class to a manageable size, and no one can maintain that any hardship would be done. It is highly probable that there are many worthy students of unlovely feature and unimpressive ancestry; it is also highly probable that psychological tests do not furnish a perfect criterion of that complex of qualities which make the scholar or the genius; but no man who refuses an opportunity to go to college because he is denied the privilege of enjoying the hysterics induced by a cheer-leader can maintain that he is being denied his inalienable right to the development of his mind. And as to the sound mind in a sound body, there are other and more efficacious ways of cultivating it than are afforded by intercollegiate football.

The fact is that the colleges have brought their problem upon themselves and that they have no good excuse for complaint. They have themselves elaborated the social aspects of college life, they have deliberately made the universities as attractive as possible to those who have scant interest in things intellectual, and then they bemoan the fact that they are besieged by hordes of not very serious-minded youths. What, we wonder, do they expect, when they pay five times as much for a coach as for a professor and spend ten times as much for a stadium as for a laboratory? The game which one takes is bound to depend upon the bait which one uses, and a man who opened a golf course would not be surprised to find that those who came to play were not particularly interested in metaphysics. Obviously the way to attract a group of students capable of profiting by a college education is to run a college, not a country club, and we are willing to wager that at the present moment the classrooms and the faculties of American institutions are amply sufficient to give such an education to all who really want it.

Drawn by Hendrik van Loon

The Birth of a New Idea

George Washington—The Image and the Man

By W. E. WOODWARD*

I. Schoolboy and Swain

NOWADAYS men are morose with living in a world that has grown too large for them. Morose and bitter, or defiant and gay. One need not be a clairvoyant to detect a sense of foreboding beneath the exultation over what is called modern progress. We are the victims of our own inventions; we see civilization strangely shattering before the driving power that we hoped would save it.

* * * * *

The world into which young Washington came was very different. It was by no means too large. Henry Adams, with his instinct for compact phrases, calls it a "small and cheerful world"—but both its smallness and cheerfulness were relative. People were dissatisfied, as they have always been; but then they thought they were able to lay their hands on the things that made them unhappy. Life was almost devoid of theory. If they were without poetry, they were also without hopeless dilemmas. They were a practical people, the colonial Americans. They lived under conditions that made practicality a cardinal virtue.

Now, in this small and cheerful world we see the small Washington getting a small amount of education.

There was no regular school near Augustine Washington's home, or so it seems, and George at the age of six or seven was turned over to a Mr. Hobby, sexton of a nearby church, to receive whatever sluggish pothook instruction the sexton could give.

Mr. Hobby's business was not to teach people but to bury them; and he was without renown in the field of book-learning. No matter. In a primitive society queer shifts are made. A man may be at one and the same time a horse-shoer and a dentist.

To the [illegible] George goes, his hornbook in his hand, wearing buckles on his shoes and a little coat of the color of plum.

In this churchyard school he learned the alphabet and how to make crude, curly letters. No doubt he heard the rambling story of many a departed soul and spelled the mossy headstone names while the sexton mused on the fate of some poor country Yorick.

But there was no moody Hamlet in this boy. To him a dead man was a dead man; a house was a house; and a spade was a spade. He was firmly planted in the everyday practicality that makes nations and then ruins them. The imagination that breeds vice was not in him; nor was the imagination that breeds fear.

Pretty soon the sexton was dried up; he had taught all he knew; there was no more water in that well. George had acquired a sort of vague capacity to read, a little arithmetic, and the foundation of the fantastic system of spelling that bedeviled him to the end of his days. He was never able to get the i's and the e's right in such words as "ceiling"; he always wrote "blew" when he meant the color blue; lie was "lye"; and oil was "oyl" in his orthography.

Down in Westmoreland County, near the old home of the Washingtons, a Mr. Williams presided at a more generous fount of knowledge. There George was sent, and as the school was thirty miles or so from his father's home he lived with his half-brother Augustine—the one nicknamed "Austin"—who had grown up and had a home of his own in Westmoreland.

The colorless Mr. Williams, who exists to us only as a name, appears to have specialized in mathematics. It was he who taught George the round bold handwriting that makes Washington's letters so legible.

In the science of numbers he had an apt pupil in little George, who loved arithmetic as many another boy has loved Shelley. At his tongue's end were all the weights and measures—avoirdupois, pints and gallons, cords of wood, peck of peas, long division, subtraction. I doubt if we can find in history any other character of the first importance who had a passion for counting equal to that of George Washington. During his whole life he kept his eye on the number of things. Every penny he owned and every foot of land was set down, over and over again, in the most orderly and meticulous manner.

The enumeration of things seemed to afford an outlet for a sort of mental voluptuousness. At one time when he was managing five plantations and several hundred slaves he calculated laboriously the number of seed in a pound Troy weight of red clover, and found that a pound contained 71,000 seed. Then he calculated the seed in a pound of timothy, and learned that there were 298,000. Large numbers these, but he got into astronomical dimensions when he set out to calculate the number of seed in a pound of New River grass, and discovered the total to be 844,800.

There is also, in his handwriting, a memorandum giving the number of windows in each of the houses on the Mount Vernon estate, and the "no. of Paynes" in each window.

He was never too busy to spare the time to do this counting and measuring. In 1786 he measured the exact altitude of the piazza at Mount Vernon above the high-water mark of the river, and found it to be 124 feet 10½ inches.

These are the gestures of a man who loves material possessions with an intensity that is almost passionate. His counting was limited to the enumeration of the things he possessed or which might bear some tangible relation to his possessions. In his various enumerations, treasured in the archives, there is no list of authors or of historical events or of works of art.

I cannot find that he ever wrote out his ideas in logical sequence for his own guidance as Lincoln did, and as Jefferson did.

He was not an idea-man but a thing-man.

* * * * *

In the queer mess of human destiny the determining factor is Luck. For every important place in life there are many men of fairly equal capacities. Among them Luck decides who shall accomplish the great work, who shall be crowned with laurel, and who shall fall back into obscurity and silence.

* This is the first of three instalments [illegible] by courtesy of the author and the publishers, Boni and Liveright. Another instalment will be printed next week.

Ability counts in human affairs, but Luck counts too and as one approaches the summit in any sphere of effort Luck counts more and more. The proverbial saying that there is plenty of room at the top is the reverse of the truth. There is never any room at the top, though there is plenty at the bottom. Men who reach the top arrive there through a linked-up series of fortuitous circumstances in which capacity and chance are combined.

The turning-points of lives are not the great moments. The real crises are often concealed in occurrences so trivial in appearance that they pass unobserved.

One of the important turning-points of George Washington's life was his meeting with Lord Fairfax. It is entirely probable that he did not realize its importance at any rate, he never said anything to lead us to believe that he did—but we can see it clearly now, in historical perspective.

This nobleman, who was a bachelor and past the age of fifty when he met young Washington, possessed in Virginia an almost incredible estate of five million four hundred thousand acres. He owned more land than there is in the State of New Jersey. It was all in a single tract, in the Northern Neck of Virginia; twenty-one counties have been made of it. This is a larger area of land than has ever been owned by any individual before or since in the history of the United States.

* * * * *

He [George Washington] became a youthful favorite of Lord Fairfax, but who knows why? He could ride splendidly and shoot well. Lord Fairfax liked that. Fox-hunting occupied his time, and that of his neighbors, to an extent that is almost unbelievable. There were no theaters, no fashionable assemblies, no daily papers—and but few of any kind—no elegant shops, nothing to read, and nothing to do but play cards and hunt game.

Some one writes from Belvoir to Mount Vernon: "His Lordship proposed drawing Mudd Hole tomorrow, first killing a Fox; and then to turn down a Bagged Fox before your door for ye diversion of ye Ladys. . . . We took the Fox yesterday without Hurt."

Young George Washington was dependable, forthright, and honest. No doubt Lord Fairfax liked that, too, for he had come from a land of sinuous lickspittles where Mr. Snake would, before long, flourish in "The School for Scandal." And, moreover, young Washington said very little. He did not ask the keen and searching questions which make wealthy elderly gentlemen uneasy and wonder what the world is coming to.

At that time Washington was only sixteen, but he looked much older. He was about six feet tall, with gray-blue eyes and reddish-brown hair. His hands and feet were so large that they seemed enormous. Thirty years later Lafayette said that Washington's hands were "The largest I have ever seen on a human being."

George Washington Parke Custis, his adopted son, describes his walk in this marvelous sentence: "His lower limbs, being formed methodically straight, he walked, as it were, on parallel lines."

The noble Fairfax thought the time was ripe to have his land surveyed and his titles put in order. It was high time, indeed. Farmers were coming down from Pennsylvania and settling in the Fairfax wilderness, without rhyme or reason, as bold as you please, just as if the land were not already owned by somebody else.

He gave the job of surveying the lands behind the Blue Ridge—in the Shenandoah Valley—to his relative, young George William Fairfax (son of the William of Belvoir), who was assisted by George Washington and an experienced surveyor named Mr. Genn. This is, I think, the first opportunity that George had ever had of making any money. The pay he received was large—at least so it seems to me—for he says in a letter about the job that "A Dubbleloon is my constant gain every Day that the weather will permit my going out and sometimes Six Pistoles." At that time a doubloon was the equivalent of about $7.20; and a pistole was worth $3.60; approximately.

* * * * *

Early in life Washington began to fumble with love. It was really fumbling, for he was never at ease in the technique of love and love-making. Like the art of swimming, the art of love is one of the simplest arts within human range, if one understands it. On the other hand, when it is not understood the course of love runs through a foot-tripping labyrinth in which strange, insuperable obstacles appear. Washington, I think, always found it something of a mystery.

In the presence of women he would often lose his simple forthright manner and turn himself into a pompous and mouthy sentimentalist—or else remain spellbound and silent.

My impression is that he idealized women; and most women, in their hearts, detest idealization. With good reason, too, for it puts them in a very uncomfortable position. To live every day on a plane of lofty and rather ethereal ideals is a discouraging outlook for a woman of spirit and sense, especially when the ideals have been invented by a man.

The idealization of women is one of the well-known traits of highly masculine men. They do not understand feminine thought and feeling. To them women are strange beings of a superior order. Washington was intensely masculine.

In 1748, about the time of the Fairfax surveying expedition, he wrote to somebody whom he calls "Dear Robin" about an amatory experience of his own. The affair is hazily anonymous, unfortunately. A draft of the letter is in the notebook which he used to record his survey of the Fairfax estate. As it is quite lengthy and deals with other matters, I shall quote only a pertinent extract:

> My place of Residence is at present at His Lordships* where I might was my heart disengaged pass my time very pleasantly as theres a very agreeable Young Lady Lives in the same house (Colo George Fairfax's Wife's Sister) but as thats only adding Fuel to fire it makes me the more uneasy for by often and unavoidably being in Company with her revives my former Passion for your Low Land Beauty whereas was I to live more retired from young Women I might in some measure eliviate my sorrows by burying that chast and troublesome Passion in the grave of oblivion or etarnall forgetfulness for as I am very well assured thats the only antidote or remedy that I shall be relieved by or only recess that can administer any cure or help to me as I am well convinced was I ever to attempt any thing I should only get a denial which would be only adding grief to uneasiness.

* He means Lord Thomas Fairfax.—[Author's note.]

This "Low Land Beauty" has become as famous among the biographers of Washington as the Man in the Iron Mask is among French historians. She has been identified at haphazard with half a dozen young women of Westmoreland—among them Mary Bland, Lucy Grymes, and Betsy Fauntleroy. (She could not have been Miss Fauntleroy, as that lady was only a child of eleven in 1748.)

The most convincing conjecture is that the Lowland beauty was Miss Lucy Grymes, who afterward married Henry Lee and became the grandmother of General Robert E. Lee.

Whoever she may have been, it is evident that she had left our hero in a state of despair. There is an air of impending deliquescence in his utterance. He is about to m lt away. He is through with women—at sixteen. All is vanity; all is ashes,

> Whereas was I to live more retired from young Women I might in some measure eliviate my sorrows by burying that chast and troublesome Passion in the grave of oblivion or etarnall forgetfulness.

What mooning and moping! But such maladies soon run their course. The remedy for woman is woman. Strange ailment, strange remedy.

In the same notebook that records his desolation we find, a few pages further on, this cryptic entry:

> 'Twas Perfect Love before)
> But Now I do adore (s. Young M. A. his Wife

It would appear from this sentimental note that he was adoring somebody's wife. Young M. A.'s wife.

Then we come to an acrostic in George's handwriting. Here it is:

> From your bright sparkling Eyes I was undone;
> Rays, you have; more transparent than the Sun,
> Amidst its glory in the rising Day
> None can you equal in your bright array;
> Constant in your calm and unspotted Mind;
> Equal to all, but will to none Prove kind,
> So knowing, seldom one so Young, you'l Find.
>
> Ah! woe's me, that I should Love and conceal
> Long have I wish'd, but never dare reveal,
> Even though severely Loves Pains I feel;
> Xerxes that great, was't free from Cupids Dart,
> And all the greatest Heroes, felt the smart.

You will observe that the acrostic spells "Frances Alexa[illegible]," obviously Frances Alexander. She has not been identified. The Alexanders were numerous in colonial Virginia. The next page of the notebook has been torn out, so that the last lines of the acrostic are missing.

It would be as absurd to lay much stress on these fragments as it would be to reconstruct an unknown prehistoric animal from a single bone. All that they can prove is that he was thinking of love, and that he was a young man of some little experience in such matters.

Although we know very little with certainty as to Washington's relations with women, there are some facts which we know very well. One of them is that he was never obsessed by them. He never had an overwhelming love affair. In his history there is neither a Josephine nor a Beatrice. He never took his opinions from any woman, and never went out of his way to fashion his life to make it fit any woman's conception.

However, there was one who stood large in his young life. . . .

I have mentioned a George William Fairfax who accompanied Washington on the surveying trip. He was the son of William Fairfax of Belvoir, and Lawrence Washington had married his sister. On the survey he was as lovelorn as Washington, but the result was more happy, for on his return he married Miss Sally Cary, the eldest daughter of Colonel William Cary.

Washington spent most of the winter of 1749 at Belvoir, as a guest of Young Fairfax and his wife. Persons in the vicinity who were skilled in predicting and recording emotional disturbances mentioned the occurrence at that time of numerous perturbations at Belvoir. These seismic emotions were slight, hardly worth setting down in the larger annals, but sufficiently thrilling nevertheless to warrant local attention.

Naive folk declared that young Washington was in love with Mary Cary. This young lady is mentioned in the letter to "Dear Robin"—quoted above—as staying at Lord Fairfax's house.

Alas! It was not to Miss Mary that he had given his affection, but to her married sister, Mrs. Sally Fairfax, his friend's wife. It was then all in germination, awaiting the flow of days and too nebulous to be placed in a definite category. But we shall hear of it later, with the passing of years.

It was in this period that he had another experience with girls which was dramatic enough, but not at all sentimental. One day he was taking a swim in the Rappahannock and two girls of low degree ran off with his clothes.

Only fancy! The Father of our Country standing by the river's brink in the golden sunset clad only in humorless dignity—for, although he had plenty of dignity he never had any humor—clothed in dignity, and wondering how to get home.

Eventually he got home somehow, and had the girls arrested. One of them was convicted of theft and was punished with fifteen lashes on her bare back.

* * * * *

If he was precocious in love, he was also precocious in land, and of the two passions the desire for land was the stronger.

In 1748 this boy of sixteen acquired his "Bullskin Plantation"—so named because of its proximity to Bullskin Creek. The place consisted of five hundred and fifty acres of wild land in Frederick County. He paid for it by doing work as a surveyor.

In 1750 he bought four hundred and fifty-six acres of one McCracken; a cultivated farm probably, as he paid one hundred and twelve pounds for it, which would have been a very high price for uncleared land.

Two years later he bought five hundred and fifty-two acres more, paying a hundred and fifteen pounds. Before he was twenty-one years of age he was the owner of 1,558 acres, all of which he had obtained by his own efforts.

The money for these purchases was earned by him as a surveyor. In 1748 he was recommended by Lord Fairfax for the post of official surveyor of Culpeper County, and was appointed after he had gone down to Williamsburg to take a sort of post-graduate course in the art and mystery of measurement. The county records of Virginia contain hundreds of his surveys, all drawn and annotated in his neat, clear manner.

Eliot: Iconoclast and Builder

By GLENN FRANK

THE NATION has asked me to speak of Dr. Eliot presumably because I am a very recent recruit in the ranks of university presidents and might be expected to speak in terms of a first fresh contact with an extraordinary system and situation upon which this great gray savant, more than any other American of the last half century, left the mark of his mind.

My only personal contact with Dr. Eliot was confined to a few letters, written in his precise longhand, that still lie in my files. Something of the Olympian sweep of his spirit crept even into these letters. Despite his apparent austerity and aloofness he could precipitate a deal of human warmth and power on the white paper of a letter. So that, despite my casual and tenuous contact with him, I feel that I knew him. But I shall not undertake to recapture in this brief paper the strength and savor of his personality. That may be safely left to pens dipped in a devotion more intimate and informed by a knowledge more personal than mine. I shall speak of him impersonally as an idea, a force, a symbol of a definitive epoch in the evolution of liberal education in the United States.

I cannot, however, turn to this impersonal task without venturing the opinion that one quality, more than any other, marked him off from some, at least, of his contemporaries. Dr. Eliot possessed transcendent and triumphant courage. He never soiled his soul with idolatry before the traditions either of his class or of his calling. In a profession—the university presidency—that makes for timidity and trimming, Dr. Eliot remained an executive who was not afraid to differ from his directors when necessary. He was great enough to be more interested in the progress of his purpose than in the permanence of his position.

I have sometimes thought that no man should accept the presidency of a university unless he could feel his freedom guaranteed by either of two things—an unbreakable courage or assured economic independence of his job. No man should be a university president who wants to be a university president. The call to compliance is too insidious to be resisted by the man who needs the job or is wedded to it for his own sake. No man is spiritually fitted to head a great American university, such as Dr. Eliot administered, unless he could surrender his presidency on twenty-four hours' notice without a pang rather than surrender either to alien interests or to academic inertia. I am sure that, at any moment, Dr. Eliot would have resigned from the presidency of Harvard before he would have sold out to a tradition or submitted to a demand that his intelligence had indicted.

Dr. Eliot was the ideal democrat because he was the ideal aristocrat. He put his superiority of mind and character unreservedly at the disposal of the nation. His aristocracy was an aristocracy of social power rather than an aristocracy of social position. Born into the charmed and charming circle of New England's social aristocracy, he was a member of it, but not a minion of it. He kept his mind free from automatic conformity to the dominant political, social, and economic ideas of his class. He was a modern representative of the ancient Greek conception of an aristocrat as a man deserving high honor because he had done some socially essential job in a superior manner.

Dr. Eliot was an apostle of the disinterested love of excellent performance dedicated to the service of the commonwealth. In short, he was the aristo-democrat who foreshadowed that scientific democracy which must, sooner or later, supersede the traditional democracy which at present gives its vote for bad English and baggy trousers in preference to utilizing a leadership that is wise enough and courageous enough to differ from it when necessary.

But I am doing the thing I said I would not do—I am speaking about Dr. Eliot as a person. I promised to speak of him as a symbol of a definitive epoch in the evolution of liberal education in the United States. This I will do by presenting, in the barest and briefest outline, a few considerations that must, as I see it, enter into any realistic attempt to "place" Dr. Eliot in the history of liberal education.

We must, I think, clearly distinguish between the influence Dr. Eliot exerted upon the college of liberal arts in particular and the influence he exerted upon the university in general. The influence he exerted upon the graduate and professional schools of the American university will stand as a permanently valuable contribution of educational statesmanship. His influence upon the development of the American college of liberal arts, on the other hand, will, in my judgment, ultimately be considered as having been temporary. With respect to university policy, he was a statesman for the future. With respect to college policy, he was the courageous pilot of a transition.

Along with Gilman and others, he brought to the development of graduate and professional schools that extensive scope of material and that intensive specialization of method that must always distinguish the graduate and professional schools from the college of liberal arts, in which the objective is the general enrichment and discipline of the intellectual, aesthetic, and moral capacities of the student. Dr. Eliot's contribution to university policy is, I think, unquestioned; I shall therefore leave it undiscussed.

I want merely to suggest a point of view respecting Dr. Eliot's influence upon the American college of liberal arts. When, as a lad of thirty-five, Dr. Eliot assumed directive responsibilities in American education, he found the subjects of the college curriculum few and required. When, as an elder statesman of seventy-five, he ended his career as an active administrator, the subjects of the college curriculum were many and elective. He found the college curriculum standing, like a walled city, with most of the creative intellectual activity of the time going on outside its walls among the natural scientists. He made a breach in the walls and asked the scientists in. The many new subjects introduced into the curriculum were, for a time, sniffed at by the old subjects. They were the nouveaux riches of the academic world. Greek, Latin, and mathematics, the aristocrats of the curriculum, were not happy over having to associate with such social climbers as modern languages, modern sciences, and the like. But finally the new inclusiveness won the day over the old-fashioned exclusiveness.

This was an epoch-making service. Somebody had to break the shell of the self-satisfied and inadequate curriculum of the old college. I do not mean to say that Dr. Eliot did all this single-handed. He was as much creature as creator of the movement for variety and freedom in college studies, but he played his part with such boldness and decision that for all time this epoch in college evolution will be named after him. It is casting no slight upon Dr. Eliot's statesmanship to say that certain unhappy results have followed his college reforms. He did the thing that was needed at the time. Progress follows not a straight line but a zigzag course. It was better that Dr. Eliot should swing the pendulum to an extreme rather than leave it at a dead center. His chief service to the American college was that he broke up its old curriculum. I doubt that his building of a new curriculum will fare as well at the hands of the historians of American education.

The policies of the utmost variety of subject matter in the curriculum and of the utmost freedom of election by students have not panned out according to the promises of their promoters. There is no automatic wisdom to guide students to a wise choice of studies. As I have said elsewhere, and as many others have said, the system of extreme elective freedom and extreme variety of subject matter has placed the immature student in the position of a child, ignorant of food values and the chemistry of food combinations, faced with the problem of selecting a nutritious and well-balanced meal from the bewildering offerings of a cafeteria. In both cases the result is likely to be indigestion, if not something more serious. Following the application of the principles of variety and freedom, we have reached a point at which we find ourselves citizens of an intellectual world broken into fragments. In the modern college we are suffering from a suicidal specialization by teachers and a suicidal smattering by students.

The pendulum must swing back. The danger is that it will swing back to an artificial synthesis of modern knowledge. There is a vast deal of synthesis and correlation that can be done and should be done by educational leadership. But it may be doubted that it is within our power to effect any formal and comprehensive synthesis of the whole of modern knowledge. We are already crowding too much into the college curriculum. If we try to get away from the smattering and inconsecutiveness that have resulted from the extreme variety and extreme freedom of the Eliot era by attempting to base a new curriculum on a comprehensive new synthesis of knowledge, we may find that we are trying to confine the ocean in a tin cup. We do not want our colleges to become retail stores for conclusions, even the conclusions of our ablest scholars. We are facing the challenge of a post-Eliot period in the evolution of the American college. I venture to guess that this challenge can be answered only by some radically new approach to the process of liberal education. I believe that the curriculum as we know it must go. The strictly college education of the future must, in my judgment, be greatly simplified and informalized. We shall more and more get away from the study of established precepts and devote more time to the study of evolving processes. A hundred years from now I suspect that little will be left of the rigidly departmentalized college that teaches a variety of separate studies. But all this is another story for another time.

Dr. Eliot did valiant service in breaking up the old college; he did valiant service in building up the new university. Upon these two pillars his fame must ultimately rest.

At a Workers' Vacation Camp

By MICHAEL GOLD

WHEN I was a boy growing up among the stones and heat of the East Side no one that I can remember took a vacation. The rich Jews went to the Catskills, of course, and played pinochle and discussed operations on hotel porches; and workers who had contracted consumption in the clothing-shops went to sanitariums. There were also the long heart-breaking spells of unemployment, but these were not times of joy and relaxation.

No, no worker not actually dying ever dreamed of taking a real vacation. I myself never passed a single night in the country until I was nineteen years old; I was always working. My mother and father, twenty years in America, had never seen any greener, wilder places than the meadows in Bronx Park. My father earned about $12 a week, and had three children, which is the reason we never took a vacation. And the other Jews worked fifteen and eighteen hours a day in sweatshops, lived on bread-and-herring diets, and paled, sickened, and died piously, in the traditional Ghetto manner. No vacations.

Sometimes uplifters, settlement-house ladies, C. O. S. officials, and other foreigners made benevolent raids and carried off a few of us for vacations. But there were and are half a million Jews on the lower East Side, and the few hundreds who were thus uplifted helped little in the vital statistics. The babies went on dying, the men and women withered and decayed in the shops. And my mother longed incessantly for the country; she had been raised with flowers and cows under the blue sky of a Hungarian village; and my father and his friends spent long summer nights reminiscing about the peasants and the sweet, slow peasant life in the old country. But no one ever dreamed of escaping the city for a vacation; no, that was for the rich and for the deathly sick.

There has been a revolution on the lower East Side in the past decade. I am a young man, but I have witnessed a social miracle with my own eyes. The sweatshop, once the dark symbol of the utmost in proletarian degradation in this country, has become the source of the finest labor movement in America. There are now about 150,000 organized needle-trades workers in New York, and they are militant, high-spirited, and intelligent, the vanguard of every progressive movement in this country. They average better wages now than school-teachers, they have infinitely more democratic control of their jobs than have newspapermen, and they have built up a richer and intenser mass culture than that of bank presidents or Greenwich Villagers or even Theater Guild audiences. The Jewish workers have climbed at last from the Ghetto, and have cast off the sad, self-pitying, melancholy helplessness of the Ghetto, which many minor poets consider so spiritual, but which has been a curse to the Jews for centuries. Their revolution has taught them to be their own saviors. Among other things they now take vacations.

I have just come back from two weeks spent at a cooperative camp run by and for Jewish workers. The left wing in the needle trades has built this camp, which is called Camp Nitgedaiget, meaning literally Camp No Worrying, or Camp Sans Souci. The camp is on the Hudson a few miles below Beacon, N. Y. It is a beautiful spot—a stretch of rolling earth in the midst of simple mountains by the noblest river of America. There are accommodations for seven hundred workers in tents. There is a great dining-room and meeting-hall, a canteen house, an outdoor stage. It is not easy to feed and house seven hundred people, but the workers have learned to make things run smoothly. The camp is simple and rather primitive, but everyone is comfortable and happy.

No one can come to this camp who is a boss or who owns a business of any kind. But any wage earner, and this includes intellectual workers, can come at the low rate of fifteen dollars a week. He is given clean linen and two woolly blankets and can climb to his tent among the trees to rest until the camp gong brings him down for dinner. He can sleep. He can roam the hills. He can sing in the moonlight. He can swim, take sun-baths, listen to lectures, sing in the mass chorals, act in proletarian comedies, read in the library, talk, laugh, play games, go about all day in nothing but bathing trunks until his body is brown as a faun's.

At seven-thirty, when the mists are melting before the sun, the camp is waked by a wild Indian yelling and whistling. It is Yossel, the tanned athlete who is physical director, rousing the sleepy-heads. "Get up, you hounds! Jump into your clothes! It's healthy to be up early, it's nature!" This is one of the camp jokes; when someone stubs his toe on a rock or contracts poison ivy or is battered up in soccer the others console him by saying: "Never mind, it's nature." Yossel takes the sleepy needle-workers for twenty minutes of calisthenics, then for a plunge in the cold mountain pool between the rocks. Then to breakfast. After breakfast, baseball and other summer sports. Dinner, and more fun. Supper, and still more.

The meals are excellent—honest food, almost entirely vegetarian. All the milk you can drink, good eggs, butter, cheese, black bread, fresh fruits and greens, and Jewish dairy dishes. No coffee or tea, however, and no cakes, puddings, or other heavy desserts. A simple diet, but one builds muscle on it. And no scamping or profiteering in the kitchen—this is a cooperative, not a money-making, camp.

Yiddish is the prevailing language, though English breaks out at strange moments, and half of the lectures are in English. I cannot tell how queer and new it seem to an East Sider who has grown up with a kind of prejudice against Yiddish to hear and see a baseball game conducted in Yiddish. Yes, the needle-workers play baseball at their camp. Some of them even become good players. They don't know all the rules; they sometimes protest when they should rejoice after the umpire has called ball instead of strike; they sometimes run in a straight line to second instead of to first; but they throw themselves into the game with passion. Anyway, these strike pickets, these readers of Marx and Tolstoy and Lenin and Gorki play as joyously as sandlotters. The teams are made up of all ages and both sexes, girls and men and children, anyone who can learn to swat the ball. They play a rough game of soccer too; it is the second most popular game in the workers' camp.

And there is push-ball and basketball, all as unfamiliar to them as they would be to Chinese peasants. We Jews are an ancient race, but we are a young race, too, for we are just coming out of the Ghetto and wage slavery. This is the first generation of Jews that has begun to use its body again, has begun to fight, laugh, and sing as lustily as did the armies of David. It is a revolution that has taken place.

There are many superstitions about the different races—there is the superstition that the Negro is a clown; that Latins are treacherous. And Jews are said to be physical cowards. But in the swimming pool or at the sun-bathing field at the camp one can see heroic scars and wounds on many of these pale bodies, the souvenirs of hard-fought strikes in the workers' interest. Another superstition is that all Jews are money-mad; but at Camp Nitgedaiget I never heard a word on that American subject, money.

Every Friday night at a camp-fire assembly Nicholas Buchwald, the dramatic editor of the New York Freiheit, and Jacob Fenster, a young Yiddish poet who is working as waiter at the camp, read a burlesque weekly called the Camp Yot, or, in English, the Camp Wise Cracker. The fire throws a great yellow blaze, the dark sky curves over the dark mountains and river, and the seven hundred needle-workers sit in old camp togs on the hillside chuckling at the Camp Yot. Jewish humor is rough and direct, and everyone from the camp manager to the camp dogs comes in for a salutary drubbing.

After the Camp Yot is read, volunteer tenors and sopranos sing the folk-songs of Israel and of the working class. Once someone sang a group of Italian folk-songs. Another time two guests who were grand-opera singers rose and sang Verdi and Wagner. There are recitations, choruses, and improvised dialogues.

Jacob Schaefer is one of the leading writers of choral music in the country and conducts the Freiheit chorus of 600 voices, all of them Jewish workers. Next season they are to sing Alexander Blok's revolutionary poem, The Twelve, which Schaefer has composed as a dramatic modernist mass-choral. At the camp Schaefer takes a group of vacationists each week, improvises a play with them, and teaches them a few songs, the work lyrics of Abraham Raisin, Winchewsky, and other Yiddish folk-poets. There is a concert on Saturday night, where the work is performed for the other campers.

It is amazing how these workers respond to Schaefer's direction. They learn intricate four-part harmonies in this short week, they learn to modulate, to weave strange and thrilling effects. Once Schaefer, in less than a week, drilled sixty campers in a mass recitation, a most difficult technical job. It was a success; the whole audience was shouting with the mass-declaimers at the end; the hall was a throbbing, electric unity.

The Jewish workers are taking bigger things as they climb from the Ghetto, but I am glad that, with the rest, they have taken the vacation idea too.

In the Driftway

FOR many hours the Drifter has watched his friend the Editor select manuscripts. With every mail they pour in, and if all of them were to be printed the Editor would publish each week a magazine as thick as the advertising section of the Saturday Evening Post. So he has to sift out what he can use and return what he cannot find place for. Each manuscript returned is accompanied by a little note of thanks, so the Drifter observed, and he determined to help the Editor in writing those little notes. His best effort so far has been a short letter, steeped in Oriental politeness:

EXALTED CHILD OF THE SUN:

Our insignificant paper has been honored by the receipt of a manuscript from your preeminent pen. Deeming ourselves unworthy to be the purveyors of your profound thought to the public, we herewith return your honorable manuscript, trusting that a medium fitting its surpassing virtues may be found. Words cannot convey the sense of honor and exhilaration we feel at having been singled out for the unusual distinction of reading it.

Gratefully and humbly we kiss your hand!

THE DRIFTER

BUT this did not work. It was so ingratiating that the recipient at once sent in another manuscript and the Editor's troubles began all over again. Now the Drifter has another idea. It is a formula from across seas which the Drifter ventures to translate:

DEAR FRIEND:

We are returning your manuscript with many thanks, because

1. We are at present overloaded with materials.
2. We have in your city a steady correspondent to cover the subject.
3. We do not at present wish to enlarge our staff of correspondents.
4. Your article is too long for the space available in our paper.
5. Your article is no longer up to date.
6. Your article deals with a subject well known to our readers.
7. Your article covers a subject on which we have ordered an article from another writer.
8. Your article deals with a field in which we are well supplied with materials.
9. Your article is merely advertising.
10. Your article is written illegibly.
11. Your article does not fit present-day circumstances.
12. Your article does not agree with the policy of our paper.
13. Your article arrived too late.
14. Your article is not suited to our readers (a) because of its subject matter; (b) because of its manner of presentation.
15. Your article does not, in our opinion, consider sufficiently the demands of a paper both in make-up and manner of writing.
16. Your article is more suited to a magazine than a newspaper.
17. Your article would give offense to some of our readers (a) in a political; (b) in a moral; (c) in a religious [illegible]

We ask you not to consider our rejection as implying any criticism of your work and to honor us in the future with your manuscripts. THE EDITOR

NOTHING could be more convenient and at the same time make a show of great thoroughness and exactness. The Drifter imagines the system working like this: Here comes a manuscript entitulated "Pre-Silurian Finglefangles." Numbers 6, 8, and 9. Another calls itself "Inspired Idiot or Irritable Genius?" Numbers 11, 12, and 17a. Another bears the title "Khufu, Khorsu, and Kuru." Numbers 1 to 8, 10 and 17c.

* * * * *

BUT one thing gives the Drifter pause. He fears that some day the Editor will forget to mark the pertinent numbers and a good friend of his will be overwhelmed with seventeen reasons why his article cannot be published—which would certainly be fatal. The Drifter therefore reconsiders his proposal. He will not help the Editor to a shortcut so pregnant with disaster. The Editor will have to walk safer, if more irksome, paths.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Meat-Eaters on Vacation

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Tomorrow I go to Geneva to observe Europe at the League; it is a pleasure to watch cats discussing the beauty of vegetarianism.

DHAN GHOPAL MUKERJI

Lausanne, Switzerland, August 30

Justice to Hindus

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have read with profound interest and sympathy A Woman Without a Country in your issue of August 4.

No person who looks into the matter can deny that a serious injustice has been done to many worthy persons—Hindus and others—by the Cable Act which deprives any American woman of her citizenship if she marries an alien who is ineligible to citizenship. An American man may marry any foreign woman he pleases without losing his citizenship. Why should an American woman be discriminated against?

An injustice to an even greater number of Hindus has been done by the decision rendered some two years ago by one of the judges of the United States Supreme Court, that high-caste Hindus do not belong to the white race. During the last session of Congress Senator Copeland introduced a bill ("to amend Section 2169 of the Revised Statutes"), which, if enacted into law, will change this, placing Hindus among the various peoples of the world who are classed by American law as white. This classification not only is in accord with the best scientific scholarship everywhere, but it is in harmony with the definite recommendation made by the immigration commission appointed in 1911 to investigate the subject; also it is what American courts had always accepted up to 1923.

By the passage of the Copeland bill several forms of injustice will be righted, among which are these: (1) Hindus who have been long in America, who by proper naturalization have become American citizens, and are in every way loyal will not then be unjustly and without cause deprived of their citizenship and of the protection which citizenship insures, as is now the case. (2) American women, by birth Americans, will not then, on marrying Hindus, have their citizenship taken away, and thus be made "stateless" and without legal protection, as is now the case with a considerable number. I know a highly cultured American woman who married a Hindu scholar and author who, when the marriage occurred, had for ten years been an American citizen. Of a sudden, like bolts out of a clear sky, came these two retroactive government acts, taking away the citizenship of this American woman, whose ancestors have been American since the year 1700, and of her husband, and placing them in the cruel condition of possessing no citizenship anywhere and no rights to protection by any nation.

Mr. Copeland's bill has no effect on Hindu immigration into this country. It will cause the admission of not a single additional Hindu. It simply aims to correct a great wrong that has been done perhaps inadvertently.

Poughkeepsie, N. Y., September 2 J. T. SUNDERLAND

Why New England Prospers

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Nelson Antrim Crawford might have gone further in enumerating the lines of rural industry which are enjoying a renaissance of prosperity. He appears to have overlooked the manner in which the once almost abandoned apple orchards of New England are coming into their own again. For many years there has been practically no market for the product of these orchards and they have been allowed to lapse into desuetude, but now all this is changed!

At a cost of no more than two or three dollars a barrel of cider may be obtained, which with the necessary and not at all intricate manipulation may be converted into eight or nine gallons of absolutely pure apple-jack, selling without difficulty at $15 or $16 per gallon and even more. Orchards are now spoken of as yielding so many gallons per acre instead of so many bushels.

Washington, D. C., August 28 G. F. WEEKS

In Horthy's Hungary

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: With the recent conviction of Matthias Rakosi and 54 other Communists and left-wing Socialists by the Bethlen-Horthy Government, the number of prisoners who are being held in Hungary solely for their political views reaches several hundreds. These political prisoners are chiefly left-wing Socialists, Communists, and Liberals. The Government has been ruthless in the suppression of freedom of speech and of the press. Vilag, the best Hungarian-language paper, has been suppressed and its editor, Charles Feleky, imprisoned because of a single article which did not meet with the approval of government officials. Socialist and even conservative papers have been outlawed for criticizing Horthy or even the old Hapsburg family, a bit of Bethlen strategy calculated to win royalist support.

Authors of newspaper or magazine articles are being sentenced to prison terms of from one to five years under a law entitled "A Bill for the More Efficient Protection of the Country's Interests." Count Michael Karolyi, Professor Oscar Jaszi, and other statesmen and scientists have been indicted under this measure. Rakosi and the 35 of the others recently tried in Budapest were sentenced to terms varying from eight and a half years to ten months.

The families of these prisoners are in desperate need. No relief is officially permitted. Dominant sentiment is hostile to any movement in behalf of political prisoners or their kin and the relief distributed through foreign agencies has to be managed with discretion. This committee is, however, in contact with trustworthy agents in Hungary who are able to distribute relief to prisoners' families.

A correspondent has recently written to the committee:

> We have men and women released from prison from time to time and they need immediate help for mind and body. Last week I distributed parcels of food to 70 families of political prisoners. You must see how I need funds to carry on this work. Unemployment is fearful and educational [illegible] almost impossible to get work. Sons of former teachers are barred from schools. Others, poets and journalists, are blacklisted. We must [illegible]. It seems in America there came off the screen [illegible]. I'm sure they would send time at once.

Will those of your readers who are interested to help, send contributions to the International Committee for Political Prisoners, Room 410, 2 West 13th Street, New York City?

New York, August 27.

ROGER N. BALDWIN
NORMAN THOMAS
ELIZABETH GURLEY FLYNN
JOHN HAYNES HOLMES
WILBUR THOMAS

So-So Figures

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In The Nation for September 15 appears this:

> In Brandfort the monthly death-rate for children, multiplied by twelve, reached the ghastly figure of 1,918 per 1,000, and in Bloemfontein the monthly death-rate for women, similarly multiplied, produced an annual figure of 1,554 per 1,000.

How come? Can the parts be greater than the whole? Can some children die more than once apiece?

A mere teacher of law—how can I hope to comprehend such statistical subtleties? I can't! I can think only of Carolyn Wells's wise-crack:

> There was a young Lady of Skye
> With a shape like a capital "I."
> She said, "It's too bad,
> But then—I can pad,"
> Which shows one that figures can lie!

Do The Nation's figures lie? If so, how so? If I saw them in the Sun they would be so, of course. But, being in The Nation, are they merely so-so? Or aren't they so at all?

Lawrence, Kansas, September 12 THOMAS A. LARREMORE

[Our figures were so; our expression of them only so-so. Each month more than a twelfth of the prison population died. The annual death-rate was therefore more than 100 per cent—high enough to wipe out the prisoners in less than a year.—EDITOR THE NATION.]

Professor Sam, Militarist

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your interest in Uncle Sam as a professor of militarism prompts me to send you the following dispatch from the Paris Herald of June 8, 1926:

> Washington.—A startling development in the Tacna-Arica situation may be expected shortly. It will show the United States in the versatile role, it is said, of endeavoring with one hand to make peace between two nations which [illegible] employing the other hand to sell machines of war to at least one of the Powers involved in the historic controversy.
>
> The War Department, it appears, has granted four [illegible] of the flying corps, with permission "to go abroad." Lieutenant Doolittle either is in Chile already or is on his way there. His mission is to demonstrate and sell to the Chilean Government the latest type of pursuit airplanes used in the American army. These pursuit planes are the fighting planes of the air. They have a speed of 180 miles an hour and are the principal weapon of defense and offense in aerial warfare.

Paris, France, August 31 FLORENCE BAYARD KANE

Books and Plays

Dream of the Corn

By HAL SAUNDERS WHITE

Above these frozen furrows
The glancing gold of the sun
Is the dream of the corn.

Under the snow
The close black greeting;
The ultimate song.

Under the snow
The ageless tremors meet
In uncreated harmony;
Seeds tick thin earthquakes to the pressing soil;
Ever the dumb, sad pulse beats slow;
Thin, blind, white fingers tremble
And twitch an endless music on
Under the snow. . . .

Harvest has song here:
Through an unborn dawn goes the song of the reapers
Under the snow;
Through a night unending,
Processional and dim dance
Of corn-blades, liquid under the moon.

In the tick of the seed, strong song of the reapers. . . .

Ageless and dark runs the harmony of harvest;
The gold of the sun is the dream of the corn.

Sleight of Hand

The Story of Philosophy. By Will Durant. Simon and Schuster. $5.

MR. DURANT'S book is probably no worse than its fellow outlines, but it commits the typical sins. Its many admirers have been thrilled, excited, awakened, and refreshed by the apparition Mr. Durant has given them of philosophy made as humanly familiar and as readily intimate as a street-walker. They were left cold by their college courses and their college texts when philosophy was conventionally "dry as dust." They have now been startled to enthusiastic warmth by the anecdotal richness of Mr. Durant's treatment, by the lightness of his touch in the handling of ponderous problems, which too often is sleight of hand; by the superficial clarity, the punning humor, and the real charm of his style. But they would again be frozen to disinterest, averted, perhaps even maddened by the vision of philosophy unhumanized, in the austerity of its logical structure, starkly complex and persistently dialectical. They would not see this beauty naked. Instead they would see eristic and technical obfuscation, bloodless abstractions, and colossal irrelevance to life. They would hardly call this magnificent, as Mr. Dorsey did "The Story of Philosophy"; but it would be philosophy, and there are some who find it lovely to behold.

In this the book's central blindness lies, that philosophy is conceived in a manner which would be rudely uncongenial, if not directly heretical, to the minds of the philosophers Mr. Durant has chosen to sketch sympathetically. Where he has achieved sympathetic insight into a philosophic system it has been largely on the side of its vital motivations rather than in terms of its dialectical intent. His implicit acceptance of the pragmatic attitude toward the history of philosophy is the one exception, an exception which makes his lack of appreciation for antithetical viewpoints the more distressing, since the pragmatic conception of philosophy is the unacknowledged, pervasive doctrine of the book, underlying its exposition of thinkers to whom pragmatism would have been unintelligible. This doctrine commits the fallacy of genetic interpretation. It assumes that ideas are to be exhaustively understood and their validity estimated in terms of their origins; that philosophies are most significantly revealed as biographical items in a socio-politico-economic context. Greek mathematics "grew with increasing complexity of exchange, astronomy with the increasing audacity of navigation." Aristotle, we are told, associated himself with the Macedonian group in Athenian politics, and it is "only with this situation in mind" that we shall "understand Aristotle's political philosophy." This kind of genetic criticism is extremely flexible and reversible. We are introduced to Spinoza by an elaborate delineation of the essential Hebraism of his nature, necessary for comprehending his thought; and then later we find that "he had a northern hunger for truth rather than the southern hunger for beauty." Schopenhauer expresses Europe's reaction to the devastation of the Napoleonic wars in his philosophy of quietism; whereas Hegel, his contemporary, prepares Europe for its next war by stressing the indispensability of strife and conquest in development. Whether such statements be true or false makes no difference to the point of criticism. Mr. Durant has been so anxious to interlace philosophy with life that he has completely missed the possible contrary perception that philosophy has had an isolated intellectual status, uninfluential in the social and economic nexus, and uninfluenced thereby. The thinker may be described biologically; thinking may be a psychological process, susceptible to various psychoanalyses; but thought itself—and here is Mr. Durant's blindness—has a logical structure dispersed from life and a life of its own in discourse which is purely dialectical. In this very fact lies the joy of philosophy, the delight which Mr. Durant continually tries to convey to his readers without ever really enjoying it himself.

The character of the errors in many cases forces one to suspect an uncritical reliance on secondary sources. From the viewpoint of philosophical clarity there is no difference between Mr. Durant's chapters on Plato, Aristotle, Spinoza, and Kant and similar sections in the usual textbook treatments; but Mr. Durant is more readable and therefore more dangerous. One meets not only with obtuseness but with inconsistencies in the exposition. James, we learn, began with psychology, "not as a metaphysician who loves to lose himself in ethereal obscurities"; his "Principles of Psychology" is "a fascinating mixture of anatomy, philosophy, and analysis; for in James, psychology still drips from the foetal membranes of its mother, metaphysics." There are lapses of another kind, in historical accuracy, in the unqualified report of questionable anecdotes, and in the general historical perspective. The book includes a table of philosophic affiliations which is most amusing on the contemporary level, Santayana deriving from French and British epistemologists and out of relation to Plato, Aristotle, and Spinoza; Russell and Dewey both stemming from Spencer, Dewey, the brilliant young Hegelian out of all relation to Hegel, and Russell, the student of Leibniz. Leibniz is not even mentioned. The most offensive, if the least important, of all Mr. Durant's sins is the vaudevillian character which informs the whole work. One can almost forgive him the bad taste of his punning and his little jokes; but one cannot brook the bald and blatant bombast of innumerable summaries of this sort: "Here [in Aristotle's works] is the Encyclopedia Britannica of Greece: every problem under the sun and about it finds a place; no wonder there are more errors and absurdities in Aristotle than in any other philosopher who ever wrote"!

It is not inharmonious with what has gone before to add that "The Story of Philosophy" is a very good book of its kind. But what of its kind? Plato was clear on this point. The poets were banished for writing stories about the gods. Diogenes and Mr. Durant would have been exiled with them for telling stories about the philosophers. Not that gossips and collectors of opinions could have harmed the real philosophers who ruled the perfect state; simply that lack of insight into the relation between discourse and truth would have offended them.

MORTIMER J. ADLER

The New Asceticism

Tarr. By Wyndham Lewis. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

WHEN first published some ten years ago this newly reissued novel was not less than prophetic. Here, before the appearance of Mr. Joyce's major work or Mr. T. S. Eliot's "Wasteland," was fully displayed the temper if not the technique of the most significant work which has appeared in England since that time. Not only did Mr. Lewis detach himself without apparent effort from all the preoccupations, sociological or sentimental, of the contemporary novel but in his hero Tarr, a lonely and savage intelligence fighting ruthlessly to keep himself free from the shabby emotional compromises of his fellows, he created a type which has appeared again and again, not so much because Tarr has been imitated as because he is a genuinely typical figure, the inevitable embodiment of a prevalent mood. Something of the novel's boldness, of its straightforward analysis of characters and situations which lie outside the beaten track of fiction, may be due to "Dubliners" or "The Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man"; but more is doubtless due to the fact that Mr. Lewis was not a novelist but a painter and that he could go directly at his material without ever being diverted for an instant into the grooves which novelists have worn.

It is against the background of "artistic" Paris—that shabby international bourgeois bohemia into which there drift a hundred disorganized nondescripts for one genius—that Tarr is projected, and the background is observed through eyes made keen with hate. Yet it is not upon this background—important only because its chaos permits the development to logical extremes of temperaments which a patterned society tends to hold in check—but upon Tarr himself, together with his messy-minded foil, Kreisler, that the interest is focused; and if the chief problem with which Lewis and his hero have to deal is the problem of sex, there is, nevertheless, no touch of that banality into which the sex novel in the romantico-sentimental vein of H. G. Wells has fallen. Here is no bourgeois pother about the "right to love"—a right which no competent intellect, accustomed to moral self-determination, has, during the last half century, failed to avail itself of as often as it thought desirable—but instead the struggle of a robust mind to think its way through the maze of nature to freedom.

Now, if we set aside the ascetic ideal, there are two ways in which the artist—and within the meaning of that term should be included whoever has a plan of his own for life which he sets against the banal plan of nature—may deal with sex. The first of these is what may be called the romantic way. Its aim is to sublimate and infuse; it surrounds sex with a mystical poetry, and while it makes of love an art it inevitably tends, at the same time, to devote art to love. It recoils in horror from the crude stuff of animal passion, but it nevertheless makes the most important fact of existence and it so diffuses the sex impulse as to invest everything with a subdued and perhaps disguised eroticism. Its painting, its fiction, its music, and even its religion, though they may be delicate and even prudish, are as saturated with sex as the pictures of Greuze or the novels of Thackeray. This was the Victorian way, and this, only slightly modified, was the way both of the lurid nineties and of the solemn age of H. G. Wells. But there is another way which, for better or worse, has revealed itself in much that is most significant in contemporary literature and which represents an effort to escape from the wearisome omnipresence of love. There are men—artists at least in the broad sense defined above—who resent this erotic tyranny, who, with no religiously ascetic ideal, demand some intellectual realm, some domain of art, which shall be free from this carnal preoccupation and who revolt against the ideal of romantic love because romanticization has involved, or at least made possible, this universal diffusion. They feel no more as battle against the flesh, they have no desire to waste their energies in a futile struggle against the demands of the natural man, and they preach no stern denials; they would make of love a game, a joke, or even a ribaldry in order that it may be kept in its place, that it may be reduced to an incident. Such, I take it, is the meaning of the obscenities which crowd the pages of such intellectual writers as Joyce and Eliot, and such, I deduce, is the philosophy of Tarr. Nothing could be less elevated than his relations with the women he knows; but (or rather, as he implies, therefore) "The tendency of my work, as you may have noticed, is that of an invariable severity. Apart from its being good or bad, its character is ascetic rather than sensuous, and divorced from immediate life. There is no slop of sex in that." It is, indeed, curious how few of the moralists who, seizing upon a fashionable word, sing the praise of "sublimation" seem to realize that sublimation implies an almost universal diffusion.

It can hardly be said that Tarr, for all his efforts, achieves to any remarkable extent the inward peace for which he struggles, and in general a cynic might remark of the whole school of writers here described that if their aim was to decrease their preoccupation with sex the evidence of their books would point to a singular lack of success. But our present concern is with nothing except an elucidation of the thought underlying a specific novel and a judgment upon it as a piece of fiction. "Tarr" is not quite easy reading for the very reason that it does not contain a single cliche, but there is not a page which does not reveal a fresh observation and a keen mind.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Comparative Superstition

This Believing World. By Lewis Browne. The Macmillan Company. $3.50.

HERE is a book that should give the fundamentalists fits. About five years ago they laid down five points: the inerrancy and infallibility of the Bible; the Virgin Birth and the complete deity of Christ; the resurrection of the same body that was buried; the substitutionary atonement of Jesus for the sins of the world; the second coming of Jesus in bodily form, according to the Scriptures. Mr. Browne effectually discounts these points by showing that they are more or less common to all religions. Thus the Koran to the faithful Mohammedans is inerrant and infallible; legend recounts that the god Attis was conceived immaculately in the womb of a virgin; the kindred myths of Adonis, Dionysus, Orpheus, and Osiris spread through the Mediterranean basin the notion of the resurrection; substitutionary atonement existed in the widely extended cult of Cybele and in the rite of Tauroboleum, or salvation through blood; while the second coming of a Messiah was found in Zoroastrianism and Persian Mithraism as well as in Judaism.

Mr. Browne nowhere specifically attacks the peculiar type of Protestant mind which considers that it possesses the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. He is not controversial but comparative in his methods. He insinuates his devastating information, and as a study in ethnic religions his book is most effective in discussing the historic origins of dogma. It properly begins with the prehistoric religions, and here, in the dark backward and abysm of time, it finds the fount of

